"An," as used in a claim for a patent for "an" artificial slate, fairly implies that the claim is for material having form and dimensions, and not to a new substance in mass. Plastic Fireproof Const. Co. v. City & County of San Francisco (U. S.) 97 Fed. 620, 623.

The article "an" is equivalent to "any," so that Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that "an" action may be dismissed on paying costs, etc., will be held to apply to an action in interpleader. Kaufman v. Superior Court of City & County of San Francisco, 46 Pac. 904, 905, 115 Cal. 152.

"An" originally meant "one," and is seldom used to denote plurality, so that Code Cr. Proc. § 840, providing that "an" overseer of the poor may bring an action to inquire into the facts of a bastard case, authorizes one overseer to bring such action. People v. Ogden, 40 N. Y. Supp. 827, 828, 8 App. Div. 464.

ANACOLUTHON.

An "anacoluthon" is an incomplete proposition, as, for instance, the following section of Act March 25, 1831 (an act assessing a tax on personal property), in which personal property made taxable by the provisions of the act is described as "all ground rents or moneys at interest, and all debts due from solvent debtors, whether by promissory notes, (except bank notes) penal or single bill, upon judgment, mortgage, stocks," etc., as the word "whether," as there used, requires some correlative. Voegtly v. Third Ward School Directors of City of Alleghany, 1 Pa. (1 Barr) 330, 331.

ANÆSTHETIC.

An "anæsthetic" is "that which produces insensibility to pain." Webst. Dict. It is a word in common use in the vernacular of the language, and has a well-settled meaning which is not local and cannot be regarded as technical or peculiar. It was therefore proper for the court to give such definition to the jury. State v. Baldwin, 12 Pac. 318, 328, 36 Kan. 1.

ANALOGOUS FORMS.

The expression "analogous forms" in Code 1876, § 4824, declaring that forms of indictment given in the Code are sufficient in all cases in which they are applicable, and providing that "analogous forms" may be used in other cases, was held to mean analogous to the forms given, which states the material facts of the offenses to which they are applicable, and not analogous to such forms given as do not include a statement of the material facts. Smith v. State, 63 Ala. 55, 58.

ANALYSIS.

An "analysis" is a scientific, accurate ascertainment of the elements and their proportion contained in a substance submitted for examination by chemical processes. Shivers v. Newton, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 469, 475.

ANARCHIST.

An "anarchist" is defined by Webster to be "an anarchy," one who excites revolt or promotes discord in the state; hence to publish a false account of a person, describing him as an anarchist, is libel per se, since one who advocates anarchy is liable thereby to be brought into hatred or contempt. Cervený v. Chicago Daily News Co., 28 N. E. 692, 693, 139 Ill. 345, 13 L. R. A. 864.

"Anarchy," as generally understood, is avowed hostility to all governments and open antagonism to all political parties, every one of which professes to support some form of government, and generally that which its members consider the best. It cannot be doubted that all law-abiding, right-thinking men regard with abhorrence the individual who justifies or approves of the bloody and atrocious means to which anarchists resort, the world over, in furtherance of their reckless and revolutionary designs against every form of government and against every right of property. It is equally apparent that to accuse another of being an anarchist in the sense in which the term is generally accepted is to accuse him of that which will inevitably injure his reputation and expose him to obloquy and ignominious reproach. Lewis v. Daily News Co., 32 Atl. 246, 247, 81 Md. 466, 29 L. R. A. 59.

ANARCHY.

Anarchy is the absence of government. It is a state of society where there is no law or supreme power. If the conspiracy had for its object the destruction of the law and the government, and of the police and militia as representatives of the law and government, it had for its object the bringing about of practical anarchy. Spies v. People (Anarchists' Case), 12 N. E. 865, 987, 122 Ill. 1, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320.

"The point and pith of the offense of anarchists is that they teach the doctrine that the pistol, the dagger, and dynamite may be used to destroy rulers. The teaching of such horrid methods of reaching an end is the offense. It is poor satisfaction, when one of their dupes has consummated the results of their teaching, to catch him and visit upon him the consequences of his acts. The evil is untouched if we stop there. In this class of cases the courts and the public have too long overlooked the fact that crimes and offenses are committed by written or spoken words. We have been punishing offenders in other lines for words spoken or written, without waiting for an overt act of injury to persons or property. The press is restrained by the law of libel from the too free use of words. Individuals can be punished for words spoken or written, even though no overt act of physical injury follow. It is the power of words that is the potent force to commit crimes and offenses in certain cases. No more striking illustration of the criminal power of words could be given, if we are to believe the murderer of our late President, than that event presents. The assassin declared that he was instigated and stimulated to consummate his foul deed by the teachings of Emma Goldman. He is now awaiting execution for the crime, while she is still at large in fancied security. A person may advocate any change of our government by lawful and peaceful means, or may criticise the conduct of its affairs, and get as many people to agree with him as he can, so long as he does not advocate the commission of crime as the means through which he is to attain his end. If he advocates stealthy crime as the means of reaching his end, he, by that act, commits a crime for which he can be punished. The distinction we have tried to point out has been too long overlooked. If our conclusions are sound, it is the teachers of the doctrine who can and ought to be punished. It is not necessary to trace and establish the connection between the teaching of anarchy and a particular crime of an overt nature. The liberty of conscience, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, do not need such concessions to save to the fullest extent unimpaired those sacred rights of a free people." People v. Most, 73 N. Y. Supp. 220, 222, 36 Misc. Rep. 139.

ANCESTOR.

See "Collateral Ancestors."

In its legal sense "ancestor" means the person from whom an estate passed, and not a progenitor, as in popular acceptance. Bailey v. Bailey, 25 Mich. 185, 188.

"In most of our English dictionaries the word 'ancestor' is defined to be one from whom a person descends, and some of the law dictionaries agree substantially in this definition. But this is its popular and not its legal meaning. In Termes de la Ley it is said that this word in a forensic sense is more properly applied to the prepossessor of an estate than to the ancestor of a family, and in this sense it is frequently, and, indeed, most generally, used in books which treat of descent, of real estate, and in statutes relating to that subject. Mr. Burrill in his Law Dictionary derives the word in question from 'antecedere,' 'to go before,' and defines it, when used in the law of descents, to be one who has gone before or preceded in the seisin or possession of real estate; a deceased person from whom an estate has passed to another by operation of law in consequence of his decease; the person last seised of an estate of inheritance, and from whom such estate is transmitted to the heir. Blackstone, in his chapter on 'Descents' (2 Comm. 201), uses the word 'heir' and 'ancestor' as correlative terms." McCarthy v. Marsh, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 263, 275.

"Ancestor" is a term, in a forensic sense, more properly applied to the possessor of an estate than to an ancestor of the family, and is defined as one who has gone before or preceded in the seisin or possession of real estate, and such is its use in 1 Rev. St. p. 749, § 4, providing that, when any real estate subject to a mortgage executed by any ancestor shall descend to an heir, such heir shall satisfy and discharge the mortgage out of his own property, without resorting to the executor of his ancestor. In re Kene's Estate, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1078, 1079, 8 Misc. Rep. 102, 103.

Any one from whom an estate is derived by act of law and right of blood is in a proper legal sense an ancestor. Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Handy, 52, 56; Prickett's Lessee v. Parker, 3 Ohio St. 394, 395; Brower v. Hunt, 18 Ohio St. 311, 338; Cliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501, 504.

"Ancestor," in common parlance, is one from whom a person may be descended; but the word must be taken in connection with the whole subject-matter of the act or instrument in which it is used. Brewster v. Benedict, 14 Ohio, 368, 385.

The word "ancestor" is an ambiguous one, broad enough to include, but not necessarily including, parents, grandparents, and all persons in the ascending line as far as relation can be traced. One of its antonyms is "descendant." An allegation that the ancestors of the plaintiffs are buried in a certain graveyard is not equivalent to an allegation that the plaintiffs' parents were buried there, or that the plaintiffs are the heirs of the persons there buried. No one is the heir of all his ancestors. Mitchell v. Thorne, 32 N. E. 10, 12, 134 N. Y. 536, 30 Am. St. Rep. 699.

No person can be an "ancestor" of an intestate, within the meaning of the statute of descent providing that when any person shall die intestate having title to land which has come to him from any ancestor it shall descend in a certain manner, unless he is of the blood of the intestate, and the decisions in the state enlarging the common-law definition of "ancestor" in its application to our statutes of descent are all consistent with this view, as they are without exception cases in which the person adjudged the ancestor was of the same blood as the person whose ancestor he was held to be. Birney v. Wilson, 11 Ohio St. 426, 431.

Child.

An "ancestor" is the person from whom the inheritance devolves upon the heir, and a child may be the "ancestor" of his parent. Lavery v. Egan, 9 N. E. 747, 749, 143 Mass. 389.

An "ancestor" primarily means one who goes before, a progenitor; but in the law relating to the devolution of property the word "ancestor" is sometimes used in the sense that a son may be the "ancestor" of his father. Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522.

Collaterals.

The term "ancestor," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 753, § 15, concerning descents, providing that in case an inheritance came to an intestate by devise or descent from one of his "ancestors," when used with reference to the descent of real property, embraces collaterals as well as lineals through whom an inheritance is derived. Righter v. Ludwig, 80 N. Y. Supp. 16, 19, 39 Misc. Rep. 416 (citing Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67).

"'Ancestor' is an ambiguous word, broad enough to include, but not necessarily including, all persons in the ascending line as far as relationship can be traced." Mitchell v. Thorne, 32 N. E. 10, 12, 134 N. Y. 536, 30 Am. St. Rep. 699.

St. 1851, c. 211, provided that every illegitimate child should be considered as heir of his mother and of any maternal ancestor, and that his issue might take by descent from such ancestor. Held, that the word "ancestor" as there used was limited to progenitors or ancestors in the direct ascending line, according to the common meaning in which the word is used in the statutes of descent, and hence an illegitimate child was not entitled to take under such statutes from his mother's collateral kindred. Pratt v. Atwood, 108 Mass. 40, 42.

"Ancestor," as used in the statute of descents relating to a devise or deed or gift from any "ancestor," does not mean one from whom the estate, had it not been devised or given, would have come in the regular course of descents. It is not to be confined to its original meaning of one from whom a person lineally descended, but means of the same blood as a taker. Any one from whom an estate is derived by act of law and right of blood is in a legal sense an ancestor. "In the idea of the term 'ancestor' there are two things to be observed, the character of the estate and the personal relationship, or the act of law and the right of blood;" and it was in view of this personal relationship and right of blood that the words "any ancestor" were used in the statute. A capacity to inherit, kindred to common stock or inheritable blood, will suffice to constitute one an ancestor of another. Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Handy, 52, 55.

In a statute declaring that relatives of the half blood shall inherit equally with them of the whole blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance goes to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his "ancestors," in which case all those not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance, it is held that the word "ancestor" designates the ancestors of the intestate in the right line, as father and mother, grandfather and grandmother, and does not include collateral relatives as brothers and sisters. The term is not the equivalent of the expression "the parent or other kindred of the intestate." Valentine v. Wetherill, 31 Barb. 655, 659.

The word "ancestors" in its ordinary meaning includes those from whom the person spoken of is lineal descendant, either on the father's or mother's side; and whenever this word is intended to be used in a sense which is different from its ordinary import of lineal ascendants, or in the enlarged sense of "antecessors," so as to embrace all of the blood relatives of the person referred to who have preceded him, it is qualified or enlarged by some other term to show that it is not used in its natural sense merely. Banks v. Walker, 3 Barb. Ch. 438, 446, 447.

The inference is plain, says Judge Foot in McCarty v. Marsh, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 263, that the word "ancestor" as used in the statutes is not limited in its meaning to lineal ancestors or progenitors. "Hence the inference is pretty plain that our revisers and Legislature used the term 'any ancestor,' without the qualifying words 'lineal' or 'collateral,' with the intent of embracing ancestors of both classes. If they had designed to include the one and exclude the other, it is almost, if not quite, certain, they would have used the appropriate qualifying words." In re Reeve, 77 N. Y. Supp. 936, 938, 38 Misc. Rep. 409.

As immediate ancestor.

"Ancestor," as used in Rev. St. 1866, p. 415, declaring that the real estate which came to an intestate from his parent or "ancestor" shall belong equally to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, signifies the one from whom the estate immediately descended, and not to a remote ancestor. Buckingham v. Jacques, 37 Conn. 402, 403; Clark v. Shaller, 46 Conn. 119, 121.

The expression "ancestor," as used in the statute regulating descent of personal estates, and providing that if an intestate had no children the estate should pass to the brothers and sisters of the intestate who may be of the blood of the "ancestor from whom the estate came," means the ancestor from whom the estate was immediately inherited. Prickett's Lessee v. Parker, 3 Ohio St. 394, 395; Clayton v. Drake, 17 Ohio St. 367, 373; Oliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501, 504.

The word "ancestors," as last used in 1 Rev. St. p. 752, § 615, entitling an ancestor to inherit from an intestate unless the inheritance came to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such "ancestor" shall be excluded from such inheritance, is to be construed as meaning the immediate ancestor from whom the intestate received the inheritance, devise, or gift. Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67, 70.

Infant brother.

"'Ancestor,' as used in a statute of descent, means any one from whom the estate is inherited. In this sense an infant brother may be an 'ancestor' of an adult brother, the former having died, and his estate having come to the latter as his heir." Murphy v. Henry, 35 Ind. 442, 450.

Living parent.

"Ancestor," according to its accurate and legal meaning, designates one's forefathers, etc., in a direct line, who are dead, the word not applying to a living parent. Hillen v. Iselin, 39 N. E. 368, 371, 144 N. Y. 365.

ANCESTRAL PROPERTY.

"Ancestral property" is realty which comes to one by descent or devise from a now dead ancestor, or by deed of actual gift from a living one, there being no other consideration than that of blood, as distinguished from "nonancestral property," which is realty which comes to one in any other way. Brown v. Whaley, 49 N. E. 479, 480, 58 Ohio St. 654, 65 Am. St. Rep. 793.

ANCESTRY.

The term "ancestry," within the rule that questions of ancestry and pedigree may be proven by general reputation, is not limited to the ancestry or pedigree of the human race, but is equally applicable whether the question concerns horses, cattle, dogs, or men. Citizens' Rapid Transit Co. v. Dew, 45 S. W. 790, 791, 100 Tenn. 317, 40 L. R. A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754.

ANCHOR.

Lying at anchor, see "Lying."

ANCHOR WATCH.

"Mr. Dana, in his Dictionary of Sea Terms, p. 129, describes an 'anchor watch' as a 'small watch of one or two men kept while in port.' Capt. Totten, in the Naval Text-Book and Dictionary, p. 443, defines it as 'watch of three or four men kept constantly on deck and stationed at one of the anchors while riding at single anchor, to see that the stoppers, painters, cables, and buoy ropes are ready for immediate use.' It is the duty of the anchor watch to do whatever may be needful or possible to prevent a collision, but it is not bound to take active measures to get the vessel out of the way of a vessel under command approaching in broad daylight, nor to hail such vessel unless its vessel is discovered to be unseen." The Lady Franklin (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 934, 935.

ANCIENT.

The word "ancient," as applied to lights, ways, foundations, etc., means such lights, ways, etc., as have been used as such more than 20 years with acquiescence. Eno v. Del Vechio, 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 53, 63.

The word "ancient," as used in Const. art. 2, § 2, which recognizes the state's "ancient" right of eminent domain and of taxation, means old, "that existed in former times, and is not used rhetorically for the purpose of conveying the information that such rights always existed here and in the governments whence ours is derived." It is limiting and qualifying, and alludes to those powers of imposing and modes of collecting, based upon necessity and immemorial usage, or, rather, common usage which had been theretofore employed. It justifies them and such analogous modes of collection as might rest upon the same principle with the other, and merely means the power to impose and collect taxes by the ordinary methods. Bagley v. Castile, 42 Ark. 77, 87.

ANCIENT DEED.

A deed 30 years old, and proven to have come from a proper place of custody, is known as an "ancient deed," and may be admitted in evidence without proof of its execution. Havens v. Seashore Land Co., 20 Atl. 497, 501, 47 N. J. Eq. (2 Dick.) 365.

An "ancient deed" is one more than 30 years old, and having nothing suspicious about it, which is presumed to be genuine without express proof. Davis v. Wood, 61 S. W. 695, 698, 161 Mo. 17.

ANCIENT DEMESNE.

"Ancient demesne" is a title to land terra regis recorded in the Domesday Book, and no other. In other words, it is a recorded title derived from the King. Tenants holding such land under the English tenures were free as to their persons, but not as to their estates. Hunt v. Burn, 1 Salk. 57.

"Ancient demesnes" were manors which, during the period of William the Conqueror, were held by the Crown, each of which was so recorded in the Domesday Book. Tenure in ancient demesne might be pleaded in abatement to an action of ejectment. Rust v. Roe, 2 Burrows, 1046; Baker v. Wich, 1 Salk. 56, 57.

ANCIENT DOCUMENTS.

The term "ancient documents" is used to designate a class of documents which are admitted in evidence without proof of execution, their admissibility as ancient documents being based on the presumption and theory that the attesting witnesses are dead. The term includes a deed more than 30 years old received by the owner of land from his grantor, its proper custodian. White v. Farris, 27 South. 259, 261, 124 Ala. 461.

ANCIENT LIGHTS.

"Ancient lights" is the right to the enjoyment of lights or windows which have existed for 20 years with the acquiescence of the owner of the adjoining ground, it being a decisive presumption of a right to maintain such lights unobstructed by grant or otherwise, unless contradicted or explained. Wright v. Freeman (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 467, 477.

"Ancient lights" is a doctrine of the common law protecting the windows and openings of a man's house which have remained open for a time sufficient to authorize a presumption of a grant to keep them open by the adjoining owner which will prevent the erection of a building on the adjoining lot in such a manner as to shut off light and air. Thus, where one sells a messuage, having doors or openings into a vacant lot adjoining belonging to the vendor, without reserving a right to build on such lot or to stop the windows and doors, neither such vendor nor his grantee of such lot can lawfully stop them. No lapse of time is necessary to confirm the plaintiff's rights. He may maintain his action for such a nuisance immediately after his purchase, as well as after the lapse of 20 or 40 years. Story v. Odin, 12 Mass. 157, 160, 7 Am. Dec. 46. See, also, to the same effect, Swansborough v. Coventry, 9 Bing. 305.

The English doctrine sustaining the right to ancient lights and windows based on 20 years' user is not generally applicable in the United States, since to adopt it would greatly interfere with and impede the rapid changes and improvements constantly going on in towns and cities. Cherry v. Stein, 11 Md. 1, 7. See, also, 3 Kent, Comm. 448; Mahan v. Brown (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 261, 28 Am. Dec. 461; Myers v. Gemmel (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 537; Pierre v. Fernald, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 436, 46 Am. Dec. 573; Ingraham v. Hutchinson, 2 Conn. 584, 597; Napier v. Bulwinkle (S. C.) 5 Rich. Law, 311; Hoy v. Sterrett (Pa.) 2 Watts, 331, 27 Am. Dec. 313.

ANCIENT RENTS.

"Ancient rents" is rent which has previously been reserved for the messuage if the building was not under lease. Orby v. Mohun, 2 Vern. 542, 544. See, also, Payne v. Whale, 7 East, 274, 279.

ANCIENT WATER COURSE.

"A water course is ancient if the channel through which it naturally runs has existed from time immemorial. Whether it is entitled to be called an 'ancient water course,' and, as such, legal rights acquired and lost in it, does not depend upon the quantity of water it discharges. Many ancient streams which, if dammed up, would inundate a large region of country, are dry a great portion of the year. If the face of the country is such that it necessarily collects in one body so large a quantity of water after rains and melting snows so as to require an outlet to some common reservoir, and if such water is regularly discharged through a well-defined channel which the force of the water has made for itself—an accustomed channel through which it flows and has flowed from time immemorial—such a channel is an ancient natural water course." Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. (1 Beas.) 280, 283, 284, 72 Am. Dec. 395.

ANCILLARY.

"Ancillary" means "subordinate" or "auxiliary" to the principal. Steele v. Connecticut General Life Ins. Co., 52 N. Y. Supp. 373, 379, 31 App. Div. 389.

ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATION.

Administration taken out in another state is ancillary to the administration in the forum of the domicile. Pisano v. B. M. & J. F. Shanley Co., 48 Atl. 618, 620, 66 N. J. Law, 1.

"Ancillary administration" is an administration in a state other than that in which the principal administration is granted, and is subservient and subordinate to the latter. In re Gable's Estate, 44 N. W. 352, 353, 79 Iowa, 178, 9 L. R. A. 218.

ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATOR.

An "ancillary administrator" is one who is subordinate or auxiliary to the principal or domiciliary administrator. An "ancillary administrator" is appointed in a foreign jurisdiction to enforce the rights of the estate in that jurisdiction, because a domiciliary administrator is not recognized by the courts of a foreign state. Steele v. Connecticut General Life Ins. Co., 52 N. Y. Supp. 373, 379, 31 App. Div. 389.

ANCILLARY ATTACHMENT.

An ancillary attachment is sued out in aid of a suit already brought, and its only office is to hold the property attached under it for the satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand. It does not bring the parties into court, its office being different from a summons, in that the one brings the person, and the other the property, before the court. Templeton v. Mason, 65 S. W. 25, 26, 107 Tenn. 625.

An ancillary attachment is a proceeding in aid of the personal action when the debtor has been served or has appeared in court so as to be liable to a personal judgment. The remedy thus employed is usually an adjunct to the main suit. It often happens that after a suit at law has been instituted for the recovery of a debt or damages, and where personal service is or may be had, a ground of attachment arises, and an attachment becomes necessary that the property may be seized and held to respond to any judgment that may be recovered. The attachment proceeding in such case is designated as "ancillary." A proceeding in attachment brought against a nonresident debtor against whom there was no expectation of securing personal service or of obtaining a personal judgment, but sale made to subject the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court, that sale is not an ancillary attachment. Southern California Fruit Exch. v. Stamm, 54 Pac. 345, 347, 9 N. M. 361.

ANCILLARY BILL.

The term "ancillary bill" is applicable to proceedings growing out of the original proceedings in the same court, and dependent on such proceedings, and instituted for the purpose of enforcing a judgment or rendering complete justice among all the parties in interest. Coltrane v. Templeton (U. S.) 106 Fed. 370, 374, 45 C. C. A. 328.

If one have an action at law pending, he may file a bill of discovery in equity or a bill for some other equitable relief in aid of his action at law, and this bill is auxiliary to his action at law, and in a certain sense ancillary. So if one have a judgment at law, and his execution thereof be obstructed or hindered, he may file a bill in equity to remove the obstruction or to subject assets which the execution otherwise will not reach, and this and similar proceedings are "auxiliary," and in a certain sense "ancillary"; and, in the peculiar relation of the jurisdiction of the federal courts to the citizenship of parties, this principle of ancillary jurisdiction is sometimes resorted to for sustaining supplemental litigation involving a jurisdiction which otherwise a federal court could not maintain, as where the judgment is between a plaintiff and defendant of adverse citizenship, but the subsequent bill in equity involves a controversy between citizens of the same state of whom the federal courts could have no jurisdiction, the proceeding is treated as a continuation of a suit at law and "ancillary" to it. In re Williams (U. S.) 123 Fed. 321, 322.

ANCILLARY SUIT.

Actions by a judgment creditor to set aside fraudulent transfer of personal property by a judgment debtor after the return of an execution are ancillary to the original suit, and are in effect a continuance of the suit at law to obtain the fruit of a judgment, or to remove obstacles to its enforcement. Therefore it would seem that they cannot be maintained in any court which does not exercise auxiliary jurisdiction over the court in which the original suit was brought. Tabell v. Griggs (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 207, 23 Am. Dec. 790; Davis v. Bruns (N. Y.) 23 Hun, 648. Therefore such an action cannot be maintained in the federal court where the original judgment was recovered in another state, and especially where the fraudulent transfer is to be set aside there also. Clafin v. McDermott (U. S.) 12 Fed. 375.

AND.

Pub. St. c. 157, § 104, provides that debts due to and taxes assessed by the state or any county or town shall be preferred debts in the declaration of dividends on an insolvent estate. Held that, the words "debts due to and taxes assessed by" being connected conjunctively in the statute, the intention was that each should be a preferred debt. Bent v. Inhabitants of Hubbardston, 138 Mass. 99, 100.

"And," as used in an instruction that the burden of proof rests on the defendant to establish the defense that plaintiff's injury resulted from his intoxication "and" negligence, does not mean that the defendant must establish both intoxication and contributory negligence, but requires him only to prove such intoxication as culminated in negligence. Loewer v. City of Sedalia, 77 Mo. 431, 447.

"And," as used in a claim for a patent for a firecracker, which claimed, "first, in a firecracker, the match, B, and fuse, C, in combination with a solid plug and body," should not be construed to mean that the match and fuse constituted but one element, so as to render such a contrivance an infringement of a patent for continuous fuse. Masten v. Hunt (U. S.) 5 Fed. 216, 218, 5 C. C. A. 42.

The charge in an information was that the defendant, knowing the bank in which he was cashier to be insolvent, received therein money "on deposit and for safe-keeping." Held, that the words "for safe-keeping" clearly qualify the word "deposit," and that there was but one action charged—a receiving of money on deposit for safe-keeping. Koetting v. State, 60 N. W. 822, 88 Wis. 502.

The expression "writing and affidavit," standing alone, in an indictment alleging the sending of a false "writing and affidavit" to the Pension Office, might be ambiguous. It might mean two documents or it might mean one, but when accompanied by a recital of the writing or affidavit it is clearly shown to be one instrument, and the pleading is not double. United States v. Corbin (U. S.) 11 Fed. 238, 239.

The use of the word "and," in an instruction that defendant had no right to do a certain thing in the performance of his contract after he had notice of a certain arrangement "and" had consented thereto, does not render the instruction erroneous on the ground that such use of the word constituted an assumption that defendant had consented to the arrangement. Wreggitt v. Barnett, 58 N. W. 467, 99 Mich. 477.

Under Const. art. 4, § 17, providing that property shall be assessed for taxes under general laws "and" by uniform rules, property must be taxed both under general laws and by uniform rules. The constituent parts of the sentence, "general laws and uniform rules," are essential to a valid act of taxation. State Board of Assessors v. State, 4 Atl. 578, 602, 48 N. J. Law, 146.

The use of the word "and" to unite the words "assessments and taxes" in Comp. St. c. 12a, § 91, providing for the listing of "assessments and taxes" by the proper city officer and the subsequent sale of the land affected thereby, shows that the words were not synonymous. State v. Irey, 60 N. W. 601, 606, 42 Neb. 186.

The word "and," as used in Act Feb. 18, 1891, declaring that the office of commissioner of agriculture shall be elective, and at the general election in 1892 and every two years thereafter there shall be elected a commissioner of agriculture, does not have the effect that the first part of the act should go into immediate effect, and that the last should be suspended until the time of holding the election. There is but one sentence, and what is deemed a second clause is only the concluding member of the sentence. The first member makes the office elective, and the second declares when the election shall be held. Lane v. Kolb, 92 Ala. 636, 665, 9 South. 873.

"And," as used in a will giving and devising unto the children of testator's brother W., sister M., sister S., sister M., brother J., "and" brother Henry, indicates the closing of the class of persons whose children are to take. Lippincott v. Bechtold, 34 Atl. 1079, 1080, 54 N. J. Eq. 407.

As well as.

In an act of the Legislature providing that all executors shall be liable on their bonds for the trusts of the will "and" all duties devolving upon them as executors, "and" expresses the relation of addition, and means "as well as." Porter v. Moores, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 16, 19.

As in addition to.

"And" is an article which expresses the relation of addition. It may connect words merely or full sentences. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353, 367.

Where a lease provided that the lessee, for and in consideration of the renting, was to pay as rent for the premises a yearly money rent of $660, and in addition thereto, as part rent, was to board the lessor "and" his family, consisting of two adult persons, during said year, the lease should be construed as obligating the lessee to board not only the lessor but two adult persons in addition, and should be construed as if it read, "and board the lessor, and and, or in addition thereto, two adult persons," since, if the lessee agreed to board only two persons, then what follows "and" in the sentence includes a part of what preceded it, and the word "and" does not mean something added or in addition to what has gone before, which would be contrary to the plain use of the term. O'Brien v. Carson, 42 Iowa, 553, 554.

The conjunction "and" is a co-ordinate conjunction. It is not explanatory, but signifies and expresses the relation of addition. As used in a declaration alleging that a city disregarded its duty by failing to keep the earth, sand, and other substances of the walls or sides of a sewer firmly in place by suffering the earth, sand, and other substances to remain in a loose, water-soaked, "and" dangerous condition, it means that the earth, sand, and other substances of the walls or sides of the ditch were in a condition beyond or in addition to that of a loose and water-soaked condition. City of La Salle v. Kostka, 60 N. E. 72, 74, 190 Ill. 130.

In an assignment of a patent, together with all other letters patent and applications therefor connected with the manufacture of pig iron, blooms, and billets, "and" the conversion or treatment of iron or steel into rails, blooms, or billets, "and" is used in the cumulative sense, and imports an additional and not a vastly restricted class of cases in which an assignment of these applications was to be made, and does not embrace such patents or applications as combine both of the features. Appeal of Reese, 15 Atl. 807, 810, 122 Pa. 392.

The word "and" commonly means "in addition to," and should be so construed in Rev. St. 1893, c. 43, § 16, making it a criminal offense to sell intoxicating liquors outside of cities, towns, and villages "in any less quantity than five gallons, and in the original package as put up by the manufacturer," so that sales of less than five gallons are prohibited except when contained in an original package. Tipton v. People, 40 N. E. 838, 339, 156 Ill. 241.

Pub. Laws, c. 596, § 1, declares that no person shall manufacture or sell or suffer to be manufactured or sold, or suffer to be kept on his premises or in his possession, or under his charge, for the purpose "of sale and delivery within the state," any liquors, etc. Defendant was indicted under the statute for keeping intoxicating liquors for sale, and it was contended by the Attorney General that the words "and delivery," as used in the statute, added nothing to the meaning, and might be treated as pure pleonasm, but the court held that, while generally and almost invariably a sale imports delivery or is completed only by delivery, occasionally the sale is completed without delivery, as where the article bought is specific and is retained for the purchaser by the seller, in which case the title passes, and if the article is lost by fire before delivery the loss falls on the purchaser. "Therefore the words 'and delivery' must be construed to have been inserted by way of limitation, so as to make the keeping of the prohibited liquors for sale within the state, to be used as a beverage, inimical to the statute only when the keeper intends not only to sell, but also to deliver as well as to sell, such liquors within the state." State v. Murphy, 10 Atl. 585, 587, 15 R. I. 543.

Construed as or.

The popular use of "or" and "and" is so loose and so frequently inaccurate that while they are not treated as interchangeable, and their strict meaning should be followed when their accurate reading does not render the sense dubious, their strict meaning is more readily departed from than that of other words, and one may be read in place of the other in deference to the meaning of the context. Witherspoon v. Jernigan (Tex.) 76 S. W. 445-447.

"Where sense requires it, there are many cases to show that we may construe the word 'or' into 'and,' and 'and' into 'or,' in order to effectuate the intention of the parties. I would say, with Lord Hardwicke, that there is no magic in particular words further than they show the intention of the parties." Burrill v. Kemp, 3 Term R. 470, 473.

To give effect to the intention of the parties to an instrument, a word will be excluded or disregarded altogether, if necessary. Thus "and" is often construed to mean "or." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 11 N. E. 867, 869, 120 Ill. 603.

In a resolution of a corporation authorizing its secretary and treasurer to secure any "and" all other creditors of the corporation by mortgages subject to and subsequent to a mortgage to another person, "and" should be construed as having the meaning of "or," giving the right to secure any other creditors, and not requiring a mortgage which should secure all other creditors. Brown v. Grand Rapids Parlor Fur. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 286, 291, 7 C. C. A. 225, 22 L. R. A. 817.

A policy insured a vessel in the sum of $3,000 and $1,000 on her cargo, and provided that should the vessel and cargo be insured in England in time to attach, this policy is to be canceled on the assured's paying one-half per cent. The vessel was insured in England, but the cargo was not. It is not uncommon, in papers written without much attention to technical and grammatical rules, to find "and" used for "or," and "or" for "and." In this case neither word alone would have clearly expressed the intent of the parties. They intended that if vessel and cargo, or either of them, should be insured in England, this policy should attach only on what should remain uninsured by such policy effected in England. Davis v. Boardman, 12 Mass. 80, 83.

"And," as used in an order requiring that a bond be given by the petitioners indemnifying one whose property had been taken under a warrant of seizure in a bankrupt proceeding for all damage he might sustain, providing that if on the final hearing of the creditor's petition to have the defendant adjudged a bankrupt the defendant shall prove he is not a bankrupt, "and" the proceeding against him by the petitioning creditors shall be dismissed, must be read as "or," so that defendant would have the indemnity in case he proved that he was not a bankrupt or the proceedings were dismissed, and hence when judgment was rendered for defendant in the bankrupt proceedings the event had happened upon which the liability of defendant was conditioned, and the indemnity became operative to defendant. Sonneborn v. Libbey, 7 N. E. 813, 818, 102 N. Y. 539.

Same—In bonds, deeds, or mortgages.

As used in a forthcoming bond, the obligation of which is to satisfy the judgment "and" deliver the property, "and" is to be construed as meaning "or." Hayman v. Hallam, 79 Ky. 389, 392.

"And," as used in a bond reciting a levy of execution upon the property claimed by a person other than the judgment debtor, which was conditioned that the officer making the levy be kept harmless "and" that the obligors should pay all damages in case the execution be levied on the wrong property, means "or," the intention being to indemnify the officer both for levying on the wrong property and for its sale. Finckh v. Evers, 25 Ohio St. 82, 83.

"And" is not confined to its grammatical sense, but may be read "or" where the plain intent of the grantor was that it should be so construed. A similar rule is to be observed in the construction of statutes. Long Island R. Co. v. Conklin (N. Y.) 32 Barb. 381, 385.

"And," as used in a deed conveying all the right, title, and interest of the grantor in and to all the real estate of which A. "and" B. died seised or possessed, will be construed to mean "or," in order to carry out the manifest intention of the grantor. "It is not uncommon to construe 'and' to mean 'or,' and 'or' to mean 'and,' when necessary to carry into effect the intention of the parties." Litchfield v. Cudworth, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 23, 27.

"And," as used in a deed giving a right of re-entry to the grantor in case the grantee neglects to pay certain debts of the testator "and" suffers the grantor to be put to costs, trouble, or expense, is to be construed as meaning "or." "It is well settled at the present day, although for a long time vexata questio in England, that the grammatical sense is not to be adhered to either in a will or deed where the contrary intent is apparent. Lord Kenyon observed that in deeds certain legal phrases must be used to create certain estates, but beyond that he would say with Lord Hardwicke that there is no magic in words further than as they show the intention of the parties." Jackson v. Topping (N. Y.) 1 Wend. 388, 396, 19 Am. Dec. 515.

The phrase "claims due said C. and P.," in a mortgage securing all legal claims due said C. and P., was held capable of being construed to include individual debts of C., the courts saying that the words are fairly susceptible of more than one interpretation. They may mean claims due to the parties jointly, or they may mean claims due to them severally, or they may mean claims due to them jointly and severally. Snow v. Pressey, 27 Atl. 272, 276, 85 Me. 408.

Same—In charter or ordinances.

In an ordinance "or" will not be substituted for "and" on mere conjecture as to the motives which induced the repeal of the former enactment. Such a change cannot properly be made in any case unless necessary to give effect to the intent of the Legislature as disclosed by the context. City of Frankford v. Arrott (Pa.) 8 Phila. 41, 42.

The word "and," in an ordinance requiring commission merchants "and" produce dealers to obtain a license, may be construed to mean "or," there being no such general and prevailing custom of uniting produce dealers and commission merchants to one person, firm, or corporation as to lead to the conclusion that the ordinance was one intended to apply to the combination of both businesses. Kansas City v. Grush, 52 S. W. 286, 287, 151 Mo. 128.

"And," as used in a city charter authorizing the common council to suppress "and" restrain tenpin alleys, is used disjunctively for "or." Smith v. City of Madison, 7 Ind. 86, 90.

Same—In civil statutes.

"Or" and "and" are not treated as interchangeable in a statute unless the intention requires, and in deference to the context. The most latitudinarian construction would not sanction the interchange of "or" for "and" in an article of the Code of Practice, in the construction of which strict meaning should not be departed from. Merchants' & Farmers' Bank v. McKellar, 11 South. 592, 595, 44 La. Ann. 940.

The words "and" and "or" when used in a statute are convertible, as the sense may require. A substitution of one for the other is frequently resorted to in the interpretation of statutes, when the evident intention of the lawmaker requires it. People v. Rice, 33 N. E. 846, 847, 138 N. Y. 151; Elsfield v. Kenworth, 50 Iowa, 389, 391; Collins Granite Co. v. Devereux, 72 Me. 422, 425; Williams v. Poor, 21 N. W. 753, 755, 65 Iowa, 410; Price v. Forrest, 35 Atl. 1075, 1080, 54 N. J. Eq. 669.

"And" may be read "or" if the sense requires it. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, §§ 6794, 23, 4947; Rev. St. (Wyo.) 1899, § 2724.

In the General Highway Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV, c. 50, § 111), providing that, if the inhabitants of any parish shall agree to defend any indictment found against any such parish, the surveyor of such parish may charge in his account the reasonable expenses incurred in defending such prosecution, after the same shall have been agreed to by such inhabitants at a vestry or public meeting "and" allowed by two justices of the peace within the division where such highway shall be, "and" should be construed as "or." Townsend v. Read, 10 J. Scott (N. S.) 308, 321.

In Code 1873, § 1068, providing that a failure of a corporation to comply with certain requirements to organization "and" publicity renders the individual property of the stockholders liable for the corporate debts, "and" will be construed "or." Seaton v. Grimm, 81 N. W. 225, 226, 110 Iowa, 145.

In Laws 1899, c. 25, § 4, creating the city court of Atchinson City, and providing that the Governor shall appoint a marshal, who shall hold office for two years "and" until his successor is elected and qualified, "and" will be construed to mean "or." Starr v. Flynn, 62 Pac. 659, 660, 62 Kan. 845.

"And," as used in the resolve of March, 1804, accepting the report of a commissioner appointed to survey a town and report the number of proprietors and settlers of a certain class, their heirs and assigns, and the quantity which ought to be confirmed to them, and affirming and granting the quantity of land assigned in such report and survey to the original proprietors to the settlers "and" to the heirs and assigns of settlers as respectively set against their several names therein, must be construed as meaning "or," so as to give it the intended operation; that is, if the deceased settler had neither conveyed nor devised his equitable assets to any one, then the grant operated, and a deed should have been given to the heirs. Sargent v. Simpson, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 148, 153.

In Sp. Laws 1887, c. 3, subc. 4, § 5, subsec. 5, authorizing a city to provide for the health, comfort, "and" convenience of the inhabitants, "and" should be read "or," in accordance with the rule that "or" may be read for "and" in a statute, and conversely, as the clear intent of the statute may require. City of Red Wing v. Guptil, 75 N. W. 234, 235, 72 Minn. 259, 41 L. R. A. 321, 71 Am. St. Rep. 485.

In St. April 8, 1801 (1 K. & R. 562), declaring that the people will not sue for lands by reason of any right or title of the people to the same which shall not have accrued within 40 years before suit, unless the people or those under whom they claim shall have received the rents "and" profits or some part thereof within 40 years, "and" is synonymous with "or." People v. Van Rensselaer (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 189, 199.

The word "and" is often used interchangeably with the word "or," the meaning being determined by the context, and will be given the meaning of "or" in a statute authorizing a canal company to charge tolls upon all boats, vessels, steamboats, "and" other craft used for the transportation of freight or passengers along its canal. Sturgeon Bay & L. M. Ship Canal & Harbor Co. v. Leatham, 45 N. E. 422, 423, 164 Ill. 239.

In Laws 1861, c. 311, decreeing that every public highway "and" private road already laid out and dedicated to the use of the public that shall not have been opened and worked within six years from the time of its being so laid out shall cease to be a public road for any purpose whatever, "and" is construed to mean "or." Ludlow v. City of Oswego (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 260, 261.

Rev. Code, c. 119, § 1, authorizes the probate of a script as a holograph will, provided the script be found among the valuable papers "and" effects of the testator. As the statute appeared in the Revised Statutes, the disjunctive conjunction "or" was used in the place of "and," and was changed for the conjunction "and" in the Revised Code. Held, that the change did not affect the construction of the statute, since, if the word "and" was used in its strict conjunctive sense, the statute would be virtually repealed or its benefits greatly diminished, as but few persons who manage their business with order and system keep their valuable papers and effects together, notes, bonds, etc., being usually kept together in proper files, and currency, coin, jewels, etc., deposited in a more secret place; and hence the statute would be construed as if the disjunctive conjunction was retained. Hughes v. Smith, 64 N. C. 493, 495.

It is within common knowledge that the words "or" and "and" are frequently used interchangeably, not only by those unskilled in the use of language, but by those who are acquainted with the shades of difference in the two conjunctions, for oftentimes the idea of the user is as correctly expressed by the use of one as the other. So it is held that under an act concerning distributions and descents, and providing that the wife shall not be entitled to any interest, under the provisions of the section, in any land to which the husband has made a conveyance, when the wife at the time of the conveyance is not "or" never has been a resident of this state, the word "or" should be read "and," with the effect that a wife who had ever been a resident of this state is entitled to the benefits of the act. Kennedy v. Haskell (Kan.) 73 Pac. 913, 914.

In the act of 1872 giving to the widow dower in the land of which the husband was seised "and" possessed, the word "and" substituted for the word "or" in the former act does not affect the meaning of the enactment. Barnes v. Raper, 90 N. C. 189, 191.

In Rev. Laws, c. 135, subd. 4, providing that any person of age who resides in any town and who holds ratable estate in his own right of a certain value shall gain a settlement in such town, "and" is to be construed conjunctively, and not meaning "or." Town of Washington v. Town of Corinth, 35 Vt. 463, 470.

In St. 1885, p. 147, § 30, as amended by St. 1889, p. 157, providing that before ordering any work done or improvements made on streets, as authorized by section 2 of the act, the city council should pass a resolution of intention, which should be published "and" posted, "and" is to be construed as meaning "or." Washburn v. Lyons, 32 Pac. 310, 97 Cal. 314.

In Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5248, subd. 6, exempting from execution a mechanic's tools and instruments used to carry on his trade for the support of himself and family, "and" should be read "himself or family." Gelger v. Kobilka, 66 Pac. 423, 424, 26 Wash. 171, 90 Am. St. Rep. 733.

The provision in the Constitution of West Virginia that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law "and the judgment of his peers," did not mean that no person should be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without a trial by jury, for there never has been a time in this state, or in any other state, or in England, in which it was held indispensable that to deprive a man of his life, liberty, or property he should in all cases have a trial by jury, and the word "and" should be read "or." Jelly v. Dils, 27 W. Va. 267, 274.

An act providing that cities of the third class may tax all property, matters, and things within said cities "taxable for state and county purposes" authorizes cities of a third class to levy a tax upon any species of property which is taxable for either state or county purposes. Appeal of Banger, 109 Pa. 79, 90.

Same—In criminal statutes.

"And," when used in the statute, is construed as "or" when the spirit and reason of the law require and justify it. While the words are not treated as interchangeable, and should be followed when their accurate reading does not render the sense dubious, their strict meaning is more readily departed from than that of any other words, and one read in the place of the other in deference to the meaning of the context. People v. Lytle, 40 N. Y. Supp. 153, 161, 7 App. Div. 553 (citing Boyles v. McMurphy, 55 Ill. 236; Simpson v. Morris [Pa.] 3 Yeates, 104).

In the construction of statutes, "and" must be regarded as a convertible term with "or," if the sense so requires, even in a criminal statute, where a strict construction usually prevails. Williams v. Poor, 21 N. W. 753, 755, 65 Iowa, 410; City of Indianapolis v. Huegele, 18 N. E. 172, 176, 115 Ind. 581; Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475, 479; People v. Sweetser, 46 N. W. 452, 454, 1 Dak. 308; State v. Myers, 10 Iowa, 448, 449.

As used in that part of the statutes relating to crimes and criminal procedure "and" may be read "or." Rev. St. (Wyo.) 1899, § 5190.

The word "and," in Rev. St. § 5467 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3691], making criminal the secret stealing or destroying a letter "and" stealing the contents of such letter, should be construed to mean "or," and the statute operates to create two separate and distinct offenses. United States v. Wight (U. S.) 38 Fed. 106, 107.

St. 1863, p. 540, authorizing a city to prohibit and suppress "houses of prostitution and gaming," is not limited to houses devoted to the purpose of both prostitution and gaming, but includes houses used for either purpose. Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78, 84.

Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2179 (Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 2084), provides that any person who shall keep any room or building or occupy any place, etc., for the purpose of recording or registering bets or wagers or of selling pools, "and" any person who shall record or register bets or wagers or sell pools upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed, or power of endurance of man or beast, etc., shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, held, that "and" should be construed to mean "or," thus making the statute describe two different offenses. Douglass v. State, 48 N. E. 9, 10, 18 Ind. App. 289.

The word "and," in Act March 11, 1895, § 10, declaring that its provisions shall apply to sales of spirituous, vinous, malt, "and" other intoxicating liquors, will be construed as "or"; the word "or" being used in such expression in each of the preceding sections, and such construction being necessary to harmonize section 10 with the other sections. State v. Myers, 44 N. E. 801, 802, 146 Ind. 36.

"And," in Act 1872, § 6, relating to intoxicating liquors, providing that every person guilty of violating the first "and" second sections of the act shall forfeit, etc., should be construed as equivalent to "or," and hence penalties therein provided may be imposed for a violation of either section, and does not require that he be guilty of a violation of both before he can be subjected to such penalties. Streeter v. People, 69 Ill. 595, 597.

In Code 1873, § 3870, declaring that if the father and mother of any child under the age of six years exposed the same with intent to abandon it, etc., "and" should be construed to mean "or" so that the offense charged therein may be committed by either parent alone. State v. Smith, 46 Iowa, 670, 673.

In Code 1873, § 2634, providing punishment for making counterfeit coin and having such counterfeit coin with intent to pass the same, "and" should be construed as meaning "or," since it would be absurd and against the obvious intent of the law to construe it so that a man could not be convicted of having counterfeit money in his possession without also showing that he counterfeited the coin. When necessary to give effect to a statute, "and" will be construed as a disjunctive or copulative, according to the sense which the law most clearly requires. State v. Myers, 10 Iowa, 448, 449.

When necessary to harmonize the provisions of a statute or give effect to all of its provisions, the word "and" may be read as "or," and conversely. State v. Brandt, 41 Iowa, 593.

"And" is frequently construed "or," and "or" is frequently construed "and," to further the intents of the parties in legacies, devises, deeds, bonds, and writings; and the rules of construction of a statute are in most respects the same as the rules of construction of deeds and wills. Thus, where a statute in one section prohibited the sale of liquor without a license, in the second section prohibited use of screens, frosted windows, etc., in the third section prohibited the sale of liquor to minors, etc., and in seventh section provided that for every violation of the provisions of first, second, "and" third sections a certain penalty should be inflicted, it was held that the word "and" in the seventh section would be construed "or," since it could not have been intended that a person must violate all three sections before he could be punished. State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 559, 569.

Act May 5, 1868 (65 Ohio Laws, 146), declares that it shall be unlawful for any person within the limits of the state who has not attended two full courses of instruction and graduated at some school of medicine, or who cannot produce a certificate of qualification from some state or county medical society, "and" is not a person of good moral character, to practice medicine in the state. Held, that the word "and" as last used in the section should be construed as "or," a contention that one having good moral character was excluded from the operation of the statute being without merit. Wert v. Clutter, 37 Ohio St. 347, 349.

In a statute giving a police court jurisdiction of the offense of keeping a liquor nuisance, with the provision that the fine imposed by them shall not exceed $100 "and" an imprisonment not exceeding one year, the offense having previously been punishable by the superior court by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, the word "and" should not be construed as authorizing the police court to add the imprisonment to the fine, but rather as fixing a limit to the fine which may be imposed by that court, and also to limit the imprisonment which that court could impose. Commonwealth v. Griffin, 105 Mass. 185, 186.

In Code 1876, § 954, subd. 15, requiring dealers in pistols, bowie knives, "and" dirk knives to be licensed, "and" should be construed to mean "or." Throughout the whole section it is clear the intention of the Legislature was to subject single particular occupations of pursuit, and not a combination of them, to a license. Porter v. State, 58 Ala. 66, 68.

The word "and," in a statute giving villages the right to license, regulate, "and" prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in a village, cannot be construed to mean "or" for the purpose of limiting the village to the alternative of either licensing or prohibiting the traffic, but the traffic may be licensed in one part of the village and prohibited in another. People v. Cregier, 28 N. E. 812, 815, 138 Ill. 401.

Rev. St. § 841, provides a punishment for a willful or maliciously burning in the nighttime, etc. Held, that in an indictment for arson the indictment was not defective because the word "willfully" was connected with the word "maliciously" by "and," instead of the disjunctive "or" having been employed. State v. Price, 37 La. Ann. 215, 219.

Same—In wills in general.

When obviously necessary to carry out the intentions of the testator, the word "and" in a will will be construed to mean "or," or conversely. Abrahams v. English, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 280, 288; Stubbs v. Sargon, 2 Keen, 255; In re Wells, 21 N. E. 137, 139, 113 N. Y. 396, 10 Am. St. Rep. 457; In re Gilmer's Estate, 26 Atl. 614, 616, 154 Pa. 523, 35 Am. St. Rep. 855; Janney v. Sprigg (Md.) 7

Gill, 197, 202, 48 Am. Dec. 557; Beall v. Deale (Md.) 7 Gill & J. 216, 222, 224.

The word "and" as used in a will, may be construed to mean "or," when necessary to give effect to all the words of the will. Bell v. Phyn, 7 Ves. 453, 458.

The word "and," as used in a will, will be construed to mean "or," when it gives a more rational construction to the will or comes nearer to the intention of the testator. Harris v. Taylor, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 413, 420.

When used in a will, "and" will only be construed to mean "or" for the purpose of carrying out the "evident intention" of the testator, and not to gratify the desires or wishes of a legatee or effect what might indeed seem more just or reasonable. Ely v. Ely's Ex'rs, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 43, 48.

"Courts sometimes, in attempting to give effect to testator's intention, displace 'or,' and substitute 'and,' and also put 'or,' where the testator has written 'and,' but such departures from the words of the will are never made except it is clear that they are necessary to give effect to the purpose of the testator." Courter v. Stagg, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 305.

Where a testator bequeathed and devised all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate, both real and personal, to his son and daughter, subject to the dower "and" thirds of his wife, the word "thirds" should be construed to mean the same thing as "dower," and the word "and" to mean "or." O'Hara v. Dever, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 558, 561; O'Hara v. Dever (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 418, 428.

Testator devised one-sixth part of the residue of his estate to each of his three children, provided that they, their children or grandchildren, shall transmit proofs to the executors within six years after testator's death of their being alive, and after the said six years no proof to be admitted, but the said residue shall be equally divided among such of his children and grandchildren as can make proof, "and" shall have made it within the aforesaid space of time. Held that the word "and" as last used should be construed as "or" in order to effectuate the testator's intention, and hence, where a devisee made proof within the required time, but it was unavoidably prevented from being forwarded, the devise did not lapse. Englefried v. Woelpart (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 41, 45.

Same—In wills with limitations over.

The words "or" and "and" in deeds and wills are not to be always held to a strict grammatical sense, but "or" is to be taken for "and," and "and" is to be taken for "or," as may best comport with the meaning of the grant or devise; hence, in the provision in a will that certain property devised shall go to another if the devisee "will not pay the above annuity and what he owes me," the word "and" must be construed as the disjunctive "or." East v. Garrett, 9 S. E. 1112, 1117, 84 Va. 523.

The courts will transpose the clauses of a will and construe "or" to be "and," and "and" to be "or," only in such cases when it is absolutely necessary to do so to support the evident meaning of the testator, but they cannot arbitrarily expunge or alter words without such apparent necessity. Denn v. Woodward (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 316, 319.

In a will leaving property to children, but providing that, in case of their death without being married "and" having children, the share of such child shall be divided among the surviving children, the word "and" will be construed to read "or." Bell v. Phyn, 7 Ves. 453, 458; Maberly v. Strode, 3 Ves. Jr. 450, 454; Roome v. Phillips, 24 N. Y. 463, 470; Janney v. Sprigg (Md.) 7 Gill, 197, 202, 48 Am. Dec. 557.

In a will by which testator gave real estate to his son, provided and on condition that he lives to the age of 21 years and has issue of his body lawfully begotten, but in case such son dies under the age of 21 years "and" without issue as aforesaid, "and" should be construed to mean "or," for if not so construed, if the son had died under age leaving issue, they could have derived no benefit from the devise to the father, although the devise over never did nor could take effect, and thus the whole devise would be completely frustrated. "Or" is to be taken for "and," and "and" is to be taken for "or," as may best comport with the intent and meaning of a devise or grant. Sayward v. Sayward, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 210, 216, 22 Am. Dec. 191.

In a will by which testator gave property to his son subject to the conditions and limitations that the executors should invest his share safely, and that he receive the income thereof during his natural life, and in case of his death without issue his share to go in equal shares to his surviving brothers and sisters, and, in case the son should leave a child or children, said child or children to receive said income only until the youngest of them arrive at 21 years "and" as long as one or either of them shall live, "and" should be construed to mean "or," for by reading the sentence conjunctively the first member, which gives the income during minority, is reduced to silence by the second, which gives it for life, and the right of a child to the income ceased when she attained majority. Shimer v. Shimer's Ex'rs, 24 Atl. 385, 386, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 300.

In a will devising testator's realty to his two sons for life as tenants in common, and providing that, in case either of the sons should depart this life "under age and without leaving any child or children" living at his death, then his part should go to the testator's daughter, "and" must be construed to mean under age "or" without issue, and hence, on the death of one of the sons without issue, after becoming of age, the limitation to the daughter was effectual. Seabrook v. Mikell (S. C.) Cheves, Eq. 80, 90.

The word "and" in a will giving the income of testator's estate to his grandson and his granddaughter, and the survivor of them, neither to receive more than one-half thereof, and directing that on the death of the grandson "and" the granddaughter, if either have children, the trustee shall turn over one-half the estate to the children of the grandson and one-half to the children of the granddaughter, and providing that, in case of the death of the grandson "or" the granddaughter without leaving children, the property be divided among testator's heirs, was construed to mean "or," on the ground that it was used in such sense by the testator. "Attention need not be called to the numerous authorities to sustain this. Uncertainty is sometimes the result of the improper use of 'or' for 'and,' or vice versa. The general rule in such cases is that the one word will be construed to have been used for the other where the plain intent of the testator will be defeated without such substitution, but such construction is not admissible unless it be necessary to carry out the manifest design of the will. That the testator used these words indiscriminately is still more apparent further on, in the fifth clause, where he says, 'so that the said child or children of my said grandson and granddaughter shall have and enjoy all of my estate then remaining in the hands of my trustees.' The word 'and' read literally in this latter part of the clause would make the distribution of his estate per capita among all his great grandchildren, though it cannot be questioned that he intended the distribution to be to the children of his grandchildren per stirpes; and in the sixth clause, unless 'or' is read 'and,' the proceeds of the entire estate of the decedent are to be divided among his heirs at law upon the death of either grandchild, leaving no child to survive him or her, whereas the manifest intention was that only upon the death of both of them, leaving no children surviving, his estate was to be distributed among his heirs at law." In re Tripp's Estate, 51 Atl. 983, 985, 202 Pa. 260.

In a will giving the rents and arrears and other annual profits due at the time of testator's death from a certain estate to the person or persons who should be entitled to the freehold "and" inheritance of the home estate, the word "and" should be construed to read "or" in order to effectuate testator's intention. Stapleton v. Stapleton, 2 Sim. (N. S.) 212, 221.

Where the condition of a devise was that a former devisee "should not marry and have lawful issue of his own body," the devise would be good if either event should happen. Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 9, 86, 87, 49 Am. Dec. 139.

Same—In wills naming devisees.

The word "and," in a devise to a beneficiary "and" his heirs, may be construed to mean "or," in order to prevent a lapse of the legacy by reason of the death of the first beneficiary prior to the death of testator, if such meaning is plainly indicated as that intended to be given by the testator. The practical effect of the consideration is great, as, if the word "and" is construed in its natural meaning, the word "heirs" is a word of limitation, and not of substitution, and the legacy lapses; but, in case it is construed to mean "or," the word "heirs" is used as a word of substitution, and they take as beneficiaries. In most of the cases which draw the distinction between the force of the word "and" and the force of the word "or," the legacy, according to the strict grammatical form of the phraseology employed, is given not only to the legatee named, but to other persons who are designated as his heirs. The rule of construction, however, founded largely upon technical usage, is settled, as we have seen, that a gift in form to A. and his heirs is a gift to one donee, not two. It is only necessary, however, to substitute the word "or" for the word "and" in order to give the terms which in form import a gift to heirs their ordinary meaning and effect. Zabriske v. Huyler, 51 Atl. 197, 198, 62 N. J. Eq. 697.

In a will leaving property in trust to pay the produce to the children of testator's sister Ann, to be divided among them "and" such of them as shall be then living, share and share alike, the word "and" should be construed as "or." Hetherington v. Oakman (Eng.) 2 Younge & C. Ch. 299, 301.

In a will providing that when all testator's children were dead his estate should be equally divided between his wife "and" her heirs, "and" should be construed to mean "or." Maguire v. Moore, 18 S. W. 897, 899, 108 Mo. 267.

"And," as used in a will devising property to a person and his heirs, may be construed to mean "or," where the context requires such construction to effectuate the testator's intention. Keniston v. Adams, 14 Atl. 203, 205, 80 Me. 290.

In a will providing that testator's wife should have his property for life, and that after her decease it should go to the testator's daughter "and" her heirs forever, "and" must be construed "or," since a living person cannot have heirs. Ray v. Enslin, 2 Mass. 554, 556.

In a will, authorizing the remainder to be paid in equal portions to testatrix's niece and nephew named "and" the survivors of them, "and" should be construed in the sense of "or." Hall v. Blodgett, 48 Atl. 1085, 70 N. H. 437.

In a codicil to a will providing that a legacy should go to the legatee "and" her executors and administrators absolutely, "and" should be read with the same effect as if it were "or." Kerrigan v. Tabb (N. J.) 39 Atl. 701, 702.

In a will directing the executors, as testatrix's grandchildren shall respectively attain the age of 21 years "and" her youngest grandchild and her son-in-law may still be living, to pay over to each grandchild as they arrive at the age of 21 years a proportionate share of the rents, issues, and profits of her estate during the lives of the grandchildren and son-in-law, "and" should be construed to mean "or." Roe v. Vingut, 22 N. E. 933, 934, 117 N. Y. 204.

In a will bequeathing money to testator's daughter "and" her bodily issue, "and" should be construed to mean "or." Duncan v. Harper, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 76, 84.

Not construed as or.

When it appears from the context of a statute that the intention of the lawmaking power can only be given effect by treating "and" as "or," courts will do so, but ordinarily they are in no sense interchangeable terms, but, on the contrary, are used in the structure of language for purposes entirely variant. Robinson v. Southern Pac. Co., 38 Pac. 94, 95, 105 Cal. 526, 28 L. R. A. 773 (citing State v. Beauchleigh, 92 Mo. 490, 4 S. W. 666).

The rule which allows "and" to be read "or" cannot be applied to sustain an affidavit to obtain a discharge in insolvency, which declares that the debtor has not disposed of any property for the future benefit of himself "and" family, when the statute under which the discharge is sought requires an affidavit that he has not disposed of any for the benefit of himself "or" family. Such affidavit only negatives a disposal for the joint benefit of the debtor and his family, whereas the object of the statute is to secure proof that none has been made for the benefit of either. Hale v. Sweet, 40 N. Y. 97, 100.

Same—In contracts or deeds.

While courts have construed "and" as "or," and vice versa, such construction has been sanctioned only for strong reason, and only to carry out the manifest intention of the parties (Roome v. Phillips, 24 N. Y. 463; Hale v. Sweet, 40 N. Y. 97), so that "and," as used in a guaranty to pay all bills of goods bought by B. and M., will not be used in the sense of "or," but will render the guarantor liable only for joint sales. Mayer v. Cook, 57 N. Y. Supp. 94, 95, 26 Misc. Rep. 774.

The use of the word "and" in a contract whereby one party agreed to pay in sawing "and" lumber meant that the payment would be made in both sawing and lumber, "and" not being employed disjunctively or as synonymous with "or." Fredenburg v. Turner, 37 Mich. 402, 405.

In a deed of all the real estate "lying in," etc., "where-of H. was seized on July 4, 1876, or at any time since, and where-of the said P. is now seized," construed to include not only all the lands of which the said H. was seized at the specified time, but also the lands of which P. was seized at the time of the execution of the instrument. The word "and" is not to be construed as a disjunctive, or as merely affirming that P. has the title formerly held by H. Thomas v. Perry (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 964, 968.

Same—In civil statutes.

"And" will not be construed to mean "or" in Civ. Code, § 490, empowering the purchaser of a railroad ticket to ride from the station at which the ticket is bought to destination "and" from any intermediate station to destination. Robinson v. Southern Pac. Co., 38 Pac. 94, 95, 105 Cal. 526, 28 L. R. A. 773.

In St. 1876, c. 90, giving to him who labors in quarrying or cutting and dressing granite in any quarry a lien for his labor for 30 days after the granite is cut and dressed, "and" as much longer as the stone remains unsold and not shipped on board a vessel. "and" is used conjunctively, and not as synonymous with "or." Collins Granite Co. v. Devereux, 72 Me. 422, 424.

"And," as used in the twenty-sixth section of the schedule of the Constitution, providing that all persons in office at the time of the adoption of the Constitution "and" at the first election under it shall hold their offices until their term expires and their successors are qualified, should not be read "or," as no necessary intent on the part of the makers of the Constitution requires it. Commonwealth v. Kilgore, 82 Pa. 396, 398.

In Code, c. 73, § 64, requiring the examination of a married woman on the acknowledgment of a deed and certificate to declare that she acknowledged "that she had willingly executed the same 'and' does not wish to retract it," the word "and" does not mean "or," so as to render the two phrases connected by it equivalent expressions, so that the presence of one might be construed as dispensing with that of the other. Leftwich v. Neal, 7 W. Va. 569, 575.

"And," as used in Tariff Act 1890, Schedule J, par. 373, placing a certain duty on embrodered and hemstitched handkerchiefs, is not employed disjunctively or as synonymous with "or," but means handkerchiefs which are both hemstitched and embroidered. Rice v. United States (U. S.) 53 Fed. 910, 912, 4 C. C. A. 104.

"And" and "or" may be convertible when required by the sense of the statute, otherwise they will be taken as ordinarily used and understood; but in a statute providing that, whenever 50 or more resident householders "and" freeholders of a county ask for an election as to sale of liquor, an election shall be ordered, "and" will not be construed "or," as it is apparent that the statute intended to guard against precipitate action in such matters, and therefore required both qualifications. Miller v. Jones, 80 Ala. 89, 95.

Laws 1901, p. 581, c. 466, and Code Civ. Proc. § 3216, provide that defendant in the Municipal Court may, without issue joined, "and" before adjournment on his application, apply for an order removing an action to the City Court of New York. Held, that the word "and" is a word of addition, and signifies that something is to follow in addition to that which precedes. "And" in this case does not mean "or," and the statute means that, after issue joined, defendant must not indicate an intention to go to trial, but must at once take steps necessary to remove. Duke v. Caluwaert, 83 N. Y. Supp. 10, 12, 40 Misc. Rep. 623.

Same—In penal statutes.

"And," as used in penal statutes, can never be construed to mean "or." Buck v. Danzenbacker, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 350, 361; Fagan v. State, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 175, 178.

The word "and" in a criminal statute cannot be construed to mean "or," and therefore such a construction is not permissible in a statute providing for a forfeiture of goods attempted to be imported on the concurrence of certain facts "and" certain other facts. United States v. Ten Cases Shawls (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 35, 37.

In Act July 14, 1832, § 4 (4 Stat. 593), declaring that whenever, on the opening of any imported packages of goods composed wholly or in part of wool or cotton, they shall be found not to correspond with the entry at the custom house, "and" if any package shall be found to contain any article not entered such article shall be forfeited, "and" is not used disjunctively. United States v. Ten Cases Shawls (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 35, 37.

"And," as used in the statute providing for punishment by fine "and" imprisonment, requires the court to inflict both if the party is found guilty. United States v. Vickery (Md.) 1 Har. & J. 427.

Same—In wills.

In a will directing that testator's daughter should be supported out of his estate, when she should be sick and unable to support herself, "and" should be construed in its strict sense conjunctively, and she is not entitled to such support, though she is old and very infirm and unable to support herself, but not sick. Reynolds v. Denman, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 218, 219.

Though the courts are authorized to construe a disjunctive word into a conjunctive word, and vice versa, where it is necessary to give effect to the true meaning of the testator, unless there be something in the will or the subject from which it may be fairly collected that the testator did not use such words in their grammatical sense, the grammatical sense must prevail. A court cannot from arbitrary conjecture, though founded upon the highest degree of probability, add to a will or supply the omissions. Holmes v. Holmes' Lessee, 5 Bin. 252, 258.

In a will bequeathing all testator's personal estate, after several legacies, to his brother James and his children and the child of his sister, to be equally divided between them "and" their heirs and assigns, "and" cannot be construed to mean "or," so as to change the expression "and their heirs" into "or their heirs." "And" is never read "or" unless the context of the will favors it and the general intention is thereby elucidated or promoted. "These words are certainly not ordinarily convertible, and to change one into the other at will to suit the mood of the reader would work wonderous mischief with legal instruments, to say nothing of its singular effects upon any English author one may chance to take down from the shelf." Armstrong v. Moran, 1 Bradf. Sur. 314, 315.

AND ALSO.

Where a testator devised 208 acres of land, definitely described, to his daughter, "and also" 83 acres on which "she now lives," for life, the use of the copulative words "and also" will be construed to indicate his intention to have been to apply the limitations to the first as well as to the second tract, the words "and also" being equivalent to "in like manner." Noble v. Ayers, 56 N. E. 199, 61 Ohio St. 491.

"Also," as defined by Webster, means "in like manner; likewise"; and is defined to mean "in like manner; further; in addition to; too." As used by a testator in devising a house and lot to his daughter and "the heirs of her body, 'and also' an equal share of any other lands, negroes, etc.," the copulative "and" connected the words that followed it with the words that preceded it, and the words "and also" thus used were copulatives, carrying with them the sense of the preceding words, and being equivalent to "in like manner," and denoted the intention of the testator that the devise of the house and lot and "other lands" should be considered as governed by "lawful heirs of her body," thus creating a fee conditional in said house and lot and other lands. Du Pont v. Du Bos, 29 S. E. 665, 670, 52 S. C. 244.

In a devise of a negro "and also lands for life," the words "and also" continue the clause, and the words "for life" refer to all that precedes, and make a devise of the negro for life as well as the lands synonymous. Anonymous, 3 N. C. 161.

AND OR

A charter party to load a full and complete cargo of sugar, molasses, "and" other lawful produce, is to be construed to mean either a full cargo of sugar and molasses, or a full cargo of other lawful produce, or a full cargo of sugar and molasses and other lawful produce. Cuthbert v. Cumming, 10 Exch. 809, 814.

AND SO.

An allegation in an information charged the offense of being present where gaming implements are found, "and so the said D. doth say that the said room, in the manner and form aforesaid, was unlawfully used as and for a gaming house." Held, that the words "and so" did not have the effect of limiting the following allegation to the legal conclusion from what precedes, but the allegation is of a distinct substantive fact. Commonwealth v. Smith, 44 N. E. 503, 504, 166 Mass. 370.

AND SO FORTH.

A demise was of one whole building and the three upper floors of the adjoining building, with the privilege of using the stairway of the whole building for the carrying in and out of ashes, coal, "and so forth." Held, that "and so forth" meant of a like kind, and hence the lessee had no right to use the stairway of the whole building as the principal entrance to the floors above, but for the purposes named, and those of like kind. Agate v. Lowenbein, 4 Daly, 62, 68.

The term "and so forth," in a will devising property, is a patent ambiguity, not explainable by parol evidence. Taylor v. Maria, 90 N. C. 619, 624.

AND SO ON.

"And so on," as used in a deed providing that a certain slave should remain in the grantor's possession or in his wife's possession until their death, and then go to one of the grantor's daughters and to the future heirs of her body, and that if any of the grantor's daughters should die without leaving any lawful heirs of her body the property should go to the grantor's surviving children, "and so on," means that on the death of the first daughter without leaving any lawful heirs of her body her share should survive to the others, and so on in like manner on the death of the second daughter her share should go to the surviving daughter, and the words were intended to apply to the succession of the grantor's daughters to each other by survivorship, as the word "so" must be construed to mean "in a like manner," and "on" to mean "forward," "in progression," "successively." Nix v. Ray, 5 Rich. Law, 423, 424, 426.

ANEW.

See "Locate Anew"; "Trial Anew."

ANGER.

The word "anger" has no technical meaning peculiar to law, and hence it is not error for the court to fail to define anger as used in instructions in a homicide case. Robinson v. State (Tex.) 63 S. W. 869, 870.

"Anger" is a strong passion or emotion of the mind, caused by real or supposed injury to or intent to injure one's self or others, and the term "malice" includes all that anger does, and more. Chandler v. State, 39 N. E. 444, 447, 141 Ind. 106.

"Anger" is a short madness, and when provoked by a reasonable cause excuses from the punishment of murder. Pennsylvania v. Bell (Pa.) 1 Add. 156, 160, 1 Am. Dec. 298.

As heat of passion.

While anger may amount to heat of passion, it is not a synonym for heat of passion, and hence, as used in an instruction that if defendant was "angered" at deceased and then killed him it was murder in the third degree, is not equivalent to saying that killing in a heat of passion constitutes murder in the third degree. Hoffman v. State, 73 N. W. 51, 52, 97 Wis. 571.

Rage or resentment distinguished.

Pen. Code, art. 594, subd. 3, provides that, if the killing of a person who has used insulting words or conduct toward a female relative of the party guilty of the homicide takes place on the first meeting after the party learned of such words or conduct, it is necessary, in order to reduce the offense to manslaughter, that an adequate cause exist to produce "anger," rage, resentment, or terror in a person of ordinary temper, sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection at the time of the commission of the offense. Held, that anger means a violent passion of the mind excited by real or supposed injury offered to a relative or friend, and is not synonymous with "rage or sudden resentment." It is not necessarily rage, nor transport of passion, nor delirium, though it may be inflamed into such conditions. These are but higher and more demonstrative and uncontrollable types of its existence. It often happens that the uneducated mind will confound the cause with the higher degrees, and require that the same external exhibitions shall indicate its presence. Such is not the fact; "anger" may exist without any violent ebullition of passion or even outward expression, and yet to such an extent as to render the mind incapable of cool reflection. It may present all "the torrent's smoothness ere it dash below," and its indicia are as varied as are the varied faces and dispositions of men. Eanes v. State, 10 Tex. App. 421, 446.

ANGINA PECTORIS.

"Angina pectoris is a disease of the heart, so named from a sense of suffocating contraction or tightening of the chest over the sternum, and causes an anxious feeling and fear of death. The disease is marked by sudden attacks of severe pain and fainting sensations. The paroxysms come on unexpectedly, with irregular intervals. As the disease continues, the respiration in the intervals between the paroxysms becomes labored, and the patient seeks temporary relief, not only in stimulants, but also in various, and at times, ridiculous, postures of the body. In re Lee's Will, 18 Atl. 525, 528, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 183.

ANGLING.

The term "angling," as used in the chapter relating to the preservation of fish, game, birds, etc., means taking fish with hook and line, or not exceeding two rods or lines with hooks attached, held in hand, and not including set lines. V. S. 1894, 4562.

ANGOSTURA.

The word "angostura" has long been used in medical and scientific works to designate the bark of a South American tree, having well-known properties. Siebert v. Abbott, 25 N. Y. Supp. 590, 593, 72 Hun, 243 (quoting Murray's New Eng. Dict.).

It is alleged that the word "angostura" is not the subject of a trade-mark or a trade-name. We cannot sustain the contention. For upwards of half a century no town has existed by that name, and, even if the old town of Angostura were still known by that name, a person would not be permitted by fraudulent imitation to deceive the public and wrong the manufacturers of the Angostura Bitters by palming off its goods as their goods, and such a person cannot be permitted to usurp that name and dress its goods like those of the original proprietors, and thereby defraud the public. A. Bauer & Co. v. Siebert (U. S.) 120 Fed. 81, 84, 56 C. C. A. 487.

ANGRY.

"Angry" means touched with anger; feeling resentment; provoked; and anger is a strong passion or emotion of the mind, caused by real or supposed injury to or intent to injure one's self or others; so that an indictment for assault and battery, charging that the act was done unlawfully, feloniously, purposely, and with premeditated malice, is sufficient under an act making an act done in an "angry" manner an assault, the word "malice" comprehending all that "angry" does, and more. Chandler v. State, 39 N. E. 441, 447, 141 Ind. 106.

ANGUISH.

The word "anguish" certainly applies, inter alia, to an operation of and upon the mind. Webster defines it: "Extreme pain, either of body or mind;" and as "synonymous with agony, distress, pang, torment, etc." Mental suffering is so allied to and inseparable from physical injury of the character in question, that it follows as effect does cause. We may conceive of a child so young that it could hardly be affirmed of it that it suffered in mind—felt anguish and like emotions—but in the instance of a person of the age of this plaintiff (11 years), if of ordinary intelligence, which his testimony indicated he possessed, the jury may infer the mental pain from the inevitable physical pain, on the known and experienced connection subsisting between collateral facts, or circumstances proved, and the fact in controversy. Cook v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 19 Mo. App. 329, 334 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev.; Randolph v. Hannibal & St. J. Ry. Co., 18 Mo. App. 609).

ANGUS.

Where an indictment charges Angus M. Cannon with unlawful cohabiting with more than one woman, naming them, it charges that the defendant is a "male person" within Rev. St. § 5352, in reference to bigamy, providing that, if any "male person" in a territory shall hereafter cohabit with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. The name "Angus" is in the community recognized as that of a male person, the defendant himself, however, being the most public character bearing the name. Outside of the community it is well recognized as a male appellative. The word "person" embraces all mankind, and mankind is divided into two classes, one male and the other female. The statute says that this crime can be committed only by the members of one class, the male, upon and with members of the other class, the female. When, therefore, the specific crime is charged to have been committed by some person upon and with those of the female class, the natural and inevitable conclusion would seem to be that the same person committing the offense belonged to the other, the male class. United States v. Cannon, 7 Pac. 369, 4 Utah, 122.

ANHYDROUS.

"Anhydrous" signifies absence of water and the quality of taking it. It is the opposite of "hydrous," which is the scientific term indicating the presence of water. The use of the word "anhydrous," in speaking of an article known as "anhydrous lanoline," indicates that the lanoline is without water, in the first instance, though it may be capable of absorbing water. The term may be applied to lanoline after the water it contains is driven off. Joffe v. Evans, 75 N. Y. Supp. 257, 259, 70 App. Div. 186.

ANIMAL.

See "Dead Animals"; "Domestic Animal"; "Dumb Animal"; "Live Animals"; "Vicious Animal."

Any animals, see "Any."

Like animals, see "Like."

Other animals, see "Other."

"The common law divides animals having the power of locomotion, exclusive of man, into three classes, viz., such as are domitæ naturæ (tame animals) such as are feræ naturæ (wild animals), and such as, whether wild or tame, are of so base a nature as not to be the subject of larceny. This latter class is composed out of the two former. In the first class a man may have as absolute property as in any inanimate beings, because these continue perpetually in his occupation, and will not stray from his house or person unless by accident or fraudulent enticement, in either of which cases the owner does not lose his property. But in the second class a man can have no absolute property." State v. Summer, 2 Ind. (2 Cart.) 377, 378 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 390).

"Animals," as used in Sess. Acts 1874, p. 112, entitled "An act for the prevention of cruelty to animals," should be construed to cover all creatures except human beings. State v. Bogardus, 4 Mo. App. 215, 216.

Pub. St. c. 207, § 53, provides that every owner, possessor, or person having charge of any animal, who cruelly drives or works it when unfit for labor, or cruelly abandons it, or knowingly authorizes or permits it to be subjected to unnecessary torture or suffering of any kind, shall be punished, etc. Held, that the word "animal" as so used included all wild and noxious animals, and is sufficiently broad to include all brute creatures; and the word in its common acceptation includes all irrational beings. Commonwealth v. Turner, 14 N. E. 130, 131, 133, 145 Mass. 296.

The use of the word "animal" as designating the subject of a legacy is so uncertain in meaning as to render the legacy void. Succession of Trouard, 5 La. Ann. 390.

In statutes relating to or affecting animals, the words "animal" or "dumb animal" shall be held to include every living creature. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1298; Code N. C. 1883, § 2490.

The word "animal," as used in the chapter of the Penal Code relating to cruelty to animals, does not include the human race, but includes every other living creature. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 669.

In the chapter relating to cruelty to animals, the word "animal" shall be held to include every living dumb creature. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2287. In the act relating to the prevention of cruelty to animals, the word "animal" shall be held to include every living dumb creature. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 117. As used in the chapter relating to the prevention of cruelty to animals, the word "animal" shall be held to include every living dumb creature. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3721.

The word "animal," as used in the chapter relating to cruelty to animals, shall be held to include all brute creatures. V. S. 1894, 5000; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4459; Crim. Code, S. C. 1902, § 630; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 11,748.

In the chapter relating to offenses against chastity, morality and decency the word "animal" includes every living brute creature. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 911, c. 124, § 48.

Dead animals.

An animal is an organized living being, endowed with sensation, power, and voluntary motion, and also characterized by taking its food into an internal cavity or stomach, by giving off carbonic acid to the air, and taking oxygen into the process of respiration by a motive power or aggressive force, with progress to maturity. The term is properly applied, however, only so long as an animal is alive, and after its death it ceases to be an animal, but is an inanimate mass or carcass. Reed v. State, 16 Fla. 564, 565.

Where an animal is known by the same name after it has been slaughtered as before, an indictment charging the larceny of the animal will be construed to mean the live animal, and is not sufficient to describe the dead animal. Commonwealth v. Beaman, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 497, 499.

"Animals," as used in Rev. Code, § 3706, declaring a person who steals any animals therein designated guilty of grand larceny, should be construed to mean live animals, and not the carcasses or bodies of those that have been killed. Hunt v. State, 55 Ala. 138, 140.

Fowls.

"Animals," as used in a will devising animals belonging to testator, should be construed to include fowls. Huber v. Mohn, 37 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 432, 433.

Under Pen. Code, § 665, punishing the keeper of a house used for fighting any birds or animals, the animals include gamecocks. People v. Klock, 48 Hun, 275, 277.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2101, declaring cruelty to animals to be a misdemeanor, a domestic fowl, i. e., a goose, is an animal. State v. Bruner, 12 N. E. 103, 104, 111 Ind. 98.

Revenue Act 1861, c. 68, § 23, provides that animals of all kinds, birds, singing and other, and land and water fowls, shall be exempt from duty. By Act March 16, 1866 (14 Stat. 48), a duty of 20 per cent. was levied on all horses and mules, cattle, sheep, "and other live animals." Held, that the words "other live animals" did not include birds, since the second statute must be read in the light of the first. The court said: "The act of 1866 is in its terms comprehensive enough to include birds and all other living things endowed with sensation and the power of voluntary motion, and if there had not been previous legislation on the subject it might be possible that Congress did not intend to narrow the meaning of the word 'animals,' but, inasmuch as birds and fowls were not embraced in the term 'animals' in the act of 1861, it was manifest that Congress adopted the popular signification of the word 'animals,' which is applied only to quadrupeds, and placed birds and fowls in a different signification, and, having so defined the word in one act, it must be treated as meaning the same thing in a subsequent act in pari materia therewith." Reiche v. Smythe, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 162, 164, 20 L. Ed. 566.

Within the law of sodomy, a duck will be held to be an animal. Reg. v. Brown, 24 Q. B. Div. 357, 358.

The word "animals," as used in the act relating to the preservation of game, shall not be construed to include any variety of birds. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 2187.

The term "animals" and "animal," as used in the chapter relating to the humane society, or in the sections concerning animals, shall include all brute creatures and birds. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2815.

Horses.

"Animals," as used in Laws 1880, p. 322 (Act March 12, 1880), making animals with contagious or infectious diseases common nuisances, and authorizing their destruction, has a signification sufficiently broad to include horses, and therefore include horses affected by glanders. Newark & S. O. H. R. Co. v. Hunt, 12 Atl. 697, 699, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 308.

Snakes.

Trained snakes, imported by a professional snake charmer, to be used in exhibition of skill in that profession, and which were not for sale, are not dutiable as live "animals," under Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 251. Magnon v. U. S. (U. S.) 66 Fed. 151, 152.

ANIMALS FERÆ NATURÆ.

See "Feræ Naturæ."

ANIMO FURANDI.

"Animo furandi," means a fraudulent intent to appropriate goods to the taker's own use or wholly to deprive the owner of them. Gardner v. State, 26 Atl. 30, 33, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 17.

Eyre, C. D., says: "Larceny is the wrongful taking of the goods with the intent to spoil the owner of them lucri causa;" but Blackstone says the taking must be felonious; that is, done animo furandi, or, as the civil law expresses it, lucri causa. The point arrived at by these two expressions "animo furandi" and "lucri causa," the meaning of which has been much discussed, seems to be this: that the goods must be taken into possession of the thief with the intention of depriving the owner of his property in them. State v. Slingerland, 7 Pac. 280, 282, 19 Nev. 135.

ANIMUS DERELINQUENDI.

"Animus derelinquendi" is that simple affection of the mind by which a person wills that a thing previously his property should no longer remain so, without reference to any particular transference. Rhodes v. Whitehead, 27 Tex. 304, 313, 84 Am. Dec. 631.

ANIMUS TESTANDI.

To make a valid will the testator must have had the "animus testandi"; that is, his own free conclusion and wish to adopt the particular last will offered for probate. Bacon calls it "a mind or serious intention to make such a will." Farr v. Thompson (S. C.) 1 Speers, 93, 105.

ANNÉE.

The constitution and by-laws of an association allowed a member a sick benefit of a certain sum per week during 13 weeks only of the same "année," the original by-law being in the French language. It was held that année means a period of a year, and not a calendar year. Thibeault v. Association of St. Jean Baptist, 42 Atl. 518, 519, 21 R. I. 157.

ANNEX—ANNEXATION.

The word "annexed" is defined by lexicographers to mean joined at the end; connected with; affixed. It has a different and less extensive meaning than the word "appurtenant," which signifies belonging to, or pertaining to of right. Thus the terms "annexed grounds" in a statute exempting all churches, meeting houses, or other regular places of stated religious worship, with the grounds thereto annexed, for the occupancy and better enjoyment of the same, from taxation, does not include a parsonage belonging to the church, but separated and distinct therefrom. Treasurer of Dauphin County v. Rector, etc., of St. Stephen's Church, 3 Phila. 189, 190.

The term "annexation" means to add or unite to something already existing; to subjoin; to affix, as to unite a province to a kingdom, a codicil to a will, a condition to a grant. In Black's Law Dictionary the word "annexation" is thus defined: The act of attaching, adding, joining, or uniting one thing to another, generally spoken of the connection of a smaller or subordinate thing to the larger or principal thing. Maumee School Tp. v. School Town of Shirley City, 65 N. E. 285, 286, 159 Ind. 423.

In Act March 17, 1842, by which a portion of one town was set off therefrom and "annexed" to and made a part of another town, and repealing the act of incorporation of the first town annexed, means to unite one thing to another. There is no reference made to any effect which would thereby be produced upon that with which the thing united might have been before connected, but the word "annexation" is used in the legal sense and in decided cases to designate the act of separating a part of a town from it and uniting it with another town, and has always been used where the town from which the part annexed was taken was left as an existing corporation, and where there was no corporation left from which a part of a town was taken and united to another it was not "annexed" in the sense in which the term has been used, so as to give the same effect as the incorporation of a new town upon the settlement of paupers who previously had a settlement in the town or person of a town united to another. Inhabitants of Livermore v. Inhabitants of Phillips, 35 Me. 184, 187.

Where an agreement referred to a clause in a prior agreement, and provided that it should extend to the new agreement, it was not annexed to the new agreement, so as to make an additional stamp necessary as based on the number of words in both agreements. Atwood v. Small, 7 Barn. & C. 390, 391.

Attached.

The word "annexed" has been legally construed to mean physically joined. Hamilton County Com'rs v. Mannix, 9 Ohio Dec. 189, 191.

In Rev. St. c. 120, § 136, providing that the tax collector's warrant shall be "annexed" to his collection book, "annexed" means attached or fastened to the book in any manner whatsoever; it might be annexed by muclage or fastened by eyelets; tied or fastened by a cord or by a wire. Loehr v. People, 24 N. E. 68, 70, 132 Ill. 504.

Code, § 3971, requires that on foreclosure of a chattel mortgage an affidavit to foreclose shall be "annexed" to the mortgage, and be returned therewith to the clerk's office. Held, that the requirement that the affidavit should be annexed was prima facie complied with by statement that the affidavit and mortgage were "attached" together, the term "attached" being practically synonymous with the term "annexed." Bosworth v. Matthews, 74 Ga. 822.

By the expression "annexed to the freehold," used in defining a fixture, is meant fastened to or connected with it. Mere juxtaposition or the laying of an object, however heavy, on the freehold, does not amount to annexation. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59, 64.

The writing and signing a process on a separate paper from that on which the original petition is extended, and then placing the paper containing the process loosely within the folds of the petition, is not a compliance with that provision of the judiciary act of 1799 which requires the process to be "annexed" to the petition. The process must be extended on the same paper, or, if on a different paper, must be firmly united by wax or tape. Ballard v. Bancroft, 31 Ga. 503, 506.

"Annexed," as used in Gen. St. c. 131, § 26, requiring a magistrate's certificate to be annexed to the deposition, does not necessarily mean literally annexed in case of ponderous exhibits, but it is sufficient if they are sealed up by the magistrate and transmitted to the clerk in the same wrapper with his certificate. Shaw v. McGregory, 105 Mass. 98, 100.

"Annexed," as used in Rev. St. c. 70, § 62, relating to composition with creditors, and providing that the debtor shall present an affidavit containing a schedule of his accounts and liabilities "thereunto annexed," does not necessarily mean in contact with, but one paper may be regarded as annexed to another if inclosed in the same envelope, or if placed on file together." Cabbossee Nat. Bank v. Rich, 16 Atl. 506, 509, 81 Me. 164.

Indorsement on back of paper.

In the statute requiring an affidavit for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage to be annexed to the mortgage, and the two filed for record, "annexed" is used in the sense of "attach," and hence where the affidavit was written on the back of the mortgage it was annexed thereto, within the meaning of the statute. Lilly v. Willis, 73 Ga. 139.

Where a statute provides that before the sale of land under an execution appraisers shall be appointed and sworn, and a certificate of their oath shall be made on the back of the execution, the term "on the back" is not the same as "annexed," and a certificate written upon a separate piece of paper, and merely attached to the execution at a corner, though annexed, would not be on the back of the execution. Hall v. Staples, 74 Me. 178, 180.

ANNO DOMINI.

The words "Anno Domini," in the caption of an indictment, are not objectionable as not a part of the "English language." These words have become literally English by adoption. The same is true of a very considerable number of terms in the language. Most of these adopted terms have changed their costume, while others have not. "Phenomenon" and "memorandum" are as strictly English as any terms of the most purely Saxon derivation. Others are not the less so because they still retain their foreign dress. State v. Gilbert, 13 Vt. 647, 651.

A declaration containing the words "Anno Domini" is not demurrable on the ground that they are not in the English language, as they may be rejected as surplusage. Hale v. Vesper (N. H.) Smith, 283, 286.

The latin words "Anno Domini" mean, when translated, "in the year of our Lord." It is not necessary to add them, or their abbreviation "A. D.," to the date specified in an indictment charging the commission of an offense on such day. Commonwealth v. Traylor, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 97, 98, 45 S. W. 356.

ANNOUNCE.

Rev. St. 1876, p. 184, § 363, permits plaintiff to dismiss his action before the jury retires, or, when the trial is by the court, at any time before the findings of the court are announced. Held, that the term "announced," as defined by Worcester, means (a) to give public notice of; to publish; (b) to pronounce; to declare by judicial sentence; and hence it was not necessary, in order that the finding of the court trying the case should be "announced" within the act, that the finding should be orally stated by the judge from the bench, but that an entry of the finding in the proper order-book, by direction of the court finding in favor of one defendant generally, and for the plaintiff against the other defendants in the sum of ——— dollars, was an announcement, within the statute. Walker v. Heller, 56 Ind. 298, 300.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

An "announcement" is the act of announcing or giving public notice; proclamation; publication; hence where a petition in an election contest alleged that the clerks and judges canvassed the votes, and by their canvass, announcement, and return declared a person elected, and such allegation was admitted by the answer, it was error to find that no proclamation had been made as required by law. Dooley v. Van Hohenstein, 49 N. E. 193, 195, 170 Ill. 630.

ANNOYANCE.

Blackstone defines a nuisance as being anything to the hurt or annoyance of another. By hurt or "annoyance" here is meant, not a physical injury necessarily, but an injury to the owner or possessor of premises as respects his dealings with or his mode of enjoying them. Rowland v. Miller, 15 N. Y. Supp. 701, 702.

ANNUAL.

Annual, from the Latin "annus," usually means annually, or every twelve months. Whenever used in contracts, it is construed to mean every twelve calendar months. State v. McCullough, 3 Nev. 202, 224.

ANNUAL CROP.

The term "annual crops." in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 505, § 34, which requires administrators to take possession of and to inventory the emblements and "annual crops," whether severed or not from the land, raised by labor, etc., does not include uncut grass growing in a field, but such grass descends with the land to the heir. The distinction between annual crops, merely vegetable productions of the soil, raised by labor bestowed during the year, and trees, fruits, and grass, which are to a greater or less extent of spontaneous growth, may be said to be well recognized and firmly established by the authorities. Evans v. Hardy, 76 Ind. 527, 531.

ANNUAL ELECTION.

"Annual," as used in Const. art. 10, § 5, providing that in case of elective offices no person appointed to fill a vacancy shall hold his office by virtue of such appointment longer than the commencement of the next political year next succeeding the first "annual" election after the happening of the vacancy, is not synonymous with "municipal," as used in Buffalo City charter (Laws 1891, c. 105, § 271, as amended by Laws 1895, c. 805), providing that a vacancy in the office of an elected commissioner of public works shall be filled by appointment by the mayor, and the term of the appointee shall last until the first day of January after the next "municipal" election. People v. Scheu, 60 N. E. 650, 653, 186 N. Y. 292.

"Annual election," as used in Const. art. 10, § 5, providing that no person appointed to fill a vacancy shall hold his office by virtue of such appointment longer than the commencement of the political year next succeeding the first "annual election" after the happening of the vacancy, "is to be understood in a general sense, so as to embrace town meetings as well as state elections." People v. Keeler, 17 N. Y. 370, 375.

The words "annual election," as used in Oklahoma St. § 541, providing that the officers elected at the first election in any city of the first class shall hold only until the next annual election, mean yearly election. Wright v. Jacobs, 70 Pac. 193, 196, 12 Okl. 138.

ANNUAL EXPENSE.

Pamph. Laws 1886, p. 389, gives to the common council of any city power to order any public street to be lighted, and to make and enter into contracts therefor with any other parties, "and to cause the annual expense thereof to be certified." Held, that the phrase, "and to cause the annual expense thereof to be certified," should be construed to limit such contracts to the period of one year, and therefore the council had no power to contract for such lighting for a longer period of time. Taylor v. Lambertville, 10 Atl. 809, 814, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 107.

ANNUAL FRUIT.

A lease reserving under the lessor all timber trees, and other trees, but not the "annual fruit thereof," may apply either to the produce of an orchard or to that of timber trees, and the words may therefore be satisfied without holding them to apply to the produce of orchard trees. Bullen v. Denning, 5 Barn. & C. 842, 847.

ANNUAL INCOME.

Under the charter of a corporation which restricts it from holding property exceeding a specified "annual income," such term is not synonymous with "actual value." Property may have actual value without any income. Gradual depreciation in the value of lands of a corporation is not annual income. Betts v. Betts, 4 Abb. N. C. 317, 400.

"Annual income," as used in Act Dec. 31, 1838, § 13, providing that the railroad thereby incorporated and its property should not be subject to a higher tax than one-half of 1 per centum on its annual income, means gross income. People v. Niagara County Sup'rs, 4 Hill, 23; Niagara County Sup'rs v. People, 7 Hill, 504. The gross income is what passage money and freights the road makes each year, and not the annual rental derived from its lease to another company. Goldsmith v. Augusta & S. R. Co., 62 Ga. 468, 471.

"Annual value or income," as used in Act April 24, 1846, authorizing trusts for the benefit of the owners and occupants of mill privileges on the Wynantskill, and authorizing the formation of an association for holding these trusts, and providing that the annual value or income of the property to be held in trust is not to exceed the sum of $2,000, refers to the association formed under the act above referred to, and not to its members individually. It does not mean the benefits which each member of the association derives from his mill privilege or business, but means the collective value or income received by the association as such under the statute. Troy Iron & Nail Factory v. Winslow, 45 Barb. 231, 247.

ANNUAL INTEREST.

A note provided that the maker would pay the sum stated therein in ten years from date, "with annual interest," and it was contended that the word "annual," used as an adjective, was intended to and did modify interest, and meant only the computation of the interest by annual rests, but that the whole amount, principal and interest, did not become due until the expiration of ten years from date; but it was held that the contract would not be so construed, but that "annual interest," in legal contemplation, was the same as if written "interest annually," and that the interest on the note was therefore due and payable at the expiration of each year. Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44, 46.

Annual interest, within the meaning of a guaranty by a surety of "annual interest," indorsed on an instrument, in which the maker obligates himself to insure 10 per cent. profit upon the amount of capital invested by another person in the certain business, evidently means the present profit which the other side of the paper calls for, and is not an obligation to pay 10 per cent. annually on the capital, irrespective of the conditions which its terms import; and thus, the business being a partnership business, the liability of the guarantor is contingent and conditional upon the profits accruing falling below 10 per cent. upon the amount invested by B. McPike v. Kerr's Ex'r, 29 Mo. 79, 83.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The words "annual meeting," applied to towns, mean the annual meeting required by law for choice of town officers. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 4.

The words "annual meeting," as used in a statute, when applied to townships shall be construed to mean the annual meeting required by law to be held in the month of April. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 4.

The words "annual meeting," when applied to towns, shall mean annual meetings required by law to be held in the month of February, March, or April. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 88, c. 8, § 5, subd. 1.

The words "annual meeting," when applied to towns, shall mean the annual town meeting in March or the adjournment thereof. V. S. 1894, 4.

Laws 1867, c. 75, § 1, which provides that at the "annual meeting in November" in every year thereafter the county board of supervisors for the several counties shall fix and determine the annual salary that shall be received by each and every county officer, etc., means merely the meeting which commences in November; therefore the board of supervisors may fix the salary of a county officer at an adjourned session of such meeting, though such adjourned session is not held until the following March. Hull v. Winnebago County, 11 N. W. 486, 487, 54 Wis. 291.

ANNUAL OFFICE.

An annual office is one which runs for a year, and thus where by a statute commissioners were required to meet yearly, and appoint assessors for a year, the assessors were annual officers, and their bondsmen were only liable, under their statutory bonds, for their acts during the term of their office. Pepin v. Cooper, 2 Barn. & Ald. 431, 439.

Under the statutes of various states, public officers are elected pursuant to statutory provisions which fix their term of office, but in many cases they are elected annually. That is the case in all New England states. In New England towns there is an annual meeting, where the citizens assemble and elect their town officers in a government of pure democracy. They are elected annually at these meetings. A great many years ago in Massachusetts a question arose whether under such a provision the sureties of an officer elected for a year, and where his default occurred after the year, but before his successor had qualified, were liable for such default, in Chelmsford County v. Demarest. 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 1, when Chief Justice Shaw was on the bench, and a thorough examination of it was made. The court held that the office was annual, so that, where the condition of the bond was that the officer should hold until his successor was elected, such condition did not cease to make it an annual office, so far, at all events, as the sureties were concerned. Such view of the question has been adopted in most of the states, although North Carolina, Indiana, perhaps Maryland, and possibly Mississippi, have decided the other way. Harris v. Babbitt (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 612, 614.

ANNUAL PROFITS.

Other annual profits. see "Other."

Laws 1853, c. 654, providing that any incorporated company named in an assessment roll, upon proof made to the board of supervisors that it had not been, during the preceding year, in receipt of net "annual" profits or clear income equal to 5 per cent. on the capital stock, should be entitled to a commutation on taxes, contemplated that the corporation would have been in business during the whole year, as it is in such cases that "annual" profits or income can accrue. Park Bank v. Wood, 24 N. Y. 93, 96.

ANNUAL SALARY.

1 Acts 1865, p. 124, increasing the "annual salary" of the attorney general, should not be construed to operate retrospectively, so as to make the increased salary commence at the beginning of the quarter, the word "annual" having reference only to the rate at which the salary was to be computed and paid, and not to the time when such rates should be commenced. State v. Thompson, 36 Mo. 66, 69.

"Annual salary," as used in Ky. St. § 1072, providing that the county judge shall receive an "annual salary," necessarily means a continuing rate of payment—something that will apply for each succeeding year—and is not the fixing of a compensation for a specific time. Marion County Fiscal Court v. Kelly, 56 S. W. 815, 816, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 174.

ANNUAL TAXES.

A direction in a will to pay annual taxes is not a direction to pay special assessments. A special assessment, imposed for a special purpose, has none of the distinctive features of the ordinary annual taxes which are proposed for some general or public object. Warren v. Warren, 36 N. E. 611, 614, 148 Ill. 341 (citing Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 126 Ill. 92, 18 N. E. 315, 1 L. R. A. 613; Id., 147 U. S. 190, 13 Sup. Ct. 293, 37 L. Ed. 132).

"Annual town meeting," as used in Const. 1846, art. 6, § 18, providing that the electors of the several towns at their annual town meeting shall elect justices of the peace, means the annual meeting of the electors, as distinguished from all other public assemblages and elections; and the words "annual town meeting" are the antithesis of those indicating a general or special election, and must have been used with reference to their well-understood character; and it is reasonable to suppose that the intention of the formulators of the Constitution was to provide for the selection of these officers at a time and place when the attention of the electors should not be disturbed or affected by the consideration of subjects of state or national importance. The distinction of the annual town meeting as a time when justices were to be chosen was equivalent to an express prohibition against choosing them at a general or special election or at a special town meeting. People v. Schiellein, 95 N. Y. 124, 128.

ANNUAL VALUE.

See "Annual Income"; "Clear Annual or Yearly Value."

ANNUALLY.

See also, "Yearly."

In a promissory note by which the maker agreed to pay a certain sum three years from date, "with interest annually" at 10 per cent., such words are not used merely for the purpose of determining the rate of interest, but for the purpose of fixing the time when the interest should be payable, meaning that the interest should be payable annually. Walker v. Kimball, 22 Ill. (12 Peck) 537, 538; Winchell v. Coney, 5 Atl. 354, 355, 54 Conn. 24; Patterson v. McNeeley, 16 Ohio St. 348, 352.

"Annually," as used in a note, whereby the maker bound himself to pay a certain sum in a year, with interest from date, payable annually, makes the payee entitled to interest upon interest, as well upon that which accrued annually after the expiration of the first year as upon that which then fell due. O'Neill v. Bookman, 9 Rich. Law, 80, 82.

A contract to pay interest "annually" is the same thing as if the party at the end of each year promised as much money as would be equal to the interest which might then be due. In such a contract there can be no doubt interest must be computed on the sums thus annually set down as due. Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582, 594.

"The ordinary and natural meaning of a direction by one person to pay to another a specified sum 'annually,' or each year, is that the specified sum is to be paid in an annual or yearly payment. The word or phrase, naturally interpreted, would be regarded as fixing both the measure and time of payment." Kearney v. Cruikshank, 22 N. E. 580, 582, 117 N. Y. 95; Henry v. Henderson, 33 South. 960, 964, 81 Miss. 743, 63 L. R. A. 616.

Laws 1901, p. 316, c. 132, § 187a, enacts that every trust company shall pay "annually," for the privilege of exercising its corporate franchise, a certain annual tax. Held, that the word "annually" did not show that the Legislature did not intend that a trust company should pay for any period of existence less than a year, and hence a trust company was liable for the tax, though it had only been in business six days when the tax was assessed. People v. Miller, 83 N. Y. Supp. 185, 187, 85 App. Div. 211.

As fixing time of year.

"Annually," as used in an insurance policy providing that the premium shall be paid "annually," signifies once in a year, but does not signify at what time in the year, and it is by no means inconsistent with a stipulation in the same instrument which fixes that time. McMaster v. New York Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 856, 858, 869, 40 C. C. A. 119.

Under statutes requiring the directors of certain corporations to "annually" make and file a certificate of its condition on the first day of the month then next pending, and in case of failure making them liable personally for all debts contracted by the corporation while such default continued, the first such certificate could be filed during any month of the year, and a similar certificate at any time during the corresponding month of the next ensuing year. Bond v. Clark, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 361.

As per annum or yearly.

The word "annually" means yearly or once in each year. Continental Nat. Bank v. Buford (U. S.) 107 Fed. 188, 189.

"Annually," as used in the limited partnership act (1 Rev. St. p. 763, § 15), authorizing a special partner to draw interest on his capital stock "annually," means the same as "per annum" or by the year, and it was not a violation of the statute to permit a special partner to draw his interest monthly, since the statute does not prohibit the payment of proportionate parts of the annual interest at stated periods of less than a year.

Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Sirret, 97 N. Y. 320, 331.

Laws 1870, c. 519, § 2, declared that the board of health of the city of Buffalo should "annually" appoint a health physician, and prescribe his duties. Held, that a resolution making such appointment, duly adopted, was an appointment of the officer for a year, which deprived the board of power to rescind the same at a subsequent meeting, the word "annually" as there used importing that the physician was to hold the office for the term of one year from his appointment. City of Buffalo v. Mackay, 15 Hun, 204, 208.

As year by year.

The use of the word "annually" in the articles of incorporation of a church, providing that the members of the church who shall contribute as much as 10 shillings "annually" towards its support shall meet to elect trustees, was intended to fence out intruders, and to guard against those abuses to which all religious corporations are exposed in time of excitement. Hence the requirement not merely of money, but the payment of money "annually," which would exclude individuals who offered to vote in virtue of payment made less than a year before the election, and the word as used means year by year, a series of payments, and not one single payment at the time of the election. Juker v. Commonwealth, 20 Pa. (8 Harris) 484, 494.

In Act May 22, 1867, § 13, providing that every company incorporated under such act should "annually," within 20 days from the 1st day of January, make and publish a report, "annually" means every year, and that whenever a January comes after the company has been incorporated it must make and publish the report in question. Union Iron Co. v. Pierce (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 583, 584.

The word "annually," as used in the city charter of San Francisco, providing that the first general election for city officers shall be held in April, 1851, and thereafter "annually," at the general election for state officers, does not mean a measure of time, but a succession of calendar years, and, as the general elections are held in September, the first officers elected in April only hold to such time, as the word "annually" has no relation to the first election held in April, so as to make it one of the annual elections contemplated. People v. Brenham, 3 Cal. 477, 488.

"Annual," from the Latin "annus," usually means annually, or every 12 months. Whenever used in contracts it is construed to mean every 12 calendar months. Annual interest is interest payable every 12 months. Annual rent is considered in the same manner, but the term "annually elected," as used in the incorporation law of California, would not perhaps admit of this strict construction. In requiring an annual election of trustees the evident purpose of the Legislature was to limit the term of office to 12 months, or as near to that period as is practicable, and that the uniform rule should be adopted so that trustees should hold office for one year, and that the election for such trustees should take place substantially every 12 months. Curtis v. McCullough, 8 Nev. 202, 224.

"Annually," as used in a note payable one day after date, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, interest to be paid "annually," amounts to a stipulation for payment of such interest after maturity. Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341, 343.

"Annually," as used in a promissory note in which the maker promises to pay a sum of money in, at, or within 12 months after its date, with interest payable "annually," means that the interest is to be paid annually until the note is fully paid; but where the promise is to pay more than 12 months after date, with interest from date payable "annually," the interest does not continue to be payable after maturity. Westfield v. Westfield, 19 S. C. 85, 89.

ANNUITY.

See "Clear Annuity"; "Voluntary Annuity."

An annuity is a yearly payment of a certain sum of money, granted to another in fee, or for life, or for a term of years. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73; Kearney v. Cruikshank, 22 N. E. 580, 582, 117 N. Y. 95; Pearson v. Chase, 10 R. I. 455, 456; Henry v. Henderson (Miss.) 33 South. 960, 964, 63 L. R. A. 616; Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co. v. Dancel (U. S.) 119 Fed. 692, 693, 56 C. C. A. 300. Charging the person of the grantor only. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73; Horton v. Cook (Pa.) 10 Watts, 124, 127, 36 Am. Dec. 151; Wagstaff v. Lowrer, 23 Barb. 209, 216; Turrentine v. Perkins, 46 Ala. 631, 633; Nehls v. Sauer, 93 N. W. 346, 119 Iowa, 440.

A charge upon land devised cannot properly be considered as an "annuity," because by an annuity the person alone is charged. No land is incumbered with it. In re Owings (Md.) 1 Bland, 290, 296.

An annuity is a grant of a certain sum of money, to be paid by the representatives of the grantor at the expiration of fixed, consecutive periods for life of the grantee. In re Williams, 12 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 179, 182.

An annuity "is a sum one is entitled to per year during his whole life." Atlanta & W. P. R. R. v. Johnson, 66 Ga. 259, 262.

An annuity "is an annual payment for the support of the recipient," and terminates with his life. Wagstaff v. Lawerre, 23 Barb. 209, 216.

The contract of annuity is that by which one party delivers to another a sum of money, and agrees not to reclaim it so long as the receiver pays the rent agreed upon. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2793.

An annuity arises upon the ground of a yearly sum, with the payment of which the grantor has charged himself, and which would have been liable at the common law to a writ of annuity. Pennington v. Metropolitan Museum of Art (N. J.) 55 Atl. 468, 471.

An annuity is a bequest of certain specified sums periodically; and, if the fund or property out of which they are paid fails, resort may be had to the general assets, as in the case of a general legacy. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1820, subd. 3; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1357, subd. 3; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1071.

It seems to be well settled in the American courts that, as a general rule, a bequest of the interest of a particular sum will not be construed the same as giving an annuity of the same amount, although payable annually; but it will be regarded simply as a gift of the income or interest of that amount. Whitson v. Whitson, 53 N. Y. 479, 482 (citing Redf. Wills, pt. 2, p. 453).

Annuities given by wills ordinarily commence from the death of the testator. Wethered v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 28 Atl. 812, 813, 79 Md. 153; Welsh v. Brown, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 37, 42; In re Stanfield, 31 N. E. 1013, 1015, 135 N. Y. 292.

Income or profits distinguished.

"There is a distinction between income and annuity. The former embraces only the net profits, after deducting all necessary expenses and charges. The latter is a fixed amount, directed to be paid absolutely and without contingency." Carr v. Bennett (N. Y.) 3 Dem. Sur. 433, 442; Ex parte McComb (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 151, 152. Hence, where a testator by will gave his wife an "annuity" of a certain amount per annum, directing his executors to retain in their hands and keep invested a sum sufficient to pay the "annuity," the "annuity" is not liable for the annual taxes on the property. Ex parte McComb (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 151, 152.

The income or interest of a certain fund is not an annuity, but simply profits to be earned, and, although directed to be paid annually, that relates only to the mode of payment, and does not change the character of the bequest. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73.

An annuity is a stated sum per annum, payable annually, unless otherwise directed. It is not income or profits, nor indeterminate in amount, varying according to the income or profits, though a certain sum may be provided out of which it is to be payable; and hence, where testator gave a beneficiary the interest upon a certain sum, payable annually, it is not an annuity, but merely an ordinary legacy, for it is not a stated sum, but may be more or less, according to the earnings of the capital, and is merely interest or income. Booth v. Ammerman (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 129, 133.

An annuity usually consists of a gross sum payable in any event, and in principle there is no difference between the gift of an annuity and the gift of income with respect to the time when each begins to accrue. An annuity is payable from the death of the testator, unless a different time is prescribed in the will. In re Stanfield, 31 N. E. 1013, 1015, 135 N. Y. 292.

Legacy distinguished.

The terms "legacy" and "annuity" are often used interchangeably. Thus a devise of real estate to a city, on condition that the city pay to the devisors' widow annually $3,000, creates a legacy, an annuity, in her favor. Budd v. Budd (U. S.) 59 Fed. 735, 740.

Lord Eldon, in Gibson v. Bott, 7 Ves. 96, drew the distinction between an annuity and a legacy for life, which has been cited in every thoroughly considered case since: If an annuity is given, the first payment is payable at the end of the year from the death; but if a legacy for life is given, with the remainder over, no interest is due until the end of two years. It is only the interest of the legacy, and until the legacy is payable there is no fund to produce interest. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73.

Rent charge distinguished.

An annuity is a yearly sum of money, granted by one person to another for life or years, and which charges only the person of the grantor, while a rent charge, frequently confounded with an annuity, is a burden imposed on and issuing out of land. Wagstaff v. Lowerre, 23 Barb. 209, 216.

A devise reading: "I give and bequeath to my daughter the sum of $60.00 as an annuity, to be paid to her out of the profits of my real estate annually," constituted an "annuity," and not a rent charge. Robinson v. Townshend (Md.) 3 Gill & J. 413, 424.

A covenant in a deed to pay the grantor a certain sum in each and every year during the lifetime of the grantor, such payment to be made a lien on the land, was a covenant to pay an annuity, and not rent. Nehls v. Sauer, 93 N. W. 346, 119 Iowa, 440.

ANNUL.

To "annul" means to abrogate, to make void; and a bequest is not annulled by a codicil because the time for the payment of the bequest is extended. In re Morrow's Estate, 54 Atl. 342, 343, 204 Pa. 484.

To annul is to make void. Webster's Dict. To dissolve constitutes an annulment, and a dissolution of a marriage by a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, is therefore an annulment, and defeats the dower rights of the widow. Wait v. Wait, 4 Barb. 192, 205.

To annul is to render void, or declare invalid, nullify, or abolish. Standard Dict. The annulment of a special assessment, spoken of in Laws 1896, c. 910, providing that, whenever an assessment for a local improvement has been "annulled" by a judgment of any court, the amount paid on such assessment may be recovered, refers to the annulment of the assessment against the particular property affected thereby, and such annulment does not operate as an annulment of the entire assessment on all property affected thereby. Wallace v. City of New York, 65 N. Y. Supp. 855, 859, 53 App. Div. 187.

The word "annul," in a statute giving the right to annul a sale of a lot in the St. Louis commons, is not a technical word, and there is nothing which prevents the idea conveyed by it from being expressed in equivalent words. The annulling of a lease is nothing more in effect than causing a forfeiture of it, and therefore the annulment of a sale, within the meaning of the statute, is accomplished by declaring the lot forfeited to the city. Woodson v. Skinner, 22 Mo. 13, 24.

A testator, who bequeathed a certain sum to an orphanage, afterwards executed a codicil which recited: "I hereby annul and revoke such bequest, and instead thereof I give the same to a trustee, to be invested during the life of [a person] for his benefit, and upon his death to be paid to the orphanage for the purpose expressed in the will." In construing the codicil, it was held that the words "annul and revoke," taken in connection with expressed purposes of the codicil, did not constitute a revocation of the will. "The fact that the testator called it by that name does not make it so." "Revoke" means to recall, to take back, to appeal. "Annul" means to abrogate, to make void. The codicil did not recall or make void the bequest in any part, except as to the time of payment, and this it changed. In re Watts' Estate, 32 Atl. 42-44, 168 Pa. 422.

A warrant of attachment against property is said to be "annulled" when the action in which it was granted abates or is discontinued, or a final judgment rendered therein in favor of the plaintiff is fully paid, or a final judgment is rendered therein in favor of the defendant; but in the case last specified a stay of proceedings suspends the effect of the annulment, and the reversal or vacating of the judgment revives the warrant. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 12.

ANOMALOUS INDORSER.

A person not a party to a negotiable promissory note, who places his name on the back thereof, after its execution and delivery, before maturity, and before it has been indorsed by the payee, is an irregular, or, as it has been sometimes styled, an "anomalous, indorser," and is, as to bona fide holders, an indorser of the paper. Buck v. Hutchins, 47 N. W. 808, 809, 45 Minn. 270, 271.

ANOMALOUS PLEA.

An anomalous plea is one which is partly affirmative and partly negative, and must always be supported by an answer in subsidium as to the allegations which constitute the replication and as to all charges of evidence, if any, in support of such allegation. Baldwin v. City of Elizabeth, 6 Atl. 275, 280, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 11.

An "anomalous plea" is a plea which is neither strictly affirmative or negative may be filed by a complainant, who, after stating his case, proceeds to set out some fact which exists, or which the defendant pretends exists, which fact, if standing alone, would defeat his suit, and then goes on to state circumstances to show that the existence of such fact cannot be used against him. Thus, where the bill states that there had been an account stated between the parties, or an award of arbitrators, or a former judgment or decree, either of which would bar the suit, and then proceeds to attack the account stated or award or judgment or decree by setting up circumstances to invalidate them, such a plea is permissible. Potts v. Potts (N. J.) 42 Atl. 1055, 1056.

ANOTHER.

In Comp. St. c. 68, § 2, providing that the printing of all bills for the Legislature shall be let in one contract, the printing and binding of the Senate and House Journals shall be let in another contract, the word "another" signifies one more, and precludes the idea that such contracts can be divided into several contracts. State v. Cornell, 71 N. W. 961, 965, 52 Neb. 25.

In Code 1891, c. 157, § 10, providing that, "when one grand jury has been discharged, another may by order of the court be summoned to attend the same term," "another" does not mean that only one other may be summoned, but only declares the common-law power to have further grand juries. Eastham v. Holt, 27 S. E. 883, 884, 43 W. Va. 599.

The word "another," in How's Ann. St. § 9121, providing that any person who shall assault "another," with intent to do great bodily harm, less than the crime of murder, shall be punished, etc., is not to be construed to mean one, and no more, and therefore such an assault may be made on two or more persons jointly. People v. Ellsworth, 51 N. W. 531, 532, 90 Mich. 442.

In a statute providing for the punishment of any person who shall forge or counterfeit any writing whatever to obtain the possession or to deprive another of any money or property, or cause him to be injured in his estate or lawful rights, "another" will be construed to include the state; and hence the forgery of a witness' certificate payable by the state is within the statute. Moore v. Commonwealth, 18 S. W. 833, 92 Ky. 630.

In Rev. St. 1881, § 2204, as amended by Acts 1883, providing penalties for whoever, with intent to defraud another, designedly, by color of any false writing or pretense, obtains from any person any money or thing of value, "another" refers to a person or persons, and should be construed to include a city as an artificial person. State v. Bruner, 35 N. E. 22, 24, 135 Ind. 419.

The term "personal goods of another," in 1 Stat. 116, a criminal statute in reference to larceny of the "personal goods of another," applies to the personal goods of the United States. United States v. Maxon (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1220.

"Another," as used in Rev. St. art. 2899, subd. 2, allowing the actual damages for the death of any person through the wrongful act, neglect or default of another, construed to mean an individual, and not an artificial person, as a corporation. "Person" and "another," as used in the statute, are employed in their popular sense, and mean an individual, and not an artificial person. Ritz v. City of Austin, 20 S. W. 1029, 1031, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 455.

The word "another," when used in a statute, may extend and be applied to communities, companies, corporations, public or private, societies, and associations. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1.

The word "another," when used to designate the owner of any property subject to any offense, includes not only natural persons, but every other owner of property. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 6794. As used in that part of the statutes relating to crimes and criminal procedure, the words "person" and "another," when used to designate the owner of any property, the subject of any offense, include not only natural persons, but every other owner of property. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 5190.

The word "another," as used in the provisions of the Code defining and punishing forgery, includes the United States, and the several states and territories, and all the several branches of government of either of them, all public and private bodies politic and corporate, all partnerships, as well as individuals. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, §§ 6612, 6613.

Within the meaning of the word "another," as used in the definition of forgery, are included this state, the United States, or either of the states or territories of the Union, and all the several branches of the government, or either of them, all public or private bodies, politic and corporate, all courts, all officers, public or private, in their official capacity, all partnerships in professions or trades, and all other persons, whether real or fictitious, except the person engaged in the forgery. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 535.

As a different one.

Gen. St. c. 128, § 8, provides that, when a judgment for damages and costs is rendered against an executor or administrator, an execution for the debt or damage shall be ruled against the goods or estate of the deceased, and "another execution" for costs against the goods or body of the executor as if it was his own debt. It was held that "another" should be construed to mean a different and separate execution, in no manner affected by the execution rendered on the debt, and hence the fact that the execution on the debt was stayed, because of the estate's insolvency and of the appointment of commissioners to settle the same, did not require that the execution for costs against the administrator should likewise be stayed. Greenwood v. McGilvray, 120 Mass. 516, 521.

"Another," as used in statute of frauds, requiring an agreement to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another to be in writing, must be understood as referring to persons other than the contracting parties. Preble v. Baldwin, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 549, 553.

The statute of frauds, requiring a contract to "answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person to be in writing" does not include a promise made to a debtor to pay the debt due the creditor. Flemm v. Whitmore, 23 Mo. 430, 432.

"Money or property of another," within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 95, § 23, authorizing the punishment of any clerk, agent, servant, etc., for embezzling without the consent of his employer or master any money or property of another, means any money or property not belonging to the defendant. State v. Kent, 22 Minn. 41, 42, 21 Am. Rep. 764.

The word "another," as used in the Kentucky statute providing for the punishment of any person who shall forge or counterfeit any writing whatever, thereby fraudulently to obtain the possession of, or to deprive "another" of, any money or property, means a different person. Moore v. Commonwealth, 92 Ky. 630, 633, 18 S. W. 833, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 738.

ANOTHER COUNTRY.

The words "another country" signify any part of the world out of this state. Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7215.

ANOTHER OFFICER.

Where a bond stipulated for the good conduct of an officer holding office for a fixed time, and until another officer be appointed, "another" was not used in the sense of another person, but meant another officer; and, where the original incumbent of the office was re-elected, he was another officer within the meaning of the bond. A man who is re-elected to his office may be usually said to have changed his official personality. Such a person, with respect to his position, is another officer, and in this sense a man may be said to be his own successor. Citizens' Loan Ass'n v. Nugent, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 215, 217, 29 Am. Rep. 230.

ANOTHER PARTY.

Devisees are proper parties to an action for an accounting by the executors against the surviving partner of the testator, and, though joined as defendants, their interests are adverse to those of the surviving partner, and they may ask for a discovery of his books, as being "another party to the action," within Code Civ. Proc. § 803. Applebee v. Duke, 21 N. Y. Supp. 890, 892, 66 Hun, 634.

ANOTHER PERSON.

A corporation is another person, distinct in law from a natural or artificial person who holds its stock. When, therefore, upon the faith of a stockholder's promise a corporation obtains property, the person who makes the promise is not the person who obtains the property; and, if the stockholder be a married woman, it is a promise on her part to pay the debt of "another person," and not to her own use or for her separate estate. Allen v. Beebe, 43 Atl. 681, 63 N. J. Law, 377.

Pub. St. c. 78, § 4, declares that false representations with reference to the credit and ability of another person in writing shall be actionable. Held, that the words "another person" included representations by the officers of a corporation with reference to its financial standing or means, made with reference to its credit and ability. Hunnell v. Duxbury, 31 N. E. 700, 702, 135 Mass. 1.

"Another person," as used in the definition of a fidel commissum as a disposition causa mortis by which the heir or legatee is requested to give or return a certain thing to another person, means the person or institution so named or indicated as to individualize him or her of it, and a general bequest to a city, and to it alone, is held not to come within this definition. Succession of Meunier, 26 South. 776, 779, 52 La. Ann. 79, 48 L. R. A. 77.

ANOTHER STATE.

A corporation chartered by congress is a corporation of "another state," within Act March 24, 1870, relating to the leasing by a railroad in the state of its road to a corporation in another state. Smith v. Pacific R. R., 61 Mo. 17, 18.

ANSWER.

See "Complete Answer"; "False Answer"; "Full Answer"; "Sham Answer"; "Supplemental Answer."

Irrelevant answer, see "Irrelevancy—Irrelevant."

The answer is the statement of the defense or any counter claim or claims. Talbott v. Garretson, 49 Pac. 978, 979, 31 Or. 256.

An answer is a counter statement of facts in the course of pleading; a confutation of what the other party has alleged. When an answer is spoken of in legal proceedings, it generally implies something that is written. Larrabee v. Larrabee, 33 Me. 100, 102.

The term "answer," in the law of pleading, includes both denials and defenses, and may consist of a denial or denials only, or of a defense only, or of both. Schmidt v. McCaffrey, 70 N. Y. Supp. 1011, 34 Misc. Rep. 693 (citing Code Civ. Proc. § 500).

An answer must contain, first, a general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief, and, second, a statement of any new matter constituting a defense, offset, or counterclaim. Singer v. Effler, 39 N. Y. Supp. 720, 721, 16 Misc. Rep. 334.

An answer, in pleading, is a statement of defense. It is not its office to demand affirmative relief, unless a counterclaim, nor can it be made to take the place of a motion to cite in new parties. Russell v. Easterbrook, 40 Atl. 905, 906, 71 Conn. 50.

The "answer," as the term is used in admiralty, is the pleading occupying a similar position in admiralty proceedings to that occupied by the plea in a proceeding at common law. The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302, 316, 23 L. Ed. 863.

As affidavit.

See "Affidavit."

Appearance.

As an appearance, see "Appearance."

The term "answer," as used in a statute requiring the defendant, in order to defeat a judgment by default, to file his answer within the time required by law, means a written pleading of some character (that is, in courts where pleas are required to be reduced to writing); and the simple appearance of the defendant in court, without submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court for the purposes of the trial of the case, would not be an answer. State v. Patterson (Tex.) 40 S. W. 224.

Counterclaim or set-off distinguished.

An answer is to be distinguished from a counterclaim or set-off by the fact that the purpose of an answer is to defeat the action and bar the recovery by the plaintiff on the cause of action set up by him, while a counterclaim or set-off, on the contrary, is a pleading by which the defendant states a cause of action in his own favor and against the plaintiff. It does not purport to answer the complaint, or to set forth any facts which bar a recovery upon it. It has none of the parts of an answer. It neither admits nor denies the allegations of the complaint. It does not confess and avoid them. Where a defendant succeeds upon an answer, the only judgment that the court can pronounce is that the plaintiff take nothing by his complaint; that the defendant go hence, therefore, without day, and recover his costs. The same pleading cannot be tried both as an answer and a counterclaim. If a defendant wishes to obtain affirmative relief against the plaintiff, he must state his cause of action by way of counterclaim or set-off. Hence it is held that where defendants filed a pleading alleging certain facts "for a third and further defense," and stating as a conclusion that because of such facts the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, and asked judgment, the pleading was an answer, and not a set-off or counterclaim, and hence could not be made the foundation of a judgment for damage or other affirmative relief in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff. Bird v. St. John's Episcopal Church, 56 N. E. 129, 133, 154 Ind. 138.

Defense synonymous.

Rev. St. p. 352, § 9, having given a right to plead several pleas in an answer, the term "answer," as used in Code, § 247, refers to such entire answer as a distinct pleading, and not one or more parts of an answer, or one or more of several defenses, as constituting the answer. An answer is one thing, and well understood when referred to as such, and a single defense making a part of an answer is quite another thing; and the one is never confounded with the other, either in the statutes or in popular legal phraseology. Stronge v. Sproul, 53 N. Y. 497, 499.

An answer, strictly speaking, is a pleading by which the defendant in a suit at law endeavors to resist the plaintiff's demand by an allegation of facts, either denying the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, or confessing them and alleging new matter in avoidance, which defendant alleges should prevent a recovery on the facts alleged by plaintiff. The word, however, has been liberally used in the adjudications to include all manner of forms of pleadings by defendant, except demurrers and pleas in abatement, including pleas of set-off and counterclaim and cross-bills in equity, and may properly be defined as used to-day as a pleading by the defendant alleging facts barring plaintiff's right of recovery, and as synonymous with the word "defense." Brower v. Nellis, 33 N. E. 672, 673, 6 Ind. App. 323.

Dilatory plea.

A dilatory plea is not an answer, within the act of Congress providing that the petition for removal of a case must be filed at or before the time at which the defendant is required to plead or answer. Mahoney v. New South Building & Loan Ass'n (U. S.) 70 Fed. 513, 515.

All pleas or answers of a defendant, whether in matter of law by demurrer, or in matter of fact, either of dilatory plea to the jurisdiction of the court, or in suspension or abatement of the particular suit, or by plea in bar of the whole right of action, are said in the standard works on pleading to answer the declaration or complaint, which the defendant is summoned to meet. Pennsylvania Co. v. Leeman, 66 N. E. 48, 50, 160 Ind. 16 (citing Martin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 673, 14 Sup. Ct. 533, 38 L. Ed. 311).

Demurrer or motion.

A demurrer to a bill is an answer in law, though not in a technical sense and according to the common language of practice. New Jersey v. New York, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 323, 327, 8 L. Ed. 414.

A demurrer is not an answer in any legal sense. Cashman v. Reynolds, 9 N. Y. Supp. 614, 615, 56 Hun. 333.

Under Hill's Ann. Laws, § 536, providing that any party to the judgment, other than those given by confession or for want of an answer, may appeal therefrom, it was held that an appeal would lie from a judgment entered on demurrer. "A demurrer is an answer," said the court, "in so far as it questions the law of the case upon the facts stated. An answer charges the facts themselves; and within the purview of the statute the demurrer is as effective in giving the right of appeal as an answer." Willis v. Marks, 45 Pac. 293, 294, 29 Or. 493.

"Answer," as used in Rev. St. c. 138, § 1, declaring that the objection that an action was not commenced within the time limited can only be taken by answer, includes demurrers. "This provision came with the Code, in which the word 'answer' is frequently used in a general sense, so as to signify any pleading by which an issue, whether of law or of fact, is made or tendered on the part of defendant." Howell v. Howell, 15 Wis. 55, 59.

A demurrer is an "answer," within the meaning of Practice Act, § 150, authorizing a clerk to enter default judgment in an action for money or damages arising on a contract, "if no answer has been filed" with him within the time specified in the summons. Olliphant v. Whitney, 34 Cal. 25, 27.

As used in Rev. St. § 2886, providing that the relief granted to plaintiff, if there be no "answer," cannot exceed that amended in the complaint, a demurrer will be held to constitute an answer. Viles v. Green, 64 N. W. 856, 857, 91 Wis. 217.

The word "answer," as used in an original notice stating that, unless the defendant appears and answers by a certain day, default will be entered, construed not to be limited to its technical meaning, but to include demurrers and motions, as well as answers. Lyman v. Bechtel, 7 N. W. 673, 674, 55 Iowa, 437.

As used in Gantt's Dig. § 4727, providing that, before judgment is rendered against a defendant constructively summoned who has not appeared, it shall be necessary that an attorney be appointed to defend for him, etc., and that the attorney so appointed may take any step in the progress of the action, except filing an "answer," without it having the effect of entering the appearance of such defendant, cannot be construed as equivalent to a "demurrer," for a demurrer is not an answer; and hence an attorney appointed under the statute may enter a demurrer to the complaint, which will not be appearance for the absent defendant, when filed by virtue of his appointment only. Henry v. Blackburn, 32 Ark. 445, 449.

In Code, § 275, providing that, if there be no answer, the relief granted the plaintiff cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint, but in any other case the court may grant him any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, the term "answer" is used in its technical sense, and does not include a demurrer. Answers and demurrers are distinct pleadings under the Code, having different offices and different characteristics, one forming an issue at law and the other an issue of fact, and as generally used in statutes and law-books the term "answer" does not include or mean demurrer. Kelly v. Downing, 42 N. Y. 71, 77.

Reply.

The term "answer," within the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 542, providing that within 20 days after a pleading or the answer or demurrer thereto is served, or at any time before the period for answering expires, the pleadings may be once amended as of course, relates to pleadings of fact exclusively. It includes a reply, as well as an answer. Seaman v. McClosky, 53 N. Y. Supp. 554, 23 Misc. Rep. 445.

ANSWERABLE.

A marine insurance policy, providing that, if the insured shall have made any other insurance on the premises prior in date to this policy, then the company shall be "answerable" only for so much as the amount of such prior insurance may be deficient toward fully covering the premises hereby insured, means that the insurer shall not assume the risk, except so far as it has not been assumed by the prior policy. American Ins. Co. v. Griswold, 14 Wend. 399, 500.

ANTECEDENT.

See "Last Antecedent."

In holding that the phrase, "such institution shall pay to the state an annual tax of one-half of 1 per cent. on each share of capital stock," in the charter of 1856 by the state of Tennessee to the Bank of Commerce, which provided that the bank should have a lien on the stock for debts due by stockholders, and that "such institution shall pay to the state an annual tax of one-half of 1 per cent. on each share of capital stock, which shall be in lieu of all other taxes," was the antecedent of the phrase, "In lieu of all other taxes," it was said that an "antecedent" may be a noun, a pronoun, a clause or a phrase. Tennessee v. Bank of Commerce (U. S.) 53 Fed. 735, 744 (citing Maxw. Adv. Gram. §§ 280, 570-572).

ANTECEDENT DEBT.

An "antecedent debt," within the rule that the right of the seller to rescind a sale for fraud is superior to the right of the mortgagee whose mortgage was taken to secure an antecedent debt, is a debt created before the date of the sale sought to be rescinded. A debt created after the sale on the faith of property in the possession of the vendee, though not secured by mortgage until some time after the debt was created, is not an antecedent debt within the meaning of the rule, provided, of course, the mortgage was executed before the seller exercised his right to rescind. George D. Mashburn & Co. v. Dannenberg Co., 44 S. E. 97, 101, 117 Ga. 567.

ANTHRACITE MINE.

The term "anthracite mine," as used in the acts relating to mines and mining, includes any coal mine not now included in the bituminous boundaries. P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, vol. 4, col. 1249, § 33.

ANTHRAX.

Anthrax is a disease caused by the infection upon the body of putrid animal matter containing poisonous bacillus anthrax, so that death from such cause is death from disease, and not from accident, within the terms as used in an insurance policy. Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 25 N. E. 399, 123 N. Y. 304, 9 L. R. A. 617, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748.

ANTI-MEANS DOCTRINE.

The "anti-means religious doctrine" is a belief and faith that conversions of sinners to Christianity and the salvation of human souls is not and cannot be brought about or aided by any human means or effort whatever, but that the same must be and is wholly and naturally the work of the Lord, as contradistinguished from the "means doctrine," which is a belief and faith in the exact opposite; that is, that such conversions and salvation may be aided by the use of human means. Smith v. Pedigo, 44 N. E. 363, 370, 145 Ind. 361, 19 L. R. A. 433, 32 L. R. A. 838.

ANTICHRESIS.

Antichresis is a kind of mortgage, investing the mortgagee with a right of possession of the mortgaged property, and entitling him to receive the rents and income, which, after the payment of interest on the mortgage, taxes, etc., is to be applied to the liquidation of the debts secured by the antichresis. Marquise De Portes v. Hurlbut, 14 Atl. 891, 892, 44 N. J. Eq. (17 Stew.) 517.

Antichresis is a pledge of immovables; and it must be reduced to writing. A creditor acquires by this contract the right of taking the fruits or other awards of the immovables given to him in pledge, on condition of deducting annually their proceeds from the interest, if any be due him, and afterwards from the principal of his debt. The creditor is bound to pay the taxes, as well as all annual charges of the property, unless the contrary be agreed on. Likewise he is bound under the penalty of damages to provide for the keeping and necessary repairs of the pledgor's estate, and may lay out from the revenues of the estate sufficient for such expenses. The creditor does not become the proprietor of the pledged immovables by the failure of payment at the stated time, and any clause to the contrary is of no validity; but he may sue the debtor, in order to obtain sentence against him and cause the objects which have been put into his hands to be seized and sold. A debtor cannot, before the full payment of his debt, claim any enjoyment of the immovables; but the creditor, if at any time he wish to free himself from the obligation under the antichresis, may always compel the debtor to retake the enjoyment. Livingston v. Story, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 351, 389, 9 L. Ed. 748.

ANTICIPATION.

In the case of Topliff v. Topliff, 145 U. S. 156, 12 Sup. Ct. 825, 36 L. Ed. 658, in speaking of patents, the court said: "It is not sufficient to constitute anticipation that the device relied on might by modification be made to accomplish the functions performed by that invention, if it were not designed by its maker, nor adapted, nor actually used, for the performance of such functions." Following this guide, it was held, in Taylor Burner Co. v. Diamond (U. S.) 72 Fed. 182, that a mere accidental use of the features of an invention, without recognition of its benefits, does not anticipate a patent. Ryan v. Newark Spring Mattress Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 100, 103.

"Anticipation," in patent law, is defined in Black's Dict. as the patenting of a contrivance or thing already known in the country granting the patent. The mere drawing, not followed by construction and actual use, of the machine, does not amount to "anticipation." Detroit Lubricator Mfg. Co. v. Renchard (U. S.) 9 Fed. 293, 298.

A device, which is an infringement if later than a patent, constitutes an "anticipation" if earlier. National Hollow Brake Beam Co. v. Interchangeable Brake Beam Co. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 758, 772 (citing Knapp v. Morss, 150 U. S. 221, 14 Sup. Ct. 81, 37 L. Ed. 1059).

ANTICIPATORY PUBLICATION.

A publication which describes an invention as consisting of an "acid-resisting protective material for lining sulphite digesters," without disclosing the substances of which the material is composed, cannot be considered "anticipatory publication." American Sulphite Pulp Co. v. Howland Falls Pulp Co. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 986, 994 (citing Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. [11 Wall.] 516, 20 L. Ed. 33; Eames v. Andrews, 122 U. S. 40, 7 Sup. Ct. 1073, 30 L. Ed. 1064).

ANTIPYRINE.

Antipyrine is a patented medicine, ready for administration in the condition as imported, made of the aniline from coal tar; alcohol being chemically used and broken up in the manufacture. Schulze-Berge v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 748, 749.

ANTIQUITIES.

See "Collection of Antiquities."

ANY.

See "If Any."

In cases where construction is necessary to determine whether an instrument creates a joint tenancy or tenancy in common, the distributive words "among," "any," and "each," are used to distinguish estates in common from joint tenancies, and are given controlling effect in determining the estates to be tenancies in common. Sturm v. Sawyer, 2 Pa. Super. Ct. 254, 257.

A deed of bargain and sale, wherein the premises are conveyed to the grantees, or "any of them," their or any of their heirs or assigns, creates a tenancy in common. Galbraith v. Galbraith's Lessee (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 392.

"Any," as used in an affidavit for attachment, stating that defendant is about to conceal or dispose of "any of his property" with intent, etc., is not synonymous with "some" and is insufficient, as not alleging the disposal of property. Miller v. Munson, 34 Wis. 579, 17 Am. Rep. 461.

The words "any quantities," in a statute forbidding the sale of spirituous liquors in any quantities without a license, operate to preclude the sale without a license of any such liquors whatsoever, and the statute, therefore, repeals former acts forbidding the sale in certain quantities only. State v. Turner, 18 S. C. 103, 106.

As a.

"Any," when used as a substitute for "a" in the phrase "a reasonably prudent man," in a definition of negligence or care or diligence, does not impose a higher degree of care than would be imposed by the same definition with the use of the phrase "a" reasonable man, instead of "any" reasonable man. Taylor, B. & H. R. Co. v. Warner (Tex.) 60 S. W. 442, 444.

There is no distinction between giving the right of appeal to "any party aggrieved" and giving it to "a party aggrieved." Chandler v. Railroad Com'rs, 5 N. E. 509, 514, 141 Mass. 208.

As all or every.

"Johnson says the word 'every' means each one of all, and the same great lexicographer defines 'any' to mean 'every,' and says it is, in all its senses, applied indifferently to persons or things." Purdy v. People, 4 Hill, 384, 413. The court in the same case, speaking through Senator Scott, say: "However, if we apply the rule to this case, and seek to ascertain the meaning of the word by examining the context, it will be found that in every section of the Constitution where the words 'every' and 'any' are used, it is in the same sense defined by Johnson. * * * Thus the use of the word 'any,' instead of 'every,' in Stock Corporation Law, § 52, as amended by Laws 1897, c. 384, providing a penalty for 'any' refusal by such corporations to allow an inspection of their stock books by stockholders and certain other persons, does not limit the scope of the statute. The statute makes it the duty of the corporation to have the book within the reach of the stockholders daily." Cox v. Island Min. Co., 73 N. Y. Supp. 69, 74, 65 App. Div. 508, 515.

In a power of attorney, appointing an attorney to remonstrate in writing against the granting of a license to any applicant for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the words "any applicant" meant every applicant who may apply; the word being often used in the plural as a pronoun, meaning a person or thing understood, as anybody, any one, or any person. In the case of Dubuque County v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 4, it was held that the word "any" extends to an indefinite number. In McComas v. Amos, 29 Md. 141, it was held that the word "any" might mean "every." So, also, in Davidson v. Dallas, 8 Cal. 239; Chicot Co. v. Lewis, 103 U. S. 164, 26 L. Ed. 495. So that under such power the attorney was under duty to file a remonstrance against all applications, and it appearing that the statute in relation to such remonstrance provided that a majority of the legal voters of any township or ward in any city might remonstrate, it is clear that, when the Legislature used the phrase "any township or ward in any city," it meant any town in the state and every ward in every city in the state, so that, the phrase "any applicant" meaning "every applicant," the power of attorney was not indefinite. White v. Furgeson, 64 N. E. 49, 53, 29 Ind. App. 144. For a like holding see Ludwig v. Co., 64 N. E. 14, 18, 158 Ind. 582.

A statute authorizing the pleading of special matter in bar by notice in lieu of a special plea, provided that "any" special matter which was sufficient to bar the action might be set up by notice, which could present as many independent defenses as could be set up by special plea. Held, that the word "any," though in general used to represent a single one, in such act was used in its comprehensive sense of "every," and hence the statute should be construed as authorizing "every special matter which could be pleaded by special plea to be set up by notice." Tillou v. Britton, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 120, 128.

"Any," as used in Act April 21, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 237, § 1), providing that any number of persons not less than 13 may in the manner hereinafter prescribed form a corporation for the purpose of issuing policies for "any" of the following kinds of insurance business, means "all" or "every." Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, says that the word "any" is given the full force of "every" or "all." "The word 'any' is frequently used in the sense of 'all' or 'every,' and when thus used has a very comprehensive meaning." People v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 38 N. E. 752, 753, 153 Ill. 25, 26 L. R. A. 295; People v. Van Cleave, 58 N. E. 422, 425, 187 Ill. 125.

Code, art. 47, § 27, provides that if, in the descending or collateral line, "any" father or mother may be dead, the child or children of such father or mother shall by representation be considered in the same degree as the father or mother would have been, if living, and shall have the same share of the estate as the father or mother, if living, would have been entitled to, and no more, and in such case, when there are more children than one, the share aforesaid shall be equally divided among such children, provided that there shall be no representation admitted among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' children. It was held that "any" means "every," and embraces as well the case where all of the class have died in the lifetime of the intestate, as where some one or more only may have died. "The words 'any father or mother' cannot be restricted to mean any father or mother dead, leaving brother or sister surviving." McComas v. Amos, 29 Md. 132, 138.

"Any number," in specifications for a patent, stating that "any number" of the springs may be removed, and rings put in their places, may be held to include "all." Harris v. Allen (U. S.) 15 Fed. 106.

The words "any building," last used in Comp. Laws, § 7557, providing that every person who shall set fire to any building mentioned in the preceding sections, or to any other material, with intent to cause any such building to be burned, or shall by any other means attempt to cause "any building" to be burned, shall be punished by imprisonment, etc., should be construed as meaning every building mentioned in the preceding sections, as it cannot be supposed that the Legislature meant by this general phrase to go beyond the objects intended to be protected by the earlier and definite provisions. McDade v. People, 29 Mich. 50, 54.

Code, § 798, exempting from taxation all poorhouses, almshouses, houses of industry, or any house belonging to any charitable institution, "any" is to be construed as "every," and, as a Masonic lodge is a charitable institution, any house belonging to such lodge is exempt from taxation. City of Savannah v. Solomon's Lodge, No. 1, F. & A. M., 53 Ga. 93, 94.

In Laws 1885, c. 342, § 7, providing that any lienor may enforce his lien by a civil action in a court of record, "any" is used in the sense of "each" or "every." Egan v. Laemmle, 25 N. Y. Supp. 330, 332, 5 Misc. Rep. 224.

The statutory provision that a transfer of "any" unpaid stock shall not relieve the subscriber from liability for "any" debts due from the corporation means all debts due from the corporation; that is to say, all unpaid stock shall be a fund for the payment of all debts of the corporation. Jones v. Whitworth, 30 S. W. 736, 738, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 602.

The word "any," as used in Code, § 165, providing that, in actions for libel or slander, defendant may allege in his answer both the truth of the matter charged as defamatory and "any" mitigating circumstances to reduce the amount of damages, means "all." Heaton v. Wright (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 79, 83.

The word "any," in Laws 1893, c. 150, providing that any city shall have power to construct a system of sewers, and that the expense of the sewers constructed under the act shall be paid by special assessment, is used in the sense of "every," and therefore the act applies to cities organized under special charters, as well as to those organized under the general law. Heyler v. City of Watertown (S. D.) 91 N. W. 334.

As any one out of a number.

As used in Act Cong. 1822, c. 107, § 15, providing that no deputy of a collector, naval officer, or surveyor in any of certain districts shall receive more than $1,500, nor any such other deputy more than $1,000, for any services he may perform for the United States in "any office or capacity," means in any such office or capacity. The true intent and meaning of the clause is to limit the emoluments of the deputy collector in that office to the sum specified, and to make no allowance to him on account of any incidental services he may perform or emoluments he may receive beyond that sum. It was not intended to say that if he actually performed the duties or services of any other independent office, such as inspector in any of the nonenumerated ports, he was not entitled to receive the emoluments thereof. "In any office or capacity" may well be interpreted to mean in any one office or capacity. United States v. Morse (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1, 2.

The words "any defendant," in Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 2, 24 Stat. 553 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 582], giving the right to remove a suit, in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, to any defendant who is a citizen of another state, must be construed to mean any single defendant, and not to require that all defendants, where there are several, shall be nonresidents in order to entitle one nonresident defendant to a removal. Fisk v. Henarie (U. S.) 32 Fed. 417, 424.

"Any railroad," as used in Act July 23, 1868, authorizing any county in the state to subscribe to the stock of "any railroad" in the state and issue bonds therefor, but limiting the subscription to a certain amount, is to be construed so as to mean any one railroad taken separately from other railroads, and hence does not restrict the county to a single subscription of the designated amount. Chicot County v. Lewis, 103 U. S. 164, 167, 26 L. Ed. 495.

In a will by which testator gave a legacy to a city, in trust to use the income for the purchase of books for the Young Men's Institute, or "any" public library which may from time to time exist in said city, "any," being used as an adjective, means one out of several or many, implying a selection, thus giving the city power to determine and select the one among the others. New Haven Young Men's Institute v. City of New Haven, 22 Atl. 447, 448, 60 Conn. 32.

In an action of trespass against two police officers for assault and battery, defendants pleaded that plaintiff had been guilty of a misdemeanor, and that plaintiff interfered with defendants in the discharge of their duties in conveying a person they had arrested to a police station; and the court charged that, if the jury believed that the plaintiff had not committed "any offense" charged in the pleas, they should find the defendants guilty. Held, that then the instruction was not erroneous, on the ground that the word "any," before the word "offense," meant one out of many, inasmuch as the sentence meant the same as if the language had been, "committed one of the offenses." Mullin v. Spangenberg, 112 Ill. 140, 144.

"Any of the following causes," as used in Code, § 5242, providing that when a person indicted for a criminal offense is arraigned before a court having jurisdiction of the matter, and pleads not guilty, and is tried on the merits and convicted, he shall not be entitled to a new trial for "any of the following causes," must be construed as meaning for any one of the following causes, and therefore if more than one of the causes mentioned existed, and such causes would, but for the provisions of section 5242, entitle the party to a new trial, the party is entitled to the relief, notwithstanding the provisions of that section. Thurston v. State, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 115, 118.

The phrase "any time or sitting," in Gen. St. 1872, c. 407, § 6, providing that any person losing $50 or more at any time or sitting, by playing at cards or other games, may recover the same by action at law, is to be construed to read "at any one time or sitting." It is true the word "any" is indefinite as to the particular thing referred to; but it is singular, and in connection with a name singular means one of the particular things indicated. Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C. 305, 310.

As any other.

"Any," as used in charter of Omaha, providing that the mayor and city council may order the improvement of a street in any district within certain limits, and that they may order street improvements in "any" district upon a petition being signed, will in the latter clause be held "any other." Kountze v. City of Omaha, 88 N. W. 117, 118, 63 Neb. 52.

"Not to impose 'any further tax' or burden, when used in reference to some tax already imposed, means no other tax besides that to which reference is made. These words, so used, cannot be limited, by refinement upon the etymology of the word 'any,' out of or beyond its meaning in common discourse, to 'any like,' and the words 'any further tax,' used in reference to some other tax, will by common consent, as it always has been, be intended to mean any additional tax beside that referred to, and any further like tax." It was so held in construing Act Md. 1821, § 11, exempting certain banks from any further tax or burden. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 133, 147, 11 L. Ed. 529.

The word "any," in Act March 22, 1881, authorizing a tax collector to sell township school lands on the written petition of a majority of the male inhabitants of such township, and that, if any tract is offered and not sold, it may be offered again on the first day of the next or "any" succeeding term of the county court, and so offered until sold, without a new petition, cannot be construed to mean "each," or "every," but only one indifferently, and therefore land not sold when first offered for sale may be offered for sale and sold at a subsequent term of the county court, without its having been offered for sale at intervening terms. Brown v. Rushing, 66 S. W. 442, 446, 70 Ark. 111.

Code, § 1966, imposes a penalty on "any" railroad which shall charge for transportation of any freight over its road a greater sum than shall be charged at the same time by it for an equal quantity of the same class of freight transported in the same direction over any portion of the same railroad of equal distance. Held, that the word "any" is used in the sense of "each," "every," and "all," and hence includes a foreign railroad company. Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 95 N. C. 434, 440, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

The word "any," in a statute relative to counterfeiting, providing that any person who shall counterfeit, or attempt to pass knowing them to be counterfeit, "any" of the aforesaid gold or silver coins, is synonymous with "either." State v. Antonio, 2 Tread. Const. 776, 783.

As ejusdem generis.

"Any false pretense whatever," as used in Act 1811, imposing a penalty upon a person for the use of any false writings, tokens, or "any false pretense whatever," calculated to impose on the credulity of ordinary men, means pretenses of a like kind with those specifically enumerated, and would not include a mere naked lie. State v. Simpson, 10 N. C. 620, 622.

Rev. St. § 3854, providing that any person convicted of horse racing, cock fighting, or playing at cards or "games of any kind" on Sunday, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, means games of a like nature to those mentioned; that is, such sports and games as have a demoralizing tendency, and does not include mere athletic sports. St. Louis Agricultural & Mechanical Ass'n v. Delano, 18 S. W. 1101, 108 Mo. 217.

Rev. St. 1899, § 2242, providing that every person who shall be convicted of horse racing, cock fighting, or playing at cards or "games of any kind" on Sunday, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, cannot be construed to include the game of baseball. The general words "games of any kind" must be construed to mean games of the same kind as the games specially designated in the statute, and baseball does not belong to the same class, kind, species, or genus as horse racing, cock fighting, or card playing. It is to America what cricket is to England. It is a sport or athletic exercise, and is commonly called a "game," but is not a gambling game, or productive of immorality. In a qualified sense it is affected by chance, but it is primarily and properly a game of science, of physical skill, of trained endurance, and natural adaptability to athletic skill. It is a game of chance in the sense that chance or luck may enter into anything that man can do. Ex parte Neet, 57 S. W. 1025, 1026, 157 Mo. 527, 80 Am. St. Rep. 638.

The phrase "work of any kind," in Rev. St. § 5095, which prohibits any person holding a lucrative office from being interested in any contract for the construction of any state building, courthouse, schoolhouse, bridge, public building, or work of any kind, must be restricted to works of like kind with those specially enumerated. The rule of construction is that, when a specific enumeration concludes with a general term, it is held to be limited to things of the same kind. It is restricted of the same genus as the things enumerated. Baker v. Board of Com'rs of Crook County, 59 Pac. 797, 798, 9 Wyo. 51.

As an indefinite number.

The word "any," in Laws 1895, c. 398, § 153, providing that the fees imposed and collected in any prosecution for practicing medicine without lawful registration shall be paid to "any" medical society which institutes such proceedings, is to be construed in its common sense, as usually understood, to mean an indefinite number or quantity, and therefore any medical society instituting such prosecution is entitled to such fees, and the act cannot be construed to be for the exclusive benefit of the medical, homeopathic, and eclectic societies only. New York County Medical Ass'n v. City of New York, 65 N. Y. Supp. 531, 532, 32 Misc. Rep. 116.

In an act providing for suits against "any or all of the shareholders" of a corporation under certain circumstances, the term "any" is not used in its limited sense, but in its enlarged and plural sense, and is to be construed as meaning some or an indefinite number. Witherhead v. Allen (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 661, 666, *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 562, 563.

A parol license to enter upon land at any and all times, and cut and carry away growing timber, cannot be construed as giving an indefinite time to cut and remove the timber, but means at any and all times within a reasonable time. Thus it was held that, if not acted on within three years, such license could be revoked. Hill v. Hill, 113 Mass. 103, 18 Am. Rep. 455.

The words "any goods," when used in letters of credit, have repeatedly been construed as affording evidence of a continuing guaranty, when the order contained no limitation as to time. Tischler v. Hofheimer, 83 Va. 35, 38, 4 S. E. 370.

Defendant executed to plaintiff a written guaranty of payment by W., plumber, for any and all materials which plaintiff may deliver to W., not exceeding $500, for any balance due. Held, that the words "any and all materials" were ambiguous, and might mean that the guaranty was intended to attach to the purchase money for materials required for a particular purpose, or for materials required indefinitely; and hence parol evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity. Henry McShane Co. v. Padian, 20 N. Y. Supp. 679, 681, 1 Misc. Rep. 332.

In a note containing a stipulation that all defenses on the ground of any extension of time for payment were waived, the use of the word "any," before "extension," indicated that any one of an indefinite number of extensions was intended. Winnebago County State Bank v. Hustel, 93 N. W. 70, 71, 119 Iowa, 115.

As one or more.

Act March 8, 1872 (P. L. 264), confirming the consolidation of certain railroads, provides that the company shall annually pay into the treasury of the city of Philadelphia a tax of 6 per cent. on so much of "any dividend declared" as shall exceed 6 per cent. per annum on their said capital stock. Held, that the words "any dividend declared" contemplated that the tax should be based on the aggregate dividend declared in any one year, and not that it should be based on any single dividend. City of Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. Ry. Co., 102 Pa. 190, 193.

"Any person," as used in Code 1873, § 45, subd. 3, providing that all property within the jurisdiction of this state which shall pass to any person shall be subject to a tax, etc., "any person" does not necessarily mean one person only, but will include more than one, when that is necessary to give the statute the effect it was intended to have. In re McGhee's Estate, 74 N. W. 695, 696, 105 Iowa, 9.

A statute forbidding cruelty to "any of the crew" of a vessel means "any one or more of the crew." United States v. Harri-man (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 172, 173.

"Any," as used in Act 1872, providing that a railroad company is empowered to build, maintain, and use a railroad or railroads on "any" public road or highway extending from the city of Camden into the county of Camden, does not have the force of "one," but, in connection with the plural of "railroads," must be construed as giving the right to use more than one public road. The Century Dictionary shows that, with the context here presented, "any" implies unlimited choice as to the particular unit, number, or quantity; an indeterminate unit or number of units out of many or all. In affirmative sentences, "any," being indeterminate in application, in effect has reference to every unit of the sort mentioned, and thus may be nearly equivalent to "every." West Jersey Traction Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co., 29 Atl. 333, 337, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 452; Id., 35 Atl. 49, 52, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 163.

Under a statute providing that, "if 'any person' shall lay off an addition and be legal owner of all the lots," etc., he may have the same vacated on taking certain procedure, the phrase is not limited to one person only so situated, but applies equally to any number of persons who together come within the descriptive terms employed. Spurgeon v. Hennessey, 32 Mo. App. 83, 87.

The words "any school," in a statute providing that it should not affect or repeal any special law enacted for the benefit of any school, is held to be applicable to several schools; the court observing that a word implying the singular number only in a statute may be applied to several persons or things. Kirk v. Roberson, 76 S. W. 183, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 633.

St. 1889, c. 105, § 50, empowered the commissioners of the city of Chicago to connect any public park, boulevard, or driveway under its control with any part of an incorporated city by selecting and taking any connecting streets or parts thereof leading to such park. Held, that the word "any," as applied to the parks under the control of the park commissioners, could not be construed as limiting the power to connect by a street or streets only one park of the city, but that the power to connect any parks under their control was intended to mean that all parks under their control might be so connected. West Chicago Park Com'rs v. McMullen, 134 Ill. 170, 179, 25 N. E. 676, 10 L. R. A. 215.

Any action.

Gen. St. tit. 1, § 95, providing that in "any action" pending in the superior court, if either of the parties die, his representative may enter, is not confined in operation to proceedings at common law technically known as "actions," but would include proceedings on appeal from the probate court. Appeal of Stiles, 41 Conn. 329, 333.

Writs of error and appeals are within a construction to be given to the words "any suit or action," in Act July 20, 1892, c. 209, 27 Stat. 252 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 706], allowing any citizen in the United States to prosecute any suit or action in the federal courts, without prepaying fees or costs, upon filing an affidavit of poverty. Columb v. Webster Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 76 Fed. 198, 200.

Any advantage or benefit.

Const. art. 1, § 18, declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation first being made, etc., as soon as the damages shall be assessed by a jury, who shall not take into consideration "any advantage" that may result to said owner on account of the improvement for which it is taken. Held, that the expression "any advantage" means all benefits of every kind that may result. Incidental, indirect, consequential, and remote benefits are meant, as well as direct and immediate. Those benefits that result to the land itself, as the improvement of the soil, if that be possible, or drainage of ponds, etc., which increase its intrinsic value, are included in the expression, as well as other consequences attending the location of highways, which increase the value of real estate. Frederick v. Shaue, 32 Iowa, 254, 256.

"Any benefit," as used in Gen. St. c. 34, § 19, providing that the commissioners, in determining the damages to land by the construction of a railroad, shall make due allowances for "any benefit" that such owners may derive from the railroad, construed not to include all the benefit which the landowner may receive from the construction of the road, whether it is peculiar to himself or common to the whole community, but only includes benefits special to the landowner and not shared by the community. Weir v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co., 18 Minn. 155, 160 (Gil. 139, 144).

Rev. St. 1893, c. 61, § 6, making it unlawful to sell or expose for sale, etc., "any of the animals, wild fowls, or birds" mentioned in section 1 of the act, which declares that it shall be unlawful at specified times to kill or take specified animals, should be construed to apply equally to game taken or killed out of the state as to those killed or taken within the state. Merritt v. People, 48 N. E. 325, 169 Ill. 218.

Any articles of traffic.

The words "any kind of articles of traffic," in a statute prohibiting the sale of any kind of articles of traffic, spirituous liquors, wines, porter, beer, cider, or any other fermented, mixed, or strong drink, within three miles of any place of religious worship, except, etc., embraces everything that is the subject of trade or traffic, whether it is dry goods, groceries, liquors, hardware, or lumber. The specification of liquors afterwards seems to have been added out of abundant caution. Rogers v. Brown, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 119, 122.

Any attempt.

In a will directing testator's executors to pay the income of a certain sum to testator's grandson, and providing that, should any attempt, at law or otherwise, be made during the minority of such grandson to withdraw his person from the custody of the executors, they should suspend all further payment of such income, "any attempt" does not include unsuccessful and abandoned attempts. The attempt against which the testator tried to guard was not an abortive one, that should leave the custody unchanged, but a successful one, that should change the custody. In re White's Estate, 80 Atl. 192, 194, 163 Pa. 388.

Any bank or joint-stock company.

"Any bank," as used in Act 1874, § 39, providing that any bank may be subject to being thrown into bankruptcy, means a banking institution owned by a natural person, partnership, or joint-stock company, and includes an institution incorporated as a bank. In re Leavenworth Sav. Bank (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 117, 118.

Laws 1892, c. 689, § 130, providing that the property of "any bank" which shall become insolvent shall be applied, first, to the payment in full of money deposited by any savings bank, includes national banks. Elmira Sav. Bank v. Davis, 26 N. Y. Supp. 200, 202, 73 Hun, 357.

Code 1892, § 3758, provides that any bank or joint-stock company, the capital of which is taxable, shall furnish the assessor a written statement of the stock paid in and its market value, except such as is not liable to be taxed, and in default of such statement the entire authorized capital shall be assessed. Held, that the phrase "any bank or joint-stock company" meant all incorporated associations having stock. State v. Simmons, 12 South. 477, 481, 70 Miss. 485.

Any bond.

In Act April 19, 1873, regarding all actions on any bond, obligation, or contract under seal which shall be commenced within seven years, the words "any bonds" are comprehensive enough to embrace all bonds of every sort, and therefore include official bonds. Furlong v. State, 58 Miss. 717, 733.

Any borough or town.

In Act April 3, 1851, § 30, authorizing the burgess and town council of any borough, on petition of 20 of the freehold owners of lots in any section lying adjacent to said borough to admit such section into the borough, "any borough," means only boroughs created after the passage of the act. Commonwealth v. Council of Montrose Borough, 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 391, 392.

A statute forbidding the digging up of a human body without the authority of the selectmen of "any town" of the commonwealth refers to the selectmen of the town within which the offense was committed. Commonwealth v. Loring, 25 Mass. (8 Pick.) 370, 372.

Any borrower.

Act March 27, 1865, which makes it lawful for "any borrower" to contract for the payment of taxes on the loan in addition to the interest, applies to both private and municipal corporations, and is not confined to natural persons. Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. City of Scranton, 102 Pa. 387, 393.

Any bridge.

The term "any bridge," in a statute giving a mechanic's lien to any person who performs any work or labor on any bridge, has a general application, and includes all bridges not excluded on grounds of public policy, and therefore includes railroad bridges. Purtell v. Chicago Forge & Bolt Co., 42 N. W. 265, 266, 74 Wis. 132; Smith Bridge Co. v. Bowman, 41 Ohio St. 37, 52, 52 Am. Rep. 66.

Any candidate.

Act No. 208, Laws 1887, authorizes the presentation of a petition for a recount of ballots cast for "any candidate voted for at any election" to the boards of city canvassers, if a city or ward office is voted for, and to the district board or board of county canvassers in all other cases. Held, that the terms "any candidate voted for at any election" was limited by the natural purport of the rest of the statute to elections for city, county, and state officers, and could not be extended to cover village, school district, and other elections for lesser offices. Johnson v. Board of Canvassers of Village of Casnovia, 59 N. W. 412, 413, 101 Mich. 187.

In 3 How. Ann. St. § 234a, declaring that any candidate voted for at any election may file his petition and ask for a correction of the canvass, "any candidate" refers to candidates for state offices, and does not apply to a candidate for Congress, inasmuch as the House of Representatives is the judge of the election of its members. Belknap v. Ionia County Canvassers, 54 N. W. 376, 94 Mich. 516.

Any case or cause.

In Loc. Acts Mo. 1885, p. 59, § 13, establishing a court of probate in a certain county, and declaring that, whenever the circuit judge of said county shall be disqualified from trying "any cause," the same shall be transferred, the term "any cause" embraces any civil cause. Logan v. Small, 43 Mo. 254, 256.

The words "any case" in Rev. St. § 806 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], which authorized a dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage to be issued in any case in which it is necessary, includes criminal as well as civil cases. United States v. Cameron (U. S.) 15 Fed. 794.

When the statute says "in any case," it includes the only two classes of cases we have, namely, civil and criminal, and doubtless it was in the legislative mind that, having used the words "in any case," the words "either civil or criminal," would be mere surplusage. Litton v. Commonwealth (Va.) 44 S. E. 923, 927.

"Any case," as used in Rev. St. § 866 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 663], providing that, in any case where it is necessary to prevent a failure or delay of justice, any of the courts of the United States may issue a dedimus potestatem to take depositions, means "any case" in which the court has jurisdiction of the proceedings in which the deposition is desired; and hence, where Chinese persons, alleged to be unlawfully in this country, are being examined before a commissioner, whose jurisdiction is exclusive under Chinese Exclusion Act, Sept. 13, 1888, c. 1015, § 13, 25 Stat. 479 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1317], the federal court has no authority to issue a dedimus potestatem for the taking of testimony. United States v. Hom Hing (U. S.) 48 Fed. 635, 637.

Any cask.

Rev. St. § 3289 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2132], providing that all distilled spirits found in "any cask" containing five gallons or more without having thereon the mark and stamp required by law shall be forfeited to the United States, does not apply generally to such spirits found in all casks whatever, but refers to such casks and in such quantities as by other sections of the statute are required by law to be marked and stamped. United States v. Cask of Gin (U. S.) 3 Fed. 20, 21.

Any cause whatever.

In a contract for city work, providing that, if the contractor desires an extension of time to complete his contract by reason of any hindrance or delay "from any cause whatever," he shall give notice of the cause of detention to the engineer, to be reported to the council, which is to determine the amount of time that may compensate for the detention, the words "any cause" must be construed to refer to any cause other than the act of the city; otherwise, the city might cause the contractor such delay that he could not complete the contract within say 30 days after the time specified, and then the city might allow but 5 or 10 days on account of it, which would be an unconscionable result. Hill v. City of Duluth, 58 N. W. 992, 57 Minn. 231.

As used in a contract for shipment of livestock between the shipper and a common carrier, providing that the carrier should not be liable for loss caused by "escapes from any cause whatever," cannot be construed literally, so as to exempt the carrier from all liability whatever, but only for such escapes in which the negligence of the carrier is not an active and co-operative cause. Oxley v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 65 Mo. 629, 631.

The phrase "any cause whatever," in a fire policy on a mill, providing that the stoppage of the mill for more than 20 days from any cause whatever should have the effect of suspending the policy, means any and every cause that may have the effect of stopping the operation of the mill, even though such stoppage were for the purpose of making necessary repairs. Day v. Mill Owners' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 29 N. W. 443, 445, 70 Iowa, 710.

Any child.

"Any child," as used in a will giving property equally to testator's children living at his death, for life, thereafter to their children, conditioned that, if any child shall have died previous to his death leaving children, the share of such child should go to the child's children, mean any child of every class of children previously named; that is, any of the testator's own children, or any of the children of his children—that is, any of his grandchildren. Douglas v. James, 28 Atl. 319, 320, 66 Vt. 21, 44 Am. St. Rep. 817.

Any claim.

The term "any claim of any character," as used in Ashland city charter, declaring that no suit of any kind or "any claim of any character" shall be brought against said city, but the claimant shall file his claim with the city clerk, should not be construed as limited to claims arising on contracts, but includes as well claims arising on torts. Koch v. City of Ashland, 53 N. W. 674, 83 Wis. 361; Van Frachen v. City of Ft. Howard, 60 N. W. 1062, 1063, 88 Wis. 570; Mason v. City of Ashland, 74 N. W. 357, 358, 98 Wis. 540.

"Any legal claim to real property," as used in Judiciary Act 1875, § 8, relating to bringing in absent defendants by substituted service in actions to enforce any legal claim to real property, is employed in a general and comprehensive sense, and includes an action of ejectment; such action being a legal claim to realty. Spencer v. Kansas City Stockyards Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 741, 745.

Any contract.

The term "any contract," in a statute giving a mechanic's lien to any person who shall do or perform any work by virtue of "any contract" for any incorporated company, was construed not to be limited to anybody's contract with the company, but to refer to any kind of contract, whether written or verbal, express or implied. Richardson v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 17 S. E. 195-196, 37 W. Va. 641.

"Any contract," as used in Code, § 3078, providing that agricultural laborers shall have a lien on the crop grown during the current year for labor and services rendered in cultivating the crop under any contract for such labor and services, includes implied, as well as express, contracts. Wilson v. Taylor, 8 South. 149, 89 Ala. 368.

"Any contract," as used in the mechanic's lien law, giving a lien for labor and materials by virtue of "any contract" with the owner of a building, is sufficiently comprehensive to include special contracts, as well as contracts which arise by implication. McMurray v. Austin, 3 Cent. Law J. 158, 159; McMurray v. Brown, 91 U. S. 257, 23 L. Ed. 321.

"Any contract," as used in Revision 1860, § 1846, providing that all contractors, mechanics, laborers, etc., engaged in the construction of any railroad or other work of internal improvement, or for repairing the same, under or by virtue of any contract with the owner or proprietor thereof, or his agent, etc., includes the contracts of laborers working for day wages. Mornan v. Carroll, 35 Iowa, 22, 26.

The words, "any contract for the sale of real estate," as used in the statute of frauds, includes every agreement by which one promises to alienate an existing interest in land, upon a consideration either good or valuable, so that a contract to convey land in consideration of labor or services to be rendered is within the statute. Sprague v. Haines, 68 Tex. 215, 216, 4 S. W. 371.

Any corporation or body corporate.

Rev. St. Tex. art. 1198, providing that suits against any private corporation may be commenced in any county in which the cause of action arose, or in which the corporation has an agent, includes both domestic and foreign corporations. Angerhoefer v. Bradstreet Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. 305, 307.

"Any religious corporation," as used in Laws 1892, c. 399, exempting from personal tax property devised or bequeathed to any religious corporation, does not include a foreign religious corporation. In re Balleis' Estate, 38 N. E. 1007, 1008, 144 N. Y. 132.

Within Const. art. 9, § 7, providing that the assent of two-thirds of the members of the Legislature shall be required to every bill creating, altering, or renewing any body politic or corporate, "any" means "all"; its term being comprehensive, explicit, and unambiguous, so as to extend to public, as well as private, corporations. Purdy v. People (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 384, 394.

Any county.

Act March 19, 1857 (Laws 1857, p. 244), created the county of Union, and declared that it "shall have and enjoy all the jurisdiction, powers, rights, privileges, liberties, and immunities which any other county in the state doth or may enjoy." Held, that the purpose of this declaration is that this county shall be politically equal with the other counties in the state. The word "any" has several meanings, according to the subject which it qualifies. In synonyms it is distinguished from "some." Thus it is said "some" applies to one particular part, in distinction from the rest, while "any" applies to every individual part, without distinction. The former is altogether restrictive in its sense, while the latter is altogether universal and indefinite. Crabb, Eng. Synonyms. This is more noticeable when it is joined with another word, as "anything," "anywise." Webster says, although the word "any" is formed from "one," it often refers to many. State v. Freeholders of Union County, 11 Atl. 143, 144, 50 N. J. Law (21 Vroom) 9.

"Any county," as used in Wag. St. p. 408, § 7, declaring that, in all actions brought by or against any county, inhabitants of the county so suing or sued may be jurors or witnesses, if otherwise competent, not only means "counties" in the usual sense of the word, but the city of St. Louis, not being purely a municipal corporation, but having attributes of a county, is within the statute. O'Brien v. Vulcan Iron Works, 7 Mo. App. 257, 259.

Any court.

"Any court," as used in Act July 13, 1866, § 19, providing that no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, until appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, should be construed in their ordinary sense, and include state courts, as well as federal courts. The Collector v. Hubbard, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 1, 14, 20 L. Ed. 272.

Rev. St. § 3224 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2088], provides that no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court. Held that, taken literally, the phrase "in any court" would prohibit such a proceeding as that described from being maintained in any of the state courts, as well as federal, but that, inasmuch as Congress has no control over state courts in respect to state taxes, and as it was not to be presumed that Congress intended to reach beyond where its power extended, but to the contrary, the broad or literal construction could not prevail, but that the term "in any court" must be construed to mean in any federal court. Wells v. Central Vermont R. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 643, 644.

In a statute providing that every person who shall, in the presence of any court, either by words or actions behave contemptuously or disorderly, may be punished, etc., the term "any court" includes the court of common pleas, though it was created after the passage of the statute. Middlebrook v. State, 43 Conn. 257, 267, 21 Am. Rep. 650.

"Any court," as used in Act Cong. July 13, 1866, providing that no deed or other instrument shall be used in evidence in any court, unless stamped, is used in its broadest and fullest form, without qualification or exception, and is not limited to the federal courts. Chartiers & R. Turnpike Co. v. McNamara, 72 Pa. (22 P. F. Smith) 278, 281, 13 Am. Dec. 673.

The term "any court," in 2 Tayl. St. p. 1610, § 123, in reference to deeds executed at judicial sales in pursuance of any judgment, order, or decree of any court, includes the county court, when acting as a court of probate. Chase v. Whiting, 30 Wis. 544, 545.

Rev. St. § 4284 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2943], authorizing freighters and owners of property to take appropriate proceedings in "any court" for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owner of the vessel may be liable among parties for loss to goods shipped in the vessel, will be construed to mean "any court of competent jurisdiction." Ex parte Phenix Ins. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 25, 31, 118 U. S. 610, 30 L. Ed. 274.

The term "any court," within the meaning of Act 1881, providing that, whenever the property, rights, powers, immunities, privileges, and franchises of any turnpike, bridge, plank road, gas, and water corporation shall be sold under any process or decree of any court of the state, the purchaser shall be a body politic and corporate, cannot be construed to include every court, because that would give the power to justice courts and courts of common pleas. A narrower meaning must be attributed to the enactment, by restricting its operation to such process or decree and such proceedings as would at the time of the passage of the act vest a title to franchises in the purchaser, which view excludes the power of the circuit court over the subject. State v. Turnpike Co., 46 Atl. 569, 570, 65 N. J. Law, 73.

Acts 1886, c. 496, conferring "on any court of record" power to issue writs of mandamus against the board of excise, etc., means any court having power to issue the writ, and not a court of record possessing no authority whatever in such proceedings. People v. Board of Excise, 3 N. Y. St. Rep. 253, 255.

2 Gav. & H. St. p. 329, § 777, providing that "any court of record" may suspend an attorney from practicing therein for any of certain specified cases, means any court of record having jurisdiction, and does not include a court whose jurisdiction is limited to the trial of criminal actions alone. Mattler v. Schaffner, 53 Ind. 245, 246.

Rev. St. § 2103, declaring that such suit as is provided for by said section may be brought in "any court of the United States," means any court of the United States within the territorial jurisdiction of which a defendant may be an inhabitant. United States v. Crawford (U. S.) 47 Fed. 561, 565.

Any creditor.

Under the provisions of the bankrupt act that any creditor of such bankrupt may attend his examination, the words "any creditor" include all creditors, as well those who have not, as those who have, come in under the commission. Livermore v. Swasey, 7 Mass. 213, 227.

In Bankr. Act 1841, § 6, providing as to any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand, the words "any creditor" mean any creditor of the bankrupt whose debts constitute present subsisting claims on the bankrupt's estate, and cannot be construed as referring exclusively to such creditors as come in and prove their debts under the bankruptcy. Ex parte City Bank of New Orleans, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 292, 293, 11 L. Ed. 603.

Bankr. Act 1867, authorizing "any creditor" to apply for an order to examine a bankrupt, construed to only mean a creditor who has proved his claim. In re Ray (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 322, 323.

Any criminal case.

The fifth amendment to the United States Constitution, declaring that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself "in any criminal case," means that no one shall in any criminal proceeding be compelled to give testimony damaging to himself in a criminal case, and is not limited to cases against the witness himself. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 198, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. Ed. 1110.

Any crime or offense.

Laws 1877, p. 179, providing that, when "any crime or offense" shall have been committed in respect to any portion of a railroad train, an indictment may be found in any county through which the train passed in the course of its trip, means any crime or offense already known to the law. People v. Dowling, 84 N. Y. 478, 487.

Any damages.

"Any," as used in a constitutional provision for compensation "for any damage done to lands or property," in condemnation proceedings, means all or every damage so done. Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coon, 6 Pa. (6 Barr) 379, 383, 47 Am. Dec. 474.

The charter of a bridge company, requiring the payment of damages, "if any," by reason of the erection of the bridge, means all damages, including consequential damages. Buckwalter v. Black Rock Bridge Co., 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 281, 287.

Where the contract between a shipper of cattle and the carrier recited that "we take upon ourselves the risk of all and any damages that may happen to our cattle, and will not call upon said railroad company for any damages whatsoever," the phrase "for any damages whatsoever" should not be construed to mean cases where the damage has arisen from gross negligence of the carrier or want of ordinary care. Sager v. Portsmouth, S. & P. & E. R. Co., 31 Me. 228, 238, 1 Am. Rep. 659.

Any debt or indebtedness.

"Any indebtedness," as used in a mortgage reciting that the grant was intended as collateral security for the payment of any indebtedness, referred to contemplated, as well as to existing, debts, and the intention of the parties may be shown aliunde, without infringing the rule which excludes parol evidence to extend or change the meaning of written instruments. Simons v. First Nat. Bank, 93 N. Y. 269, 272.

Any debtor.

The use of the word "any" in a statute providing that "any debtor, having become insolvent or against whom attachment proceedings have been instituted," etc., may make an assignment, is broad enough to include debtors nonresident of the state, and will not be limited to those who are residents only. Rollins v. Rice, 62 N. W. 325, 326, 60 Minn. 358.

As used in the bankrupt law, the term "any debtor" includes any one who is capable of contracting a debt and who has done so. Kinney v. Sharvey, 50 N. W. 1025, 48 Minn. 93.

Any defendant.

The phrase "any defendant," as used in Laws 1853, c. 511, as amended by Laws 1863, c. 212, in relation to substituted service, and providing for service on any defendant, indicates an intention to include infants within the provisions of the statute. Steinhardt v. Baker, 46 N. Y. Supp. 707, 709, 20 Misc. Rep. 470.

Rev. St. § 639, subsec. 3, as amended by Act 1887, § 2, giving the right to remove a suit under certain circumstances to "any defendant," cannot be construed to mean all the defendants, and so will be denied to any unless all have such citizenship as is required. Fisk v. Henarie (U. S.) 32 Fed. 417, 422.

Any defect.

"Any defect," as used in Judiciary Act, c. 15, § 4, providing that the court may at any time permit either of the parties to amend "any defect" in the process or pleadings, is broad enough to include substantial, as well as merely formal, defects. Wilson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 29 Atl. 300, 18 R. I. 598.

Any deficiency.

"Any deficiency," as used in a bond in which defendants guarantied the payment of an amount secured by a mortgage or any deficiency, covered the whole amount due on the mortgage, where the mortgaged premises were sold under foreclosure to satisfy a prior mortgage. Crouse v. Owens, 3 N. Y. Supp. 863, 864, 49 Hun, 610.

Any election or election law.

Const. art. 8, declaring that any person who, while a candidate for office, shall be guilty of bribery, fraud, or willful violation of "any election law," etc., includes any law relating to elections, and includes a statute which punishes bribery or fraud in an election officer, as well as the statute which prescribes the hours when the polls shall open and close on election day. Leonard v. Commonwealth, 4 Atl. 220, 224, 112 Pa. 607.

The term "any election," in Code, § 4289, prohibiting illegal voting at any election held in the state of Alabama, includes a local election held under statutory provisions to ascertain the sense of the people on the subject of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. Gandy v. State, 2 South. 465, 82 Ala. 61.

The term "any election," in the statute making it criminal to bet on any duel or the result of any election, etc., includes all elections held in the state. Sharkey v. State, 33 Miss. 353, 354.

Any error or irregularity.

Laws 1876, c. 34, § 145, requiring a county to refund the purchase money of lands sold for taxes, where the title shall fail on account of error or irregularity, "Includes not merely irregularity in the tax proceedings, but also jurisdictional defects, such as that the lands are not subject to taxation." School District No. 15 v. Allen County Com'rs, 22 Kan. 568, 570.

In Clay's Dig. § 8, providing that, when any estate attached shall be shown by certain evidence to be likely to waste or to be destroyed by keeping, it may be ordered to be sold, the words "any estate" are to be construed as comprehending "all property upon which a levy may be made." Millard's Adm'rs v. Hall, 24 Ala. 209, 229.

The words "any estate or interest," in a statute, means either a legal or equitable estate or interest. Bernards Tp. v. Warren Tp., 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 447, 454 (citing Rex v. Geddingtton, 2 Barn. & C. 129).

Insolvent Act 1853, § 19, providing that, if any creditor shall present a claim against "any estate in settlement" under the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the commissioners, etc., will be construed "to include estates in settlement at the time of the passage of the act, as well as future ones." Appeal of Mechanics' & Farmers' Bank, 31 Conn. 63, 68.

Any evidence.

As used in the rule that a case will not be taken from the jury, and a verdict directed for defendant, if there is any evidence of the allegations of the complaint, the words "any evidence" are not used in their strictest sense; but, while there may be some evidence tending to establish an issue, yet, if its probative effect is so small that it only raises a surmise or suspicion, in legal contemplation it falls short of being any evidence, and it is the duty of the court to decide the issue. In other words, if the evidence is not of sufficient directness and force to form the basis of a reasonable conclusion, the court should decide the issue; but, if there is sufficient evidence to lead a reasonable mind to a conclusion, it is for the jury. Joske v. Irvine, 44 S. W. 1059, 1063, 91 Tex. 574; Cahill v. Benson, 46 S. W. 888, 891, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 30.

By "any evidence" is meant, in legal contemplation, evidence of such probative force as to create more than a mere surmise or suspicion of the existence of the fact sought to be established. Where there is any evidence adduced to establish a fact, the court is not authorized to determine its weight, but it must be submitted to the jury for consideration. Where, however, the probative force of the evidence is so weak that it only raises a mere surmise or suspicion of the existence of the fact sought to be established, or of such a character that there is no room for ordinary minds to differ as to the conclusion to be drawn from it, the court is authorized to take the question from the jury and direct the proper verdict. Berry v. Osborn (Tex.) 52 S. W. 623, 624.

The terms "some evidence," "any evidence," "any evidence whatever," and "any evidence at all," as used in opinions holding that the court must submit a case to the jury whenever there is "some evidence," "any evidence," "any evidence at all," and "any evidence whatever," pertinent to the issue, must be construed to mean evidence legally sufficient to warrant a verdict. The legal sufficiency of evidence in that sense is a question of law which the court must decide, no matter when or how it arises, and hence, where the evidence in an action for injuries from negligence would not warrant a verdict on any view that could be taken of the facts which the evidence could be said to tend to establish, the question of negligence was one of law for the court to decide, and not for the jury. Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 21 S. W. 1062, 1063, 57 Ark. 461, 38 Am. St. Rep. 254.

The rule requiring a question of negligence to be passed upon by the jury, if there is "any evidence" in the case, does not mean a mere scintilla, but such as, taken alone, would justify the jury in inferring the fact. Citizens' Pass. Ry. Co. of Pittsburgh v. Foxley, 107 Pa. 537, 539.

Any form.

A by-law of a bank declared that no transfer of stock shall be allowed or valid so long as the holder is in arrears to the bank or "in any form indebted" to it. Wag. St. § 16, p. 292, provided that no shares shall be transferred until all previous calls thereon shall have been fully paid in. Section 53, p. 611, provided that, when any shares of bank stock should be sold, the officer should execute a bill of sale to the purchaser, and leave with the cashier a copy of the execution and his return thereon, and the purchaser should thereupon be entitled to all dividends and stock, and to the same privileges as a member of such corporation as such debtor was entitled to. Held, that the phrase "in any form indebted" refers to indebtedness outside of the stock subscription. Kahn v. Bank of St. Joseph, 70 Mo. 262, 268.

In a prosecution under Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 1, as amended by Act March 25, 1866, inflicting a penalty on any one who for compensation sets up or conducts a game of cards, whereby money or other thing may be won or lost, the addition of the words "in any form whatever," after the word "compensation," in an instruction, is not error; the words "in any form whatever" being embraced by the word "compensation" in the sense in which it is used in the statute. Harper v. Commonwealth, 19 S. W. 737, 93 Ky. 290.

Any future extensions or branches.

A contract between two connecting railroad corporations for a division of freights and fares over their roads, or "any future extensions or branches" of the same, will not be construed, in the general sense of the word "any," to apply to extensions then unauthorized, where there are existing powers at the time of the contract to build other extensions or branches. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Sussex R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 542, 557.

Rev. St. § 1580, prohibiting horse racing, cards, or games of "any" kind on Sunday, includes the game of baseball, and the general rule in the construction of statutes, that where particular words are followed by general, as if, under the enumeration of classes of persons or things, there is added "and all others," the general words are restricted in meaning to objects of the like kind with those specified, has no application. State v. Williams, 35 Mo. App. 541, 548.

Any goods or chattels.

As the words "any goods or chattels" are used in Laws 1790 (2 Smith's Laws, p. 531), which declares that if any person shall feloniously steal, take, and carry away "any goods or chattels," etc., he shall be deemed guilty of petit larceny, etc., means such goods or chattels as had been before esteemed subjects of larceny; hence, would not include a dog, as he is not a subject of larceny. Findlay v. Bear (Pa.) 8 Serg. & R. 571.

Any house.

"Any house," as used in Code, § 1062, which makes it a misdemeanor to unlawfully and willfully "deface, damage, or injure any house," etc., does not ordinarily include damaging, defacing, or injuring one's own house or property; but it does include defacing, damaging, or injuring a house which is legally in the possession of another, although the party who commits the offense may have a better title thereto. State v. Howell, 12 S. E. 569, 570, 107 N. C. 835.

The words "any house," as used in Gen. St. c. 29, art. 7, which provides that "if any person shall willfully burn a powder house, warehouse, storehouse, stable, barn, or any house or place where wheat, corn, or other grain, fodder, hemp, wood, fruit, ice, hay, or straw is usually kept, or 'any house' whatever, * * * shall be confined in the penitentiary," includes a church. McDonald v. Commonwealth, 4 S. W. 687, 86 Ky. 10, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 230.

Any interest in or concerning land.

"Any interest in land," as used in Rev. St. 1843, c. 28, § 16, providing that any contracts, etc., relating to "any interest in land," etc., must be in writing, includes an agreement to lease land for two years at a rent equal to the full rental value of the premises, the occupation to commence at a future day. Stackberger v. Mosteller, 4 Ind. 461, 462.

The statute of frauds provides that any contract for the sale of lands, or any "interest in or concerning" them, shall be in writing, etc. A. contracted to purchase from B. a tract of land at a stipulated price, and gave his written obligation to that effect. Afterwards C. by parol agreed to purchase A.'s interest in the contract, and A., by indorsement on his obligation, directed B. to convey to C. Held, that the words "any interest in or concerning" should be construed to include the contract between A. and C. Simms v. Killian, 34 N. C. 252, 253.

"Any interest in or concerning them," as used in the statute of frauds, means "concerning the sale of lands or any interest therein, which includes the various tenures by which lands may be holden," and cannot be construed to include contracts respecting labor on lands. A contract to cut down and clear away trees on a farm is not a contract concerning lands. Forbes v. Hamilton (Vt.) 2 Tyler, 356, 357.

The phrase "any interest in or concerning them," as used in the statute of frauds, providing that contracts for the sale of lands, or "any interest in or concerning them," should be in writing, etc., does not include a parol submission and award that a certain party should pay to another a sum of money as a compensation for the future use of the latter's private road. A right of way is not an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. Mitchell v. Bush (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 185, 186. It does not include a contract to sell the mere improvements made on lands. Improvements upon land distinct from the title or possession are not an interest in land within the meaning of the statute. They are only another name for the work and labor bestowed on the land. Lower v. Winters, (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 263, 264. It does not include "a parol contract to pay for work to be done on land, or what has been done at the instance and request of the promisor. The statute could have had in view to avoid such agreements in relation to lands as rested in parol only where some interest was to be acquired in the land itself, and not such as were collateral, and by which any kind of interest was to be gained by the agreement in the land." Frear v. Hardenbergh (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 272, 275, 4 Am. Dec. 356.

It does not include an agreement to remove a fence, so as to open a certain road to its original width. Storms v. Snyder (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 109, 110.

Any insurance company.

Rev. St. § 1977, providing that "any insurance company shall be bound by the contract of its agent," includes mutual as well as stock corporations. Zell v. Herman Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 44 N. W. 828, 830, 75 Wis. 521.

Act Oct. 24, 1887, providing that any person who solicits in behalf of any insurance company shall be deemed an agent thereof, applies only to agents of incorporated companies, and not to those of unincorporated companies, though the expression of itself might be construed to include both. Fort v. State, 18 S. E. 14, 15, 92 Ga. 8, 23 L. R. A. 86.

Any intoxicating beverage or liquor.

"Any intoxicating beverage" necessarily includes spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors of all kinds. Rush v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 47 S. W. 586, 587.

The word "any," as defined by the Century Dictionary, means "to imply unlimited choice as to the particular unit, number, or quantity, and hence, subordinately as to quality, whichever, of whatever quantity or kind"; and the word as used in Act Cong. March 1, 1895, c. 145 (28 Stat. 697) prohibiting the manufacture or sale within the Indian Territory of "any vinous, malt or fermented liquors, or any other intoxicating drinks of any kind whatsoever," includes all of the liquors mentioned in quality and kind, as well as quantity, and a malt liquor sold under the name of "Rochester Tonic" whether intoxicating or not, is within the provisions of such act. United States v. Cohn, 52 S. W. 38, 45, 2 Ind. T. 474.

Any judge or justice.

The statute authorizing "any judge" in any other state to take depositions includes "an assistant judge" of a county court of another state. City Bank v. Young, 43 N. H. 457, 460.

Code, §§ 4077, 4078, providing that a landlord may go before "any" justice of the peace to procure a warrant to dispossess a tenant, includes all the justices in the state, so that a justice of one county may administer the oath and issue the warrant to dispossess a tenant holding over in another. Du Bignon v. Tufts, 66 Ga. 59, 61.

Act Feb. 18, 1848, providing that an application for the imprisonment for debt of fraudulent debtors may be made to "any judge of a court of record" in any county in which the judgment on which the complaint is grounded is docketed and in which the defendant resides, means any judge of a court of record, commonly called "judge," and known and spoken of as a judge of a court of record, such being the common and ordinary use of the word "judge," and does not include the recorder of the city of New York, who has the power of a judge of the court of general sessions and is in fact a judge thereof for he is not commonly called or known and spoken of as a judge of such court, not even when actually holding the court of general sessions. People v. Goodwin (N. Y.) 50 Barb. 562, 566.

Any judgment.

"Any judgment," as used in Gen. St. § 85, giving an attorney lien on any judgment obtained by him and belonging to his client, is employed in a latitudinous sense, and embraces all kinds of judgments, regardless of the subject-matter to which they relate. Fillmore v. Wells, 15 Pac. 343, 347, 10 Colo. 228, 3 Am. St. Rep. 567.

An act authorizing writs of error to review "any judgment" in favor of a defendant tried for a criminal offense does not apply to judgment rendered before the act was passed. People v. Carnal, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 463.

"Any judgment," as used in Gen. St. tit. 19, c. 5, § 15, providing that, in civil actions before a justice of the peace, an appeal shall be allowed from "any judgment rendered therein on any issue," means final judgments. Denton v. Town of Danbury, 48 Conn. 368, 370.

"Any judgment," as used in Act Dec. 31, 1868, § 44, providing that the bond of a tax collector shall operate from its execution as a lien in favor of the state and county for the amount of "any judgment which may be rendered against him in his official capacity," "does not mean 'judgment' in a technical or restricted sense, as confined solely to an action at law, but refers to the judgment of any court to which the state or county may properly resort, whether such judgment be rendered in a court of law or equity." Dallas County v. Timberlake, 54 Ala. 403, 412.

Laws 1887, c. 320, authorizing the board of street opening and improvement of the city of New York to select and lay off parks therein, and to enter upon and condemn "any and all lands" which the board shall deem necessary for such purpose, should be construed to include land used as a cemetery. In re Board Street Opening & Improvement, 16 N. Y. Supp. 894, 895, 62 Hun, 499.

"Any and all lands," as used in Laws 1887, c. 320, authorizing the board of street opening and improvement of New York to lay out parks therein and to enter on and condemn any and all lands which the board should deem necessary for such purposes, means any land not already occupied for a public purpose. In re Board of Street Opening, etc., 31 N. E. 102, 103, 133 N. Y. 329, 16 L. R. A. 180, 28 Am. St. Rep. 640.

St. 1892, c. 341, § 1, as amended by St. 1893, c. 337, § 1, declaring that a certain city may "take and hold," by purchase or otherwise, "any and all" such real estate and lands within said city as it may deem advisable, and lay out, maintain, and improve the same as a public park or parks, was not intended to authorize the taking in fee of lands already devoted to public use as part of the actual location of a railroad. Boston & A. R. Co. v. City Council of Cambridge, 44 N. E. 140, 141, 166 Mass. 224.

Any law.

St. 1872, c. 11, §§ 1, 48, chartering a street railway corporation, and which provides that the said city (New Bedford) or town (Fairhaven) is hereby authorized and empowered to contract with said railway corporation concerning the construction, maintenance, and operation of said railway on such terms as it may agree with said railway corporation, "any laws now existing to the contrary notwithstanding," refers simply to laws limiting the authority of the city, and cannot be construed to mean that any general laws to which the company has been declared subject may be overridden by contract. In any event it extends only to laws existing at the passage of the act, and hence would have no operation on general laws subsequently passed. New Bedford & F. St. Ry. Co. v. Achushnet St. R. Co., 9 N. E. 536, 539, 143 Mass. 200.

Any license or right to possession.

Civ. Code, § 316, declaring that a defendant shall not be allowed to give in evidence "any license or right to possession" of real property, unless the same be pleaded in his answer, should be construed to mean only such a license or right to possession as to constitute a legal defense, and not to include mere equitable rights. Newby v. Rowland, 1 Pac. 708, 709, 11 Or. 133.

Any lien.

In Laws 1882, c. 410, § 1813, as amended by Laws 1883, c. 276, providing that, where a claimant for a mechanic's lien is made a party defendant to any action brought to enforce "any" other lien, the notice of the pendency of such action must be filed by him or in his behalf, "any" means "each and every," and is the same as if the statute read "each and every other lien," and hence includes a mortgage lien, as well as a mechanic's lien. The word "any" is used in various ways, and may convey different meanings. It may mean "one" or "many," "each" or "every." In some instances it means an indefinite number. Danziger v. Simonson, 22 N. E. 570, 575, 116 N. Y. 329.

A contract for the shipment of cattle guaranteed the payment of freight by the shippers, whether or not the cattle were "lost in any manner whatsoever," and also provided that the freight should be payable on the arrival of the ship at Liverpool. Held, that the guaranty of the shippers, including the words "lost in any manner whatsoever," should be construed as absolute and unlimited in its terms, and not to depend on the subsequent clause, as meaning that payment should only be made when the cattle should arrive at Liverpool, and hence the shippers were liable on their absolute guaranty, though the cattle were lost through fire and subsequent wreck of the vessel, which failed to reach its port of destination. Myers v. The Queensmore (U. S.) 53 Fed. 1022, 1024, 4 C. C. A. 157.

Comp. St. c. 32, § 3, declares that no estate or interest in land, other than leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, "or in any manner relating thereto," shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, or surrendered, unless by deed of conveyance in writing, subscribed, etc. It was contended that the words "or in any manner relating thereto" applied only to what immediately preceded them, or, in other words, to "trusts concerning lands," and not to estates or interests therein; but the court held that the words could not be so limited, and therefore required all assignments of interests in lands to be in writing, which included a promise of the grantor of real estate to warrant and defend the title of his grantee. Kelley v. Palmer, 60 N. W. 924, 42 Neb. 423.

Any married woman.

Laws 1866, c. 52, providing that the contracts of "any married woman" made for any lawful purpose shall be valid and binding, and may be enforced in the same manner as if she were sole, cannot be construed to include infants, though literally the words "any married woman" include married female minors. Cummings v. Everett, 19 Atl. 456, 457, 82 Me. 260.

Act 1848, c. 200, as amended by Act 1849, c. 375, providing that "any married female" may take by inheritance or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, real and personal property, and any interest or estate therein, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, in the same manner and with like effect as if she were unmarried, means any married female not an infant. The word "any" does not qualify the entire provision and make marriage the important requirement, without consideration of the age other than the legal age only. The power to devise real property given to married females is like that which

Any mismanagement, neglect, or negligence.

In Laws 1870, c. 93, making a railroad company liable for "any neglect" on its part which causes injury, the words "any neglect" have been construed to mean "ordinary negligence." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shaft, 6 Pac. 908, 912, 33 Kan. 521 (citing St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Grover, 11 Kan. 302).

"Any negligence," as used in an instruction to the effect that any negligence would defeat the defendant, meant a want of that degree of care required in the particular instance. Chicago, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 24 Pac. 497, 499, 44 Kan. 384.

Where a bill of lading contained a clause excepting "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever" of the master or mariners, and a clause against liability for leakage or breakage "when properly stored," the two clauses "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever," and "when properly stored," should be construed not to exempt the vessel from responsibility for leakage and breakage occurring as the result of bad stowage by the master or mariners. The Colon (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 143.

"Any neglect," as used in Act 1870, § 1, providing that the railroads in the state should be liable for all damages done in consequence of "any neglect" on the part of the railroad companies, means failure to use ordinary care and diligence; that is, ordinary negligence. If the company fails to use ordinary care, it is guilty of ordinary negligence. If it fails to make ordinary and usual efforts to prevent the injury, there is some neglect on its part. It cannot omit that degree of diligence which men in general exercise in respect to their own concerns, without being open to the charge of neglect. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Grover, 11 Kan. 302, 306.

The use of the terms "any neglect" and "any mismanagement," in an instruction that it is the law of Iowa that every railroad company shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employes, in consequence of any neglect of the agents or any mismanagement of the engineers or other employes of the corporation to any person sustaining such damages, providing the plaintiff does not contribute to the injury complained of by his own want of proper care or his own negligence, "implies that the defendant is liable for want of extraordinary care, and not for the want of ordinary care only, as ruled by this court in Hunt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 26 Iowa, 363, 364." The terms do not include negligence and mismanagement of all degrees and character. The word "any," the use of which is the ground of objection, is an indefinite pronominal adjective, and is used to designate objects in a general way, without pointing out any one in particular. It indicates an indefinite number. It is not used to describe the qualities or character of objects. The language of the instruction, therefore, cannot be understood to lay down the rule that defendant is liable for want of the highest care. Hamilton v. Des Moines Valley R. Co., 36 Iowa, 31, 39.

Any money, jewels, or ornaments.

Act N. J. April 6, 1865, provides that the proprietor of a hotel, inn, or boarding house who provides a safe for the safe-keeping of "any money, jewels or ornaments" belonging to the guests or boarders, after posting a notice stating such fact, shall not be liable for any loss of such money, jewels, or ornaments sustained by a guest or boarder, by theft or otherwise, who has neglected to deposit them in the safe. Held, that the act does not mean the money, jewels, or ornaments in excess of what the guest may reasonably require for his traveling expenses or personal convenience, but embraces all money, jewels, or ornaments which the guest brings with him, without reference to the amount or value. Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258, 262.

Any officer.

"Any officer," as used in Code, § 627, providing that if the ballots for "any officer" are found to exceed the number of voters in the poll lists, etc., means any district, state, county, or township officer or officers for whom an excess of ballots are cast. Rankin v. Pitkin, 50 Iowa, 313, 316.

In a fire policy providing that if the building, "or any part thereof," fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance immediately ceases, the clause "any part thereof" should not be construed technically or literally. The clause must have a fair and reasonable interpretation and construction, and that which is most favorable to indemnity. The clause is not to be understood so as to avoid the policy if an atom or some minute portion of the material in the insured building should fall. It means some functional portion of the structure, the falling of which would destroy its distinctive character as such, so that if the roof was blown from the building, and one of the upper rooms was uncovered, and the walls thereof partially blown away, but leaving more than three-fourths of the building intact and suitable for a dwelling house, and that on this condition it was burned, the clause would not exempt defendant company from liability. London & L. Fire Ins. Co. v. Crunk, 23 S. W. 140, 91 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 376.

A will authorizing and empowering the executors to convey and sell "all and any part" of the real estate belonging to testator, to pay his debts out of the proceeds, and giving the net residue, after payment of such debts, to the executors and to the survivor of them as joint tenants, should be construed to mean "all or any part" of the real estate of which testator died seised, and out of the proceeds of which his debts were payable, and did not require them, if they sold any, to sell all. Forster v. Winfield, 23 N. Y. Supp. 169, 170, 3 Misc. Rep. 435.

"Any party," as used in Act 1880, requiring that in all civil actions "any party" thereto may be sworn and examined as a witness, notwithstanding "any party" thereto may sue or be sued in a representative capacity, included both parties, and did not permit the surviving party to a contract with a decedent alone to testify, but also the representative. McCartin v. Traphagen's Adm'r, 17 Atl. 809, 810, 43 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 265.

Civ. Code, § 3214, providing that the mere delay in presenting a bill of exchange or promissory note, payable, with interest, at sight or on demand, does not exonerate "any party thereto," should be construed to mean the indorser, for the maker, surety, and the guarantors are never exonerated by any mere delay till the statute of limitations runs in their favor. Machado v. Fernandez, 16 Pac. 19, 20, 74 Cal. 362.

An act providing for the appointment of viewers to assess damages on the taking or occupying of private property for the construction of sewers, and authorizing "any party" to file exceptions to a report of the viewers, means any party interested in the proceedings. In re Construction of Sewer of Borough of Olyphant, 48 Atl. 487, 488, 198 Pa. 534; Appeal of Receivers of Pennsylvania Steel Co., 29 Atl. 294, 161 Pa. 571; In re Second St. in Steelton Borough, Id.

"Any party," as used in the Code, providing that any party aggrieved by the judgment of the district court may appeal, construed to mean any person who is a party to the action and aggrieved thereby. Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637, 640; Jones v. Quantrell, 9 Pac. 418, 419, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 153.

"Any party," as used in a statute authorizing appeals from a justice of the peace to the circuit court, and providing that "any party," etc., might appeal, means any one party, and it is not necessary, where there are several plaintiffs and defendants, that all should unite in the appeal. People v. Wayne County Circuit Judge, 36 Mich. 331.

Any person.

955, 190 Pa. 364 (citing Williams v. Ivory, 173 Pa. 536, 34 Atl. 292).

"Any person," as used in Rev. St. § 700, declaring that during the usual hours of business each day "any person" may enter the office of the register of deeds and examine the records in order to make a set of abstract books, means every person, and not that merely those who are interested in a particular piece of land may inspect and copy the records as to such piece. Hanson v. Eichstaedt, 35 N. W. 30, 33, 69 Wis. 538.

Rev. St. c. 58, § 13, gives any person injured by a dog a remedy against the owner or keeper. It was held that "any person" as there used was used in its broadest sense as anybody, any human being, and not in contrast to property. Brewer v. Crosby, 77 Mass. (11 Gray) 29.

"Any person," within Supplemental Act 1868, authorizing "any person" aggrieved by an assessment to appear before the commissioners, includes all persons without exception. Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Ormsby County Com'rs, 5 Nev. 341, 348.

By section 124 of the Criminal Code, "any person" who advises, aids, or participates in the embezzlement of public money by the officer or person charged with the collection, receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of such money is himself guilty of embezzlement. The words "any person" refer to all, and are not confined in meaning to a person or persons, or officer or officers, in some manner interested with the collection, handling, or care of money. Mills v. State, 73 N. W. 761, 765, 53 Neb. 263.

The words "any person," as used in statute providing that the filing of mechanics' liens to designate who may acquire such liens, includes both natural and artificial persons or corporations, and includes foreign corporations as well as domestic. Chapman v. Brewer, 43 Neb. 890, 62 N. W. 320, 321, 47 Am. St. Rep. 779.

Under Code 1873, § 1543, providing that "any person" violating an injunction against maintaining a legal nuisance on the premises described in the injunction shall be punished for contempt, a person not a party to the injunction can be punished for contempt if he uses property for the sale of liquor, since the decree reaches further than the party named, and in order to enforce the mandate of the law for the abatement of a nuisance, which is the property itself. Silvers v. Traverse, 47 N. W. 888, 889, 82 Iowa, 52, 11 L. R. A. 804.

"Any person," as used in Act April 8, 1833 (P. L. 251), providing that when "any person" shall make his last will and afterwards shall marry, or have a child not provided for, and shall die, leaving such child, such person shall be deemed intestate as to such child, should be construed to include females as well as males. Owens v. Haines, 48 Atl. 859, 860, 199 Pa. 137.

"Any person," as used in Rev. St. § 6038, providing that when "any person" shall die leaving a widow, or minor child or children under the age of 15 years, certain property should not be deemed assets or administered as such, includes both men and women. In re Hinton's Estate, 60 N. E. 621, 623, 64 Ohio St. 485.

"Any person," as used in Act July 12, 1842, providing that "any person" arrested in a civil action may procure his discharge by executing a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, means every person, and includes a minor or other person under disability. Williams v. Ivory, 34 Atl. 291, 292, 173 Pa. 536.

The term "any person," as used in Code Prac. art. 869, authorizing a mandate to prevent a usurpation in office to be obtained by any person, means what it says, and therefore a resident and a taxpayer of the city is competent to stand in judgment to determine the right of office of certain members of the sewerage and water board of the city. State v. Kohnke, 33 South. 793, 797, 109 La. 838.

The words "any person whomsoever," as used in Laws 1897, c. 312, § 28, subd. 2, providing for cancellation of a liquor certificate where any provision of the tax law has been violated by "any person whomsoever in charge of said premises," is not restricted to the sense of an agent or servant, for this would render them meaningless. In re Cullinan, 80 N. Y. Supp. 186, 187, 39 Misc. Rep. 641.

Same—In limited sense.

"Any person," as used in Act March 4, 1893, providing that every corporation shall be liable for injuries suffered by any employe for such injury resulting from the act or omission of "any person" done or made in obedience to any regulation of such corporation, or in obedience to any particular instruction given by any person delegated with the authority of the corporation, do not include the person injured, though such words in their usual and ordinary sense are inclusive and embrace every employe. Dixon v. Western Union Tel. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 630, 634.

As used in Laws 1883, c. 104, § 1, providing that if "any person" shall be drunk in any highway, street, or in any public place or building, or if "any person" shall be drunk in his own house, or any private building or place, disturbing his family or others, he shall be punished, etc., "any person" should be construed to mean only such persons as act voluntarily in the performance of the interdictioned act, and hence does not include idiots, insane persons, children under seven years of age, babes, and persons who have been made drunk by force or fraud and carried into a public place. Human actions can hardly be construed as culpable either in law or morals unless an intelligent consent of the mind goes with the actions, and to punish where there is no culpability would be the most reprehensible tyranny, and hence one who innocently drinks of the liquor which intoxicates him, and without having any knowledge of its intoxicating quality, and without having any idea that it would make him drunk, is not guilty of the offense prescribed by the statute. State v. Brown, 16 Pac. 259, 260, 38 Kan. 390.

Under Gen. St. Ky. c. 57, p. 550, which gives a right of action for damages to the personal representative of "any person" whose life is lost by the negligence of a railroad company, etc., to be pursued in the same manner that the person himself might have done for any injury where death did not ensue, the right is not confined to decedents who were citizens or residents of Kentucky, the words "personal representative" not being limited to a personal representative appointed in and by the state of Kentucky, but meaning any one appointed in any state, the action being transitory. Marvin v. Maysville St. R. & Transfer Co. (U. S.) 49 Fed. 436, 437.

"Any person," as used in Collection Law 1799, § 43 (1 Stat. 1660), providing that if any chest of tea shall be found in the possession of "any person," unaccompanied with the proper marks and certificates, it shall be presumptive evidence that the same shall be liable to forfeiture, means the possession of the purchaser to whom the certificates are required to be delivered on the sale, and not the possession of the wrongdoer. 651 Chests of Tea v. United States (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 253, 257.

Act Oct. 19, 1876 (Sess. Laws, 8), amending section 17, Act Dec. 22, 1853 (Or. Laws, 656), provides that every boat used in navigating the waters of the state shall be subject to a lien for all debts due to persons by virtue of a contract with the owners of a boat, or with the agents, contractors, or subcontractors of such owner, or any of them, or with "any person" having been employed to construct, repair, or launch such boat or vessel, on account of labor done and materials furnished by mechanics, tradesmen, or others in the building, repairing, etc., of such vessel. Held, that the phrase "any person" should be construed to mean any person sustaining some relation to the owner; one having others employed by authority of the owner. The City of Salem (U. S.) 10 Fed. 843, 845.

"Any person or persons," as used in the Constitution relating to those who commit misprision of treason or felony, are necessarily confined to any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States, though the words in themselves are broad enough to comprehend every human being. United States v. Palmer, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 610, 631, 4 L. Ed. 471.

"Any person," as used in Act Nov. 14, 1786, which provides that no mortgage hereafter made should affect a bona fide purchaser unless put on record within 30 days after its execution, and that mortgages heretofore given shall have no effect in law or equity against "any person" except the mortgagor unless recorded under the act of 1765, etc., means only such persons as were previously mentioned in the preamble or the preceding section of the act; that is, mortgagees and purchasers without notice. Low v. Goldtrap, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 272, 274, 275.

A corporate charter, providing that if "any person" chosen to be warden shall refuse to accept the office of warden he shall forfeit a certain sum, means, under the direct provisions of the charter, only such persons eligible by the terms of the charter to the office of warden. Company of Tobacco Pipe Makers v. Woodroffe, 7 Barn. & C. 838.

The words "any person," in Code Civ. Proc. § 401, subd. 7, providing for the taking of the affidavit of any person for the purposes of a motion when required by his adversary, is applicable only to those persons who may by existing laws be subjected to this species of examination, and a party to an action cannot be compelled by the adverse party to make an affidavit for the purpose of a motion. Hodgkin v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 73, 74.

Same—In law of negligence by carriers.

Under a statute providing that, whenever "any person" shall die from any injury resulting from or occasioned by the negligence of any person or employé while running a train of cars, his representatives may recover, the words "any person" do not include a servant whose death was occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant. Sullivan v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 10 S. W. 852, 854, 97 Mo. 113; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Farrow, 6 Colo. 498, 505; Lutz v. Atlantic & P. R. Co., 30 Pac. 912, 913, 6 N. M. 496, 16 L. R. A. 819; Proctor v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 64 Mo. 112, 122; Connor v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 59 Mo. 285, 292.

The term "any person," in Rev. St. Mo. § 4425, authorizing a suit for damages for wrongful death when any person shall die from any injury resulting from the negligence, etc., of any officer, etc., while running, conducting, or managing any locomotive, car, or train, etc., has been held to include all persons—employés as well as others. Matz v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 180, 184; Schultz v. Pacific R. R., 36 Mo. 13, 28.

In Pub. St. c. 204, § 15, providing that carriers shall be liable for the loss of life of "any person," whether a passenger or not, in the care of such carrier, "any person" cannot be construed to include an employé injured by the negligence of a fellow servant. Miller v. Coffin, 36 Atl. 6, 8, 19 R. I. 164.

The words "any person," as used in Code 1880, § 1047, declaring that a railroad company shall be liable for any damages or injury which may be sustained by any person from a locomotive or cars while running at a certain rate of speed, does not embrace employes of the road. Dowell v. Vicksburg & M. R. Co., 61 Miss. 519, 529.

"Any person," as used in Rev. St. c. 81, § 21, providing that railroad corporations shall be liable for damages sustained by "any person" by the neglect of their servants, is limited in its application to such persons as were not the servants of the corporation, and who sustained damages without any contributory fault. Carle v. Bangor & P. Canal & R. Co., 43 Me. 269, 271.

Same—As including particular persons.

1 Rev. St. p. 728, § 55, authorizing the application of rents and profits to the use of "any person," includes persons unascertained at the time of the designation of those to whom there is granted a contingent remainder. Harrison v. Harrison, 36 N. Y. 543, 546.

The term "any person" in Gen. St. § 3087, prescribing a penalty for "any person" who shall keep for sale and sell spirituous and intoxicating liquors without a license, includes a licensed pharmacist. State v. Gray, 22 Atl. 675, 676, 61 Conn. 39.

A city ordinance prohibiting "any person" not an employé of a railroad from jumping on or off a moving train includes all persons, so that one not an employé, attempting to board a moving train in violation of such ordinance, was guilty of contributory negligence, although he intended to become a passenger. Mills v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. of Texas (Tex.) 57 S. W. 291, 292.

Gen. Laws 1885, c. 296, § 4, providing that "if any person shall vend" any intoxicating liquors or drinks in any county whatever without a license he shall be punished, is broad enough to include a brewer who establishes an agency for the sale of beer of his own manufacture in a town some miles from his duly licensed place of business, and there sells to such persons as desire to purchase, without obtaining a license for carrying on the business from the authorities of such town. Peltz v. State, 32 N. W. 763, 68 Wis. 538.

In Code, § 1772, providing that "any person," after 90 days and within 12 months thereafter, may recover money lost at gaming, by an action for the use of the wife, "any person" includes a husband as well as third persons. Forrest v. Grant, 79 Tenn. (11 Lea) 305, 306.

Laws 1872, c. 127, § 5, giving to any city, town, or village, or "any person" who may take charge of and provide for an intoxicated person, a right of action to recover from the vendor of the liquor a reasonable compensation and $2 per day, etc., should be construed to include a wife who had taken charge of and provided for her intoxicated husband. Wightman v. Devere, 33 Wis. 570, 578.

Comp. Laws 1881, § 172, requiring every county officer to keep all books and papers required to be kept in any public county office open for the examination of "any person," includes any person having "some or any present and existing interest to be subserved by the examination, and it can make no difference whether such interest be great or small, or whether he is interested as a principal or as an agent, or as an attorney or as a client. He has a right to examine such books and papers to the extent of his interest." Boylan v. Warren, 18 Pac. 174, 176, 39 Kan. 301, 7 Am. St. Rep. 551.

In Transfer Act 1892, § 2, exempting from taxation a transfer to "any person" to whom the decedent's grantor, donor, or vendor has stood for not less than 10 years in the mutually acknowledged relation of a parent, "any person" cannot be considered to apply only to illegitimate children of the decedent, etc., but applies also to any person, infant or adult, though not of his blood nor legally adopted by him, to whom he has stood in loco parentis, receiving in return filial devotion and services. In re Beach's Estate, 48 N. E. 516, 517, 154 N. Y. 242.

Rev. St. c. 126, § 29, making it criminal for any clerk, agent, or servant to embezzle or fraudulently convert, without the consent of his employer or master, any money or property of "any person," construed to include the property belonging to his master. Commonwealth v. Stearns, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 343, 346.

Any person interested.

"Any person interested," as used in Code 1876, § 2519, authorizing "any person interested" to appear and contest any item of the account, and to examine witnesses, etc., in a settlement by a personal representative of one deceased, includes a creditor, as our whole system of legislation in reference to estates of decedents rests on the theory that creditors have a primary interest in all proceedings pertaining to the settlement of estates, and the policy of the law has been to afford them every reasonable opportunity to protect that interest by intervening as parties. Byrd v. Jones, 4 South. 375, 377, 84 Ala. 336.

The words "any person interested," used in Sess. Laws 1895, p. 327, declaring that any person interested may under certain conditions bring a suit in equity to contest a will, means a person who at the time of the probate is directly interested in the estate in a pecuniary way, and so, where one's father had a right to maintain such an action, but failed to do so during his lifetime, and the person himself had no interest under the will, and would not have inherited excepting through his father, he could not maintain the action after the ancestor's death. Storrs v. St. Luke's Hospital, 54 N. E. 185, 187, 180 Ill. 368, 72 Am. St. Rep. 211.

Rev. St. 1874, p. 112, which provides that "whenever any person dies seized or possessed of any real estate in this state, or having any right or interest therein, and has no relative or creditor within this state who will administer upon such deceased person's estate, it shall be the duty of the county court on application of 'any person interested' therein to commit the administration of such estate to the public administrator of the proper county," is not confined to persons residing within the state, but is general in its application, and would include any person interested, without reference to his place of residence. Branch v. Rankin, 108 Ill. 444, 447.

In Pub. St. c. 107, § 25, providing that whoever is found in a state of intoxication in a public place, or is found in "any place" in a state of intoxication, committing a breach of the peace, or disturbing others by noise, may be arrested without a warrant by a police officer, "any place" will be construed to include a dwelling house in which the accused resides. Ford v. Breen, 53 N. E. 136, 173 Mass. 52.

The phrase "any place," as used in a statute defining "bunko steering," undoubtedly means and contemplates some place within the state, and the meaning thereof cannot be so enlarged as to make it apply to and include some place in another state. Cruthers v. State (Ind.) 67 N. E. 930, 932.

Any pollbook.

"Any pollbook," as used in Election Law, § 41, providing that if the clerk of the county should refuse to count the vote on "any pollbook" of any election held by the people he shall be liable to indictment, has reference to the pollbook of a legal election, and not to the pollbook of an election that the record in the office of the clerk of the county advises him is prima facie void, since the law does not contemplate any such thing as an illegal election. Howard v. McDiarmid, 26 Ark. 100, 106, 109.

Any poor person.

The term "any poor person," as used in Rev. St. c. 48, § 14, providing that, when "any poor person" shall be unable to support himself, his parents, grandparents, children, or grandchildren shall be liable for his support in the order named, are of a general import, and include all poor persons of every kind or class, insane as well as rational. Trustees of Poor of Sussex County v. Jacobs (Del.) 6 Houst. 330, 336.

Any portion of my estate.

The words "any portion of my estate," in a will conferring power of sale to the devisees of a life estate, extend the power to the principal, and permit the conveyance of a fee. Glover v. Stillson, 15 Atl. 752, 754, 56 Conn. 316.

A will giving the executrix "power to sell 'any portion of my estate' not devised to my children" has no ambiguous meaning, and the power to sell is unrestricted, except as to the property specifically devised to the children. White v. Guthrie (Ky.) 8 S. W. 274, 275.

Any process or writ.

In Rev. Code Del. c. 120, § 60, providing that if the goods and chattels of a tenant are received by fraud, or any process of execution, attachment, or sequestration, the goods and chattels shall be liable to one year's rent of such premises in arrear or growing due in pursuance of said process, the words "any process of execution, attachment or sequestration," include all kinds of process by which creditors can proceed against the goods and chattels of the tenant on demised premises to enforce payment of their claims. In re Mitchell (U. S.) 116 Fed. 87, 94.

The statutory remedy for the enforcement of a claim for rent is embraced within the terms "any process of law" contained in the exemption article of the Constitution of 1868, and the personal property exemption secured by that instrument, other than agricultural products raised on the land rented, may be claimed by the head of a family, residing in this state, as against the lien for rent given by the statute in favor of the landlord. Hodges v. Cooksey, 15 South. 549, 551, 33 Fla. 715, 24 L. R. A. 812.

"Any and every writ," in Act April 4, 1873, as amended by Act June 20, 1883, providing that no foreign insurance company shall do any business in the state unless it has filed a stipulation agreeing that no legal process served on an agent shall have the same effect as if served personally upon the company within the state, and that the term process shall include "any and every writ," clearly comprehends an attachment execution. Kennedy v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 30 Atl. 724, 725, 165 Pa. 179.

Any profits or income.

1 Rev. St. p. 416, § 9, provides that if the president or other officer of any incorporated company named in the assessment roll shall show to the satisfaction of the board of supervisors at their annual meeting, by an affidavit of such officer, that such company is not in receipt of "any profits or income," the name of such company shall be stricken out of the assessment roll, and no tax shall be imposed on it. Held, that "any profits or income" does not mean net profits and income. People v. Supervisors of City and County of New York (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 605, 606.

Any property.

Act May 2, 1852, § 7, providing that the board of supervisors of a county shall have power, with the consent of a majority of all its members, to purchase or receive "any property" for the use of the county to erect or lease a courthouse, jail, and such other buildings as may be necessary for the use of the county, should be construed to mean both real and personal property. De Witt v. City of San Francisco, 2 Cal. 280, 295.

In Laws 1872, c. 161, authorizing an action against any person, acting for or on behalf of a municipality, by whose acts the corporation or its taxpayers may be injured in its property rights or pecuniary interests, to "prevent waste or injury to any property, funds, or estate" of such county, town, or municipal corporation, such words mean "not only property and funds in possession, but the credit and power of taxation, and of borrowing money in anticipation of taxation, and every process or means by which the municipal corporation can be charged pecuniarily, or the taxable property within its limits burdened." Ayers v. Lawrence, 59 N. Y. 192, 198; Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222, 231.

"Any kind of property," as used in a statute authorizing a mechanic's lien on any building, lot, farm, or "any kind of property" not herein enumerated, does not include railroad property, and hence does not authorize a lien thereon. Buncombe County Com'rs v. Tommey, 5 Sup. Ct. 626, 629, 115 U. S. 122, 29 L. Ed. 308.

The words "any personal, mixed or real property, franchises and rights," in the statute authorizing the levy of a special execution process against an insolvent corporation upon such property, are certainly broad enough to cover patent rights. For to hold otherwise would defeat the legislative intention, which clearly was to subject all the property and rights of every description belonging to an insolvent corporation to the discharge of its debts. Erie Wringer Mfg. Co. v. National Wringer Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 248, 249.

Any provision by will.

The Illinois statute declaring that "any provision by will" bars dower means that where any property is bequeathed to the widow which from its amount might be presumed to be in lieu of dower, and there is nothing in the will to direct it, the dower is barred unless the widow elected to take her dower within the statutory period; it does not mean that any bequests to the widow, however small, necessarily bar the dower. United States v. Duncan (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 926.

Any public purpose.

"Any public purpose," within the charter of the city of Burlington providing that whenever, in the opinion of the city council, it is expedient to borrow money for "any public purpose," the question shall be submitted to the citizens, etc., is to be construed to mean any purpose within the legitimate objects of the charter; that is, any public purpose which may be necessary for the execution of the corporate powers conferred. The purpose must relate to and be connected with the objects of the incorporation, and it must be a public purpose; that is, relating to and concerning the public, as contradistinguished from one or more individuals or corporations. The term does not include the construction of a railroad, and therefore confers no power upon the city to borrow money to aid in the construction thereof. Chamberlain v. City of Burlington, 19 Iowa, 395, 402.

Any railroad.

"Any railroad," as used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 3017, giving a right of action when the death of a person is caused by the negligence of the receiver or other person in charge of any railroad, includes street railroads. Bammel v. Kirby, 47 S. W. 392, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 198 (citing Johnson's Adm'r v. Louisville City Ry. Co., 73 Ky. [10 Bush] 231).

The term "any railroad," in a statute expressly referring to any railroad, indicates a legislative intent to enact a general law regulating all railroad corporations. Inhabitants of Montclair v. New York & L. G. R. Co., 18 Atl. 242, 244, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 436.

Any respect untrue.

Where a life insurance policy contains a condition that if the statement in the application be found in "any respect untrue" it shall be void, untrue answers to specific questions avoid the policy, although relating to matters not materially affecting the risk, and not made with a view to deceive the company. Wilkinson v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1268.

Any road.

Code, § 410, providing for the submission to the people of the question whether the county will construct or aid to construct "any road" which may call for extraordinary expenditure, the term "any road" is not restricted to common roads, streets, and lanes, but applies to an indefinite number of roads, to all and to all kinds which may require an extraordinary expenditure, and includes railroads. Dubuque County v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 1, 2.

The use of the word "any," in a statute authorizing the submission of the question whether the county will construct or aid to construct "any" road or bridge which may call for an extraordinary expenditure, refers to any such road as may require the expenditure named, and does not operate to extend the meaning of the word "roads" to include railroads. Stokes v. Scott County, 10 Iowa, 166, 167, 177.

Any scheme or artifice to defraud.

The expression "any scheme or artifice to defraud," within Rev. St. § 5480 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], making it a crime to use the mails for promoting such a scheme, will not be limited to the particular deceits mentioned in the statute, but will be taken to mean any scheme or artifice of a general character of those specified in the act. The general language of the act must be limited to such schemes and artifices as are ejusdem generis. United States v. Beach (U. S.) 71 Fed. 160, 161.

Any such case.

In construing the statute providing that writs of quo warranto might be issued in certain cases, and "in any such case the writ aforesaid may be issued upon the suggestion of the Attorney General," etc., the court said: "Upon every principle of grammatical relation and obvious meaning, we must intend that the Legislature (by the use of the words 'in any such case') had in view the cases specified in the same section immediately preceding the final clause. It was of these it had been speaking, and it was of these it was continuing to speak." Commonwealth v. Burrell, 7 Pa. (7 Barr) 34, 37.

Any such person.

The phrase "any such person" in Laws 1899, c. 499, providing that the state superintendent of elections or any deputy may call on any person to assist him in the performance of his duty, and providing that any such person who fails to respond thereto, or who shall willfully or feloniously hinder or delay, or attempt to hinder or delay, such superintendent in the performance of his duty, shall be guilty of a felony, plainly refers to the persons called upon by the officer to aid him, and does not include a person not called upon to mean any person. People v. Hochstim, 73 N. Y. Supp. 626, 634, 36 Misc. Rep. 562.

Any tax certificate.

"Any tax certificate," as used in Laws 1878, c. 334, § 7, providing that every action to cancel any tax certificate shall be brought within a certain time, would include a certificate issued on sale of land for nonpayment of a special assessment. Dalrymple v. City of Milwaukee, 10 N. W. 141, 144, 53 Wis. 178.

Any term of years.

How. Ann. St. § 9124, provides that the offense of arson shall be punished by imprisonment for "any term of years." Held, that the phrase "any term of years" must be construed to mean for a time not less than two years. People v. Burridge, 58 N. W. 319, 99 Mich. 343 (citing In re Lamphere, 61 Mich. 105, 108, 27 N. W. 882; Ex parte Seymour, 31 Mass. [14 Pick.] 40, 43; Ex parte Dick, Id. 86; Ex parte White, Id. 90, 93).

Any time.

See "At Any Time."

Any unsettled person.

"Any unsettled person," as used in St. 1874, c. 274, § 3, relating to settlements of paupers, which provides that no existing settlement shall be changed by any provisions of this act unless the entire residence and taxation herein required accrues after its passage, but "any unsettled person" shall be deemed to have gained a settlement upon the completion of the residence and taxation herein required, etc., means any person unsettled at the time the statute took effect. Worcester v. Great Barrington, 5 N. E. 491, 492, 140 Mass. 243.

Any viaduct.

Where the charter of a city authorized the city to require railroad companies to keep in repair any viaduct or viaducts over streets crossed by their tracks, the phrase "any viaduct or viaducts" included such as were then in existence, as well as those subsequently constructed. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 66 N. W. 624, 628, 47 Neb. 549, 41 L. R. A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557.

Any way.

A will bequeathing an annuity to the testator's wife, payable "annually or in any way she may wish," should not be literally construed, but the more moderate construction should be adopted, namely, that she should be at liberty to call for the payment of annuity at short periods; that is to say, at the beginning of each quarter. The words should not be construed to mean that the wife could claim the payment of the whole annuity in advance. Hall v. Hall (S. C.) 2 McCord, Eq. 269, 281.

In an accident insurance policy which insures against death from injuries through external violence and accidental means, unless it is caused from taking poison "in any way," suicide, etc., the words "in any way" relate to the mode or manner in which the poison is taken, and not to the motive of the insured in taking it, and hence cannot be construed to embrace his involuntary as well as his voluntary action in that regard. Metropolitan Acc. Ass'n v. Frolland, 43 N. E. 766, 768, 161 Ill. 30, 52 Am. St. Rep. 359.

Any will or codicil.

"Any will or codicil," as used in the enacting clauses of an act relating by its title only to wills and codicils of real estate, was so limited by the title, and could not be construed to affect mere testaments, wills, or codicils of personal estate only. Brett v. Brett, 3 Add. Ecc. 210.

The preamble of 25 Geo. II, c. 6, after reciting the provision in the statute of frauds which requires that all devises of land should be attested and subscribed in the presence of the devisor by credible witnesses, and declaring that it had been found to be a wise and good provision, but that doubts had arisen who were to be deemed legal witnesses within the intent of the act, declares in the enacting portion that if any person shall attest the execution of "any will or codicil" which shall be made after the time therein mentioned, to whom any devise, legacy, or gift shall be made of real or personal estate, such devise, legacy, or gift shall, so far as regards such person, be utterly null and void. Held, that "any will or codicil" in the enacting clause meant such wills or codicils as by the statute of frauds require to be attested by witnesses, and did not extend to wills of personal estate only. Therefore a legacy to a person who is an attesting witness to such a will is not void. Emanuel v. Constable, 3 Russ. 436, 439.

St. 1855, c. 304, § 1, providing that the real estate and personal property of "any woman who may hereafter be married in this commonwealth," and its rents, issues, and profits, shall remain her sole and separate property, must be construed as extending to and including a woman who, with her husband, had her domicile in this commonwealth at the time of their marriage, although the marriage was solemnized in another state. Woodbury v. Freeland, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 105, 107.

As used in a statute providing that divorce might be granted for certain named offenses, and that the party should prefer a petition, and on proof of the allegations the court might grant a divorce, and that the court might assign to "any woman so divorced" part of the estate of her husband, the expression "any woman so divorced," though by itself all-inclusive, meant only those women who were divorced for the fault of the husband. Allen v. Allen, 43 Conn. 419, 424.

ANY LAW, USAGE, OR CUSTOM TO THE CONTRARY NOTWITHSTANDING.

The fact that a statute concludes "any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding" does not imply that it should be given a repealing tendency. The phrase was formerly frequently used by the Legislature to round off a period, and perhaps to jog the memory of the judges, lest they forget that posterior laws abrogate those which happen to be prior and contrary to them. City of Philadelphia v. Davis (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 269, 278.

ANY ONE.

"Any one creditor," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 473, § 122, providing that justices of the peace may issue writs of attachment against the personal property of a debtor when the amount claimed by any one creditor does not exceed $100, is to be construed to mean any one claiming under the same bond and affidavit. State v. King, 5 Ind. 439, 440.

"Any one year," as used in Act Cong. April 20, 1818, c. 118, providing that receivers of public money for the lands of the United States shall receive an annual salary and a commission of 1 per cent., provided the whole amount shall not exceed for any one year the sum of $36,000, meant any one year from the date of the commission of the receiver, and not necessarily commencing with the calendar year. United States v. Dickson, 40 U. S. (15 Pet.) 141, 159, 10 L. Ed. 689.

ANY OTHER.

A power authorized an attorney to demand plaintiff's just dower be assigned to her in any and all of the before mentioned premises or "any other," but no premises were described. Held, that the words "any other" added nothing to its meaning. Sloan v. Whitman, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 532, 533.

A building contract providing that any change in the plans, either in quantity or quality of the work, should be executed by the contractor without holding the contract as violated or void "in any other respect," excludes the implication of any change in terms, except such as would result from the alteration of the plans, but not such changes as would be the necessary consequence thereof. Lilly v. Person, 32 Atl. 23, 24, 168 Pa. 219.

As ejusdem generis.

The general words "any other thing," in a statute first enumerating certain particular things, and then using the general terms "any other things," is ordinarily to be confined to things ejusdem generis; that is, of the same kind as the special words have enumerated. But the reason of this rule of construction is not applied when it is evident that the intention of the statute will be thwarted by its application. State v. Williams, 35 Mo. App. 541, 548.

The phrase "any other dangerous weapon," following in a statute immediately the kind of weapons declared to be dangerous, referred to other weapons not included in the description, but of the same class. State v. Brown, 6 South. 541, 41 La. Ann. 345.

A fire policy which provided that, if camphene, spirit gas or burning fluid, phosgene, "or any other inflammable liquid" should be used, an additional premium would be required, meant some liquid equally inflammable with those enumerated. Wood v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 421, 426.

Section 36 of the act concerning boats and vessels, which enumerates the causes of indebtedness for which a part owner of a boat may sue a boat, and reciting thereafter "any other cause of indebtedness whatever," means such causes of indebtedness as had been previously enumerated. Langstaff v. Rock, 13 Mo. 579, 580, 582.

The clause "any other matter or thing whatsoever," as used in Act 1882, rendering it indictable to put into any bag or bale of cotton any stone, wood, trash cotton, cotton seed, "or any other matter whatsoever," is employed literally, and is not restricted to the things previously enumerated. State v. Holman (S. C.) 3 McCord, 306, 308.

Rev. St. c. 192, § 1, gives a review as of right to the party against whom judgment has been rendered in any civil action in the court of common pleas in which an issue of fact has been joined, and section 2 authorizes the Supreme Court, upon petition, to grant a review "in any other case" where it shall appear that justice has not been done through any accident, mistake, or misfortune. Held, that the words "any other case" are not to be construed as meaning in any other actions than those described in section 1, but as meaning in any other than those cases in which the party alleging injustice in the judgment has had an opportunity to correct it by a rehearing upon review as of right. Coburn v. Rogers, 32 N. H. 372, 374.

Any other cause or reason.

In Rev. St. c. 95, § 4, providing that any married woman whose husband, either from drunkenness, profligacy, or "any other cause," shall neglect or refuse to provide for her support and the support and education of her children, shall have the right in her own name to transact business, and to receive and collect her own earnings and the earnings of her own minor children, and apply the same free from the control of her husband, the phrase "any other cause" should not be construed as meaning every case where for any reason the husband does not furnish his wife with food and raiment and all the necessities of life, but means vices of like kind to drunkenness or profligacy, or to conduct tending to the same result; hence, where a husband was not lazy, indolent, or vicious, but was merely a careless manager, and in debt, and unable to supply the necessary wants of his wife, though he worked sometimes on a farm and sometimes in a stone quarry, the statute did not apply. Edson v. Hayden, 20 Wis. 682, 684.

"Any other cause," as used in a contract for the purchase of sugar cane, providing that the purchaser should be entitled to refuse to receive cane in case its machinery became disabled in consequence of fire, want of water, breakdown, labor strikes, or "any other cause" beyond the control of defendant, was not subject to the rule ejusdem generis, but was a sufficiently broad expression to cover any uncontrollable overpowering cause necessitating the suspension of operation. Vredenburg v. Baton Rouge Sugar Co., 28 South. 122, 124, 52 La. Ann. 1666.

"Any other reason," as used in Civ. Code, § 2533, providing that "the surety of any guardian on his bond, may at any time make complaint, to the ordinary of any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust or for any other reason show his desire to be relieved as surety," relates to some ground or grounds of relief not ejusdem generis with those which arise from the guardian's official misconduct, such as want of personal integrity, lack of business capacity, extravagant or reckless living, indulgence in vicious or immoral habits, criminality, etc. National Surety Co. v. Morris, 36 S. E. 690, 691, 111 Ga. 307.

Any other felony.

"Any other felony," as used in Sanb. & B. Ann. St. § 4385, providing a penalty for any person who shall assault another with intent to commit burglary, robbery, or mayhem, and who shall attempt to commit arson or any other felony, means such felonies as are committed by force, and does not include adultery. State v. Goodrich, 54 N. W. 577, 84 Wis. 359.

"Any other felony," as used in Rev. St. § 819 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 629], providing that when the offense charged is treason or a capital offense the defendant shall be entitled to 20 and the United States to 5 peremptory challenges, and on the trial of "any other felony" the defendant shall be entitled to 10 and the United States to 3 peremptory challenges, is to be construed to mean offenses other than capital offenses. United States v. Coopersmith (U. S.) 4 Fed. 198, 199.

Any other funds.

By a codicil to a will a testator bequeathed to his executors, for the use of his children, "whatever stock now stands in my name, or may hereafter stand in the Dutch funds, or 'any other funds,'" including any interest arising therefrom. Held, that the words "any other funds" included stock in British funds, as well as the testator's interest in Dutch funds. Montresor v. Montresor, 1 Colly. 693, 694.

Game or gambling device.

The phrases "any other species of gaming whatever" and "any other game of hazard or address" in Act 1879, c. 8, making void all contracts the consideration of which is money lost by playing at cards, dice, billiards, horse racing, or any other species of gaming whatever, include cockfighting. Bagley v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 486, 489.

Under a statute which prohibits gaming, and, after enumerating several banking games, prohibits "any other banking game," the phrase "any other banking game" means any banking game not enumerated. Randolph v. State, 9 Tex. 521, 524.

Under a statute prohibiting the use of certain named gambling devices, and also of "any other gambling devices whatever," it is held that the latter phrase intended to have reference to such device as changed the name of the bank or table, or other device specifically prohibited, without any essential change in the game played, and that a horse race could not be considered as coming within the prohibition of the statute contained in the phrase quoted. McElroy v. Carmichael, 6 Tex. 454, 456.

Any other house.

The phrase "any other house," in Act 1809, c. 138, making it an offense to willfully burn a mill or any other house, includes a schoolhouse not parcel of a dwelling house. Jones v. Hungerford (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 402, 406.

Under 2 Litt. & S. St. Law, 989, providing that all and every person or persons that shall intentionally and unlawfully burn any tobacco house, warehouse, or storehouse, or any house or place where wheat, Indian corn, or other grain shall be kept, or "any other house or houses whatsoever," shall be punished, etc., the offense is not limited to houses of the class mentioned in the act, and hence includes a schoolhouse. Wallace v. Young, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 155, 156.

Any other law.

Laws 1872, c. 182, relating to the grant of railroad aid by towns, section 11 provides that, if any county, town, city, or village shall issue and deliver to any railroad company any bonds in pursuance of the provisions of the act, it shall not thereafter issue or deliver any bonds or incur any liability in aid of the construction of the railroad of such company by virtue of the authority of "any other law" of the state. Held, that "any other law" means laws which were in existence when the act of 1872 was passed, for it could not operate on laws thereafter enacted, as future acts in conflict with it would necessarily operate as a repeal of the section pro tanto, and the Legislature of 1872 could not bind future Legislatures. Oleson v. Green Bay & L. P. Ry. Co., 36 Wis. 383, 389.

Any other manner.

In Rev. St. c. 90, § 83, providing that when any person shall claim any title or interest by force of a subsequent attachment, or a purchase, or a mortgage, "or in any other manner," in any estate that is attached in a suit between other persons, a claim asserted "in any other manner" means any claim subsequent to a prior attachment. Pelree v. Richardson, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 69, 71.

Any other matter.

Code 1888, § 3299, allowing a defendant to plead as a counterclaim "any other matter as would entitle him either to recover damages at law from the plaintiff * * * or to relief in equity," does not permit him to set up unliquidated damages based on breach of a contract other than that sued on. American Manganese Co. v. Virginia Manganese Co., 21 S. E. 466, 91 Va. 272.

The release of a debtor, executed by his creditors, and reciting that they released all claims or demands which they or any person claiming under them might have for and on account of certain bonds, notes, and debts, and from "any other matter or thing" from the beginning of the world, meant those claims which were positively released and covenanted not to be sued for. Words of such nature are often found in giving releases, but they are generally restrained to the subject-matter on which the parties act. Halsey v. Fairbanks (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 295, 303.

Any other means.

"Any other means," as used in Comp. Laws, § 7557, enacting that every person who shall set fire to any building, or by "any other means" attempt to cause any building to be burned, shall be punished by fine or imprisonment in the state prison, means some physical act on the part of accused, and does not embrace a case where one solicits another to fire a building. McDade v. People, 29 Mich. 50, 55.

Any other officer.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 14, authorizing an action on bonds of guardian, sheriff, "or any other officer," county treasurers are included, though they are not specially named in the section. Alexander v. Overton, 34 N. W. 629, 630, 22 Neb. 227.

Any other person.

Code 1873, § 1553, providing that any express company, railway company, or any person in the employ of any express company, or any common carrier, or any person in the employ of any common carrier, or if "any other person" knowingly bring within this state intoxicating liquor, he shall be punished, etc., cannot be construed to enlarge the classes which precede the words "any other person" and means simply other persons of like kind or in like employment with those specified, and are limited to other like persons. Hence a driver for one who was engaged in the business of moving, transporting, or delivering goods for hire the same as a transfer company, though not a public carrier, because his employment with one corporation was exclusive, belongs to the classes enumerated in the statute, or, rather, to a like class. State v. Campbell, 40 N. W. 100, 101, 76 Iowa, 122.

Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 4, provides that, if the loser or his creditor does not sue for the money or thing lost at gaming within six months after its payment or delivery, any other person may sue the winner and recover treble the amount of value of the property or thing lost. Held, that the words "any other person" did not include the wife of the loser, since the loss would not affect her personal estate, and therefore she was disqualified to sue alone. Moore v. Settle, 82 Ky. 187, 56 Am. Rep. 889.

Code, p. 542, § 10, providing that the court shall have power at any time to revoke an order committing the estate of a decedent to the sheriff for administration, and to grant letters to "any other person," does not mean that the court will revoke the order at the application of any person, but is limited by the power of the court to exercise its discretion as to the suitableness of the person and the time and circumstances of his application. Hutcheson v. Priddy (Va.) 12 Grat. 85, 89.

Rev. St. tit. 1, § 277, providing that every person who shall set a fire on any land that shall run on the land of "any other person" shall pay the damages, means by such other person, a proprietor of land, other than the one on whose land the fire was set; meaning that the damage which might be recovered shall be that which is occasioned, not to the land on which the fire was set, but to the land of "any other person" on which it should afterwards run. Grannis v. Cummings, 25 Conn. 165.

Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 4, declaring that if a loser at gaming, or his creditor, shall not sue for the money within six months, "any other person" might sue the winner and recover triple the value of the money lost, creates a new cause of action in favor of any person competent to sue, but does not enable an alien or married woman to sue the winner. Moore v. Settle, 82 Ky. 187, 189, 56 Am. Rep. 889.

A statute providing for the creditors' bill against the defendant and "any other person" to compel a discovery is not to be understood literally, and does not mean that such a bill may be filed against any one. It must be construed, "any other person legally liable." Neither does it in the least imply that it may not be brought against the defendant alone. Bay State Iron Co. v. Goodall, 39 N. H. 223, 234, 75 Am. Dec. 219.

"Any other persons," as used in a contract that there should be no liens entered or filed by any subcontractor or "any other persons" for or on account of any work, labor, or materials done or supplied in or upon a building, include all other persons, and necessarily include the principal contractor, as the words are generic, and necessarily include all persons who have a right to file liens. Commonwealth Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ellis, 43 Atl. 1034, 1035, 192 Pa. 321, 73 Am. St. Rep. 816.

Any other state.

In the construction of statutes the words "any other state" shall be held to include any state or territory, and any foreign government or country, and the District of Columbia. Ky. St. 1906. § 446

ANYTHING.

See "If Anything."

"Anything," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5056, providing that no person shall be entitled to maintain an action against an assignee in bankruptcy for "anything done by him as such assignee" without giving 20 days' notice, includes all things which the assignee assumes to do as such, and which an assignee is authorized to do under the circumstances. Haven v. Place, 11 N. W. 117, 28 Minn. 551.

In holding that an exception in a life policy that the insurer should not be liable for injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting wholly or in part from poison or "anything" accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, or absorbed or inhaled, included death caused by blood poisoning from the effect of the absorption into the system of septic poison evolved by the propagation of germs in cotton inserted by a dentist in wounds caused by the removal of teeth, it was said "that while the word 'poison,' as used in the policy, may be construed to mean liquids commonly known as poison, it is followed by the words 'or anything,' which clearly indicates that the intent was to include under the entire term anything of a poisonous nature." Kasten v. Interstate Casualty Co. of New

ANYTHING OF VALUE.

The term "anything of value," as used in the Penal Code, includes money, bank bills or notes, United States treasury notes, and other bills, bonds, or notes issued by lawful authority, and intended to pass and circulate as money; goods and chattels; any promissory note, bill of exchange, order, draft, warrant, check, or bond given for the payment of money; any receipt given for the payment of money or other property; any right in action; things which savor of the realty, and are, at the time they are taken, a part of the freehold, whether they be of the substance or produce thereof, or affixed thereto, although there be no interval between the severing and the taking away; and every other thing of any value whatever. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 6794; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 5190.

Rev. St. § 6794, defines the term "anything of value," as used in the definition of larceny, as including things which savor of the realty, and are at the time they are taken a part of the freehold, whether they are of the substance or produce thereof or affixed thereto, if there be no interval between the time of severing and the taking away. Bal' v. White, 39 Ohio St. 650, 651.

In Rev. St. § 6900, providing that whoever promises any valuable thing to a member of the General Assembly to influence him shall be punished, etc., no distinction can be drawn between "anything of value" and "money," since the term "anything of value" includes money by the express provisions of Rev. St. § 6794. Watson v. State, 39 Ohio St. 123, 126.

ANYWISE.

See "In Anywise."

APART.

See "Separately Apart."

An acknowledgment executed by a married woman, which recited that her examination by the notary was "apart" from her husband, was not defective for not stating also that it was "separate," since "apart" is synonymous with "separate." Belo v. Mayes, 79 Mo. 67, 70.

In a certificate of acknowledgment, in the phrase "apart from her husband," as applied to a married woman, the word "apart" means the absence of the husband, and not necessarily the absence of all other persons. Hadley v. Geiger, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 225, 233; Dennis v. Tarpenny, 20 Barb. 371, 374.

APARTMENT.

As building, see "Building"; "Building (In Criminal Law)."

As dwelling house, see "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

As house, see "House."

The "apartments" within a house and the "house" are not the same. "House" may include the subjacent land, but "apartments" within it may not. It often occurs that each apartment of a house of several stories is leased to different persons. Each lessee has an interest in the land in so far as it supports the building, and ceases on destruction of the building by fire. A conveyance and lease of the apartments may be within the statute of frauds. McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 358, 94 Am. Dec. 654.

"Apartment," as used in Act 1784, c. 41, § 8, declaring that persons incarcerated for debt should be confined at night in an "apartment" of the prison, meant some portion of the prison or grounds to which such debtor had been assigned, and hence the yard of a prison to which a person had not been assigned was not an apartment within the statute. McLellan v. Dalton, 10 Mass. 190, 191.

APARTMENT HOUSE.

Tenement house distinguished, see "Tenement."

The term "apartment house" only came into use about 1880. It is a building used as a dwelling house for several families, each family living separate and apart from the others. The building is commodious and handsome in outward and inward appearance, and each suite of rooms is a dwelling house, with a separate hall and bath, and complete in itself, each separate family using the main hall for an entrance into the building. White v. Collins Bldg. & Const. Co., 81 N. Y. Supp. 434, 436, 82 App. Div. 1.

APERTURE.

An "aperture," in common parlance, is one thing, and an aperture with a tube in it is another, and therefore a contract for so much water as will pass through two metallic apertures does not authorize the taking of water through a certain kind of tube by which an additional quantity of water can be procured. Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Whart. 477, 491.

APEX.

The apex of a vein or lode is the highest part thereof, and it may be at the surface of the ground or at any point below the surface.

Larkin v. Upton, 12 Sup. Ct. 614, 144 U. S. 19, 36 L. Ed. 330.

The word "apex," as used in mining law, designates the highest point of a vein or lode. "The apex may or may not reach the surface of the ground. The United States mineral law gives to the miner the whole of every vein, the apex which lies within his surface exterior boundaries, or which lies within perpendicular planes drawn downward indefinitely on the planes of these boundaries. The miner may follow the 'dip,' using the word in either of its significations wherever it comes, providing he has the apex and the basis of operations, and that he does not cross the vertical planes of the end line." King v. Amy & Silversmith Con. Min. Co., 24 Pac. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

The "apex" of a vein is the highest point where it approaches nearest to the surface of the earth, and where it is broken on its edge so as to appear to be the beginning or end of the vein. If a vein at its highest point turns over and pursues its course downwards, then such point is merely a swell in the mineral matter, and not a true apex. Stevens v. Williams (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 40.

Top of vein distinguished.

"In the Report of the Public Lands Commission, the word 'top,' while including apex, may also include a succession of points—that is, a line—so that by the top of a vein would be meant a line connecting a succession of such highest points or apices, thus forming an edge. The word 'apex' is not exactly synonymous with 'top.' The word 'apex' ordinarily designates a point, and, so considered, the apex of a vein is the summit, the highest point of a vein in the ascent along the line of its dip and downward course, and beyond which the vein extends no further, so that it is the end, or, reversely, the beginning, of the vein." Duggan v. Davy, 26 N. W. 887, 901, 4 Dak. 110.

APIECE.

A testator, in bequeathing to "each of my immediate nephews and nieces $1,000 apiece," means by the word "apiece" the same as by the word "each," and that is simply that each nephew and niece shall have $1,000. Martin v. Trustees of Mercer University, 25 S. E. 522, 523, 98 Ga. 320.

APOTHECARY.

An apothecary is one who practices pharmacy; one who prepares drugs for medicinal purposes, and keeps them for sale. Webster. Commonwealth v. Fuller (Pa.) 2 Walk. 550, 551.

Practicing as an apothecary is the mixing up and preparing medicines, prescribed either by a physician, or by any other person, or by the apothecary himself. Woodward v. Ball, 6 Car. & P. 577.

In the strictest sense of the word, an "apothecary" is one who prepares and sells drugs for medicinal purposes, and, as he must necessarily be a trafficker in drugs, he would seem in a certain sense to be a merchant. Anderson v. Commonwealth, 72 Ky. (9 Bush) 569, 571.

In the most usual and familiar sense, an "apothecary" is understood to be one who vends drugs or medicines as a trade or business, and one who is engaged in selling and vending liquids compounded of roots and herbs under the "Thompsonian System" is an "apothecary," and must be licensed, under a statute requiring the licensing of apothecaries. Westmoreland v. Bragg (S. C.) 2 Hill, 414, 415.

As druggist or chemist.

In this country, the business of pharmacist, "apothecary," or druggist is all one, and the same person who prepares and compounds medicines also sells them, so that in popular speech all three are used interchangeably, as practically synonymous. State v. Donaldson, 42 N. W. 781, 41 Minn. 74.

The distinction between a "chemist" or a "druggist" and an "apothecary" is that the apothecary might not only prepare, dispense, and sell, but apply and administer, medicines, and if a druggist or chemist not only sold, but also applied and administered, medicines in the ordinary course of attending patients, he practiced as an apothecary within the meaning of 55 Geo. III, c. 194, § 20, imposing a penalty on one so practicing without certificate. Apothecaries' Co. v. Greenough, 1 Adol. & E. 799, 803.

As merchant.

See "Merchant."

APPARATUS.

See "Philosophical Apparatus."

The terms "machinery" and "apparatus" are more apt to designate a flume built along the banks of a river leading to a mining claim, than the term "mining claim"; therefore such a flume is not exempt under a statute exempting mining claims from taxation. Hart v. Plum, 14 Cal. 148, 154.

Of electric company.

"Apparatus," as used in a contract by an electric light company for new "apparatus," means the full set of necessary machinery as furnished, and not merely dynamos and lamps. The definition of the word "apparatus" given in Webster's Dictionary is a full collection or set of implements for a given duty, experimental or operative. This definition is implied in the derivation of the word. These implements or agencies may be numerous and various in character, but are all united in a common function. Morrison v. Baechtold, 48 Atl. 926, 928, 93 Md. 319.

In a mortgage of an electric light company of its buildings, machinery, tools, instruments, and "apparatus," "apparatus" is broad enough to include the lamps. Ramsdell v. Citizens' Electric Light & Power Co., 61 N. W. 275, 276, 103 Mich. 89.

For gaming.

See "Gambling or Gaming Apparatus."

Of school.

"Apparatus," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 3995, limiting the power of school boards in making purchases of school "apparatus" to a certain sum each year, is an equipment of things provided and adapted as a means to some end, and includes any complex instrument or appliance for a specific action or operation, such as a mechanism so constructed as when operated to represent the relative motions of the earth and the moon with respect to each other and the sun, and explain the various phenomena caused by such motions, and other related subjects. Board of Education v. Andrews, 37 N. E. 260, 51 Ohio St. 199.

Of trade or profession.

A typewriter is not exempt from execution as a "tool or apparatus" belonging to the profession of a physician, though he uses it in correspondence and advertising his business. Massie v. Atchley, 66 S. W. 582, 583, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 114.

A single man who is a land, loan, and insurance agent cannot claim a buggy and harness which he uses in his business as exempt from execution as "tools and apparatus" belonging to his trade or profession. Cates v. McClure (Tex.) 66 S. W. 224.

"Apparatus," as used in Rev. St. 1805, art. 2397, providing that tools, apparatus, and books belonging to any trade or profession of a debtor shall be exempt from execution, does not include a bicycle used by an architect and building superintendent, though useful and convenient in the prosecution of his business. As there used, the word "only" includes such tools as properly belong to, and are essential to, the conducting of the business. For instance, the printing press, type, cases, etc., are tools belonging to, and are exempt to, a printer; the awl, last, etc., to a shoemaker; the forge, anvil, tongs, hammers, etc., to the blacksmith. But the word does not include every convenience that might be beneficial to carrying on a particular business. Smith v. Horton, 46 S. W. 401, 402, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 28.

A statute exempting the tools and "apparatus" of trade from execution for debt includes the printing press, types, and cases used in publishing a newspaper. "The word 'apparatus' is a generic term of the most comprehensive signification. The 'tools and apparatus' belonging to the trade or profession of the editor or publisher of a weekly newspaper is the printing press, type, cases, etc., and not alone the scissors, bottle of ink, and goosequill pen of the editorial department. The apparatus belonging to the trade of a publisher must of necessity include the press, type, cases, etc., which are essential to the conducting of that business. The blacksmith could as well be deprived of his anvil and hammer, the shoemaker of his awl and last, the farmer of his plow and hoe, as the publisher of his press, type, and cases." Green v. Raymond, 58 Tex. 80, 44 Am. Rep. 601.

In a statute providing that the "apparatus" and tools of trade of a mechanic shall be exempt from execution, "apparatus" is not limited to expensive and complicated machinery propelled by steam power, but embraces minor machinery operated by hand. Willis v. Morris, 1 S. W. 799, 803, 66 Tex. 628, 59 Am. Rep. 634.

"Apparatus," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 2337, exempting from execution a tool or "apparatus" belonging to any trade or profession, includes an iron safe used by an insurance agent to store his policies, etc. Betz v. Maler, 33 S. W. 710, 712, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 219.

A steam engine, shingle machine, and saw gummer in use or lately used in business are articles exempt from execution as being "apparatus" to enable the person to carry on the business in which he is principally engaged. Wood v. Bresnahan, 30 N. W. 206, 208, 63 Mich. 614.

"Tools or apparatus," within the meaning of a statute exempting the tools and apparatus of a debtor from forced sale, includes a press and paper cutter owned by a job printer and necessary for his business. St. Louis Type Foundry v. Taylor (Tex.) 35 S. W. 691, 692.

APPAREL.

See "Ship's Tackle, Apparel, and Furniture"; "Wearing Apparel."

The definition of the word "apparel" as given by lexicographers is not confined to clothing; the idea of ornamentation seems to be the rather prominent element in the word, and it is not improper to say that a man wears a watch and wears a cane. In re Steele (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1202.

APPARENT.

See "Heir Apparent."

"Apparent" may mean that two things may be and clearly appear to be the same, as in the expression "heir apparent," which was formerly understood in a less absolute sense, and used to include an "heir presumptive"; or, as more popularly used, the term 'apparent violation' may mean things which appear to be the same, or which appear to be a violation of a rule or statute, whether they are so or not." Ramsden v. Gray, 7 Man. G. & S. 961, 968.

As actual.

"Apparent," as used in St. (Pasch. Dig. art. 2260), which provides that though a homicide may take place under circumstances showing no deliberation, yet if a person guilty thereof provoke a contention with the "apparent" intention of killing or doing serious bodily injury to deceased, the offense does not come within the definition of manslaughter, means "manifest," "beyond a doubt," "obvious." The more popular meaning of the word signifies that which seems to exist or is indicated by appearances, rather than that which is real or actual. Johnson v. State, 5 Tex. App. 423, 433.

"Apparent," as used in an instruction in a trial for murder that if a man provokes the difficulty with the "apparent intention" of taking the life of his adversary, and kills to save his life, such killing would be unlawful, should be construed to mean "actual." Cunningham v. State, 17 Tex. App. 89, 97.

As used in a charge in a prosecution for murder, limiting the right of self-defense if defendant provoked difficulty with the "apparent" intention of taking the life of the deceased, "apparent" means "evident," "obvious," "clear," and is as strong as "actual." McCandless v. State, 57 S. W. 672, 674, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 58.

As visible.

"Apparent" means capable of being seen, or easily seen, and, as used in an instruction that plaintiff could not recover any damages for broken condition of corn shelled by defendant that was "apparent" when he removed the corn, compelled plaintiff to examine every sack, as it meant "capable of being seen by any one who examined all the sacks," and therefore was erroneous. Chase v. Blodgett Milling Co., 87 N. W. 826, 828, 111 Wis. 655.

"Apparent" and "visible" are words of similar meaning. Thus, under a statute defining "disorderly persons" as those who have no visible means of support, it is not error to show that defendant had no "apparent" means of support. People v. Herrick, 26 N. W. 767, 59 Mich. 563.

APPARENT AUTHORITY.

"Apparent authority" is that authority which an agent appears to have by some act on the part of the principal. Webster v. Wray, 24 N. W. 207, 208, 17 Neb. 579.

"Apparent authority" of an agent is that authority which he appears to have by reason of the actual authority which he has, and which he exercises with the knowledge and ratification of the principal. Oberne v. Burke, 46 N. W. 838, 842, 30 Neb. 581.

"Apparent authority" is that authority of an agent which he appears to have by reason of the nature of his duties, or by reason of some act or conduct on the part of his principal; and so, where an agent was intrusted with the business of carrying on a lumber yard, with authority to sell and deliver lumber on cash, or give credit, as he should see proper, to collect and receive the money of his principal, to file and enforce mechanics' liens or not, as he deemed best, he was, so far as third persons were concerned, the general agent of his principal, who would be bound by any representation or statement made by him to a third party that no lien would be filed on certain property. White Lake Lumber Co. v. Stone, 27 N. W. 396, 397, 19 Neb. 402.

The apparent authority mentioned in the rule that an insurance company is bound by the acts of its agent within the scope of his apparent authority must be understood in a legal sense, and requires something on which to base the belief that the agent had authority to contract, such as the possession of blank policies signed by the officer of the company, or the declaration of the agent to the effect that he had such authority, coupled with the fact that such authority has been recognized by the company by issuing policies on such contracts or by permitting the agent to continue its business after it had known of such representation. Bell v. Peabody Ins. Co., 38 S. E. 541, 543, 49 W. Va. 437.

"Apparent authority" is that authority which an agent appears to have from that which he actually does have, and not from that which he may pretend to have, or from his actions on occasions which are unknown to and unratified by his principal. Where a mortgagee retains the mortgage, but sends the coupons for interest to an agent for collection, with no other directions except to collect the coupons, the agent has no "apparent authority" to foreclose the mortgage. Corey v. Hunter, 84 N. W. 570, 573, 10 N. D. 5.

"Apparent authority," as applied to the right of one railroad company to sell tickets over another, means existence of some relation of business between the companies from which one would reasonably be led to believe that the authority existed. Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Goodman (Tex.) 43 S. W. 580, 581.

APPARENT DANGER.

The term "apparent danger," as used with reference to the law of self-defense, means such overt actual demonstration by conduct and acts indicative of a design to take life or to do great personal injury as would make the killing apparently necessary to self-preservation. Stoneman v. Commonwealth (Va.) 25 Grat. 887, 896; Evans v. State, 44 Miss. 762, 773.

"Apparent danger," as used in reference to danger which would authorize a man to kill another as a matter of self-defense, is to be understood as meaning not apparent danger in fact, but apparent danger as to defendant's comprehension. State v. Carter, 45 Pac. 745, 746, 15 Wash. 121.

"Apparent danger," as used in an instruction that if the defendant, when not in actual or "apparent danger" of receiving death or great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased, shot and killed the deceased, the jury should find the defendant guilty as charged, means such circumstances of danger as would excite the fears of a reasonable person. Leigh v. People, 113 Ill. 372, 379.

APPARENT EASEMENT.

An "apparent easement" is an easement which depends upon some artificial structure, or the natural formation of the servient tenement, obvious and permanent, which constitutes the easement or is the means of enjoying it, as the bed of a running stream, an overhanging roof, a pipe for conveying water; and "nonapparent easements" are such as have no means specially constructed or appropriate to their enjoyment, and that are enjoyed at intervals, leaving between those intervals no visible sign of their existence, such as a right of way, or right of drawing the net upon the shore. Fetters v. Humphreys, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 360, 362.

"Apparent easement," as used in reference to a continuous and "apparent" easement which will pass with a conveyance of a dwelling alone by the owner of both yard and house, the owner retaining the yard, means that the parties should have either actual knowledge of the quasi easement, or knowledge of such facts as to put them upon inquiry. A water pipe leading from a driven well in a yard to a sink in the kitchen of a dwelling, there ending in a pump by which water can be and is habitually drawn from the well to the kitchen for domestic purposes, the well and the water pipe being completely hidden from view, form an "apparent easement." Larsen v. Peterson, 30 Atl. 1094, 1097, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 88.

APPARENT ERROR.

See "Error Apparent."

APPARENT GOOD ORDER.

A bill of lading reciting "shipped in apparent good order," of five cases of merchandise, means that the cases are in apparent good order with reference to the external condition of the same, and excludes any inference that the carrier admits anything as to the quality of the contents of the cases. The California (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1058, 1059.

A receipt by a railroad company for goods in "apparent good order" raises no presumption against the carrier as to the actual condition of the goods when received, and the burden rests upon the consignor to show by affirmative proof the nature and condition of the contents, and that they were in fact in good order when received by the carrier. Thyll v. New York & L. B. R. Co., 94 N. Y. Supp. 175, 177.

Where a receipt given by a carrier for goods states that they were received in "apparent good order," it does not estop the company from showing that as a matter of fact they were damaged when received. Blade v. Chicago, St. P. & F. D. L. R. Co., 10 Wis. 4, 5.

The use of the word "apparent" in a bill of lading stating that the goods were received by the carrier in "apparent good order" does not change the effect of the use of the words "good order" as an admission, and therefore the burden of showing that the goods were secretly defective or insufficient is on the carrier. The Oriflamme (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 810.

APPARENT MATURITY.

The apparent maturity of a negotiable instrument, payable at a particular time, is the day on which by its terms it becomes due, or, when that is a holiday, the next business day. Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2204.

APPARENT OWNERSHIP.

"Apparent ownership" of a cause of action, as signed, is prima facie ownership. State v. Hastings, 15 Wis. 75, 84.

APPARENT SERVITUDE.

"Apparent servitudes" are such as are to be perceivable by exterior works, such as a door, a window, an aqueduct. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 728.

APPEAL.

See "Devolutive Appeal"; "Probate Appeal"; "Right of Appeal"; "Special Appeal."

"The word 'appeal' is used to designate the act of lodging the action in the appellate court." Williamson v. Judges of Court of Common Pleas of Middlesex. County, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 386, 391.

"Appeal" is the name given a proceeding for the revision of questions of law arising in a trial. White v. Howd, 33 Atl. 915, 916, 66 Conn. 264.

An "appeal" is defined by Code Prac. § 564, to be the act by which one of the parties to a suit has recourse to a superior tribunal in order to have the judgment of the inferior court corrected. Rausch v. Barrere (La.) 33 South. 602, 603, 109 La. 563.

The idea of an appeal is to secure a rehearing of the whole case, and, where no judgment has been rendered, there is nothing properly presented for review. City of Jeffersonville v. Tomlin, 35 N. E. 29, 7 Ind. App. 681.

An "appeal" is the act of the party which authorizes the appellate court to take cognizance of the cause, and, unless the record bears testimony that it was taken, the appellate court has no evidence of authority to entertain jurisdiction. Lockhart's Ex'x v. Lockhart, 1 Tex. 199, 200.

An "appeal" simply means a second hearing, so that, if the original hearing is not due process of law, the granting of an appeal cannot make it so. Montana Co. v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co., 14 Sup. Ct. 506, 509, 152 U. S. 160, 38 L. Ed. 398.

An "appeal" is but one step in a suit towards the final adjudication which the law has provided for. In re Luscombe's Will, 85 N. W. 341, 344, 109 Wis. 186 (citing Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Park Hotel Co., 37 Wis. 125, 131).

An appeal is a method of revising a definitive judgment, and is to be taken after such judgment is rendered. An order of appeal which is absolutely necessary is the first step in the process by which the cause is brought within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Gagneaux v. Desonier, 29 South. 282, 284, 104 La. 648 (citing Dupre v. Mouton, 23 La. Ann. 543).

"Appeal," in the sense of transfer of jurisdiction from one court to another, cannot be predicated of any process by which a court is called upon to determine the legality of an action by officers of another department. In this sense there can be no appeal from a common council to a court, any more than there can be an appeal from the Legislature to the court, or from the court to the Legislature. In appeals from the court of probate to the superior court, we sometimes speak of the superior court as being for that case the court of probate, and speak correctly, for probate jurisdiction is within the judicial power, and may be exercised by the superior court; but when we speak in the same way, in commenting on the discretionary power that may be exercised in one of these amorphous "appeals" from administrative boards, the expression is allowable only as a figure of rhetoric. Appeal of Norwalk St. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 1080, 1088, 69 Conn. 576, 39 L. R. A. 794.

Within a statute providing that every insolvent corporation of which a receiver has been appointed, or any person aggrieved by the proceedings or determination of such receiver in the discharge of his duty, may appeal to the court of chancery, which court shall in a summary way hear and determine the matter complained of, and make such order touching the same as shall be equitable and just, the word "appeal" is used in a broad, general sense. The appeal referred to is not technical, and requires no particular form. Taylor v. Gray, 44 Atl. 668, 672, 59 N. J. Eq. 621.

Act May 9, 1899, providing that all appellate proceedings in the Supreme Court heretofore taken by writ of error, appeal, or certiorari shall hereafter be taken in a proceeding to be called an "appeal," does not affect the procedure so far as the consideration of the evidence or the opinion in the lower court are concerned, since the distinction between the three modes of reviewing decisions is not done away with, though the same name is applied to all. Appeal of Long, 134 Pa. 641, 646, 19 Atl. 806.

The right of appeal is not a natural or inherent one. It does not exist at common law, and in this state it is conferred wholly by statute, and when once conferred it may be withdrawn by the Legislature, unless, in so doing, some provision of the organic law of the state is violated. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. City of Terre Haute (Ind.) 67 N. E. 686, 690 (citing Lake Erie R. Co. v. Watkins, 157 Ind. 600, 62 N. E. 443, and cases cited; National Exch. Bank v. Peters, 144 U. S. 570, 12 Sup. Ct. 767, 36 L. Ed. 545).

As an action, suit, or proceeding.

See "Action"; "Criminal Action"; "Proceedings"; "Suit."

An appeal is not a new action, although in some earlier cases the old views seem to have continued in the language of the opinions. Boon v. City of Utica, 25 N. Y. Supp. 846, 848, 4 Misc. Rep. 583 (citing Shuler v. Maxwell [N. Y.] 38 Hun, 242).

As action of court above.

"Appeal," as used in an affidavit for appeal stating that the appellant believes that he has a just and legal defense to make upon the merits of the "appeal," means "the action in the court above." Snover v. Tinsman, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 210, 211.

Application in same court.

An application to the same court in which a decree is made, to reverse its decision, is sometimes termed an "appeal." Longworth v. Sturges, 4 Ohio St. 690, 708.

As application for relief.

"Appeal," as used in Act 1855, p. 43, § 26, allowing an "appeal" from the assessment of the tax collectors to the selectmen, means an application for relief to be obtained by a reconsideration or review of the previous action, and should not be construed in its technical sense of a removal of a case from an inferior to a superior court for review. Leach v. Blakely, 34 Vt. 134, 135.

In this state "appeal" has been used by court and Legislature with two meanings only—one as applicable to the superior and inferior courts, when it means the transfer of the case to another jurisdiction for trial; and one as applicable to the Supreme Court of Errors, where it means an application to this court to reverse or set aside a judgment of the trial court for errors in law. In the latter sense it was never used until the act of 1882 authorized all errors previously corrected by the means of a writ of error, a motion in error, or a motion for new trial to be included in one application, and called that application an "appeal." The term in the act of 1882, which provides that upon the trial of any civil action to the court without a jury, in which an appeal to the Supreme Court of Errors may now be taken, each party may, etc., is used in the latter sense. Styles v. Tyler, 30 Atl. 165, 174, 64 Conn. 432.

Certiorari distinguished.

The distinction between an "appeal" and a "certiorari" is marked. The former brings the case up on its merits. The latter brings up the record only, and upon such a writ the court can look merely at the regularity of the proceedings. In re Thirty-Fourth St., Philadelphia, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 27, 29.

As election to change forum.

"Appeal," as used in a justice's record which recited that the defendant offered in evidence title to the real estate in controversy and that the plaintiff "appealed" to the court of common appeals, means that the plaintiff elected to change the forum, and not that he took an appeal in its technical sense. Lawrence v. Souther, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 166, 168.

As invoke aid of.

"Appeal," as used in Mansf. Dig. § 5637, creating a board for the equalization of taxable values in each county, and providing that any party aggrieved by the action of the board may "appeal" therefrom to the county court, should not be construed in its technical sense of a removal of the case from an inferior to a superior court for review, but in its popular signification of "Invoke the aid of." Prairie County v. Matthews, 46 Ark. 383, 386.

As original application.

The word "appeal," as used in Pub. Acts 1893, c. 175, providing for an "appeal" from the acts of county commissioners in granting or refusing licenses, has been construed as providing for an original application to a superior court to exercise its appropriate judicial power in respect to acts of the county commissioners in excess of their power or in the unlawful abuse of that power. Such appeal is a process by which the superior court is enabled to determine the legality of certain specified actions of the county commissioners. Appeal of Moynihan, 53 Atl. 903, 904, 75 Conn. 358.

As perfected appeal.

"Appeal," as used in Cr. Code, § 281, providing that upon "the appeal" any decision of the court or intermediate order made in the progress of the case may be reviewed, means upon the complete and perfected appeal, and hence there can be no review until notice of the appeal has been given and a transcript of the case filed in the Supreme Court. In re Chambers, 2 Pac. 646, 649, 30 Kan. 450.

As removal of cause.

An appeal is the removal of a cause from a court of inferior to one of superior jurisdiction, for the purpose of obtaining a review and new trial. Dold v. Robertson, 9 Pac. 302, 304, 3 N. M. 520; Burris v. Peacock (Ohio) 3 West. L. M. 264, 265; Greenwoods County v. Town of New Hartford, 32 Atl. 933, 934, 65 Conn. 461; State v. Case, 37 Pac. 95, 97, 14 Mont. 520; Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 531, 546; People v. Justices New York Marine Court (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. 126, 127; State ex rel. Williams v. Anthony, 65 Mo. App. 543-552.

Appeal is the mode of transmission of a cause to the Supreme Court by notice given in open court, or by application to the clerk at any time within 12 months and citation to the adverse party. Cheek v. Rogers, 1 Tex. 440, 442.

Appeal is a process of civil-law origin, and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the facts and law to review and retrial. Lyles v. Barnes, 40 Miss. 608, 609.

The words "appeal" or "writ of error," in section 5 of Act March 3, 1891, c. 517, 26 Stat. 827 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 549], which provides that appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district court, or from the existing circuit court, to the Supreme Court in any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue must be understood to be within the meaning of those terms as used in a prior act of Congress relating to the appellate power of the Supreme Court, and in the long-standing rules of practice and proceedings of the federal courts. Taken in that sense, these terms mean the proceedings by which a cause in which there has been a final judgment is removed from a court below to an appellate court for review, reversal, or affirmance. McLish v. Roff, 12 Sup. Ct. 118, 141 U. S. 661, 35 L. Ed. 893; MacLeod v. Graven (U. S.) 79 Fed. 84, 85, 24 C. C. A. 449.

"Appeal," as used in Civ. Code, § 525, giving the district court jurisdiction to hear appeals from final orders of the probate court, is a general term denoting not only what are technically denominated "appeals" as contradistinguished from a certiorari, writ of error, or petition in error, but any proceeding by which a case is said to be removed from probate courts to superior tribunals for the purpose of re-examination. Crane v. Giles, 3 Kan. 54, 55.

As part of trial.

The fundamental idea of the word "appeal" necessarily involves the idea of a review of the proceedings had in a trial which has already been had, and not a new trial of the case. An appeal is no part of the trial, so that a clause in the Constitution saving a defendant convicted in a trial before a trial justice the right to appeal does not give him the right to a trial by jury. State v. Williams, 19 S. E. 5, 7, 40 S. E. 373.

Petition in error distinguished.

An appeal is the same action as in the trial court, while a petition in error is a new action in the appellate court brought to reverse the judgment below. Foster v. Borne, 58 N. E. 66, 63 Ohio St. 169.

In Nebraska, under the form of procedure established by the Code in that state, it is held that a petition in error starts a new action, nothing being involved in it except the errors assigned. In this respect it differs from an appeal, which is a further proceeding in the same action, and brings up all the parties necessary to the determination of appellant's rights in the matter. Clark v. Lancaster County (Neb.) 96 N. W. 593, 598.

An "appeal," in the technical sense of the term, is a remedy which exists only by force of statute, and within the limits defined by statute. The word is sometimes used in a broader sense as applying to all methods of review by supreme tribunals, but a technical appeal will not be allowed, under a statute authorizing a review by a district court on petition in error of judgments rendered by any tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions, of a decision of a county superintendent changing the boundaries of school districts or creating new districts. Pollock v. School Dist. No. 42, 74 N. W. 393, 54 Neb. 171.

Petition in error included.

"Appeal," as used in Laws 1872, § 7, of the act relating to contests of county seat elections and other elections, providing that all appeals shall be taken within 60 days, includes appeals by petition in error, as the act declares that no appeal can be taken except by such petition. State v. Smith, 1 Pac. 251, 252, 31 Kan. 129.

The word "appeal" is used in many different senses, owing to the diversity of statutes relating to appellate procedure. In one sense it denotes all kinds of proceedings for the review of cases—all proceedings commonly known as "appellate." In its special and technical sense it designates the particular form of review, dependent upon statute for its existence, whereby a case is transferred after decision to a higher court for a re-examination of the whole proceedings, and final judgment or decree in accordance with the result of such re-examination. State v. Doane, 35 Neb. 707, 53 N. W. 611; Western Cornice & Mfg. Works v. Leavenworth, 52 Neb. 418, 72 N. W. 592. It is used in its former sense in a statute relating to condemnation proceedings by railroad companies, which provides that either party may appeal from the decision of the district court to the Supreme Court as to question of damages, and such appeal is by petition in error, and not by a technical appeal. Nebraska Loan & Trust Co. v. Lincoln & B. H. R. Co., 73 N. W. 546, 547, 53 Neb. 246.

Prior decision implied.

An "appeal" is the removal of a cause or matter from an inferior jurisdiction after its decision to a superior jurisdiction for retrial on its merits, and a proceeding in a superior jurisdiction cannot with any propriety be called an "appeal," where the cause or matter involved was not before any inferior tribunal or body. Thus, where a statute gave a probate court power to decide the location of telegraph and telephone lines in cities in case of inability of the council and company to agree as to such location, it is not in any sense an appeal, the council not being given any power to direct in what mode the lines of the telephone company should be constructed in the streets of the municipality, its sole province being to come to an agreement with the company in regard to the mode of using the streets by the company. City of Zanesville v. Zanesville Telegraph & Telephone Co., 59 N. E. 781, 785, 64 Ohio St. 67.

Trial de novo authorized.

An appeal is a civil-law process, and removes a cause entirely subjecting the law and fact to a review and retrial. United States v. Goodwin, 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 108, 110, 3 L. Ed. 284; Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 594, 174 U. S. 1, 43 L. Ed. 873; In re Kirby (U. S.) 84 Fed. 606, 608; United States v. Coe, 15 Sup. Ct. 16, 18, 155 U. S. 76, 39 L. Ed. 76; Dower v. Richards, 14 Sup. Ct. 452, 454, 151 U. S. 658, 38 L. Ed. 305; Wiscart v. Dauchy, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 321, 327, 1 L. Ed. 619; Dutcher v. Culver, 23

Code 1873, § 831, providing that appeals may be taken from boards of equalization to the circuit court, and that the question of liability to assessment shall be justly and equitably determined, means that the whole matter shall be examined and tried de novo. "Wherever an appeal is authorized by a statute, unless otherwise restricted, the proceeding in all cases is anew, and in order to determine the very merits of the matters in dispute." Grimes v. City of Burlington, 37 N. W. 106, 107, 74 Iowa, 123.

The legal signification of an "appeal," unless the context otherwise manifests, means an appellate process which opens the former judgment and verdict, and sends the case to a higher court for trial de novo upon the same facts, or new facts, regardless of the former trial, and such is its meaning in Const. art. 8, § 28, providing that appeals shall be allowed from the judgment of justices of the peace in such manner as may be prescribed by law. Richmond v. Henderson, 37 S. E. 653, 660, 48 W. Va. 339.

The prima facie and more proper meaning of an appeal is a process continuing the same suit in order to obtain a rehearing in the appellate court, wherein new evidence may be allowed and a new trial as if never tried, as in appeals from justices; and hence its use in a statute authorizing appeals from the assessments by a county court to the circuit court indicates that the matter is of the same nature as in the county court, and hence not a judicial proceeding. Mackin v. Taylor County Court, 18 S. E. 632, 635, 38 W. Va. 338.

In the second section of the act providing for "appeals" from justices' courts, special provision is made for a trial de novo; and in section 19, making provision for revision of the judgment of county courts in criminal cases, an appeal is provided to the circuit court without bill of exceptions, writ of error, or supersedeas. Held that, on an appeal from the county court to the circuit court in civil cases, the trial in the circuit court is not de novo, the word "appeal" not having been used in its technical sense. Lyles v. Barnes, 40 Miss. 608, 609.

"Appeals," in reference to actions at law, though expressed by a term originally derived from the civil law, are purely creatures of statutory law, and consequently our various statutes must be construed together to determine correctly the import of the term in any given statute. It does not import an unqualified trial de novo when used in the statute providing for the removal of cases from the probate to the circuit court. It does, however, by the affirmative provisions of the statute, import such trial when used in the statutes providing for the removal of cases from the courts of justices of the peace to the circuit courts. It has, then, no uniform import as to the mode of trial, whatever may have been its technical import in the civil law, from whence it is derived. Carnall v. Crawford County, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 604, 622.

Writ of error distinguished.

A writ of error is a proceeding known alone to the courts of common law, while an appeal is known alone to courts of chancery and admiralty. Stevens v. Baker, 1 Wash. T. 315, 320; Loveless v. Ransom (U. S.) 109 Fed. 391, 392, 48 C. C. A. 434.

By a writ of error only questions of law are brought up for review, as in actions of common law, while by an appeal, except when specially provided otherwise, the entire case, on both law and facts, is brought up for review. Cunningham v. Neagle, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 661, 135 U. S. 1, 34 L. Ed. 55.

An appeal in an action at law under our system partakes somewhat of the nature of a writ of error, which in most cases was a matter of right at common law; but with us it depends wholly upon statutes granting that right, and not upon any principle of common law. City of Portland v. Gaston, 63 Pac. 1051, 38 Or. 533.

The word "appeal," as used in Const. art. 8, § 28, providing that appeals shall be allowed from the judgment of justices in such manner as may be prescribed by law, is not used in the sense of "writ of error" or "certiorari," but meant such an appeal as would permit a new trial in the appellate court. Michaelson v. Cauley, 32 S. E. 170, 171, 45 W. Va. 533.

"Appeal," as used in a statute providing that from final decrees in a United States District Court in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the amount in dispute exceeds the sum of $300, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next Circuit Court to be held in such district, means a process of civil-law origin, and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the fact as well as the law to a review and retrial; while a writ of error is a process of common law, and removes nothing for re-examination but the law. Wiscart v. Dauchy, 3 U. S. (3 Dall.) 321, 324, 1 L. Ed. 619.

One of the distinctive differences between hearing of a case on appeal and on writ of error is that under the former the appellate tribunal may review the whole case, and all the questions both of fact and of law presented therein, while in the latter it is confined to a review of such errors of law as may be pointed out in the record; and such was the use of the word "appeal" in Const. 1868, but under Const. 1895, art. 5, § 4, providing that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and on such appeals shall review the findings of fact as well as the law, except in chancery cases, where the facts are settled by a jury and the verdict is not set aside, the court is not required to review the trial judge's findings of fact on conflicting evidence. Land Mortgage Investment & Agency Co. v. Faulkner (S. C.) 24 S. E. 288, 290.

The term "appeal" is in several states used in very different senses, and has to a great extent in statutes and decisions lost its distinctive meaning, having become a generic term for all forms of rehearing, or else nearly or quite synonymous with "error" or "new trial." An appeal is a process of civil-law origin, and removes a cause entirely, subjecting the forms as well as the law to a review and retrial. It is in fact granting a new trial upon the same issue in a higher court. In Nebraska there is a clear distinction between proceedings by petition in error and appeal. In an appeal the hearing in the appellate court may be said to be a trial de novo, a retrial of the same issue on the same record, subject, however, to the rule in regard to questions of fact that the Supreme Court, though trying the case on appeal, will not disturb the finding of the district court based on conflicting evidence, unless such finding is clearly wrong. Western Cornice & Mfg. Works v. Leavenworth, 72 N. W. 592, 594, 52 Neb. 418.

The word "appeal" is sometimes used broadly, and denotes the general nature of appellate jurisdiction, and in that sense may include a writ of error, and so a writ of error may, in a broad sense, include an appeal. But the one word has its origin in the civil law, and the other in the common law. The distinction between them has generally been maintained in practice, and is generally recognized by statute, hence Laws 1895, c. 215, providing that no appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court when the amount involved, excluding costs, is less than $100, does not apply to writs of error. Bumbalek v. Peehl, 70 N. W. 71, 95 Wis. 127.

"The word 'appeal' comes from the civil law, and the nature and operation of an appeal, in its technical sense, cannot be the subject of doubt in the proceedings of courts governed by that law. It is sometimes, indeed, used in legal language to denote the nature of appellate jurisdiction as distinguished from original jurisdiction, without any regard to the particular mode by which a cause is transmitted to a superior jurisdiction. In this sense it is used by Blackstone (3 Bl. Comm. 56), where he speaks of the court of exchequer chamber as a court that hath no jurisdiction, but is only a court of appeal to correct the errors of other jurisdictions. Now it is well known that this court determines causes brought from the courts of common law, not by way of appeal, but by writs of error. So also the House of Peers is considered by the same elegant writer as a supreme court of appeal of the empire. Appeal (appellatio in the civil law) is defined 'ab inferioris judicis sententia ad superiorem prorocare'—the removal of a cause from the sentence of an inferior to a supreme judge (Calvin. Lex. "Appellatio"; Shep. Abr. "Appeal"; or, as Blackstone has expressed it (4 Bl. Comm. 312), a complaint to a superior court of an injustice done by an inferior one. Calvinus in his Lexicon has collected the definitions given by many learned civilians, but they all resolve themselves into the above. Each of these definitions accurately states the meaning, but not the mode of prosecution or effect, of an appeal. The remedy by appeal, as known and practiced in England, is in a great measure confined (for I speak not of summary proceedings before magistrates, or appeals of death or robbery) to causes of equity, ecclesiastical, and admiralty jurisdiction, in all of which no jury intervenes. In the courts possessing these respective jurisdictions, the judge is in general the sole arbiter of fact and of law, and the mode of proceeding is borrowed almost exclusively from the civil law. It is undoubtedly true that, in courts proceeding according to the course of the civil law, an appeal from an inferior to a superior tribunal removes the whole proceedings, and usually, though not invariably, opens the facts as well as the law to the re-examination. In courts of equity in England it is otherwise, for Blackstone (3 Bl. Comm. 455), speaking on this subject, says 'it is a practice unknown to our law, though constantly followed by the spiritual courts, when a superior, in reviewing the sentence of an inferior, to examine the justice of the former decree by evidence that was never produced below.' And in the appellate courts in England, in proceedings according to the course of the common law, writs of error are the modes by which these courts exercise their jurisdiction, and, the facts once settled by a jury, are, while the judgment remains in force, forever conclusive upon the parties." United States v. Wonson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 745, 747, 748.

Writ of error included.

"Appeal," as used in Comp. Laws N. M. § 2206, providing that in case of appeal in civil suits, if the judgment of the appellate court be against the appellant, it shall be rendered against him and his securities in the appeal bond, applies to causes in the Supreme Court on writ of error. Dold v. Robertson, 9 Pac. 302, 304, 3 N. M. (Gild.) 520.

Act Jan., 1827, § 32, providing that appeals from the circuit courts to the Supreme Court shall be allowed in all cases where the judgment or decree appealed from be final and shall amount, exclusive of costs, to the sum of $20, should be construed to mean all cases brought into the Supreme Court where the judgment was less than $20, without regard to the name of the process by which it was brought in the Supreme Court. The term "appeal" implies removal of a cause for a rehearing upon the facts as well as the law, and a proceeding in error is in truth an appeal from the decision of an inferior to a superior tribunal. The object of the Legislature was to prevent the supervision of all cases in the Supreme Court where judgment was less than the sum of $20, and includes the bringing up of a case by a writ of error. Clark v. Ross, 1 Ill. (Breese) 334.

The word "appeal" within the meaning of chapter 4700, § 23, of the Laws approved June, 1899, authorizing appeals from judgments, orders, and decrees of inferior courts in all suits and cases brought under the provisions of the act, is used in its popular, broadest, and most comprehensive sense, and signifies any and all appropriate appellate proceedings provided by law for reviewing judgments of law, orders and decrees in equity, and other reviewable orders, judgments, or decrees, whether by writ of error or by the appeal proper, in its strictest technical sense. The purpose was not to add to, modify, or change any of the recognized and differentiated modes of procedure by which cases at law and in equity are, respectively, transferred for review from inferior to superior courts, except in the one particular of the return day of such appellate proceedings, whether by writ of error or by technical appeal, when applied to cases falling within the provision of the acts. State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 27 South. 221, 223, 41 Fla. 363.

"Appeal" signifies merely the removal of a case from an inferior to a superior jurisdiction, and any question of fact or law, or both, may be the subject of appeal, or the whole facts or the whole case. It is indeed now the substitute for a writ of error. It is the method by which all the mistakes in the judgment of inferior jurisdiction are rectified, except when otherwise specially provided. People v. Justices of Marine Court (N. Y.) 11 How. Prac. 400, 401.

APPEAL BOND.

"Appeal bond," as used in 2 Rev. St. 1876, p. 623, providing that in all cases where an appeal shall be taken from a justice of the peace to the circuit court, and the "appeal bond" filed in such case, etc., includes a recognizance given for the purpose of effecting an appeal from a justice of the peace in a criminal case. State v. Richards, 77 Ind. 101, 102.

"An appeal bond" is the bond given on taking an appeal, by which the appellant binds himself to pay damages and costs if he fails to prosecute the appeal with effect. By the common law a writ of error, without any security, was of itself a supersedeas of statutes providing for the removal of cases from the courts of justices of the peace to the circuit courts. It has, then, no uniform import as to the mode of trial, whatever may have been its technical import in the civil law, from whence it is derived. Carnall v. Crawford County, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 604, 622.

Writ of error distinguished.

A writ of error is a proceeding known alone to the courts of common law, while an appeal is known alone to courts of chancery and admiralty. Stevens v. Baker, 1 Wash. T. 315, 320; Loveless v. Ransom (U. S.) 10 Fed. 391, 392, 48 C. C. A. 434.

By a writ of error only questions of law are brought up for review, as in actions of common law, while by an appeal, except when specially provided otherwise, the entire case, on both law and facts, is brought up for review. Cunningham v. Neagle, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 661, 135 U. S. 1, 34 L. Ed. 55.

An appeal in an action at law under our system partakes somewhat of the nature of a writ of error, which in most cases was a matter of right at common law; but with it it depends wholly upon statutes granting the right, and not upon any principle of common law. City of Portland v. Gaston, 63 Pac. 1051, 38 Or. 533.

The word "appeal," as used in Const. art. 8, § 28, providing that appeals shall be allowed from the judgment of justices in such manner as may be prescribed by law, is not used in the sense of "writ of error" or "certiorari," but meant such an appeal as would permit a new trial in the appellate court. Michaelson v. Cautley, 32 S. E. 170, 171, 10 W. Va. 533.

"Appeal," as used in a statute providing that from final decrees in a United States District Court in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the amount in dispute exceeds the sum of $300, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the next Circuit Court to be held in such district, means a process of civil-law origin which removes a cause entirely, subjecting it to review as well as the law to a review and a new trial, while a writ of error is a process of common law, and removes nothing for re-examination but the law. Wiscart v. D'Almeida, 10 Dall. 321, 324, 1 L. Ed. 607.

One of the distinctions between a writ of error and an appeal is that in the latter case, an entire new trial of law and fact is permitted, it is a process of civil-law origin, while a writ of error is a process of common-law origin, and removes nothing for re-examination but the law. Wiscart v. D'Almeida, 10 Dall. 321, 324, 1 L. Ed. 607.

ly served, a justice of the peace one hour after the time specified for the "appearance" of the case they sooner appear, does not constitute an appearance in the action to the docket of the justice, but the "appearance" of the parties before. Brandies v. Robinson, 45 used to designate reference to an account come into the court. The actual presence required to constitute an appearance by his attorney, where a party made within the hour to have court held open for a certain appearance," and gives the to act. Wagner v. Kel- 92 Mich. 616.

Recognizance.

"appearance," in Civ. Code providing that in order to entitle creditor to maintain proceedings the judgment must be based upon the judgment debtor or by a personal service of upon him, means voluntary to the jurisdiction, in whatever stated, and, after entry of judgment, forfeited recognizance, such provision may be instituted though defendant served with summons, the signing of being equivalent to a voluntary appearance. People v. Cowan, 41 N. E. 348.

Unauthorized appearance.

"Appearance," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 108, wherein a "voluntary appearance" is made equivalent to personal service of the summons on a defendant, means the appearance of such defendant in person, or by an attorney authorized so to do, and hence, where an attorney without any authority appeared for a defendant, who was not served with summons and who had no knowledge or notice of the action, the court had no jurisdiction. Williams v. Neth, 31 N. W. 630, 632, 4 Dak. 360.

APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY.

"Appearance by attorney" and "appearance by counsel" in a cause are distinctly different, the former being the substitution of a legal agent for the personal attendance of the suitor, the latter the attendance of an advocate without whose aid neither the party attending nor his attorney in his stead could safely proceed; and an appearance by attorney does not supersede the appearance by counsel. Mercer v. Watson (Pa.) 1 Watts, 330, 351.

APPEARANCE DAY.

The words "default day" in a statute requiring application for a jury trial to be made on default day, and the words "appearance day" as used in another provision fixing the second day of the term as appearance day, are synonymous. Cruger v. McCracken (Tex.) 26 S. W. 282, 283.

When a scire facias against special bail is returnable at rules on the first Monday of the month, the return day is the appearance day, as an appearance may then be entered at rules. Branch v. Webb (Va.) 7 Leigh, 371, 379.

APPEARANCE OF DANGER.

"Appearance of danger" sufficient to justify homicide in self-defense is an appearance to the mind of the party committing the homicide, and not to the mind of the jury after hearing all the evidence and ascertaining the real facts, many of which might or could not be known to the slayer at the time of the killing. Each juror must place himself in the position of the defendant at the time of the homicide, and determine from all the facts, as they appeared to the defendant at the time of the killing, whether his apprehension or fear of death or serious bodily harm was reasonable. Watkins v. United States, 41 S. W. 1044, 1046, 1 Ind. T. 364.

APPEARANCE TERM.

"Appearance term," as used in Code, § 2742, providing that to entitle a party to a execution from the time of its allowance or recognition by the court to which it was directed. A presentation of the writ issuing from the superior court stopped all further proceedings, except such as were incidental to a compliance with its command to certify the record, but as writs of error came to be sued out for the purpose of delay, various acts of Parliament were passed requiring certain security in order that the writ might operate as a supersedeas. Several statutes were passed relating to the subject of security for costs, which in effect required that bond be given conditioned to pay the amount of the original judgment and the costs and damages occasioned by the delay of execution in case the judgment should be affirmed, and in case of dower and ejectment a bond was required to secure such costs, damages, and money as should be awarded after the affirmance of the judgment for mesne profits and waste pending the affirmance. Omaha Hotel Co. v. Kountze, 2 Sup. Ct. 911, 914, 107 U. S. 378, 27 L. Ed. 609.

APPEAL TAKEN.

See "Taken."

APPEALABLE INTEREST.

An appealable interest exists when the judgment or decree so affects a party or privy to the record that he would derive a substantial benefit from its modification or reversal. Consequently, on a motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground that the appellants are without an appealable interest, the question is not whether on the merits they are entitled to a reversal from the order appealed from, but it is whether the record shows that they are in the attitude of parties claiming a substantial right defeated by the order. A bidder at a judicial sale whose bid has been accepted may appeal from an order setting the sale aside. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Creighton Theatre Bldg. Co., 71 N. W. 279, 280, 51 Neb. 659.

APPEAR.

"Appear," as used in Civ. Code, § 672, providing that if a nonresident alien takes by succession he must appear and claim the property within five years from the time of succession, does not mean that the alien must appear in person, but the appearance may be made by an attorney or by an assignee. Carrasco v. State, 7 Pac. 766, 767, 67 Cal. 385; State v. Smith, 12 Pac. 121, 123, 70 Cal. 153.

As appear in person.

The only sense in which the word "appear" is used by all classes of people in general is to appear in person, to exhibit one's self so as to be visible, and every dictionary shows that this is also its grammatical sense, and such has been held to be its legal sense. Beawfage's Case, 10 Co. 100, 101. And it is so used in a will providing for the payment of a certain sum to testator's brother, provided he should "appear within six years from my decease with sufficient proof," etc. Campbell v. McDonald (Pa.) 10 Watts, 179, 182.

As be made manifest.

"Appear," as used in Const. 1890, art. 15, § 273, providing that "if it shall appear" that a majority of the electors voting at a certain election shall have voted for a proposed constitutional amendment it shall become a part of the constitution, means "if it should be made manifest or evident," "if it should be the fact," etc., and whether or not it has so appeared or is a fact is a judicial question determinable by the courts. State v. Powell (Miss.) 27 South. 927, 929, 48 L. R. A. 652.

A statute providing that service of a summons may be published when it "appears by affidavit" that the defendant cannot be found within the state, means that such legal evidence going to establish the fact of defendant's nonresidence must be given as would be received in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, and not conclusions, opinions, or hearsay. The affidavit must contain a statement of the facts and circumstances on which the applicant bases his belief, and must be so full that the officer to whom it is presented may find from the evidence contained in it that the facts existed. Mackubin v. Smith, 5 Minn. 367, 370, (Gil. 296).

"Appear," as used in Rev. St. c. 62, § 21, giving a distributive share to a child or grandchild where the testator has omitted to provide for such child or grandchild in his will, unless it shall "appear" that such omission was intentional, is broad enough to embrace any species of evidence properly tending to establish the fact that such was the intention, and parol evidence is admissible to show such intention. Wilson v. Fosket, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 400, 404, 39 Am. Dec. 736.

As clear to the comprehension.

"The word 'appear' or 'appearing' is one frequently used in judicial proceedings as meaning 'clear to the comprehension' when applied to matters of opinion or reasoning, and 'satisfactorily or legally known, or made known,' when used in reference to facts of evidence." Gorham v. Luckett, 45 Ky. (6 B. Mon.) 146, 165.

As come into court.

"Appear," as used in a recognizance, and in which the accused undertakes to "appear," means that he will attend until the proceedings are legally terminated, and is not used in its limited sense, so that it is satisfied by a single appearance for the professed purpose of trial, although a trial might in the end be evaded. State Treasurer v. Woodward, 7 Vt. 529, 532.

"Appear," when used to designate the act of any person with reference to any action pending, means to come into court as a party to the suit, and hence a defendant who employed an attorney to defend the action, who appeared on the record as attorney for the defendant, was a witness on the trial, but no notice was given that she defended or appeared as a party or acted as such, and neither the court nor the plaintiff knew that she had any connection with the defense except as a witness, she did not "appear" in the action. Schroeder v. Lahrman, 26 Minn. 87, 88, 1 N. W. 801, 802.

"Appear," as used in a bond conditioned that the defendant in an action shall "appear" before the district court on the first day of the next term to answer the complaint in said cause alleged against him, implies that the defendant is to appear for the purposes of a trial of the charges made against him, and hence it is not enough for the defendant to be in court for the first day and then slip off without leave, in order to comply with the conditions of the bond. Glasgow v. State, 21 Pac. 253, 41 Kan. 333.

"Appearance," is defined as a coming into court as a party to a suit, whether as plaintiff or defendant; the formal proceeding by which the defendant submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court. So that the use of the word "appear" in a statute providing that boards of directors of irrigation districts may sue, appear, and defend in person or by attorneys, and in the name of such districts, implies that such irrigation districts may be sued as well as sue. Boehmer v. Big Rock Creek Irr. Dist., 48 Pac. 908, 911, 117 Cal. 19.

"Appeared," as used in a return of a justice of the peace to a writ of certiorari reciting that the parties "appeared," in the absence of any qualification, means a general appearance. Cron v. Krones, 17 Wis. 401, 403.

"Appears," as used in Code, § 72, providing that a defendant "appears" in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice or appears for him, does not mean that the mere corporal presence of the defendant or his agent at the place of trial shall constitute an appearance of the defendant, but that there must be some act performed, and that the defendant must answer, demur, or give the plaintiff written notice of appearance. McCoy v. Bell, 20 Pac. 595, 598, 1 Wash. St. 504.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 73, § 82, provides that, in actions brought by the indorsee of a promissory note, possession of the note shall be prima facie evidence that the same was indorsed by the persons by whom it purports to be indorsed. Section 90 provides that an indorsement of money received on a promissory note, which "appears" to have been made when it was against the interest of the holder to make it, is prima facie evidence of the facts therein contained. In commenting on these sections, the court said that "the use of the words 'appears' to have been made,' rather than the word 'purports,' significantly indicates that the former words were not used as synonyms with the latter, but were intended to convey an altogether different idea," and construed the section as meaning that the indorsement was prima facie evidence only "when it was made to appear, by other evidence, that the indorsement was made when it was against the interest of the holder." Young v. Perkins, 12 N. W. 515, 517, 29 Minn. 173, 175.

As remain within reach of court.

The word "appear" in a bail bond, requiring the principal in the bond to appear, means that the principal shall remain within the reach of the process of the court. Harwood v. Robertson (S. C.) 2 Hill, 330, 338.

View implied.

An order for stopping a highway as unnecessary, stating that having upon view found, and it "appearing" to us, did not imply that the justices acted on any other information than their own view. Rex v. Inhabitants of Milverton, 5 Adol. & E. 841.

An order of justices for the closing of a highway, which recited that "we having viewed," "and it appearing to us that such highway is unnecessary," does not imply that it was made upon the view of the justices, and the order is insufficient. Queen v. Jones, 12 Adol. & E. 684, 685.

APPEARANCE.

See "General Appearance"; "Special Appearance"; "Voluntary Appearance."

Where a paper, which has been voluntarily executed by the defendants in a suit pending and therein filed, contains a recital, "we hereby enter our appearance to said cause," such phrase signifies that they make an appearance for every necessary purpose of the cause. Mutual Nat. Bank of New Orleans v. Moore (La.) 24 South. 304, 306.

The "appearance" of parties is no longer, as formerly, by actual appearance in court, either by themselves or their attorneys, but it must be remembered an appearance of this kind is still supposed and exists in contemplation of law. The appearance is effected on the part of the defendant, where he is not arrested, by making certain formal entries in the proper office of the court, expressing his appearance. Salina Nat. Bank v. Prescott, 57 Pac. 121, 122, 60 Kan. 490.

In order to constitute an appearance in the legal sense of the term, there must be some substantial act done by the defendant which constitutes him a party to the suit. Murphy v. Williams, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 376, 384.

"An appearance formerly signified the defendants filing a common or special bill. 1 Jacob's L. Dict. The appearance is effected on the part of a defendant, when he is not arrested, by his making certain formal entries in the proper office of the court expressing his appearance, or, in case of arrest, by giving bail to the action." Scott v. Hull, 14 Ind. 136, 137 (quoting 1 Bouv. L. Dict.).

A party enters his appearance if he does any act from which it may be presumed that he acknowledged the jurisdiction of the court. Barbour v. Newkirk, 83 Ky. 529, 532.

"Appearance," in law, means the coming in of a defendant in answer to a writ, summons, etc. An "appearance" waives all defects in service of process, and cannot be set aside, if general, unless induced by fraud or mistake. Allen v. Coates, 29 Minn. 46, 11 N. W. 132.

Appearance is the process by which a person against whom a suit has been commenced submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court. Flint v. Comly, 49 Atl. 1044, 1045, 95 Me. 251.

An appearance is the formal proceeding by which a defendant submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court; the prescribed mode of complying with the exigency of the process. Crawford v. Vinton, 62 N. W. 988, 989, 102 Mich. 83.

An "appearance" is the first act of the defendant in court, and is triable by the record, which is verity. It is the formal act by which a person against whom the suit has been commenced enters and submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court in person or by attorney. "Appearance" has the meaning of being present in court, and at common law "appearance" and "pleading" were perfectly segregated, for there could be no pleading till appearance was perfected; but now in practice appearance is generally followed connectively by some plea. Groves v. County Court of Grant County, 28 S. E. 460, 464, 42 W. Va. 587.

Answer or demurrer.

"Appearance" means the coming into court as a party to a suit, whether as plaintiff or defendant, and hence a general demurrer by defendant constitutes an appearance.

Thompson v. Michigan Mut. Ben. Ass'n, W. 247, 248, 52 Mich. 522.

Appearance "means being present at court, though, in common parlance, appearing for the defendant in an action or suit is sometimes regarded as nearly synonymous with 'answering thereto.' 'Answer,' in its proper sense, is to be distinguished from 'appearance,' in that 'answer' properly means a counter statement of facts in the course of pleading; a confutation of what the other party has alleged. When 'answer' is spoken of in legal proceedings in civil cases, it generally implies something which is written." Larrabee v. Larrabee, 33 Me. 100, 102.

A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3334.

Where a bond is given on an adjournment of an examination in a bastardy case, conditioned for the "appearance" of the party charged at the adjourned day, the word "appearance" means not a temporary appearance merely, but a continued "appearance" and attendance until the examination and subsequent proceedings are finally closed. People v. Jayne (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 58, 61.

Motion or notice thereof.

"Appearance" is the first act of the defendant in court, and is either voluntary or compulsory. A mere motion in court to dissolve an injunction granted in a case is not that formal entry of appearance which will authorize the complainant to take a pro confesso against the party making the motion. Chewning v. Nichols (Miss.) 1 Smedes & M. Ch. 122.

An appearance of defendant in court for the purpose of objecting by motion to the jurisdiction of the court over his person is not an appearance in the action, though where he also asks to have the cause dismissed on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit, which motion is not well founded, it is an appearance equivalent to a service of summons. Elliott v. Lawhead, 1 N. E. 577, 580, 43 Ohio St. 171.

The giving notice by an attorney, on behalf of defendant, to plaintiff's attorney, of a motion before a court commissioner to dissolve an attachment issued in the case on the ground that it was irregularly issued, was not a general appearance in the case authorizing the clerk to enter judgment by default. Glidden v. Packard, 28 Cal. 649, 651.

As personal appearance.

"Appearance," as used in Rev. St. 1858, c. 120, § 45, providing that, on return of a process duly served, a justice of the peace shall wait one hour after the time specified in such process for the "appearance" of the parties, unless they sooner appear, does not mean a formal appearance in the action to be entered in the docket of the justice, but a personal "appearance" of the parties before the justice. Brandies v. Robinson, 45 Wis. 464, 465.

Plea in abatement.

An appearance is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court, in obedience or in answer to process. The consequence resulting from an appearance made may be limited by the steps taken or the pleadings interposed subsequently. If these refer to, and are for the purpose of vacating an irregular service of process, or for taking advantage of defects of process, the appearance will not, on error or appeal, be deemed a general appearance curing such defects. A plea, especially a plea in abatement, when final judgment can be entered thereon, is of necessity an appearance. Grigg v. Gilmer, 54 Ala. 425, 430.

Prayer for appeal after judgment.

An "appearance," to conclude a defendant from taking advantage of any defect in the service or return of a writ, is not equivalent to a prayer for an appeal after a judgment by default. "By praying the appeal he did not appear in the action." Rose v. Ford, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 26, 29.

Request for continuance.

"Appearance," when used to designate the act of any person with reference to an action pending, means to come into the court as a party to the suit. The actual presence of the party is not required to constitute an "appearance." He may appear by his attorney or his agent, and, where a party made a written request within the hour to have a case in justice court held open for a certain time, it is an "appearance," and gives the court jurisdiction to act. Wagner v. Kellogg, 52 N. W. 1017, 92 Mich. 616.

Signing of recognizance.

The word "appearance," in Civ. Code Proc. § 2458, providing that in order to entitle the judgment creditor to maintain supplementary proceedings the judgment must have been rendered upon the judgment debtor's appearance or by a personal service of the summons upon him, means voluntary submission to the jurisdiction, in whatever form manifested, and, after entry of judgment on a forfeited recognizance, such proceedings may be instituted though defendant was not served with summons, the signing of a recognizance being equivalent to a voluntary appearance. People v. Cowan, 41 N. E. 28, 146 N. Y. 348.

Unauthorized appearance.

"Appearance," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 108, wherein a "voluntary appearance" is made equivalent to personal service of the summons on a defendant, means the appearance of such defendant in person, or by an attorney authorized so to do, and hence, where an attorney without any authority appeared for a defendant, who was not served with summons and who had no knowledge or notice of the action, the court had no jurisdiction. Williams v. Neth, 31 N. W. 630, 632, 4 Dak. 360.

APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY.

"Appearance by attorney" and "appearance by counsel" in a cause are distinctly different, the former being the substitution of a legal agent for the personal attendance of the suitor, the latter the attendance of an advocate without whose aid neither the party attending nor his attorney in his stead could safely proceed; and an appearance by attorney does not supersede the appearance by counsel. Mercer v. Watson (Pa.) 1 Watts, 330, 331.

APPEARANCE DAY.

The words "default day" in a statute requiring application for a jury trial to be made on default day, and the words "appearance day" as used in another provision fixing the second day of the term as appearance day, are synonymous. Cruger v. McCracken (Tex.) 26 S. W. 282, 283.

When a scire facias against special bail is returnable at rules on the first Monday of the month, the return day is the appearance day, as an appearance may then be entered at rules. Branch v. Webb (Va.) 7 Leigh, 371, 379.

APPEARANCE OF DANGER.

"Appearance of danger" sufficient to justify homicide in self-defense is an appearance to the mind of the party committing the homicide, and not to the mind of the jury after hearing all the evidence and ascertaining the real facts, many of which might or could not be known to the slayer at the time of the killing. Each juror must place himself in the position of the defendant at the time of the homicide, and determine from all the facts, as they appeared to the defendant at the time of the killing, whether his apprehension or fear of death or serious bodily harm was reasonable. Watkins v. United States, 41 S. W. 1044, 1046, 1 Ind. T. 364.

APPEARANCE TERM.

"Appearance term," as used in Code, § 2742, providing that to entitle a party to a trial de novo in the Supreme Court a motion therefor must be made at the "appearance term" in writing, does not mean the first term after legal service has been made, but means that term when it first becomes apparent there is any issue of fact for trial and determination. Vinsant v. Vinsant, 47 Iowa, 594, 596.

APPELLANT.

An appellant is the party or person who takes an appeal. Jones v. Quantrell, 9 Pac. 418, 419, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 153.

The party appealing is known as the appellant, and the adverse party as the respondent. Cr. Code, N. Y. 1903, § 516.

APPELLATE.

The distinguishing characteristic of "appellate" power is the authority to examine and correct errors. Commonwealth v. Simpson (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 438, 439.

The word "appellate" does not include such power of review as is exercised by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the Land Office over the action of inferior land officers. This is "supervisory" power, rather than appellate. Hestres v. Brennan, 50 Cal. 211, 217.

APPELLATE COURT.

"Appellate court," as used in a bond conditioned to perform the judgment rendered by the "appellate court," meant the judgment rendered by any court to which an appeal was taken, without regard whether it was the Supreme Court or the Court of Civil Appeals. Prewitt v. Day, 23 S. W. 982, 983, 86 Tex. 166.

The term "appellate court" includes the Supreme Court or Court of Civil Appeals having jurisdiction of a cause on appeal or writ of error. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 1386.

"Appellate courts," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include the Circuit Courts of Appeals of the United States, the Supreme Courts of the territories, and the Supreme Court of the United States. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

"Appellate jurisdiction" is the power vested in a superior tribunal to review and revise the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal. State ex rel. Williams v. Anthony, 65 Mo. App. 543, 552.

"Appellate jurisdiction" is defined to be the power and authority conferred upon the Supreme Court to hear and determine causes which have been tried in inferior courts (Bouv. Dict.). City of Brownsville v. Basse, 43 Tex. 440, 449.

"Appellate jurisdiction" is the power to take cognizance of a review of proceedings had in an inferior court, irrespective of the manner in which they are brought up, whether by appeal or by writ of error. State v. Baker, 19 Fla. 19, 26.

"Appellate jurisdiction" embraces the right to review the final judgments of the courts of original jurisdiction, or, in other words, the right to reverse, affirm, or modify them, and to enforce by some mandatory process the judgment of the appellate tribunal. In re Jessup's Estate, 22 Pac. 1023, 1030, 81 Cal. 408, 6 L. R. A. 594.

"Appellate jurisdiction," strictly speaking, is exercised by revising the actions of inferior courts and remanding the cause for the rendition and execution of the proper judgment. Dodds v. Duncan, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 731, 734.

The jurisdiction which the court is asked to exercise on an application for a writ of habeas corpus, as distinguished between "original" and "appellate" jurisdictions, is clearly "appellate." It is the revision of a decision of an inferior court by which a citizen has been committed to jail. The question brought forward in a habeas corpus is always distinct from that which is involved in the case itself. The question whether the individual shall be imprisoned is always distinct from the question whether he shall be convicted or acquitted of the charge on which he is to be tried, and therefore these questions are separated, and may be decided in different courts. The decision that the individual shall be imprisoned must always precede the application for a writ of habeas corpus, and this writ must always be for the purpose of revising that decision, and therefore appellate in its nature. Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (8 Cranch) 75, 101, 2 L. Ed. 554.

"Appellate jurisdiction," as used in Const. art. 16, § 2, declaring that the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction in such remedial cases as may be prescribed by law, and "appellate jurisdiction" in all cases both in law and equity, defines the nature of the jurisdiction conferred, but does not embrace the mode in which the jurisdiction shall be exercised. Tierney v. Dodge, 9 Minn. 166 (Gil. 153, 156, 157).

"Appellate jurisdiction," as used in Const. 1870, art. 6, § 2, providing that the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction in cases relating to the revenue, in mandamus, and habeas corpus, and "appellate jurisdiction" in all other cases, is used in contradistinction to "original jurisdiction," and was intended to invest the Supreme Court with supervisory power only, except where original jurisdiction is expressly given. People v. City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 196, 193 Ill. 577.

"Appellate jurisdiction," as used in Const. art. 7, § 3, providing that the Supreme Court, except in cases otherwise provided in this Constitution, shall have "appellate jurisdiction" only, which shall be coextensive with the state, but in no case removed to the Supreme Court shall a trial by jury be allowed, and the Supreme Court shall have a general superintending power over all inferior courts, should be construed as limiting the appellate power spoken of to appeals taken from the judgments and orders of such courts as are recognized and established by the Constitution and the laws, and cannot be extended to the acts or decisions of officers or persons not acting as a court. "Appellate jurisdiction spoken of in the Constitution is that kind of appellate jurisdiction which had theretofore been exercised by the highest judicial tribunals of the respective states, and not an unlimited appellate jurisdiction over any matter or thing arising either in courts or out of courts which the wisdom or folly of any future Legislature might see fit to confer or impose upon it. The appellate jurisdiction should be limited to the judgment and orders made by the courts of the state, and orders made by judges or other officers out of court cannot be the subject of review in the first instance in the Supreme Court." Hubbell v. McCourt, 44 Wis. 584, 587.

Power to direct subsequent action included.

"Appellate jurisdiction" is the cognizance which a superior court takes of a cause removed to it by appeal or writ of error from a decision of an inferior tribunal. The power of the appellate court necessarily includes the power not only to reverse a judgment, but also to control and direct the subsequent action of the subordinate court. Maxson v. Superior Court of Madera County, 57 Pac. 379, 381. 124 Cal. 468.

Power to render appropriate judgment included.

The statute providing that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction over all manner of pleas, complaints, motions, causes, and controversies which may be brought before it, etc., gives it authority to render such judgment as it may conclude appropriate. And this power is made more apparent by the subsequent clause of the section, providing that, when judgment or decree of the court below in civil cases shall be reversed, the Supreme Court shall render judgment or decree as the court below should have done, "except when it is necessary that some matter of fact be ascertained, or, from uncertainty as to the damages to be assessed or the matter to be decided, it is necessary to remand the case to the district court." It is committed to the judgment of the Supreme Court to determine whether there is any uncertainty as to the damages or other matter, or additional facts to be ascertained to enable the court to pronounce such judgment as should have been rendered in the court below. City of Brownsville v. Basse, 43 Tex. 440, 449.

Power to review facts included.

The term "appeal" necessarily involves the idea of a review of the facts as well as the law, so that a constitution requiring a supreme court on appeals and cases in chancery to review the findings of fact only requires in specific terms what was necessarily implied by the general terms "appellate jurisdiction." Wagener v. Kirven, 25 S. E. 130, 132, 47 S. C. 347.

Power to try de novo included.

The expression "appellate jurisdiction," as used in Const. art. 6, § 6, providing that the district court shall have appellate jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts and in such other inferior tribunals as may be established by law, is not to be construed in its narrow and limited meaning, such as to retry and determine something that has already been tried in some other tribunal, but is to be construed in a broad and comprehensible sense, so as to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts to hear cases on appeal there either in the strictest sense, which would require a trial de novo, or to review them as law cases are reviewed at common law. Cavanaugh v. Wright, 2 Nev. 166, 168.

Power to use necessary writs included.

The term "appellate jurisdiction" implies all the power and instrumentalities necessary to make effective the ultimate relief sought. This follows from the grant itself, without other express provision, for it is an established doctrine that one of the essential attributes of appellate jurisdiction, and one of the inherent powers of an appellate court, is the right to make use of all the writs known to the common law, and, if necessary, to invent new writs or proceedings in order to suitably exercise the jurisdiction conferred. Finlen v. Heinze, 69 Pac. 829, 833, 27 Mont. 107.

Prior decision implied.

"Appellate jurisdiction," as used in Const. art. 3, § 10, providing that the Supreme Court shall have such "appellate jurisdiction" as may be provided by law, means to revise and correct the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and necessarily implies that the subject-matter has already been instituted and acted on by some other court whose judgment or proceedings are to be revised. The fact that there has been a decision, however, is not sufficient, but there must have been a decision by a court clothed with judicial authority and acting in a judicial capacity. The tribunal from which an appeal lies need not be called a "court," but it must be one having the attributes of a court—a tribunal where justice is judicially administered. Auditor of State v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 6 Kan. 500, 505, 7 Am. Rep. 575.

It is the essential criterion of "appellate jurisdiction" that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a case already instituted, and does not create that cause. Therefore, though mandamus may be directed to courts, yet to issue such a writ to an officer for the delivery of a paper is in effect the same as to sustain an original action for that paper, and seems not to belong to appellate, but to original, jurisdiction. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch) 137, 175, 2 L. Ed. 60.

APPELLATE TERM.

The name "appellate term" is purely an arbitrary designation, applicable to the term of the Supreme Court which hears appeals from inferior and local courts, apparently justified by the rules and regulations pertaining to such appeals. Curtin v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 49 N. Y. Supp. 668, 22 Misc. Rep. 586.

APPENDAGE.

An "appendage" is something added to a principal or greater thing, though not necessary to it. State v. Fertig, 30 N. W. 633, 70 Iowa, 272; Hemme v. School Dist. No. 4, 1 Pac. 104, 107, 30 Kan. 377.

An "appendage" is something added, attached, or annexed; a concomitant. Hemme v. School District No. 4, 1 Pac. 104, 107, 30 Kan. 377; In re Bozeman, 22 Pac. 628, 630, 42 Kan. 451.

An "appendage" is something added; is an accessory to or the subordinate part of another thing. State Treasurer v. Somerville & E. R. Co., 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 21, 26.

To saloon.

A back room, between which and a saloon there was a third room, used as a kitchen and for the purpose of storing liquors, was properly denominated an "appendage" of the saloon. State v. Fertig, 30 N. W. 633, 70 Iowa, 272.

To school house.

"Appendage," as used in a statute requiring the district board to provide the necessary "appendages" for schoolhouses, was intended in a broad and comprehensive sense, and would include a well. Hemme v. School District No. 4, 1 Pac. 104, 107, 30 Kan. 377. The word as so used includes a lightning rod and a fence and a well, and all improvements necessary to the conduct of the school.

In re Bozeman, 22 Pac. 628, 630, 42 Kan. 451. "Appendages" likewise means school apparatus, such as blackboards, outline maps, mathematical charts, etc. School Dist. No. 17, Chase County, v. Swayze, 29 Kan. 211, 216. The term refers to things connected with the building or designed to render it suitable for use as a schoolhouse, and does not include a stereoscope, since, however available or useful a stereoscope may be in a schoolhouse, it can in no proper sense be called an "appendage" for a schoolhouse. School Dist. No. 29, Bourbon County, v. Perkins, 21 Kan. 536, 537. The word as so used does not mean simply school appendages to be used inside the building, nor can it be limited to such articles as brooms, pails, cups, etc., but must be construed in a broader sense to include fuel, fences, and necessary outhouses. Creager v. School Dist. No. 9, 28 N. W. 794, 795, 62 Mich. 101.

To railroad.

"Appendages," as used in the charter of a railroad, requiring the filing of a statement as soon as the road with its "appendages" shall be finished so as to be used, is to be construed as only meaning the real estate belonging to the company, and not to include personal property of the company. State Treasurer v. Somerville & E. R. Co., 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 21, 26.

APPENDANT.

See "Common Appendant"; "Powers Appendant."

"An appendant is a thing used with and related to or dependent upon another thing more worthy, and agreeing in its nature and quality with the thing whereunto it is appendant or appurtenant." Lucas v. Bishop, 83 Tenn. (15 Lea) 165, 167, 54 Am. Rep. 440; Leonard v. White, 7 Mass. 6, 8, 5 Am. Dec. 19; Meek v. Breckenridge, 29 Ohio St. 642, 648 (citing Coke, Litt. 121).

An "appendant" is that which beyond memory has belonged to another thing more worthy. One thing is said to be "appendant" when it has been immemorially connected with another. New Ipswich W. L. Factory v. Batchelder, 3 N. H. 190, 192, 14 Am. Dec. 346.

Appurtenance distinguished.

"Appendants" are by prescription, as distinguished from appurtenances, which are by grant, or which may arise from use. Jackson v. Striker, 1 Johns. Cas. 284, 291.

An appendant is that which beyond memory has belonged to another thing more worthy, and which agrees with that to which it is related in its nature and quality; and an appurtenant is that the commencement of which may be known. Leonard v. White, 7 Mass. 6, 8, 5 Am. Dec. 19.

APPERTAIN.

A mortgage by a railroad of engines, tenders, and cars, etc., and all other personal property in any way belonging or "appertaining" to the railroad, did not include canal boats used by the railroad company in connection with its transportation line. Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 404, 513.

Under a written contract to pay a certain proportion of the net profits after deducting expenses that "appertain" to the goods themselves, the expenses of clerk hire, advertising, and taxes may be deducted from the gross amount, these expenses being such as "appertain" to the goods themselves. Foster v. Goddard (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 534, 541.

Adjoin distinguished.

"Appertaining," as used in the expression "all lands thereto appertaining," is not synonymous with the word "adjoining." As descriptive words in a deed, "adjoining" usually imports contiguity, and "appertaining" use, occupancy. One thing may appertain to another without adjoining or touching it. Proof that pieces of land adjoined would not be proof that one appertained to the other; neither in literal meaning nor as used in deeds are they equivalent. Miller v. Mann, 55 Vt. 475-478.

As belong to.

"Appertaining" means belonging, having relation or incident to something else. Houses and buildings pass in a grant as "appertaining" to the land conveyed, as does a right of common if such right belonged to the estate sold, and that by virtue of the single word "appertaining" inserted in the deed. Governor of Missouri, to Use of McClenahan, v. McNair, 1 Mo. 302, 305.

As peculiar to.

The constitutional provision that the probate court shall have jurisdiction of business "appertaining" to minors means business peculiar to minors, and does not include any case on any subject in which minors happen to be interested, and therefore does not include the partition of land among minors. Herndon v. Moore, 18 S. C. 339, 351.

APPLIANCE.

See "Best Known Appliances"; "Suitable Appliances."

An "appliance" is anything brought into use as a means to effect some end. Honaker v. Board of Education, 24 S. E. 544, 545, 42 W. Va. 170, 32 L. R. A. 413, 57 Am. St. Rep. 847.

A joist which workmen are placing in a building does not come within the term "appliances." Griffiths v. New Jersey & N. Y.

R. Co., 25 N. Y. Supp. 812, 813, 5 Misc. Rep. 320.

The term "appliance," within the meaning of section 8 of the Illinois Laws of 1899, regulating the practice of medicine, which provides that any itinerant vendor of any drug, nostrum, ointment, or "appliance" of any kind intended for the treatment of diseases or injuries, who shall by any writing or printing or any other method profess to the public to cure or treat diseases or deformities by any drug, nostrum, or "appliance," shall pay a license, etc., means an appliance employed in an attempt to practice medicine or to administer medicine or other remedies as a cure for diseases. People v. Lehr, 93 Ill. App. 505, 509.

Books.

A fire policy on the furniture, chairs, gas apparatus, pictures, paintings, instruments, appliances, and material incidental to a dental office does not cover dental books. The word "appliances" is very comprehensive in its meaning, but it has never been so broadened and expanded as to comprehend books, and the close conjunction in which it is used with the word "material" shows clearly that it has reference to mechanical appliances, in connection with which the word is generally used. American Fire Ins. Co. of New York v. Bell (Tex.) 75 S. W. 319, 321.

Horses.

In a chattel mortgage covering fixtures, furniture, and appliances used in carrying on a grocery store, the term "appliances" was an indefinite term, which, under the circumstances, must be limited to such things as were requisite and necessary for carrying on a grocery business, and hence did not include horses, wagons, and harnesses, though the same had been previously employed by the mortgagor to convey the goods sold from the store to customers. Van Patten v. Leonard, 8 N. W. 334, 337, 55 Iowa, 520.

Persons.

"Appliances," as used in Const. art. 9, § 15, providing that "knowledge by any employé injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines voluntarily operated by them," includes not only inanimate machinery, and tools and apparatus, but also the living men or persons needed to operate the machinery. Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 715, 719, 61 S. C. 468.

Within the rule requiring an employer to furnish safe implements and "appliances" for doing the work, the term embraces not only machinery, premises, and all the implements of every kind used in and about the business, but also the persons employed to operate them, and the master must furnish a sufficient number of persons competent to perform the labor safely. Johnson v. Ashland Water Co., 37 N. W. 823, 825, 71 Wis. 553, 5 Am. St. Rep. 243.

APPLICABLE.

"Applicable," as used in reference to the adoption of the common law in the United States as far as it is "applicable," means "applicable to the habits and condition of our society, and in harmony with the genius, spirit, and objects of our institutions." "No distinction is made between what is applicable to the nature of our political institutions, and to the genius of our republican form of government, and to our constitution, and what is applicable to our wants, habits, and necessities," for what is applicable to our wants, habits, and necessities as a community or state must necessarily, to some extent, be determined from the nature and genius of our government and institutions; or, in other words, to determine whether a particular principle harmonizes with the spirit of our institutions, we must look to the habits and the condition of the society which has created and lives under those institutions. A principle or rule which tends to provide for and protect our rights and wants would harmonize with that form of government or those institutions which have grown up under it. Wagner v. Bissell, 3 Iowa (3 Clarke) 396, 402.

A general law is applicable, in the constitutional sense, where the entire people in the state have an interest in the subject, such as the regulation of interest, the statutes of frauds and limitations, etc.; but where only a portion of the people are affected, as in locating a county seat, it will depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case whether such a law would be applicable. Evans v. Job, 8 Nev. 322, 334.

Money applicable to the payment of a legacy "means money which the legatee is entitled to have applied in payment, and imports that there shall be no debts or other obligations having preference over the legacy to prevent the proper appropriation in the hands of the administrators to its payment, or delay its recovery by the legatee." Webster v. American Bible Soc., 33 N. E. 297, 299, 50 Ohio St. 1.

APPLICABILITY.

A charge instructing the jury that they are the judges of the "applicability" of the law as given them in a charge in a criminal prosecution would include the power to judge not only as to how the law stated should be applied to the facts, but as to whether or not it applied at all, and would involve the right to disregard the charge as inapplicable, and hence is erroneous. Ford v. State (Tenn.) 47 S. W. 703, 705.

APPLICANT.

"Applicant," as used in the attachment act (Rev. Laws, p. 361), requiring an affidavit for an appeal to be made by the applicant for the writ, is to be construed as being synonymous with "creditor." New Brunswick Steamboat & Canal Transp. Co. v. Baldwin, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 440, 441. And also his agent or attorney, in case he resides outside the state. Trenton Banking Co. v. Haverstick, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 171, 173.

APPLICATION.

See "Summary Application."

For appeal.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 53, declared that for the purpose of effecting an appeal to the district court from an order of a probate court an application for such appeal should be filed in the probate court. Held, that the word "application" as there used meant "notice," and that the filing of a notice of appeal in the probate court was a sufficient application. Lake v. Albert, 37 Minn. 453, 35 N. W. 177.

For appraisement of damages.

An "application," within the meaning of a statute providing that if any owner of land taken for a ditch, for the preservation of a highway, shall feel aggrieved, he may apply to the supervisors of the town, who shall appoint three electors to appraise the damages, does not include a mere claim for damages filed by a landowner with the supervisors, which contains no intimation that he desires that appraisers be appointed, and therefore such claim does not give the supervisors jurisdiction to appoint electors to appraise the damages. State v. Town of Leon, 32 N. W. 228, 229, 68 Wis. 502.

For insurance.

"A letter requesting the issuing of a policy may be regarded as an application therefor." Scheffer v. National Life Ins. Co., 25 Minn. 534, 538.

An application for a policy includes a paper headed "Application," containing a series of questions to be addressed to the person whose life is proposed to be insured, and probably also includes the paper attached thereto, and headed "To be answered by the party for whose benefit the insurance is desired," but another printed paper thereto attached, headed "Questions to be answered by the medical examiner for the company" is not a part of the application. Higbee v.

Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York (N. Y.) 66 Barb. 462, 476.

An application for insurance is the representations which a party makes of his property when he applies for insurance. Cowan v. Phenix Ins. Co., 20 Pac. 408, 411, 78 Cal. 181.

For patent.

An application for a patent "includes the paper or some written paper and its presentation to the commissioner." Henry v. Frankestown Soap-Stone Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. 78, 81.

For stay of judgment.

"Application," as used in 4 & 5 Wm. IV, c. 62, § 27, providing that judgment from execution shall not be stayed unless the party "intending to apply for such rule" shall be bound by recognizance "to make and prosecute such application as aforesaid," refers to the application for a rule to show cause, as authorized by section 26 of the act. Ha-worth v. Ormerod, 6 Adol. & E. 300, 307.

For tax deed.

Rev. St. § 1175, provides that when land sold for taxes has not been occupied for at least 30 days "at any time within the six months immediately preceding the time when the tax deed upon such sale shall be applied for," no tax deed shall be issued on the certificate except on proof filed, with such officer, whose duty it is to issue such deed, that the land was not so occupied. Held, that the making and filing with the proper officer of an affidavit of the nonoccupancy of the land would constitute an "application" without further acts, within the meaning of the section above quoted. Mead v. Nelson, 8 N. W. 895, 897, 52 Wis. 402.

For vacant lands.

"Applications" for vacant lands in Pennsylvania after the death of William Penn have been called "the expression of a wish to hold lands at or near a certain spot, but, not being followed up by due diligence, all pretensions of title under them cease, and abandonment of claim is presumed. They were the incursions of right, but of themselves conferred no title to any definite tract." Biddle's Lessee v. Dougal (Pa.) 5 Bin. 142, 151.

APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS.

"Application of payments" is where a debtor, on paying money to a creditor to whom he owes several debts, directs to which debt the payment shall be applied; and, in order to constitute an application of payments, the debtor must exercise his option when he makes the payment, since after the money has ceased to be his it is no longer subject to his control. Bank of California v. Webb, 94 N. Y. 467, 472.

APPLY.

Act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, providing for recovery of damages against persons who shall "apply" a design secured by letters patent, does not apply to all infringers. One who innocently infringes is not within its provisions. The design could not be applied, within the meaning of the act, without knowledge of the design. Schofield v. Dunlop (U. S.) 42 Fed. 323, 326.

Where a will devised real estate to a trustee, to apply the rents and profits to the support of testator's son, the word "apply" did not give the trustee authority to mortgage any part of the land so devised. And in connection with a further provision, that if the income proves insufficient, and it becomes necessary to apply the real estate to the support of the son, he is authorized to sell and convey it, clearly he is not given authority to mortgage. Potter v. Hodgman, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1056, 1057, 81 App. Div. 233.

"Apply," as used in a statute authorizing a trustee to receive the rents and profits of lands, and "apply" them to the use of any person, means the act of applying, and includes any act of the trustee by which the trust fund is applied for the benefit of the cestui que trust, whether expressly directed by the donor or permitted according to the discretion of the trustee; and hence a will creating a trust to receive rents and profits of land and pay them over to the beneficiary is valid. Leggett v. Perkins, 2 N. Y. (2 Comst.) 297, 309.

"Applied," as used in a will directing that a specific portion of rents, issues, and profits shall be "applied" to the education and support of testator's children during their minority, is substantially equivalent to "paid over." Moorehouse v. Hutchinson, 2 N. Y. Supp. 215, 217.

In Rev. Laws, p. 177, § 12, providing that if an administration bond shall be forfeited the moneys recovered upon such bond shall be "applied" towards making good the damages sustained by any one in performing the said condition, "applied" is synonymous with the word "paid." Williamson v. Snook, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 65, 67.

In a will providing that the trustees shall "apply" the income of the testator's estate to his child during its minority, and that after it should arrive at the age of 21 years the trustees should pay over such income to the child quarterly, "apply" is synonymous with "pay over," and they substantially mean the same thing; one phrase referring to the minority of the child, and the other applying only when it should have arrived at full age. Moore v. Hegeman, 72 N. Y. 376, 384.

"Apply," as used in a devise authorizing a trustee to receive rents and profits, and apply them to the use of a certain person, does not mean to pay over such rents and profits. Hawley v. James (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 61, 268.

Promise to pay imported.

In an instrument acknowledging the receipt of a deed, "in consideration of which I am to apply the payment thereof to a" certain note made by the grantors to a third party, the word "apply" precludes the conclusion that there was a direct or absolute promise to pay the note. The utmost that can be conceded is that the writing binds the maker thereof to apply the value of the land to the payment of the note. Freed v. Mills, 120 Ind. 27, 22 N. E. 86.

APPLY ON ACCOUNT.

The words "apply on the account" are equivalent to the words "settlement of account," as used in a letter inclosing a check in settlement of account. Widner v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 16 N. W. 653, 654, 51 Mich. 291.

APPOINT—APPOINTMENT.

See "Executive Appointment"; "Illusory Appointment"; "Provisional Appointment."

See "Duly Appointed."

"Appointment" is defined to be the designation of a person, by the person or persons having authority therefor, to discharge the duties of some office or trust. State ex rel. Nicholls v. City of New Orleans, 6 South. 592, 597, 41 La. Ann. 156.

"Appointment" implies the conferring of the dignity by the act of one or more individuals having power to select the person appointed. Wickersham v. Brittan, 23 Pac. 792, 793, 93 Cal. 84, 15 L. R. A. 106.

"Where the selection of an officer is referred to the Governor or other functionary, it is called an appointment." Speed v. Crawford, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 207, 210.

"Appointment" is the exercise of the right to designate the person or persons who shall be entitled to enjoy the use of property. Brandies v. Cochrane, 5 Sup. Ct. 194, 197, 112 U. S. 344, 28 L. Ed. 760.

It is held that the term "appoint" in a will is never used to convey one's absolute estate. Heinemann v. De Wolf (R. L.) 55 Atl. 707, 709.

When the common council of a city is designated as the "appointing power," the term is to be understood in its usual, ordinary, and popular sense, and the authority is to be exercised in the ordinary manner, according to the procedure governing legislative or deliberative bodies. Rathbone v. Wirth, 45 N. E. 15, 25, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L. R. A. 408.

"Appointed," as used in Rev. St. c. 138, § 10, authorizing the court of probate to require additional bond of sureties of any guardian appointed or approved of by them when they think proper, and in case of neglect or refusal to give such additional bond to remove such guardian, is not used in a strict technical sense, to apply only to guardians appointed or approved by the court, but also includes guardians appointed by testamentary act. McPhillips v. McPhillips, 9 B. L. 536, 540.

As bequeath.

The words, "I appoint A. my legatee of a sum specified or of a residue of my estate," when used in a will, carries to him a sum specified of the residue as though the more formal and usual words "I bequeath" had been used. Wyman v. Woodbury, 33 N. Y. Supp. 217, 220, 86 Hun. 277.

Contract distinguished.

The appointment to a public office for a definite term, and the acceptance of such office, bear no analogy to a contract made between the government and an individual. In the latter the terms agreed upon define the rights and obligations of both parties, and neither may depart from them without the consent of the other. In the former both the rights and privileges, as well as the duties, of the appointee are prescribed by the government, and not by agreement of parties. Uffert v. Vogt, 47 Atl. 225, 226, 65 N. J. Law, 377.

The "appointment to a public office" is not a contract the impairment of the obligation of which is forbidden by the federal Constitution. Butler v. Pennsylvania, 51 U. S. (10 How.) 402, 13 L. Ed. 472. An appointment to office is not a contract, nor is the office or its prospective emoluments the property of the incumbent. Kenny v. Hudspeth, 36 Atl. 662, 59 N. J. Law, 320.

As designate.

"Appointed" means named or designated for or assigned to an office. Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 432, 447, 4 Am. Rep. 89.

The word "appoint," as used in by-laws of a corporation authorizing the officers to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of employes, when used in connection with an office, designates or nominates a person to fill the position to a point to which the power is given. Of itself the mere power of appointment does not include a power to fix the term for which the person is appointed. The general use of the word is applied simply to the authority to designate a person to fill a position. And a power to appoint could not include either a power to fix the term or a power to fix the compensation to be paid to the person appointed. Hence, under such power, officers have not the right to make a contract for life employment with an employé. Carney v. New York Life Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 1103, 1104, 19 App. Div. 160.

Discretion implied.

"The choice of a person for a civil office constitutes the essence of the appointment, and the selection must be the discretionary act of the officer clothed with the power of appointment." The power of appointment contemplates the exercise of judgment and discretion in the appointing power as to whom he shall appoint, and responsibility for the person so selected, and to secure this it must be the independent and untrammelled act of the appointing officer. The officer clothed with the power of appointment must select the persons to be appointed. People v. Mosher, 61 N. Y. Supp. 452, 454, 45 App. Div. 68.

"Appointment" implies the exercise of judgment and will. The decisions of this and other courts, state and federal, as to the meaning of the word "appointment," and what constitutes an appointment under the law, are to the effect that the choice of a person to fill an office constitutes the essence of an appointment; that the selection must be the discretionary act of the officer or board clothed with the power of appointment; and that, while he or it may listen to the recommendations or advice of others, yet the selection must be his or its act, which has never been regarded or held to be ministerial. People v. Mosher, 163 N. Y. 32, 40, 57 N. E. 88, 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 552.

The word "appoint," as used in Const. art. 2, § 1, declaring that each state shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, a number of electors, etc., while not the most appropriate word to describe the result of a popular election, is sufficiently comprehensive to cover that mode, and was manifestly used as conveying the broadest powers of determination. McPherson v. Blacker, 13 Sup. Ct. 3, 7, 146 U. S. 1, 36 L. Ed. 869.

The word "appointed," in Code Civ. Proc. § 2071, providing that where a board consisting of more than three is created by law, with a president, who is "appointed pursuant to law," service of a writ of mandamus to the board may be made on such president, is not used in a narrow or technical sense, and is not limited to an executive appointment, but means a chairman or presiding officer for whom the law has made provision; that is, one who holds his position, not by the mere courtesy of his fellow members, but either under direct legislative mandate, or by selection under legislative requirement, and includes a president who is elected as well as one who is appointed. Pierce v. Gug-

The word "election," in the strict sense, undoubtedly means the choice of an officer in the exercise of which all the qualified electors have an opportunity to participate; while the word "appointment" is understood to mean the selection, by one or more persons who have been commissioned for that purpose, of another, who by virtue of the choice represents or may exercise some authority over the persons delegating the power to make the appointment. In People v. Langdon, 8 Cal. 1, it was insisted that the words "elected" and "appointed," as used in a section of the California Constitution, were not equivalent expressions of the meaning intended to be imported by the framers of that instrument, but the court said much stress is laid upon the word "appoint" as used in this section. This is mere hypercriticism. The word "appoint" was probably used as a more comprehensive term, to convey the idea of a mode of constituting or designating an officer with public election or otherwise. In fact, the words "elect" and "appoint" seem to be regarded as synonymous by the convention. The word "elect" simply means to pick out, to select from among a number, or to make choice of, and is synonymous with the words "choose," "prefer," "select," and was evidently used in this sense in the Constitution; and the word "elect," as used in Const. art. 15, § 1, declaring that all officers shall hold their office until their successors are elected and qualified, is not limited to offices which are filled by an election of the people as contradistinguished to those to which appointment is made by the Legislature. State v. Compson, 54 Pac. 349, 351, 34 Or. 25.

"Discriminating authorities sanction the use of the word 'appointed' in a sense which includes the notion of election by a body as well as selection by an individual, and also the use of the word 'elected' as applied to those who are chosen by the votes of a body limited in numbers. By way of authoritative definitions, we have the following: Bouvier's Law Dictionary: 'Appointment. The designation of a person, by the person or persons having authority therefor, to discharge the duties of some office or trust; election; choice; selection. The selection of one person from a specified class to discharge certain duties in a state, corporation, or society.' Century Dictionary: 'Appoint. To allot, set apart, or designate; nominate or authoritatively assign—as for use, or to a post or office.' 'Elect. To pick out; select from among a number; to select for an office or employment by a majority or plurality of votes; choose by ballot or any similar method—as to elect a representative or a senator; to elect a president or mayor.' In this connection, an election of an archbishop by the monks of a certain convent is instanced as a proper use of the verb to elect. Under these definitions the distinction seems to be that election signified the act of choosing where several participate in the selection. 'Appointment' relates to the bestowal of the office upon the person selected, whether the choosing be the act of one or of many. Where the choice rests in the sole discretion of an individual, the usual authoritative evidence that a selection has been definitely made is in the act of bestowal; hence in such cases the word 'appointment' has come to include the function of selection, as well as the function of authoritatively designating the person selected. That the functions are distinct, however, appears when we come to consider those cases where one has the exclusive function of selection, but the appointment is subject to the approval of others. For instance, the governor nominates, and, with the advice and consent of the senate, appoints, certain officers. But where the power of making an appointment resides in a numerous body the exercise of the power necessitates a previous agreement, by majority of voices or otherwise, with respect to the person to be chosen, and the choice so made is an election; after which the person selected receives the appointment, and can properly be said to be appointed, although he is the choice of many. Under our system of government the most familiar example of election is that which is participated in by the people at large. At the same time it requires the use of the phrase 'popular election,' or 'election by the people,' to clearly express the thought." Reid v. Gorsuch, 51 Atl. 457, 459, 67 N. J. Law, 396.

"Appointment," as used in statutes generally, means the designation of a person to hold an office or trust by an individual or a limited number of individuals to whom the power of selection has been delegated. The word "election" is properly applied to the choice of an officer by the votes of those on whom the law has conferred the right of election of such officers. State v. Squire, 39 Ohio St. 197, 199.

"From the word 'appointment' we understand that the duties of the appointee are for others than those by whom he is appointed. As distinguished from an election, an appointment is generally made by one person, or by a limited number, acting with delegated powers. The appointment to a public office is made by one or more possessing delegated powers, as distinguished from election, where the right is exercised by many." Wickersham v. Brittan, 15 L. R. A. 106, 108, 28 Pac. 792, 793, 93 Cal. 34.

In the popular sense an "election" is a choice which several persons collectively make of a person to fill an office or position, while an "appointment" is a choice for such office or position by some single officer or person. Where a police judge was selected by the several members of the city council it was not inappropriate to say that he was elected. State v. Williams, 58 Pac. 476, 477, 60 Kan. 837.

"Appointment," as used in Const. art. 5, § 18, providing that in case a vacancy happens in any office, the appointment of which is vested in the General Assembly, that the Governor shall fill such vacancy by appointment, which shall expire when his successor has been elected and qualified, is synonymous with the term "elected." It means an election by the General Assembly. State v. Harrison, 16 N. E. 384, 388, 113 Ind. 434, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

As executive act.

The power of appointment to office is held to be intrinsically executive, and, although the power of appointing their own clerks is often vested in courts, still the nature of the power is not changed, it being as much executive when exercised by the court as by the Governor. Pratt v. Breckinridge, 65 S. W. 136, 137, 112 Ky. 1 (citing Taylor v. Commonwealth, 28 Ky. [3 J. J. Marsh.] 401).

"Appointment to office" is in the nature of an executive act. Apart from the purpose of the appointment, it is an exercise of executive power. Though the Constitution provided for certain elective and legislative appointments, except in the cases specified, appointment to office is an exercise of executive power, unless used as a means appropriate to the exercise of powers granted to another department, and when so used it is not the exercise of executive power within the meaning of the Constitution. Appeal of Norwalk St. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 1080, 1086, 69 Conn. 576, 39 L. R. A. 794.

Promotion distinguished.

"Appointment," as used in New York Laws 1884, c. 410, § 4, requiring that honorably discharged soldiers shall be preferred for "appointment" in the civil service of the state, means appointment strictly, and does not include promotion, "a promotion being the advancement of an official or employé to a higher position who had previously been appointed to one of an inferior degree." In re McGuire, 2 N. Y. Supp. 760, 762, 50 Hun, 203.

License to practice law.

The term "appointed" excludes the idea of a popular election, and refers the office or trust to some other source. Every officer not elected may well be said to be appointed. A license or certificate from three judges, as required by law, to a resident lawyer, admitting him or authorizing him to practice in any of the courts of the state, is an appointment. Ex parte Faulkner, 1 W. Va. 269, 299.

The admission of an attorney under the provisions of the Constitution in force in 1860 is not an appointment. In re Graduates (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. 301, 336.

As selected according to law.

Where a city charter provided that all officers shall hold their offices until their successors are "elected or appointed," the term "elected or appointed" means selected in the manner provided by law to hold the office, and, when a confirmation is necessary by the city council, the appointment is not completed until such confirmation. State v. Daggett, 68 Pac. 340, 346, 28 Wash. 1.

When complete.

When a person has been nominated to an office by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and his commission has been signed by the President and the seal of the United States affixed thereto, his appointment is complete, and the transmission of the commission to the officer is not essential to his investiture to the office, and if by an inadvertence or accident it should fail to reach him his possession of the office is as lawful as if the commission were in his custody, since the commission of appointment is merely evidence of the appointment and qualification which constitutes the appointee's title, and it may be proved by other evidence. United States v. Le Baron, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 73, 78, 15 L. Ed. 525.

An appointment is complete when the appointee was nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and the giving of a bond is a mere ministerial act for the security of the government, and not a condition precedent to the appointee's authority to act. United States v. Bradley, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 843, 364, 9 L. Ed. 448.

The word "appointment," as used in reference to the appointment of an administrator, may generally signify "the actual installment in the administrative office." Wells v. Applegate, 10 Or. 519, 520.

The words "appointment" and "election" represent different tenures. The people elect; the Governor or other functionary appoints. Section 1 of the statutes concerning offices and officers provides that there shall be elected or appointed, as hereinafter declared, the following officers, etc., and the other provisions of the act use the term "election" as applied to the action of the people in choosing officers, and the term "appointment" as applied to the action of whatever officer or board is vested with the power to fill the given vacancy. Where the officer is chosen by the people he takes by virtue of his election. Where the office from any cause becomes vacant before the expiration of the term, and it is filled by the choice of the Governor or some other public functionary, the officer chosen takes by virtue of his appointment. The appointment to office by the board of supervisors is not complete until the person appointed has received a certificate of his election under the seal of the board, signed by proper officers of the board; and therefore an appointment made by a majority of the board may be revoked at any time before such certificate is issued, and no person may be appointed. Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 75, 78.

The phrases "after date of appointment" and "from such date," in Rev. St. § 1556 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1067], relative to the annual pay of assistant surgeons in the navy, and providing for increases thereof after the expiration of so many years after date of appointment, or "from such date," refers not to the original entry of the officer into the service as an assistant surgeon, but to the notification by the Secretary of the Navy that he has passed his examination for promotion to the grade of surgeon. United States v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760, 761, 24 L. Ed. 588.

APPOINTED OFFICERS.

"Appointed officers," as used in Const. art. 6, § 4, providing that appointed officers, other than judges of the courts of record, etc., may be removed at the pleasure of the appointing power, construed to include municipal as well as state or county officers. Houseman v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 222, 230.

APPOINTED SERVICES.

"Appointed services," as used in Act 1882, c. 22, providing for the appointment of officers of registration of voters, and imposing upon them the performance of certain services for which they were to receive a certain per diem for the days of "appointed services," does not mean only the sittings of the officers for the registration of the names of persons qualified to exercise the elective franchise, but means the other services which the Legislature has prescribed for them to perform, for they are "appointed services," entitling the commissioners to per diem therefor. Ryninger v. Keating, 60 Md. 334, 335.

APPOINTING POWER.

The phrase "appointing power," as used in Const. art. 2, § 27, providing "that the election and appointment of all officers, and the filling of all vacancies not otherwise provided for by this Constitution or the Constitution of the United States, shall be made in such manner as may be directed by law, but no appointing power shall be exercised by the General Assembly except as prescribed in this Constitution, and in the election of United States Senators," etc., is one of no ambiguous signification. When employed in reference to matters pertaining to government, or to the distribution of the powers of government, it means the power of appointment to office,—the power to select and indicate by name individuals to hold oflice, and to discharge the duties and exercise the powers of officers. State v. Kenyon, 7 Ohio St. 546, 556.

APPORTION.

The word "apportion" means to divide, to assign in just proportion, to distribute among two or more, a just part or share to each. Fisher v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Abb. N. C. 32, 36.

"Apportion," as used in Act Feb. 1832, incorporating the Brooklyn Bank, naming commissioners to open books, receive subscriptions to the capital stock, and making it their duty to distribute the stock among the subscribers thereto, and, in case there should be subscriptions to more than the amount of such stock, to "apportion the same among" the subscribers thereto, in such a manner as a majority of them shall deem most advantageous to the interests of the institution, does not require that every subscriber should receive some stock, as such construction would interfere with the power given the commissioners. Clarke v. Brooklyn Bank (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 361, 368.

In Act March 26, 1813 (Sess. 36, c. 80), incorporating a bank, and appointing commissioners to "apportion" an excess of shares "among" the several subscribers, as they shall judge discreet and proper, the shares subscribed for greatly exceeding the number limited to be subscribed for, "apportion" means to assign to each subscriber or give him such portion as the commissioners should deem meet. Haight v. Day (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 18, 20.

"Apportion" means simply to divide, and does not necessarily mean to divide equally. Thus, it was held that, in view of the fact that a city council was authorized to "apportion" the cost of the sewer according to the actual cost of labor or material expended in constructing along the lateral of the lot assessed, the city council was justified in making an unequal apportionment according to the actual expense. Jones v. Holzapfel, 68 Pac. 511, 515, 11 Okl. 405.

The word "apportion," as used in an act of the Legislature for the incorporation of a bank, and appointing certain commissioners to receive subscriptions, and directing them to apportion the excess of shares among the several subscribers as they shall deem discreet and proper, means to assign to each subscriber or give him such portion as the commissioners shall deem meet. Haight v. Day (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 18, 22.

In an action against connecting carriers for damages sustained by delay in shipping cattle, an instruction which in effect directed the jury to first find the whole amount of the damage done by all of the defendants, and then "apportion" it among them according to and in proportion to their respective liability as indicated by instructions already given, the use of the word "apportion" did not render the instruction objectionable on the ground that it authorized the jury to fix the liability of each according to an arbitrary rule, and not according to the evidence, especially when read with other instructions that the jury should "apportion" against each defendant only the damage that it had caused, and should not apportion against one the damage caused by another. In discussing the use of the word the court remarks that, if there is a misuse of words, the sense in which they were employed is evident to any ordinary mind, and is the same as if the word "assess" or "find" had been used according to the more general custom. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cushney, 67 S. W. 77, 78, 95 Tex. 309.

APPORTIONMENT.

Apportionment is the only method of determining the amounts which each of several parties interested in an estate shall pay towards the removal of an incumbrance on the whole. It is the only method of ascertaining the damages in case of a breach of the covenant of seisin as to a part only of the premises conveyed. Kickland v. Menasha Wooden-Ware Co., 31 N. W. 471, 475, 68 Wis. 34, 60 Am. Rep. 831.

Of rent.

"Apportionment" is defined as a division or partition of a rent or common, or a making of it into parts. This may be by the act of the law or the act of the parties. Swint v. McClintock, 38 Atl. 1021, 1022, 184 Pa. 202, 63 Am. St. Rep. 791, 41 Wkly. Notes Cas. 491, 493.

Apportionment of rent does not mean abatement of it, because, though rent may be apportioned, the tenant still remains liable to pay the whole of it, but in different parts to different persons, except where he has purchased or acquired the reversion of part of the demised premises. Gluck v. City of Baltimore, 32 Atl. 515, 516, 81 Md. 315, 48 Am. St. Rep. 515.

Of tax.

The apportionment of a tax consists in a selection of the subjects to be taxed, and in laying down the rule by which to measure the contribution which each of these subjects shall make to the tax. "Apportionment" is therefore a matter of legislation. This definition only applies to ordinary taxation, which is found in the revenue laws of the states where the various subjects of taxation are classified, and the right of taxation upon each class is fixed, and has no application to special assessments for local improvements, where the property to be taxed belongs entirely to one class. Apportionment, in the case of a tax of the latter class, is purely clerical, and may be performed by a board endowed solely with executive functions. Barfield v. Gleason, 63 S. W. 964, 971, 111 Ky. 491 (citing Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 71 Ky. [8 Bush] 508, and Loeser v. Redd, 77 Ky. [14 Bush] 18).

APPRAISE.

To "appraise" is to estimate value, and such is the duty of arbitrators appointed to ascertain and appraise "the sound value of and the loss upon the property damaged," and it requires the arbitrators to make an appraisement, and not to hear evidence. Vincent v. German Ins. Co., 94 N. W. 458, 460, 120 Iowa, 272.

APPRAISAL.

See "Existing Appraisal."

Arbitration distinguished, see "Arbitration."

An "appraisal" of property signifies the valuation of it or an estimation of its value. In a statute requiring the selectmen to appraise all taxable property "at its full and true value in money," the words "full and true in money" gave no added meaning to the word "appraisal." Cocheseo Mfg. Co. v. Town of Strafford, 51 N. H. 455, 482.

APPRAISED VALUE.

The term "appraised value," as used in Wag. St. p. 88, § 35, allowing the widow to choose additional personal property, not exceeding the "appraised value" of $400, were only designed as a means of valuation in case the widow chose specific articles. Cummings v. Cummings, 51 Mo. 261, 264.

"Appraised value," as used in the revenue acts, means the value of the goods as estimated by the appraisers, either according to the actual cost, actual value, or market value, as the case may be, exclusive of charges. Grinnel v. Lawrence (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 54, 56; Wilson v. Maxwell (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 147, 149.

APPRAISEMENT.

See "Due Appraisement."

Award distinguished, see "Award."

An "appraisement" of real property offered at judicial sale is to be treated as a summary proceeding to fix a minimum price on property to be sold, and that only fraud or irregularities taking away the power of the appraisers to act in it, or in some way affecting the substantial rights of the defendant, will vitiate it. David Adler & Sons Clothing Co. v. Hellman (Neb.) 95 N. W. 467, 468.

APPRAISER.

See "General Appraisers"; "Merchant Appraiser."

An "appraiser" is not an officer of the probate court. He is simply an officer appointed by that court to appraise the goods and chattels, rights and credits, of the deceased that shall have come to the knowledge of the administrator, and to make return thereof under oath to such court. Fairbanks v. Mann, 34 Atl. 1112, 1113, 19 R. I. 499.

"Appraisers," as used in an act appointing certain persons having the duties of commissioners, but designating them as appraisers, is to be construed not as any official or technical appellation, but rather as descriptive of the duties which they were commissioned to perform. State v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 411, 437.

An act of the Legislature appropriating a sum of money for the purchase of certain relics to be paid on the certificate of three persons named, that the relics are in their opinion genuine, and that it is desirable in their judgment that they should be placed in the museum of the state library, is not a provision for arbitration to determine controversies between individuals, or in matters of private concern, in which all of the appraisers are required to act, but was an appointment of "appraisers" to act between an individual and the state, and is a matter of public concern, in which a majority act as the whole, when all have met. People v. Nichols, 52 N. Y. 478, 482, 11 Am. Rep. 734.

The term "appraiser," as used in leases providing for appraisement of the property, a fixed percentage whereof is to be the rent, imports a disinterested person. Pool v. Hennessy, 39 Iowa, 192, 195, 18 Am. Rep. 44.

APPRAISERS AT LARGE.

The term "appraisers at large" is the name generally used to designate the appraisers appointed under Act Cong. March 3, 1851, directing that four appraisers should be appointed to afford aid and assistance in the appraisement of merchandise imported. Gibb v. Washington (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 288, 289.

APPRECIABLE.

"Appreciable," as used in a statement that an "appreciable" part of a proposed railroad was to be in the public highways, means a substantial part of it. New England R. Co. v. Central Ry. & Electric Co., 36 Atl. 1061, 69 Conn. 47.

APPRECIABLY.

"Appreciably," as used in the West Virginia cases holding that the court should not strike out the evidence where it "appreciably" tends to sustain the party's action or defense, means that the evidence must be such as would forbid the court from setting the verdict aside. If the evidence is so weak as not to carry the case in favor of him who bears the burden of proof, so that the verdict based upon that evidence ought to be set aside, the court commits no error in sustaining a motion to exclude, because after verdict the same question comes to the court on a motion for a new trial. Ketterman v. Dry Fork R. Co., 37 S. E. 683, 687, 48 W. Va. 606.

APPRECIATE.

The word "appreciate" is defined by lexicographers to mean to be fully aware of or alive to the value, importance, or worth of; see the full import of. Standard Dictionary: To be fully conscious of; to be aware of; detect; perceive the nature or effect of. There is a distinction between knowledge of defects and knowledge of the risks resulting from such defects. Illinois Steel Co. v. Ryska, 65 N. E. 734, 735, 200 Ill. 280.

In a suit to contest the validity of a will, the court instructed that though the testator had a morbid prejudice against a son-in-law, amounting to an insane delusion, that would not in itself invalidate the will provided such insane delusion did not prevent the testator from understanding and "appreciating" his relation to those who had a claim on his bounty. If the insane delusion did not prevent the testator from understanding and appreciating his relation to his daughter, then it must have been, first, that he knew that she was not responsible, and ought not be held responsible, for anything that her husband did or said; and, second, that he was able to estimate justly (for in this connection that is the sense of appreciation) his relation towards her. Having full knowledge and full capacity to reason, there is left no place for delusion to operate. Brace v. Black, 17 N. E. 66, 68, 125 Ill. 33.

APPREHEND.

"Apprehend," as used in the statement that one must have reasonable ground to "apprehend" danger in order to justify taking life in self-defense, is not synonymous with "fear," but with "belief." "The party assailed need not fear the threatened danger. It is sufficient if he believes in good faith that there is actual danger, and that he will suffer bodily harm if he does not resist." Trogon v. State, 32 N. E. 725, 727, 133 Ind. 1.

Where the court said, "My duty is to give you in charge the rule of law by which I 'apprehend' you are to be governed in the decision of this case," he meant "understand, conceive, believe." Golden v. State, 25 Ga. 527, 531.

APPREHENSION.

The word "apprehension" means the seizure, taking, or arresting of a person on a criminal charge, the term "apprehension" being applied exclusively to criminal cases as distinguished from the word "arrest," which is applied to both civil and criminal cases. Hogan v. Stophlet, 53 N. E. 604, 606, 179 Ill. 150, 44 L. R. A. 809. See, also, Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174, 176.

"Apprehension of attack," as used in Code, § 3775, prohibiting the carrying of a concealed weapon except by a person having a well-grounded apprehension of attack, means reasonable ground to believe that an assault is about to be committed on him, and does not include a case of an "apprehension" on the part of an officer that a criminal known by him to be armed will resist arrest to the extent of taking life, on the officer's approach to arrest him. Such resistance is more a defense than an attack or assault. Reach v. State, 11 South. 414, 415, 94 Ala. 113.

APPRENTICE.

Laborer distinguished, see "Laborer."

The term "apprentice" is derived from the word "apprendre," to learn. Hopewell v. Amwell, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 422, 425.

An "apprentice" is one bound by indenture with his own consent or by agreement of friends to serve in a trade. Commonwealth v. St. German (Pa.) 1 Browne, 24, 25.

"Apprentice" means in the law a learner of a trade, but learners under indentures are distinguished from those without, so that the former acquire a settlement and the latter none. Overseers of North Brunswick Tp. v. Overseers of Franklin Tp., 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 535, 537.

"Apprentices are persons bound to a master to learn some art or trade." Phelps v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 99 Pa. 108, 113.

An "apprentice" is a young person bound by indenture to a tradesman or artificer who, upon certain covenants, is to teach him his mystery or trade. Lyon v. Whitmore, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 845, 846; Hopewell Tp. v. Amwell Tp., 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 422, 425.

It is true apprentices are not confined to tradesmen or artificers. Husbandmen may take apprentices, but in doing it they covenant to learn them the art and mystery of husbandry. It is essential to every legal indenture of apprenticeship that the master or mistress must engage or covenant to learn the apprentice some trade, art, or mystery. It is that which distinguishes it from menial service. To constitute an apprenticeship something is to be learned. It is the characteristic mark of the service to be performed, and there can be no apprenticeship without it. Hopewell Tp. v. Amwell Tp., 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 422, 425.

"Apprentice," as used in Rev. St. c. 113, making it the duty of the supervisors or superintendents of the poor to bind orphans or minors, otherwise likely to become chargeable to the public, as "apprentices" to some respectable householder of the county by written indenture, binding such minor to serve as an "apprentice," means binding to serve in some specific profession, trade, or employment. In re Goodenough, 19 Wis. 274, 276.

An agreement that a son should work for a blacksmith for three years for wages to be paid to the father, and that the blacksmith was to teach the boy and employ him in and about the trade of a blacksmith, was insufficient to constitute the boy an "apprentice." Lyon v. Whitmore, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 845, 846.

A contract by which a mother agrees that her minor son shall labor for a fixed period at stipulated wages, the employer reserving the right to discharge him if he should be found incompetent or unsatisfactory, does not become an indenture of "apprentice" merely by being so styled by the parties. Dwyer v. Rathbone, 5 N. Y. Supp. 505, 52 Hun, 615.

APPRENTICESHIP.

An "apprenticeship" is a contract to create the relation of master and apprentice, and can be effected only by deed. Squire v. Whipple, 1 Vt. 69, 71.

"Apprenticeship," as used in a statute providing that pilots, in addition to the qualification now required by law, shall hereafter be required to serve a regular "apprenticeship" of two years, means regular, faithful, and active service under a competent pilot, with a purpose to secure knowledge and skill as a pilot, but an actual binding out is not necessary. State v. Jones, 16 Fla. 306, 318.

APPRISED.

In the cases of Ableman v. Booth and United States v. Same (decided together) 62 U. S. (21 How.) 506, 16 L. Ed. 169, Chief Justice Taney said: "If the return is made as to a writ of habeas corpus, and the state judge or court is judicially apprised that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further; in other words, he cannot then discharge the prisoner." He concedes that a return is to be made, and that the judge or officer must, in addition, be judicially apprised of the facts which terminate his jurisdiction. But how "judicially apprised"? Clearly, by legal proof of those facts, if the return is traversed or denied; for a judge or court, as such, and in respect to the facts in controversy in such cases, can know nothing judicially; can be judicially apprised, or judicially informed, of nothing except by the admission of the parties, or by legal proof in the due course of legal proceedings. It is possible that in the selection of the term "apprised" the Chief Justice had in mind the technical definition of that word when derived from the French "apprised," and meaning the ordinance by which the sentence of superior judge is declared to an inferior. In re Reynolds (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 592, 603 (citing Webst. Dict. [Folio Springfield, 1865]).

APPROACHES.

Of a bridge or viaduct.

As a part of a bridge, see "Bridge."

"Approaches" of a bridge are whatever is necessary to connect the bridge with the public roads or streets, either at the end thereof, or to make such roads or streets conform to the grade of the bridge. Kearney Tp. v. Ballantine, 23 Atl. 821, 822, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 194; Whitcher v. City of Somerville, 138 Mass. 454, 455.

An ordinance authorizing a railroad company to construct a viaduct, provided that it should maintain and keep in repair the "approaches" thereto, includes the retaining walls, the filling with dirt, and the paving and roadway on the viaduct. McFarlane v. City of Chicago, 57 N. E. 12, 14, 185 Ill. 242.

"Approaches," as used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 128, providing that where a highway in a city is lowered for the purpose of having a railroad pass over it by means of a bridge the railroad company shall be liable for any injury arising from a defect in the bridge or its "approaches," means the ways at the ends of it which are a part of the bridge itself and appendages to it. Whitcher v. City of Somerville, 138 Mass. 454, 455.

The term "approaches," as used in Laws 1895, c. 968, authorizing the city of New York to construct an approach from the Harlem river, and to acquire title to the land necessary for the construction of the bridge and its approaches, is applied not only to the physical structures immediately connected with the roadway of the bridge, but to those contiguous and converging streets and avenues, through and over which the public are to gain access to the bridge. In re Har-

Iem River Bridge, 66 N. E. 584, 586, 174 N. Y. 28.

Of a dock.

An approach of a dock "must mean that portion of the frontage of the dock which a vessel must pass through to reach the same, even bow on. This is a legitimate way of approach, so that, the bow being fastened to the dock, the stern of the vessel would be carried by the tide alongside of the dock." McCaldin v. Parke, 21 N. Y. Supp. 277, 278, 66 Hun, 323.

To railroad crossing.

As part of crossing, see "Crossing."

"Approaches," as used in 2 Starr & C. (Ill. Ann. St. p. 1937), providing that all railroad corporations shall construct railway crossings and the "approaches" thereto, etc., approaches has a common meaning, and signifies the embankment or bridges or grades or structures of any sort on each side of the railroad at the crossing which serve as the passageway for approaching the crossing. City of Bloomington v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 39 N. E. 478, 480, 154 Ill. 539. The term "approach" means a structure of some sort necessary to reach the railroad track from the common surface. It does not signify an ordinary sidewalk. It may be an embankment or approach or whatever is required for the purpose at a particular place. City of Bloomington v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 49 Ill. App. 129, 133. The word is to be given its ordinary meaning. It is common knowledge what an approach is to a bridge on a highway. It is simply that prepared or made condition on each side of the bridge that makes a safe, easy, and convenient way to get across the bridge. The words "approaches thereto" within their respective rights of way are words of limitation rather than of extension. They mean that in no event, as a statutory duty, as to highways laid out over railroads already established were such approaches to the railroad crossing to be extended beyond the limits of the right of way, although to make such highways passable it might be necessary that such approaches should be extended beyond such limits. Town of O'Fallon v. Ohio & M. Ry. Co., 45 Ill. App. 572, 578.

APPROACHING.

"Approaching," as used in Rev. St. c. 17, § 23, providing that persons engaged in blasting rocks shall, before each explosion, give seasonable notice thereof, so that all persons or teams "approaching" shall have time to retire to a safe distance, is equivalent to "in proximity to the place of explosion within the limits of danger." Wadsworth v. Marshall, 34 Atl. 30, 31, 88 Me. 263, 32 L. R. A. 588.

APPROBATION.

"Approbation" means sanction, consent, concurrence. As used in Gen. St. § 2708, providing that the selectmen of any town may, with its "approbation," by a writing signed by them, discontinue any highway, the word does not imply that the approbation of the town must be expressed before the discontinuance is made, but the term "approbation" may as well apply to a consent or acquiescence given subsequently. Welton v. Town of Thomas-town, 24 Atl. 333, 61 Conn. 397.

APPROPRIATE—APPROPRIATION.

See "Instrument of Appropriation";
"There is Hereby Appropriated."
Otherwise appropriated, see "Otherwise."

"The word 'appropriate' means 'to set apart for' or 'assign to' a particular person or use in exclusion of all others." (Law) To alienate. State v. Sloux City & P. R. Co., 7 Neb. 357, 373 (quoting Webst. Dict.); State v. Derham, 39 S. E. 379, 381, 61 S. C. 258.

To "appropriate" "is to allot, assign, set apart, apply in any way to the use of a particular person or thing for a particular purpose." State v. Bordelon, 6 La. Ann. 68, 69; Woodward v. Reynolds, 19 Atl. 511, 512, 58 Conn. 486.

To "appropriate" "is derived from the Latin ad and proprius, and means to take as one's own by exclusive right. A thing cannot be appropriated to the use of any one person as long as any one else is allowed the use of it also." United States v. Nicholson (U. S.) 12 Fed. 522, 524.

To "appropriate" is to make a thing one's own; to make it the subject of property; to exercise dominion over the object to the extent and for the purpose of making it subserve one's own proper use or pleasure. Wulzen v. Board of Sup'rs of City and County of San Francisco, 35 Pac. 353, 356, 101 Cal. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"Appropriate" is defined as the "taking from another to one's self, with or without violence; to take to one's self to the exclusion of all others." The appropriation of money with the intent to deprive the owner thereof, and to commit a crime, and the retaining and keeping of it after the appropriation, is in effect an appropriation to one's self. Such is the meaning of the term in an indictment charging that the defendant did wrongfully, unlawfully, and feloniously appropriate, secrete, withhold, take, steal, and carry away certain property with intent to deprive the owner thereof, and to appropriate the same to defendant's use. People v. Lammeris, 58 N. E. 22, 24, 164 N. Y. 137.

"Appropriation" "means a designation to a particular exclusive use, and in a will indiates an intention to set apart certain property for a specific object." Whitehead v. Gibbons, 10 N. J. Eq. (2 Stockt.) 230, 235.

As conveyance of title.

"The word 'appropriation' may be understood in different senses. It may mean a selection on the part of the vendor where he has a right to choose the article which he is to supply in performance of his contract, and the contract will show when the word is used in that sense. Or the word may mean that both parties have agreed that a certain article shall be delivered in pursuance of the contract, and yet the property may not pass in either case. For the purpose of illustrating this position, suppose a carriage is ordered to be built at a coach maker's; he may make any one he pleases, and if it agree with the order the party is bound to accept it. Now, suppose that at some period subsequent to the order a further bargain is entered into between this party and the coach builder, by which it is agreed that a particular carriage shall be delivered, it would depend upon circumstances whether the property passes, or whether merely the original contract is altered from one which would have been satisfied by the delivery of any carriage answering the terms of the contract into another contract to supply the particular carriage, which in the Roman law was called 'obligatio certi corporis,' where the person is bound to deliver a particular chattel, but where the property does not pass, as it never did by the Roman law, until actual delivery, though the property after the contract remained at the risk of the vendee, and if lost, without any fault in the vendor, the vendee, and not the vendor, was a sufferer. The law of England is different. Here property does not pass until there is a bargain with respect to a specific article, and everything is done which, according to the intention of the parties to the bargain, was necessary to transfer the property to it. Appropriation may also be used in another sense, viz., where both parties agree upon the specific article in which the property is to pass, and nothing remains to be done in order to pass it." Wait v. Baker, 2 Exch. 1, 8.

As an equitable assignment.

"Appropriation," as used in the rule that to constitute an equitable assignment of a particular fund in payment of a debt there must be some appropriation of the fund, may mean "either the giving of an order on the fund, or transferring it in such a manner that the holder would be authorized to pay it to the creditor directly without the intervention of the debtor." Hoyt v. Story (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 262, 264.

Every mode of transfer included.

"Appropriate," as used in Declaration of Rights, providing that whenever the public exigencies required that the property of any individual should be "appropriated" to public uses he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor, embraces every mode by which property may be applied to the use of the public, and whatever exists or public necessity demands may be appropriated. Boston & L. R. Corp. v. Salem & L. R. Co., 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 1, 35.

Power to hold implied.

A will providing that the testator's property, real and personal, should be "appropriated" by his executor in such a manner as would best promote the happiness of testator's wife and children, clearly implies that the executor is to hold that which he is directed to appropriate, and means that the executor should hold and administer the estate until final distribution. Blake v. Dexter, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 559, 568.

Reservation distinguished.

"Appropriation," as used in speaking of the appropriation of land or money by the United States, "implies a setting apart or application to some particular use." It is distinguished from "reservation," which does not imply an absolute disposition in all cases, but the mere withholding from some other disposition, such as sale, etc. Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344, 359.

By army or navy.

"Appropriation," as used in Act July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 381), providing that the jurisdiction of the court of claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or "appropriation" of or damage to property by the army or navy, or any part of the army or navy, engaged in the suppression of the Rebellion, from the commencement to the close thereof, means the taking of property for the use of the army and navy in the exercise of military power, which existed and belonged within the state of war, and which are generally confined to an enemy's country. To appropriate is to take from another to one's self, with or without violence, and hence the taking and occupying of a hotel outside the enemy country for a military hospital, agreeing to pay therefor a specified rent, was not an "appropriation" of such hotel for the use of the army and navy, so as to give the court of claims jurisdiction of an action to recover the rental and for other damages to the building. Waters v. United States, 4 Ct. Cl. 389, 393. It includes "all taking and using of property by the army or navy in the course of the war not authorized by contract with the government. The use may be permanent or temporary, and it may result in the destruction of or mere injury to the property. If the right to the property or to its use is not obtained by a valid contract with the government, the taking or use of it is an 'appropriation,' within the meaning of the act of Congress. The manner of the appropriation, whether made by force or upon the consent of the owner, does not affect the question of jurisdiction." Filior v. United States, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 45, 48, 19 L. Ed. 549.

Where the United States, under a military emergency during the Rebellion, took into its service certain officered and manned steamers for temporary use, the officers acting for the government not intending to appropriate them, nor even their services, but did intend to compel the captains and crews of the steamers to perform the services needed, and to pay a reasonable compensation for such services, and the property, after such services were rendered, was returned to the exclusive possession and control of its owners, there was no such "appropriation of the property" as brought the case within the act of July 4, 1864, which enacts "that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States, growing out of the 'appropriation of property' by the army or navy engaged in the suppression of the Rebellion." United States v. Russell, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 623, 624, 20 L. Ed. 474.

APPROPRIATE DEPARTMENT.

"Appropriate department," as used in Act June 1, 1885, art. 7 (P. L. 45), providing that the city controller should not suffer the appropriation for one item of expense to be drawn upon for any other purpose, or by any department other than that for which the appropriation was specifically made, except on transfers made by the ordinance of councils, article 6 providing that no money should be drawn from the city treasury except by due process of law, or upon warrants signed by the head of the "appropriate department," means the department to which the appropriation is made, and whose head is to draw the warrants. It includes all officials charged with duties pertaining to the city government, for whose expenses the city is obliged to provide. Bailey v. City of Philadelphia, 31 Atl. 925, 927, 167 Pa. 569, 46 Am. St. Rep. 691.

APPROPRIATE DUTIES.

In an instruction in an action stating that, if an employé did not perform his "appropriate duties," he becomes liable for any direct damages his employer may sustain thereby, the term "appropriate duties" means duties which he has undertaken to perform—duties that he has agreed to perform. Brown v. Burr, 28 Atl. 828, 831, 160 Pa. 458.

APPROPRIATE EMBLEM OR DESIGN.

"Appropriate," as used in Sess. Laws 1894, p. 62, § 18, providing that it shall be lawful to designate on the official ballots the political party by which each list is nominated by an "appropriate" emblem or design, such as a flag, eagle, rooster, or other device, etc., does not necessarily mean suggestive of the political doctrines which the organization advocates, but is rather used in the sense of "proper." Kratzer v. Allen, 50 Pac. 209, 10 Colo. App. 492.

APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION.

"Appropriate," as used in the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the United States Constitution, means legislation contemplated to make the amendments fully effective; that is, legislation adapted to carry out the objects the legislators had in view. And whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against state denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power, and hence Act Cong. March 1, 1875, c. 114, § 4, 18 Stat. pt. 3, p. 336 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1261], enacting that no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for services as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States or of any state on account of race, color, or any previous condition of servitude, and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection of jurors, who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined not more than $5,000, was "appropriate legislation." Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 344, 25 L. Ed. 676. The word as so used is equivalent to "necessary and proper." People v. Washington, 36 Cal. 658, 669.

The "appropriate legislation" by which Congress may enforce the right of citizens to exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, authorizes Congress to do no more than interfere when the discrimination is on account of such conditions, and to provide for the punishment of such discriminations. Therefore an act of Congress purporting to deal with such subject, which provided that the elector, in order to be entitled to vote, should only be required to state in his affidavit that he had been wrongfully prevented by the officer from qualifying, with no words of limitation as to the cause of such prevention, and which further provided for the punishment of all persons who by force, bribery, etc., hinder, delay, etc., any person from qualifying or voting, was too broad, and not appropriate legislation to prevent unlawful discrimination. United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 218, 23 L. Ed. 563.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

In determining whether a bill appropriating money for the erection of a capital building was an "appropriation bill" or not, it was contended that, if an unrestricted meaning be given to the word "appropriation," all bills providing for the appropriation of money, however incidental, are appropriation bills. This, however, is not necessarily conceded. It is true that all general appropriation bills provide money for certain purposes, ordinarily for the expenses of the government and public institutions, and incidentally may provide for the application of the appropriation, and specify the purchase of materials required in running the same, and how it shall be done; yet such incidental specifications do not deprive the appropriation bill of its nature as general, and it was held that the act in question, which provides money to be used by a board already existing, with matured powers to proceed, constitutes an appropriation bill. State v. Rogers, 64 Pac. 515, 516, 24 Wash. 417.

APPROPRIATION OF LAND.

See "Unappropriated."

To enter upon the lands of another, not for a preliminary purpose, but for the making of an embankment or roadway upon them for public travel and use, is a clear taking or appropriation of the land within the provision of the Constitution that no land shall be taken until full compensation therefor be first made or secured. Eidemiller v. Wyandotte City (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 383, 384.

The abatement of a nuisance, nothing more being required or done, is not of itself, and within the meaning of the Constitution, an appropriation of property to public uses. Sweet v. Rechel, 16 Sup. Ct. 43, 47, 159 U. S. 380, 40 L. Ed. 188.

As conveying title.

"Appropriate," as used in Misc. Laws 530, § 26, authorizing a railroad corporation to appropriate a portion of the highway, is not "to be understood in the same sense as in the appropriation of lands belonging to private individuals, where the corporation becomes entitled to the property. By the appropriation of part of the highway the corporation acquires no right except to use the public road in common with all other travelers upon it, unless it makes an agreement with the county court as provided in the section." Douglas County Road Co. v. Canyonville & G. Road Co., 8 Or. 102, 107; Oregon R. Co. v. City of Portland, 9 Or. 231, 238.

As grant.

In Act March 20, 1863, providing for the construction of a railroad, and that there shall be withheld from sale swamp land not otherwise "appropriated," the term "appropriated" signifies an appropriation by the Legislature for some purpose similar to that intended by the act in question—a disposition of the lands in some way by which the state is to part with the title. People ex rel. Houghton County v. State Land Office Com'rs, 23 Mich. 270, 278.

Occupancy included.

"Appropriation" is defined by Webster as a setting apart for a particular use. An appropriation does not necessarily include occupancy. For instance, the government may appropriate land for military reservations or Indian reservations, but they may or may not occupy them as such. The word is commonly used by the government in setting aside lands for special purposes. McSorley v. Hill, 27 Pac. 552, 556, 2 Wash. St. 638.

As set apart for particular use.

To "appropriate," in the sense that the word is used in the land laws of the United States, is to select the land for a particular purpose. King v. McAndrews (U. S.) 104 Fed. 430, 438.

The definition of the term "appropriate" is "to consign to some particular purpose or use; to set apart for some use." In this sense, therefore, "to be appropriated," in Rev. St. § 1464, authorizing township trustees to acquire lands for cemetery purposes, and providing that no lands shall "be appropriated" on which there are any houses, barns, stables, or other buildings, etc., means to be devoted to some purpose or use. Henry v. Trustees of Perry Tp., 30 N. E. 1122, 1124, 48 Ohio St. 671, 677.

To "appropriate" is to set apart for; to assign for a particular use; to take to one's self in exclusion of others. Thus, where the United States received a conveyance of land for the purpose of constructing a naval depot thereon, and in good faith took actual possession of the property and commenced the construction of the naval depot, the property was actually appropriated for that purpose, as it should be if the navy yard and depot were in actual operation. Murdock v. City of Memphis, 47 Tenn. (7 Cold.) 483, 500.

In a grant made by the Governor of Louisiana stating that, "exercising the authority which the King has granted to us, we destine and 'appropriate' in his royal name the aforesaid twelve leagues," the word "appropriate" signifies to set apart for or assign to a particular use, in exclusion of all other uses; to claim or use by an exclusive right. United States v. City of Philadelphia, 52 U. S. (11 How.) 609, 660, 13 L. Ed. 834.

In Act Cong. 1830, providing that the right of pre-emption does not extend to any lands which are reserved from sale by the act of Congress or by order of the President, or which may have been "appropriated" for any purpose whatever, or for the use of the United States, or either of the states in which they may be situated, the term "appropriated" means set apart or applied to some particular use by virtue of law; that is, under the authority of an act of Congress, and not by any other power. Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344, 360.

Rev. St. § 1464, authorizes township trustees to acquire by purchase or appropriation lands for cemetery purposes. Held, that the word "appropriate" is used in the ordinary sense of "devoted to some purpose or use." Henry v. Trustees of Perry Tp., 30 N. E. 1122, 1124, 48 Ohio St. 671.

Unlawful occupancy distinguished.

The term as used in the pre-emption law was defined by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344. In its opinion the court says, "we take it for granted that there can be neither a reservation nor an appropriation of the public domain for any purpose whatever without the express authority of the law," and, later, "It is in our judgment entirely useless to discuss the precise meaning of the term appropriated in its general and extended sense, because its meaning and application in the manner it has been used in the pre-emption law cannot, we think, admit of a doubt. It means nothing more in the sense in which it is used than an application of the lands to some specific use or purpose by virtue of law, and not by any other power." A mere occupancy of land at the time it was listed to a state under Act Cong. June 16, 1880, which granted lands from unappropriated lands, did not constitute an appropriation as against a subsequent purchaser from the state. Springer v. Clopath, 65 Pac. 804, 26 Nev. 183.

As use of power of eminent domain.

Const. art. 12, § 11, providing that no foreign corporation shall have power to "condemn or appropriate" property, means that such corporation cannot use the power of eminent domain to acquire property for its uses. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Foltz (U. S.) 52 Fed. 627, 629.

APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

"Appropriation of payments" is the application of a payment to one of several debts, and where payments are made by a debtor without instructions as to which of several debts shall be credited therewith, and there is no agreement as to how the same shall be applied, but the course of dealings between the parties has authorized the creditor to rely on a tacit understanding that payments are applied most beneficially for him, the law will apply them accordingly, though the creditor neglects so to do. Gwin v. McLean, 62 Miss. 121, 124.

Appropriation of payments is the application of a payment to the liquidation of a particular debt. When a debtor makes a payment to one to whom he is indebted on more than one demand, the debtor may insist on a credit on one of the particular demands, and unless he gets it may withhold the money; and so, if the debtor performs labor for a creditor, he may agree that the price of that labor shall go to his credit on a particular demand; and in either case the creditor cannot change the destination of the money or labor without the consent of the debtor. If nothing is said or agreed beforehand as to which debt the payment is to be applied, he, the creditor, may apply it to either at his option; but even then, after so applying it to one debt, if the application is known and agreed to by the debtor, the creditor cannot thereafter change it without the consent of the debtor. Martin v. Drabner (Pa.) 5 Watts, 544, 545. Appropriation, where a debtor has failed to signify where he wishes the payment applied, is a right which must be exercised by the creditor within a reasonable time after the payment, and the right must be evidenced by the performance of some act indicative of an intention to appropriate. Where neither has exercised the right of appropriation, the law presumes in ordinary credit cases that the debtor intended to pay in a way which at the time was most to his advantage. Harker v. Conrad (Pa.) 12 Serg. & R. 301, 304, 14 Am. Dec. 691.

It is the general rule that when money is paid generally, without any appropriation, it ought to be applied to the first items in the account; but the rule is subject to this qualification: that when there are distinct demands, one against persons in partnership, and another against only one of the partners, if the money paid be the money of the partners, the creditor is not at liberty to apply it to the payment of the debt of the individual: that would be allowing the creditor to pay the debt of one person with the money of others. Thompson v. Brown, 1 Moody & M. 40, 41.

Defendant, being indebted, gave his creditors a mortgage, and also accepted bills of exchange drawn by them. They assigned such bills to plaintiff, and also delivered to him the mortgage, but without an assignment. Defendant afterwards paid plaintiff a certain sum and took his receipt therefor "on account, without prejudice to the claim we have upon any securities we hold." The court held that the payment was on account generally, and was applicable to any existing demand; but that the only legal demand which plaintiff held was the bills, and that the payment could not be appropriated as a payment on the mortgage, as to which plain-tiff's title was merely equitable. Birch v. Tebbutt, 2 Starkie, 74, 75.

APPROPRIATION OF PUBLIC MONEY.

See "Specific Appropriation."

"Appropriation" is the setting apart from the public revenue of a certain sum of money for a specified object, in such manner that the executive officers of the government are authorized to use that money, and no more, for that object, and for no other. State v. Moore, 69 N. W. 373, 376, 50 Neb. 88, 61 Am. St. Rep. 538 (citing Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328; Clayton v. Berry, 27 Ark. 129; Stratton v. Green, 45 Cal. 149; State v. La Grave, 41 Pac. 1075, 23 Nev. 25, 62 Am. St. Rep. 764; State v. Wallichs, 12 Neb. 407, 11 N. W. 860; State v. Wallichs, 16 Neb. 679, 21 N. W. 397; Proll v. Dunn, 22 Pac. 143, 145, 80 Cal. 220.

To appropriate means to allot, assign, set apart, or apply to a particular use or purpose. An "appropriation," in the sense of the Constitution, means the setting apart a portion of the public funds for a public purpose, and there must be money placed in the fund applicable to the designated purpose to constitute an appropriation. State v. La Grave, 41 Pac. 1075, 1076, 23 Nev. 25, 62 Am. St. Rep. 764.

To "appropriate" means to set apart; to assign to a particular use. As used in Act Tenn. Feb. 6, 1805, authorizing the county courts of the respective counties of the state to "appropriate" money for the purpose of providing a county exhibit at a certain exposition, it means that the county court shall have power, out of the fund arising from taxes assessed for general county purposes, to set apart or assign such sum of money as should be deemed prudent and necessary. Felton v. Hamilton County (U. S.) 97 Fed. 823, 824, 38 C. C. A. 432.

"Appropriation" is defined by Webster to be the act of setting apart or assigning to a particular use. Chitty says it is the application of the payment of a sum of money by a debtor to a creditor to one of several debts which are due from the former to the latter. The expression in the Constitution of the state, "appropriated by law," means the act of the Legislature setting apart or assigning to a particular use a certain sum of money to be used in the payment of the debts or dues from the state to its creditors. The people have said in their sovereign capacity that no money shall be paid out of the treasury until their representatives by solemn enactment have assigned and set apart the public revenues of the state for specific purposes. Clayton v. Berry, 27 Ark. 129, 131.

As authority to pay.

"Appropriation," as used with regard to a general fund in the state treasury, "is an authority from the Legislature, given at the proper time and in the legal form, to the proper officers, to apply sums of money out of that which may be in the treasury in a given year to specified objects or demands against the state. An appropriation of the money to a specified object would be an authority to the proper officers to pay the money, because the Auditor is authorized to draw his warrant on an appropriation, and the Treasurer is authorized to pay such warrant if he has appropriated money in the treasury." State v. Kenney, 24 Pac. 96, 98, 9 Mont. 389.

As applied to the general fund in the treasury of a state, "appropriation" is defined to be an authority from the Legislature, given at the proper time and in legal form, to the proper officer, to supply sums of money out of that which may be in the treasury in a given year for specific objects or demands against the state. State v. Lindsley, 3 Wash. St. 125, 126, 27 Pac. 1019; State v. King, 67 S. W. 812, 813, 108 Tenn. 271; Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328, 331; Shattuck v. Kincaid, 49 Pac. 758, 760, 31 Or. 379.

An "appropriation" of money to a specific object is an authority to the proper officers to pay the money because the auditor is authorized to draw his warrant upon an appropriation, and the treasurer is authorized to pay such warrant if he has appropriated money in the treasury. Proll v. Dunn, 22 Pac. 143, 145, 80 Cal. 220.

Constitutional provision.

Where the Constitution fixes the salary of an officer, and provides that the auditor shall draw warrants on the state quarterly therefor, to be paid out of all funds not otherwise appropriated, it is an appropriation of the amount necessary to pay such salary, and no legislative act is necessary. State v. Weston, 4 Neb. 216, 217.

Const. art. 5, § 34, declaring that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except on "appropriations made by law," does not refer exclusively to appropriations made by the State Legislature, but includes also appropriations made by the Constitution itself, as, for instance, under Const. art. 7, § 4, declaring that certain state officers shall receive a certain sum as compensation, the salaries of the officers enumerated are required to be paid though the Legislature has made no appropriation therefor, since the constitutional provision that the salaries shall be paid of itself constitutes "an appropriation made by law." State v. Hickman, 23 Pac. 740, 741, 742, 9 Mont. 370, 8 L. R. A. 403.

Creation of salaried office.

The act of 1899, as amended by Acts 1901, c. 67, creating the office of shop and factory inspector, and providing that the salary of said inspector shall be $1,200 per an-act of Congress or by order of the President, or which may have been "appropriated" for any purpose whatever, or for the use of the United States, or either of the states in which they may be situated, the term "appropriated" means set apart or applied to some particular use by virtue of law; that is, under the authority of an act of Congress, and not by any other power. Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344, 360.

Rev. St. § 1464, authorizes township trustees to acquire by purchase or appropriation lands for cemetery purposes. Held, that the word "appropriate" is used in the ordinary sense of "devoted to some purpose or use." Henry v. Trustees of Perry Tp., 30 N. E. 1122, 1124, 48 Ohio St. 671.

Unlawful occupancy distinguished.

The term as used in the pre-emption law was defined by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344. In its opinion the court says, "we take it for granted that there can be neither a reservation nor an appropriation of the public domain for any purpose whatever without the express authority of the law," and, later, "It is in our judgment entirely useless to discuss the precise meaning of the term appropriated in its general and extended sense, because its meaning and application in the manner it has been used in the pre-emption law cannot, we think, admit of a doubt. It means nothing more in the sense in which it is used than an application of the lands to some specific use or purpose by virtue of law, and not by any other power." A mere occupancy of land at the time it was listed to a state under Act Cong. APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

"Appropriation of payment" is the application of a payment to the payment of debts, and where payment is made by a debtor to a creditor, the payment is appropriated to the payment of the debt, unless the creditor has agreed to apply it to some other purpose. Jackson v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344, 360.

though the creditor negates the application. v. McLean, 62 Miss. 12.

Appropriation of payment is the application of a payment to the payment of a particular debt. When a payment is made to one to whom he is indebted, and there is more than one demand, the payment is appropriated to one of the demands, unless he gets it may be applied to any other, so, if the debtor performs the debt, he may agree that the payment shall go to his credit on another demand, in either case the creditor has the destination of the payment, and the consent of the debtor is not required, or agreed beforehand. Payment is to be applied to the payment of the debt, even then, after the application of the payment to the debt, the creditor may change it without the consent of the debtor. Martin v. Drake, 100 Ill. 400. Appropriation, in the case of a payment, signifies where the payment is applied, is a right which belongs to the creditor, and after the payment is made, it is evidenced by the receipt, which is indicative of the application. Where neither the creditor nor the debtor has appropriated, the payment is applied to the payment of the debt in a way which is not to the advantage of the debtor. Id., 400, & R. 301, 304.

It is the right of the creditor to apply the payment to the payment of the debt, and he is not bound to apply it to the payment of the debt, unless he has agreed to do so. Id., 400, & R. 301, 304.

hereby declared to be the property of the public, and the same is subject to "appropri-cessful application of the water to the beneficial use and design; and the method of carrying the same, or making such application, is immaterial. Farmers' High Line

Canal & Reservoir Co. v. Southworth, 21 Pac.
1028, 13 Colo. 111, 4 L. R. A. 767.

"Appropriation of water consists in the intention, accompanied by reasonable diligence, to use the water for the purposes originally contemplated at the time of its diversion. The right of appropriation, as defined by the best authorities, is not controlled by the location of the stream with reference to the premises which are irrigated; and the further fact that the point of diversion may have been at times changed does not affect the right. The right to use the water is the essence of appropriation. The means by which it is done are incidental. Offield v.
Ish, 57 Pac. 809, 810, 21 Wash. 277.

To constitute a legal appropriation, the water diverted must be applied within a reasonable time to some beneficial use; that is to say, that diversion ripens into a valid appropriation only when the water is utilized by the consumer, though the priority of such appropriation may date, proper diligence having been used, from the commencement of the canal or ditch. Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irr. Co., 17 Pac. 487, 489, 490, 11
Colo. 582, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603.

"Appropriation," as used in connection with the taking of water for public purposes, means to take to one's self, as one's own;
to take; a prior appropriation means a prior taking. To constitute an appropriation of this kind there must be an actual intent to take, presently or in the near future, and that intent must be manifestly carried out by suitable acts. New Haven Water Co. v.
Borough of Wallingford, 44 Atl. 235, 239, 72
Conn. 293.

An appropriation of water is the intent to take, accompanied by some open physical demonstration of the intent, and for some valuable use. Such definition is applicable to appropriations of water; that is to say, that when the individual, by some open physical demonstration, indicates an intent to take for a valuable or beneficial use, and through such demonstration ultimately suc-

num, payable monthly on warrant of comptroller, as other salaries are paid, is in and of itself an appropriation by law, so that Const. art. 2, § 24, providing that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of "appropriations" made by law, and Shannon's Code, § 287, providing that no money shall be paid from the treasury unless the law under which it is claimed expressly directs payment, do not justify the comptroller in refusing to issue warrants for such salary on the ground that no appropriation had been made therefor. State v. King, 67 S. W. 812, 813, 108 Tenn. 271.

As designation of amount and fund.

Nothing more is requisite to the legislative appropriation of money than a designation of the amount, and the fund out of which it shall be paid. It is not essential to its validity that funds to meet the same should be at the time in the treasury. The constitutional provision that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made in law means only that no money shall be drawn except in pursuance of law. People v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11, 28.

As payment.

Const. art. 6, § 3, provides that no money or property of the state shall be given or appropriated for the benefit of any sectarian or religious society or institution. Article 8, § 16, declares that no appropriation of lands, money, or other property or credits to aid any sectarian school shall ever be made by the state, or any county or municipality within the state. Held, that the word "appropriation," as there used, means something more than a gift or donation, but also includes a payment to any sectarian school for services rendered to the state, and therefore precluded the state officers from auditing claims of such schools for services. Synod of Dakota v. State, 50 N. W. 632, 635, 2 S. D. 366, 14 L. R. A. 418.

As promise to pay.

"Appropriation," as used in Const. art. 10, § 3, providing that no money shall be drawn from the state treasury but in pursuance of "appropriations" made by law, means authority from the Treasurer, given at the proper time, and in legal form, to the proper officers, to apply sums of money out of that which may be in the treasury in a given year to a specified object or demand against the state. "An appropriation of the money to a specified object would be an authority to the proper officers to pay the money, because the Auditor is authorized to draw his warrant upon an 'appropriation,' and the Treasurer is authorized to pay such warrant if he had appropriated money in the treasury. Such an 'appropriation' may be prospective; that is, it may be made in one year of the revenues to accrue in another or future years, the law being so framed as to address itself to such future revenue; so a direction to pay money out of the treasury upon a given claim or for a given object may, by implication, include in the direction an appropriation. But the pledge of the faith of the state that revenues shall be provided in the future, and applied to the discharge of given claims against the states, does not authorize the officers of the state, without further legislative direction, to apply the general fund in the treasury to the payment of those claims; it is not an appropriation of the money in the general fund." "A promise by the government to pay money is not an appropriation. A duty on the part of the Legislature to make an appropriation is not such. A promise to make an appropriation is not an appropriation. The pledge of the faith of the state is not an appropriation of money with which to redeem the pledge. Usage of paying money, in the absence of an appropriation, cannot make an appropriation for future payment." Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328, 331.

Technical words not necessary.

The use of the words "out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated" are not necessary to make an appropriation operative. Proll v. Dunn, 22 Pac. 143, 145, 80 Cal. 220.

The use of technical words in a statute making an appropriation is not necessary. There may be an appropriation of public money without in any manner designating the act as an "appropriation." A direction to a proper officer or officers to pay money out of the treasury, or for a given object, may by implication be held to be an appropriation of a sufficient amount of money to make the required payments. Campbell v. State Soldiers' & Sailors' Monument Com'rs, 18 N. E. 33, 34, 115 Ind. 591.

No particular expression or set form of words is requisite or necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose, and the appropriation may be for one year, or from the revenues to accrue in another or future years. Shattuck v. Kincaid, 49 Pac. 758, 760, 31 Or. 379.

Though no money can be rightfully drawn from the treasury of the state except under an "appropriation" made by law, such appropriation may be made impliedly as well as expressly, and in general as well as in specific terms. The use of technical words in a statute making an appropriation of public money is unnecessary. There may be an appropriation without in any manner designating the act as an appropriation. A direction to the proper officer to pay money out of the treasury on a given claim or class of claims or for a given object may by implication be held an appropriation of a sufficient amount to make the required payments. Henderson v. Indiana State Board of Agriculture, 28 N. E. 127, 130, 129 Ind. 92.

APPROPRIATION OF WATER.

See "Prior Appropriation."

"To constitute a valid appropriation of water, three elements must always exist: (1) An intent to apply it to some beneficial use existing at the time or contemplated in the future; (2) a diversion from the natural channel by means of a ditch, canal, or other structure; (3) an application of it within a reasonable time to some useful industry." Low v. Rizer, 37 Pac. 82, 84, 25 Or. 551.

The Supreme Court of California defines the word "appropriation" as follows: "The intent to take, accompanied by some open physical demonstration of the intent, and for some valuable use" (McDonald v. Bear River & Auburn Water & Mining Co., 13 Cal. 220); and the Supreme Court of Colorado, quoting, approves this definition: "When the individual, by some open physical demonstration, indicates an intent to take for valuable or beneficial use, and through such demonstration ultimately succeeds in applying the water to the use designed, there is such an appropriation." While diversion must of necessity take place before the water is actually applied to the irrigation of the soil, the appropriation, in legal contemplation, made within the act evidencing the intent, is performed. Of course, such initial act must be followed up with reasonable diligence, and the purpose must be consummated without unnecessary delay. Clough v. Wing (Ariz.) 17 Pac. 453, 457 (citing Larimer Company R. Co. v. People, 8 Colo. 614, 9 Pac. 794).

In order to constitute a valid "appropriation" of water, there must be an actual diversion of the same, with intent to apply it to a beneficial use, followed by an application to such use within a reasonable time. Walsh v. Wallace, 67 Pac. 914, 917, 26 Nev. 299; Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co., 28 Pac. 966, 967, 17 Colo. 146, 31 Am. St. Rep. 275; Longmire v. Smith, 67 Pac. 246, 249, 26 Wash. 439, 58 L. R. A. 308.

"Appropriation," as applied to water rights, is often loosely used by the authorities, and in general it is used with reference to a claim to the use of the water of a public stream from the time of the inception of the right, at all the intermediate stages, and down to the time when the last act is accomplished by which the right is finally and completely secured. An appropriation proper is not made until there has been an actual application of the water claimed to some beneficial purpose or some useful industry. All rights acquired prior to this time, at whatever step in the process, amounts simply to a claim of an appropriation, but they are none the less rights and privileges which may be asserted and maintained against all persons not entitled to priority in rights and privileges of a like nature. Nevada Ditch Co. v. Bennet, 45 Pac. 472, 479, 30 Or. 59, 60 Am. St. Rep. 777; Hague v. Nephi Irr. Co., 52 Pac. 765, 16 Utah, 421, 41 L. R. A. 311, 67 Am. St. Rep. 634; Ft. Morgan Land & Canal Co. v. South Platte Ditch Co., 30 Pac. 1032, 1033, 18 Colo. 1, 36 Am. St. Rep. 259.

Const. art. 16, § 5, provides that every natural stream not heretofore appropriated is hereby declared to be the property of the public, and the same is subject to "appropriation," will be construed to mean the successful application of the water to the beneficial use and design; and the method of carrying the same, or making such application, is immaterial. Farmers' High Line Canal & Reservoir Co. v. Southworth, 21 Pac. 1028, 13 Colo. 111, 4 L. R. A. 767.

"Appropriation of water consists in the intention, accompanied by reasonable diligence, to use the water for the purposes originally contemplated at the time of its diversion. The right of appropriation, as defined by the best authorities, is not controlled by the location of the stream with reference to the premises which are irrigated; and the further fact that the point of diversion may have been at times changed does not affect the right. The right to use the water is the essence of appropriation. The means by which it is done are incidental. Offield v. Ish, 57 Pac. 809, 810, 21 Wash. 277.

To constitute a legal appropriation, the water diverted must be applied within a reasonable time to some beneficial use; that is to say, that diversion ripens into a valid appropriation only when the water is utilized by the consumer, though the priority of such appropriation may date, proper diligence having been used, from the commencement of the canal or ditch. Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irr. Co., 17 Pac. 487, 489, 490, 11 Colo. 582, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603.

"Appropriation," as used in connection with the taking of water for public purposes, means to take to one's self, as one's own; to take; a prior appropriation means a prior taking. To constitute an appropriation of this kind there must be an actual intent to take, presently or in the near future, and that intent must be manifestly carried out by suitable acts. New Haven Water Co. v. Borough of Wallingford, 44 Atl. 235, 239, 72 Conn. 293.

An appropriation of water is the intent to take, accompanied by some open physical demonstration of the intent, and for some valuable use. Such definition is applicable to appropriations of water; that is to say, that when the individual, by some open physical demonstration, indicates an intent to take for a valuable or beneficial use, and through such demonstration ultimately succeeds in applying the water to the use designed, there is an appropriation. Larimer County Reservoir Co. v. People, 9 Pac. 794, 796, 8 Colo. 614.

The true test of appropriation of water in its legal sense is the "successful application of water to the beneficial use desired; the method of diverting it, or carrying it, or making the application being wholly immaterial. It is not even necessary that ditches be used. Thus, if a dike or other contrivance will sufficient to turn the water from the stream and moisten the land sought to be cultivated, it is sufficient, although no ditch be needed or constructed. McCall v. Porter, 70 Pac. 820, 822, 42 Or. 49 (citing Long, Irr. § 49).

The taking of water from an irrigation ditch which did not belong to the taker, though an appropriation in the sense in which any wrongful taking of property is an appropriation, was not an appropriation within the meaning of the law regulating the water rights on the public domain. Goldsmith v. Newhouse (Colo.) 72 Pac. 809.

Conversion distinguished.

A mere conversion of water from a stream does not constitute an "appropriation" recognized by the Constitution of the state. To make it such, there must be an application of the water to a beneficial use. And in case of irrigation it must be applied to the land, to make the appropriation complete. Farmers' Independent Ditch Co. v. Agricultural Ditch Co., 45 Pac. 444, 447, 22 Colo. 513, 55 Am. St. Rep. 149.

As distribute.

In a broad sense, to "appropriate" is to make one's own, to make it a subject of property, and is often used in the sense of denoting the acquisition of property and a right of exclusive enjoyment in those things which before were without an owner or were publici juris; but it is also used in the sense of prescribing money or property to a particular use, as to appropriate money to a designated purpose, to appropriate land to grazing or fruit or other purpose. It is also used in the sense of "to distribute." Where water is designed, set apart, and devoted to purposes of sale, rental, or distribution, it is appropriated to those uses or some of them, and becomes subject to public use within the provision of the statute that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is thereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the control of the state. Merrill v. Southside Irr. Co., 44 Pac. 720, 722, 112 Cal. 426.

APPROPRIATOR.

Appropriators are diverters of the waters of a stream. Lux v. Hagglin, 10 Pac. 674, 786, 69 Cal. 255.

An "appropriator," using this term in its full and absolute sense, so as to include both a diversion and an application, both of which are essential to the completion of a title to water, acquires a right of property in that which he has appropriated. It is a right in one sense absolute, and in another qualified, at least qualified as to its rights with respect to third persons. The title to the waters of a state always remain in a measurable sense in the people. An appropriator may acquire title, but that title is necessarily subject to many conditions. Suffolk Gold Min. & Mill. Co. v. Miguel Consol. Min. & Mill. Co., 48 Pac. 828, 830, 9 Colo. App. 407.

APPROVAL.

An act which passes both Houses of the Legislature, and which contains an emergency clause providing that it shall take effect "from and after its approval by the Governor," but which the Governor never approves, but vetoes, and is then passed by both Houses of the Legislature by the necessary majority, takes effect and is in force from and after its passage. Biggs v. McBride, 21 Pac. 878, 879, 17 Or. 640, 5 L. R. A. 115.

APPROVE.

"Approve," as used in a city charter requiring the mayor of the city to "approve" the vote, resolution, order, etc., of the common council in order to render it operative, means that such approval must be in writing. New York & N. E. R. Co. v. City of Waterbury, 10 Atl. 162, 163, 55 Conn. 19.

A board of directors may "approve" a surety on a bond of an employé by vote or by tacit and implied assent. The assent may be more difficult to prove by parol evidence than if it were reduced to writing, but it is not a sufficient reason for declaring the assent inoperative. The approval is a matter of discretion, and, that discretion once being exercised, it is of very little consequence whether a written minute of the vote be made or not. All that the bank is interested in is that there shall be an approval, and it matters not whether that fact is established by a direct record or by acts of the directors which recognize its prior existence. Bank of United States v. Dandridge, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 64, 83, 6 L. Ed. 552.

One of the conditions of a fire policy issued by the Ontario & Livingston Mutual Insurance Company was that, in case the assured should make any other insurance on the same property, and should not with all reasonable diligence give notice thereof to the company, and have the same indorsed on the policy, or otherwise "acknowledged" and "approved" by them in writing, the policy should cease and be of no further effect.

Within a few months afterwards the insured effected a further insurance in another company on the property, at the same time forwarding a written notice of the fact to the secretary of the Ontario & Livingston Mutual Insurance Company; and on the next day the insured received a letter from the secretary in these words: "I have received your notice of additional insurance." Held, in an action on the policy, that the letter imported both an acknowledgment and an approval in writing, within the meaning of the condition as to further insurance, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover. Potter v. Ontario & L. Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 147, 149.

Determination or discretion implied.

"Approve" means "to pronounce good; think or judge well of; admit the propriety or excellence of; be pleased with; commend"; and as used in Pol. Code, § 17, providing that all contracts made by the state furnishing board must be "approved" by the Governor or State Treasurer, means more than merely ministerial approval. They must exercise judicial discretion. State v. Smith, 57 Pac. 449, 451, 23 Mont. 44.

"Approved," as used in Pol. Code, § 3456, providing that money collected upon an assessment for the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands shall be paid into the county treasury and paid out for the work of reclamation, upon the warrants of the trustees of the reclamation district, "approved" by the board of supervisors of the county, should be construed to mean that the board of supervisors should have a discretion in the approval of such warrant, and not that they should be bound to indorse as "approved" every warrant drawn by the trustees of a district. "The word 'approved' does not ex vi termini necessarily import the exercise of discretion. However, when an approval of a distinct officer is made necessary to validate or consummate the act of another, it is the intention of the Legislature that he should be vested with the option to sanction officially or disapprove the act submitted to him, which involves the idea of discretion and adjudication. Yet such presumed intention is not conclusive, and if it clearly appears from the nature of the act or from the express language of the context that the word 'approved' is used in a more limited sense, and imposes a mere ministerial or clerical duty, the court will so hold." Cosner v. Colusa County Sup'rs, 58 Cal. 274, 275.

As used in Act 1798, providing that the chancellor should "approve" a decree of the orphans' court for the sale of the lands of a ward, "approve" implies a revisory proceeding, as the term is only appropriate to such an act, and the statute clearly contemplates a previous decree by the orphans' court to receive the approbation of the chancellor. Thaw v. Ritchie (D. C.) 5 Mackay, 200, 225.

A policy of insurance providing that applications, if "approved," shall bear date on the reception of the application, does not reserve to the company the arbitrary right of setting aside at their pleasure any contract that their agents may make, no matter how fair it may be, or how strictly it may comply with their terms of insurance or with their directions to their agents, and the phrase refers simply to their right to defend themselves against fraud and mistake, so as not to bind themselves by ratifying the contract by the issuing of the policy. Palm v. Medina County Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 20 Ohio, 529, 538.

"Approve," as used in Laws, § 5845, providing that the board of education shall levy tax in support of schools, which levy shall be "approved," etc., means to accept as good or sufficient for the purposes intended, and does not vest any discretion with the city council to determine whether such levy is proper. Board of Education of City of Kingfisher v. City of Kingfisher, 48 Pac. 103, 105, 5 Okl. 82.

A provision in the by-laws of an insurance order, requiring that all proofs of death or disability benefits shall be "approved" by the subordinate council to which the claim belongs, is directory as to the mode of preparing proofs for those who are to act upon the claim, and does not give the subordinate council the right to reject the claim itself. Albert v. Order of Chosen Friends (U. S.) 34 Fed. 721, 724.

As equitable assignment of bill.

To "approve a bill" is one thing, to order it to be paid out of a particular fund is quite a different thing. The approving of a claim does not make it operate as an equitable assignment. Flaherty v. Atlantic Lumber Co., 44 Atl. 186, 190, 58 N. J. Eq. 467.

APPROVE OF.

The words "approve of" and "consent to" do not, singly or combined, express the idea of contribution to or procurement of a felonious act, for a person may be present and heartily approve of an act after it is done without being at all willing to or capable of aiding or advising or procuring it to be done, especially if it be felonious; or he may consent in the sense of offering no resistance to the commission of the act, or the slightest contribution to it of his own will; and therefore it is erroneous in a homicide case to instruct that, if defendant did in some manifest manner approve of or consent to the killing of deceased by another, he would be guilty of the crime. True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 685, 90 Ky. 651; Omer v. Commonwealth, 25 S. W. 594, 596, 95 Ky. 353.

APPROVED.

Written beneath an account, with the signature of the highway supervisor subscribed in his official capacity, the word "approve" is an official certification of the account, and identifies it as that of the supervisor, and is equivalent to marking it "O. K." or "correct," which is usually recognized as a certification in ordinary business affairs. State v. Gee, 42 Pac. 7, 9, 28 Or. 100.

"Approved," as indorsed on an official bond by the Secretary of the Interior, merely imports that the bond is deemed a sufficient security to be accepted, and does not necessarily constitute a direction that the bond was to be accepted in lieu of an existing bond, and that the existing bond was to be discharged. United States v. Haynes (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 238, 239.

"Approved" is a proper word to apply to the act of the Governor in affixing his signature to an act of the Legislature. Chumasero v. Potts, 2 Mont. 242, 285.

The word "approved," on an application for the incorporation of a borough, indorsed thereon by the foreman of the grand jury, with his signature attached thereto, does not show the necessary action of the grand jury within the meaning of a statute providing for the submission of such application to the grand jury, and directing, if a majority thereof shall find that the conditions have been complied with, and shall believe it expedient to grant the prayer of the application, they shall certify the same to the court. In re Incorporation of Summit Borough, 7 Atl. 219, 220, 114 Pa. 362.

APPROVED BILL OR PAPER.

A contract for the sale of goods requiring payment by an "approved bill" means a bill to which there was no reasonable objection, and which ought to be approved. To allow the seller in an arbitrary manner to repudiate the bill would be to enable him, according to his interest or caprice, to annul a contract by which the purchaser was absolutely bound. Hodgson v. Davies, 2 Camp. 530, 532.

Where an auctioneer's sale was for "approved indorsed paper," such phrase meant paper which should be approved, and not such as might be in fact approved by the seller. Guier v. Page (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 1.

APPROVED SECURITY.

Webster gives as one of the definitions of "approve" "to make or show to be worthy of approbation or acceptance," and it has such meaning in a contract providing that the purchaser of certain goods shall give a note with approved security. Sweeney v. Vaughn, 29 S. W. 903, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 434 (citing Hodgson v. Davies, 2 Camp. 530; Andis v. Personett, 9 N. E. 101, 108 Ind. 202).

"Approved security," in the authority given an officer to sell property on approved security, means any security satisfactory to the officers having the power to approve it. Platter v. County of Elkhart, 2 N. E. 544, 556, 103 Ind. 360.

The "approved security" which an executor must take when he sells property of the estate on credit, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2717, is national and state bonds and mortgages on real estate, although in other portions of the Code it means a bond or undertaking with one or more sureties. In re Woodbury, 35 N. Y. Supp. 485, 488, 13 Misc. Rep. 474.

APPROVEMENT.

"Approvement," at common law, was a species of confession. When a person indicted of treason or felony was arraigned he might confess the charge before plea, plead an appeal, or accuse another as his accomplice of the same crime in order to obtain his pardon. Such approvement was only allowed in capital offenses, and was equivalent to indictment, as the appellee was equally required to answer to the charge; and, if proved guilty, the judgment of the law was against him, and the approver so called was entitled to his pardon; on the other hand, if the appellee was acquitted, the judgment was that the approver should be condemned. Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, 599, 25 L. Ed. 399; Gray v. People, 26 Ill. (16 Peck) 344, 346 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 267).

"Approvement" was an ancient method by which a felon turned state's evidence. The course was for the culprit to confess the truth of the charge against him, and, on being sworn, to reveal all the treason and felonies within his knowledge, and to enter before a coroner his appeal against all his partners in crime who were within the realm. The criminal thus confessing was called an "approver," or, in Latin, "probator," and the person implicated was styled the "appellee." By this confession and appeal the approver put it in the discretion of the court either to give judgment and award the execution against him, or to respite him until a conviction of his partners in guilt; and if it was deemed advisable to admit him as an approver, and then if, upon being sworn, he made a full and true disclosure, and also convicted the appellee, either by his oath or on wager of battle, the King, ex merito justitiæ, pardoned him as for life. This practice, with its conditions that the appellee could claim a trial by battle and that grace to the approver should be abandoned on his conviction of his associate in crime, was plainly at variance with modern sentiments and habits, and for that reason the practice passed out of use; but as the purpose it served was of value to judicial administration, it was inevitable, in the ordinary development of the law, that some equivalent should take its place, which equivalent was the modern practice of an implied pledge that the court would recommend the criminal who made the confession, and was accepted as a witness, to the royal clemency. But such an implied pledge is not a legal right, but a ground for an equitable claim only, so that under no circumstances can it supply matter of a plea in bar, or otherwise constitute a basis of a defense. State v. Graham, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 15, 16, 32 Am. Rep. 174.

APPROVER.

An "approver" is one who confesses himself guilty of a felony, and accuses others of the same crime to save himself from punishment. Myers v. People, 26 Ill. (16 Peck) 173, 176; Gray v. People, Id. 344, 346 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 267); Rex v. Rudd, 1 Cowp. 331, 334.

Where a culprit indicted for treason or felony confessed the truth of the charge, and, upon being sworn, revealed all the treasons and felonies within his knowledge, and entered before a coroner his appeal against all his partners in crime who were within the realm, the criminal thus confessing was called the "approver," or, in Latin, "probator," and the person implicated was styled the "appellee," and, where he made a full and true disclosure and convicted the appellee, the king pardoned him as to his life. State v. Graham, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 15, 16, 32 Am. Rep. 174.

APPROXIMATE—APPROXIMATELY.

"Approximate," as used in an instruction relating to an implied power of an agent that the creation of the agency carries with it the power to do all those things which are necessary, proper, and usual to be done in order to effectuate the purpose of the agency, and "embraces all the approximate means necessary to accomplish the desired ends," tended to restrict the use of such words, and its use, instead of the more suitable word "appropriate," did not render the instruction erroneous. Riverview Land Co. v. Dance, 35 S. E. 720, 721, 98 Va. 239.

The word "approximately" simply means "nearly" or "closely"; so that in an action for damages for trespassing stock, where plaintiff had been prevented from completing the partition fence, an instruction that if the defendants prevented plaintiff from building the fence on the line, or approximately so, was erroneous, as permitting the building of the fence on defendants' land. Oliver v. Hutchinson, 69 Pac. 139, 140, 41 Or. 443.

The words "approximately" and "proximately" are not synonymous, but closely allied in meaning. The use of the former in an instruction that one who is injured by the negligence of another cannot recover damages therefor if the injured party by his own negligence or willful wrong "approximately" contributed to the injury, so that it would not have happened but for his own fault, could not have misled the jury. Pledger v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (Neb.) 95 N. W. 1057, 1060.

APPROXIMATE CAUSE.

APPURTENANCE—APPURTENANT.

See "Common Appurtenant."

An appurtenance is a thing belonging to another thing as principal, and which passes as incident to the principal thing. Meek v. Breckenridge, 29 Ohio St. 642, 648; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Buffalo & N. Y. & E. R. Co. (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 501, 504; Ogden v. Jennings (N. Y.) 66 Barb. 301, 307; Investment Co. of Philadelphia v. Ohio & N. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 378, 380; Scheel v. Alhambra Min. Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 821, 823; Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 25, 54, 9 L. Ed. 333; Humphreys v. McKissock, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 781, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. Ed. 473; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Commercial Bank, 11 Wis. 207, 210; Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 437; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 388; Rutherford v. Wabash R. Co., 48 S. W. 921, 924, 147 Mo. 441; Ottumwa Woolen Mill Co. v. Hawley, 44 Iowa, 57, 60, 24 Am. Rep. 719; Newport Illuminating Co. v. Assessors of Taxes of Newport, 36 Atl. 428, 429, 19 R. I. 632, 36 L. R. A. 286; Badger Lumber Co. v. Marion Water Supply, Electric Light & Power Co., 48 Kan. 182, 184, 29 Pac. 476, 15 L. R. A. 652, 30 Am. St. Rep. 301; Johnson v. Nasworthy (Tex.) 16 S. W. 758, 759, 4 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 107; City of Lincoln v. Lincoln St. Ry. Co. (Neb.) 93 N. W. 766, 772.

An "appurtenance" is that which belongs to another thing, but which has not belonged to it immemorially. Empire Land & Coal Co. v. County Treasurer, 28 Pac. 482, 484, 1 Colo. App. 205; Farmer v. Ukliah Water Co., 56 Cal. 11, 14; New Ipswich W. L. Factory v. Batchelder, 3 N. H. 190, 192, 14 Am. Dec. 346.

An appurtenance is something attached to the realty. Brush Electric Co. v. Warwick Electric Mfg. Co., 6 Ohio Dec. 475, 478.

Webster gives as the first meaning of "appurtenance" "that which belongs to something else; an adjunct; an appendage; as small buildings are the appurtenances of a mansion." Carpenter v. Leonard, 5 Minn. 155, 168 (Gil. 119, 132).

The word "appurtenance," as used in section 1, c. 54, Comp. St., which provides for a lien on any house, mill, manufactory, or building or appurtenance, means appurtenance to the land, and not to some structure. H. F. Cady Lumber Co. v. Greater America Exposition Co. (Neb.) 93 N. W. 961, 962.

Annexed distinguished.

The word "appurtenant" signifies belonging to or pertaining to as of right. It is a word of broader signification than "annexed," which is defined by lexicographers to mean "joined at the end," "connected with," "affixed." Dauphin County Treasurer v. St. Stephen's Church (Pa.) 3 Phila. 189, 190.

"Appurtenant" denotes annexed or belonging to. Empire Land & Canal Co. v. County Treasurer, 28 Pac. 482, 484, 1 Colo. App. 205.

Appendant distinguished.

"Appendants" are by prescription, as distinguished from "appurtenances," which are by grant, or which may arise from use. Jackson v. Striker (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Cas. 284, 291.

"Appurtenant" agrees with the term "appendant" in nature and quality of its properties, but differs in that the commencement of the former is known, while the latter has belonged to the thing more worthy beyond the memory of man. Leonard v. White, 7 Mass. 6, 8, 5 Am. Dec. 19.

In gross distinguished.

"Whether an easement in a given case is appurtenant or in gross, is to be determined mainly by the nature of the right and the intention of the parties creating it. If it be in its nature an appropriate and usual adjunct of the land conveyed, having in view the intention of the grantee as to its use, and there being nothing to show that the parties intended it to be a mere personal right, it should be held to be an easement appurtenant to the land, and not an easement in gross, the rule for the construction of such grants being more favorable to the former than to the latter class. Though an easement, like a right of way, may be created by 'grant in gross,' as it is called, or attached to the person of the grantee, this is never presumed when it can fairly be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate, and, if it is in gross, it cannot extend beyond the life of the grantee, nor can it be granted over, being attached to the person of the grantee alone. The greater weight of authority supports the doctrine that easements in gross, properly so called, are not assignable or inheritable. If, however, a right to take soil, gravel, water from a spring, and the like from another's land may properly be denominated an easement, then it is proper to say that an easement in gross—for such it might doubtless be constituted—might be both assignable and inheritable, for the rights enumerated are so far of the character of an estate or interest in the land itself that if granted to one in gross it is treated as an estate, and may therefore be one for life or of inheritance." Cadwalader v. Bailey, 23 Atl. 20, 21, 17 R. I. 495, 14 L. R. A. 300.

A grant in gross is never presumed when it can be clearly construed as appurtenant to some other estate. In order to declare a grant in gross appurtenant, there must be two distinct tenements—the dominant, to which the right belongs; and the servient, on which the burden or obligation rests. Winston v. Johnson, 45 N. W. 953, 959, 42 Minn. 398.

An easement is appurtenant, and not in gross, when it appears that it was granted for the benefit of the grantee's land. A right of way is appurtenant to the land of the grantee if so in fact, although not declared to be so in the deed. If the way leads to the grantee's land, and is useless except for use in connection with it, and after the grant was used solely for access to such land, it is appurtenant to it. Thus, where a right of way was granted by the owner of land on a highway to an adjoining owner who had no means of access to the highway, such right of way was an easement appurtenant to the adjoining owner's land, and not in gross. Lidgerding v. Zignego, 80 N. W. 360, 361, 77 Minn. 421, 77 Am. St. Rep. 677.

Propriety of relation implied.

The word "appurtenances" has a technical signification, when strictly employed in leases, for the purpose of including any easements or servitudes used or enjoyed with the demised premises. When the term is thus used in order to constitute an appurtenance, there must exist a propriety of relation between the principal or dominant subject and the necessary or adjunct, which is to be ascertained by considering whether they so agree in nature and quality as to be capable of union without incongruity. Riddle v. Littleton, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 388; Newport Illuminating Co. v. Newport Tax Assessors, 36 Atl. 426, 429, 19 R. I. 632, 36 L. R. A. 266.

Thing incident implied.

"Appurtenances," as used in a will granting a tract on which testator lived to his son, together with all the "appurtenances," could have no greater meaning than to comprehend things in the nature of things incident to the tract. Helme v. Guy, 6 N. C. 341, 342.

Thing necessary implied.

The word "appurtenant" will only carry with it easements and servitudes used and enjoyed with the lands for whose benefit they were created, and even an easement will not pass unless it is necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted. Humphreys v. McKissock, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 781, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. Ed. 473; Ogden v. Jennings, 62 N. Y. 526, 530 (cited and approved in Griffiths v. Morrison, 12 N. E. 580, 582, 106 N. Y. 165); Newport Illuminating Co. v. Assessors of Taxes of Newport, 36 Atl. 426, 429, 19 R. I. 632, 36 L. R. A. 266; Whyte v. Builders' League of New York, 52 N. Y. Supp. 65, 67, 23 Misc. Rep. 385 (citing Griffiths v. Morrison, 106 N. Y. 165, 12 N. E. 580); In re Metropolitan Elevated Ry. Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 278, 282; Cleary v. Skiffich, 65 Pac. 59, 63, 28 Colo. 362, 89 Am. St. Rep. 207; Fond du Lac Water Co. v. City of Fond du Lac, 52 N. W. 439, 442, 82 Wis. 322, 16 L. R. A. 581.

"Appurtenance," as used in a lease of a hotel and appurtenances, means such things as are actually and directly necessary to the enjoyment of the property; and hence a kettle situated on a lot, not included in the lease of the hotel, and not indispensable to its enjoyment, although a convenience to such property and used by the lessor in connection therewith, is not an appurtenance. Barrett v. Bell, 82 Mo. 110, 114, 52 Am. Rep. 361.

It is an established rule of conveyancing that the word "appurtenance" in the habendum of a deed will not be construed to convey anything except what was legally appurtenant to the land in the hands of the grantor, and therefore will not be extended so as to convey an easement of the land to another, which, by reason of not having ripened into a legal right, has not become legally attached to the premises conveyed, and unless accompanied by proper words describing it and showing the intention of the grantor to pass it. But when an easement, though not originally belonging to an estate, has become appurtenant to it, either by grant or prescription, a conveyance of that estate will carry with it such easement, whether mentioned in the deed or not, although it may not be necessary to the enjoyment of the estate by the grantee. Cole v. Bradbury, 29 Atl. 1097, 1098, 86 Me. 380.

"Appurtenant" denotes annexed or belonging to, but in law it denotes annexation which is of convenience merely, and not of necessity, and which may have its origin at any time, in both of which respects it is distinguished from "appendant." Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. 11, 14.

"Appurtenances," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 90, § 1, giving a lien for constructing, altering or repairing houses, buildings, or "appurtenances," means structures which are necessary for the use and enjoyment of another building in the manner in which they are used, and does not include property used in a different branch of the same business which may be carried on separately. McDonald v. Minneapolis Lumber Co., 9 N. W. 765, 766, 28 Minn. 262.

An "appurtenance" is that only which is incidental or indispensable to the proper use of the premises demised, and a mere convenience does not create an appurtenance. A restaurant conducted by the lessor of an apartment in the same building is not such an incidental and indispensable appurtenance to the leased premises that its mismanagement or removal would constitute an infraction of the lease, the instrument itself being silent in regard thereto. Gale v. Heckman, 38 N. Y. Supp. 85, 86, 16 Misc. Rep. 376.

Thing of inferior nature implied.

An "appurtenance" is a thing used with and related or dependent upon another thing more worthy, and agreeing in its nature and quality with the thing whereunto it is appendant or appurtenant. Jarvis v. Seele Milling Co., 50 N. E. 1044, 1045, 173 Ill. 192, 64 Am. St. Rep. 107; Book v. West, 69 Pac. 630, 632, 29 Wash. 70; Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 388; Snoddy v. Bolen, 24 S. W. 142, 144, 122 Mo. 479; Witte v. Quinn, 38 Mo. App. 681, 692 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 626); Rutherford v. Wabash R. Co., 48 S. W. 921, 924, 147 Mo. 441; Newport Illuminating Co. v. Assessors of Taxes of Newport, 36 Atl. 426, 429, 19 R. I. 632, 36 L. R. A. 266; Leonard v. White, 7 Mass. 6, 8, 5 Am. Dec. 19; Lucas v. Bishop, 83 Tenn. (15 Lea) 165, 167, 54 Am. Rep. 440; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 382, 390.

An appurtenance "is something belonging to, or pertaining to, something else which is its principal, and is not a part of the principal thing. A thing appurtenant must be of an inferior nature to the thing to which it is appurtenant." Ballew v. State, 9 S. W. 765, 766, 26 Tex. App. 483; Bloom v. West, 32 Pac. 846, 848, 3 Colo. App. 212.

"A mere easement may without express words pass as an incident to the principal object of the grant, but property of the same rank or kind as that conveyed in terms cannot be said to be an incident to the principal object of the grant." Investment Co. of Philadelphia v. Ohio & N. W. R. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 378, 380.

The term "appurtenant" involves the idea of dependence, and includes easements and servitudes used and enjoyed with the lands for whose benefit they were created. Humphreys v. McKissock, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 781, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. Ed. 473.

Unity of title implied.

That which is claimed to be an "appurtenance" must not only be appendant in utility and fitness for use to the principal or dominant estate, but there must be a unity of title or right in the same person to both the superior estate and the appurtenances claimed. The fact that the use of that which is claimed as an "appurtenance" is highly convenient or seemingly indispensable to the enjoyment of the premises conveyed, added to the further fact that the same was actually enjoyed by the grantor at the time of the conveyance, does not constitute a projection of the eaves of a building over the lands adjoining an "appurtenance," as the right to maintain and use it did not belong to him when the conveyance was made; the ownership of such right is indispensable. Meek v. Breckenridge, 29 Ohio St. 642, 648.

To bridge.

"Appurtenances," as used in a deed of trust by a bridge company, describing the property conveyed as the "bridge named, and also all and singular such pieces or parcels of land occupied by the railway track, culverts, approaches, trestles, and other structures thereon of said bridge company, together with the tenements, hereditaments, and 'appurtenances' to several lots, strips, pieces, and parcels of land belonging or of right appertaining thereto," does not pass such lots, the company owning them in fee. "One piece of land held in fee or lesser title cannot be appurtenant to another piece of land." Lord Coke, in his Commentaries on Littleton, p. 121, § 184, says: "A thing corporeal cannot be appended to a thing corporeal, nor a thing incorporeal to a thing incorporeal, but things incorporeal which lie in grant may be appended to things corporeal. Nothing can be properly appended or appurtenant to anything unless the principal or superior thing be of perpetual subsistence and continuous. Land cannot, therefore, be appurtenant to other land, but an incorporeal hereditament may. So of an easement which is appurtenant." It follows that the lots described in the deed did not and could not pass as "appurtenances" to the conveyance of the bridge, its approaches, tracks, culverts, and connections with other rights, etc. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Curtis, 103 Ill. 410, 418.

To buildings.

"Appurtenances," as used in the mechanic's lien law, giving a lien for constructing, altering, or repairing houses, buildings, or "appurtenances," means such structures as are necessary to the use and enjoyment of the premises, and includes buildings on the opposite side of the street from the main building, and designed to be used in connection therewith. Carpenter v. Leonard, 5 Minn. 155, 168 (Gil. 119, 132).

Where a group of buildings on one's land, constituting his coal-mining plant, extended over the right of way of a railroad company by means of sheds and a chute over them located on the right of way, the mining buildings cannot be said to be appurtenant to them, within the provision of a lease of a right of way agreeing to hold a railroad company harmless from damages by fire to any building on the leased premises or their appurtenances. Rutherford v. Wabash R. Co., 48 S. W. 921, 924, 147 Mo. 441.

"Appurtenant," as used in a policy of insurance covering "all the articles constituting the stock of a pork house and all articles contained within the building and appurtenant thereto," covers all within those buildings, without regard to the particular ownership of each or any article which was at the risk of the insured. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Jackson, 55 Ky. (16 B. Mon.) 242, 251.

"Appurtenant," as used in 1 Rev. Code, c. 147, § 16, declaring that the owner or occupier of any tavern shall be deemed to be the owner or occupier of every house and other place within the curtilage of the principal house, or in any wise "appurtenant thereto or at any time held therewith" cannot be taken in its literal sense, but must be construed to mean only such houses as are used in connection with the principal tavern for the convenience or accommodation of guests. Commonwealth v. Sanders (Va.) 5 Leigh, 751, 753.

"Appurtenances," as used in a mortgage of a brewhouse "with the appurtenances," means only such things as are a part of the realty belonging to outhouses, etc., and does not include trade fixtures and utensils and things which are not fixtures. Ex parte Quincy, 1 Atk. 477, 478.

An "appurtenance" signifies something belonging to another thing as principal, and which passes as incident to the principal thing. In accordance with this definition, where one by a bill of sale conveyed "all the fixtures and 'appurtenances' contained in a certain daguerrean room," all the loose movable articles of personal property in the daguerrean room, so far as they were necessary to the business carried on therein, passed to the purchaser under the term "appurtenances." Pickrell v. Carson, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 544, 551.

A tenant in an office building is entitled to have access through the door, halls, floors, and elevators, and the use of wash-basins and closet in order to enjoy the rooms he occupies, which conveniences are in the nature of "appurtenances." The word "appurtenances" received a broad and liberal meaning by the Court of Appeals in Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 432, 437, 21 Am. Rep. 629, where the court said: "That word would give him whatever was attached to or used with the premises and incident thereto, and convenient or essential to the beneficial use or enjoyment thereof." Hall v. Irvin, 79 N. Y. Supp. 614, 617, 78 App. Div. 107.

"Appurtenance," as used in a claim for a mechanic's lien for a debt contracted for work and labor done on a certain house by contract, made by the claimants within the time limited, for and about the construction of the said building and "appurtenance" may mean a yard, an alley, a cistern, an ice-house, a smokehouse, or stable, or other outhouse distinct from the principal building mentioned in the claim, and hence the claim did not sufficiently specify the building on which the work was done so as to exclude work done or materials supplied for anything else. Appeal of Barclay, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 495, 496.

Same—Heat.

The word "appurtenances" used in a lease will not be construed to include the furnishing of steam and forced air to the lessee. Watkins v. Greene, 46 Atl. 38, 22 R. I. 34.

Same—Land.

"Appurtenances," as used in a deed conveying a house and appurtenances, means land, and passes title to the garden, curtilage, and close adjoining the house. Ammidown v. Ball, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 293, 295.

By a devise of a house cum pertinentis only the garden and orchard will pass with it; but, by a devise of a house with the land appertaining thereto, the land usually occupied therewith will pass. Hence, where one devised land to his cousin, who should continue to live at his house and be at the charge of keeping the house, and the servants, and coach horses which the testator employed in plowing the ground, and spend the corn arising therefrom in the house, the land enjoyed with the house was held to pass to the cousin. Blackborn v. Edgley, 1 P. Wms. 600, 603.

If a man makes a feoffment of a house with the "appurtenances," nothing passes by the words "with the appurtenances" but the garden, curtilage, and close adjoining the house and on which the house is built, and no other land, though other land has been occupied with the house. In the time of Henry VIII it was usual to add these words, "and all lands, tenements and hereditaments appertaining to the said house, and being occupied, let or set with the same," and by these words the land used would pass with the house; but Lord Coke confirms Lord Hale, and says that, by the grant of a messuage or house, the orchard, garden, and curtilage will pass without the word "appurtenances," and an acre or more may pass by the name of a house, and by a devise of a messuage only, without the words "with the appurtenances." It was adjudged that the curtilage and garden would pass, but land at a distance, though used and occupied by the testator with the house, will not pass by such words. Smith v. Martin, 2 Saund. 401, notes.

Same—Sidewalk.

"Appurtenances," as used in Laws 1844, c. 339, § 1, giving a mechanic's lien for labor 1 Wds. & P.—31 or materials furnished in building, altering, or repairing any house or other building, or "appurtenances" to any house or other building, "may perhaps include, without any forced construction, the yard and sidewalk" connected with a building in the process of erection. McDermott v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 383, 387.

"Appurtenances," as used in a New York statute giving a lien upon the lot, building, and "appurtenances" for materials used for making improvements thereon, include a sidewalk in front of the premises. "The owner of a lot abutting on an avenue or street has not only an interest therein in common with the public at large, but also a special and peculiar interest, and we think it may be fairly held that a sidewalk in front of a building is an appurtenance thereto within the meaning of the lien law." Kenney v. Appar, 93 N. Y. 539, 549.

Same—Water pipes.

"Appurtenances" are not necessarily of an incorporeal nature, but things corporeal may be appurtenant. If one has a house and land, and conveys water to the house by pipes through the land, and afterwards sells the house with the appurtenances to one, and the land to another, the pipes pass with the house, because they are necessary and quasi appendant thereto. Jackson v. Striker (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Cas. 284, 291.

Same—Well.

Under Gen. St. § 3018, authorizing a mechanic's lien for materials furnished and services rendered in the construction of a building, such a lien may be had for the construction of a well close to the back yard of a house for the use of its occupants, although it is not physically connected with the house, and was built after the construction of the house and under a separate contract. In discussing the meaning of the word "appurtenances" in the statute, the court says that the word was plainly meant to cover what might not otherwise have been deemed to have belonged to a building, and is an apt term to describe detached structures built as adjuncts to a building to further its convenient use and occupation. Balch v. Chaffee, 47 Atl. 327, 328, 73 Conn. 318, 84 Am. St. Rep. 155.

Same—Windmill.

"Appurtenances," within Comp. St. c. 54, § 353, authorizing the filing of a mechanic's lien for the erection of any building or appurtenances, etc., include any erection on the property appropriate to be used in pursuance of the business to which the property is applied, and therefore includes the erection of a windmill, with a tank and pump, etc., on a farm. Phelps & Bigelow Wind-Mill Co. v. Shay, 48 N. W. 896, 32 Neb. 19.

To dredge.

An "appurtenance" is a thing used with and relating to or dependent on another thing more worthy, and agreeing in its nature and quality with the thing whereunto it is appendant or appurtenant; a thing belonging to another thing as principal, and which passes as incident to the principal thing. An appurtenant to a dredge must be something incident and needful in the work of dredging, and, where a pump had nothing to do with such work, it did not pass as appurtenant to the dredge in a conveyance of the dredge and its appurtenances. Gullman v. Sharp, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1036, 1038, 81 Hun, 462.

To electric light plant.

Electric wires and poles connected with an electric light plant are not part of the realty, or "appurtenances" thereon, for the purpose of taxation, where some of the poles are on private property, and some were placed on the public highway under an ordinance which was subject to revocation. Newport Illuminating Co. v. Newport Tax Assessors, 36 Atl. 426, 429, 19 R. L. 632, 36 L. R. A. 266.

To ferry.

"Appurtenances," as used in the return of levy by a sheriff, declaring that he had served the execution on defendant's interest in a ferry and the "appurtenances" was too general, vague, and indefinite to comprehend within its meaning any personal property as the subject of levy. Munroe v. Thomas, 5 Cal. 470, 471.

To gas plant.

The word "appurtenant" has no inflexible meaning, but must be construed in connection with the nature and subject of the thing granted. A thing is appurtenant to something else only when it stands in the relation of an incident to a principal, and is necessarily connected in the use and enjoyment of the latter. Where parties to whom a valid franchise is granted to construct and operate a plant for furnishing gas to the people of the city, construct such plant, including pipes in the streets and all necessary appliances and equipments for so furnishing gas, and thereafter contract to sell such plant and to procure a transfer to the grantees a franchise authorizing the operation thereof, such contract is fully complied with by a deed conveying such plant with all the rights, privileges, and "appurtenances" thereunto belonging. Lawrence v. Hennessy, 65 S. W. 717, 719, 165 Mo. 659 (citing Fitzpatrick v. Mik, 24 Mo. App. 435; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Maffitt, 94 Mo. 56, 60, 6 S. W. 600; Wilson v. Beckwith, 22 S. W. 639, 642, 117 Mo. 61; Humphreys v. McKissock, 140 U. S. 304, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 35 L. Ed. 473).

To land.

A thing is deemed to be incidental or "appurtenant" to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way or watercourse, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 662; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1078; Mt. Carmel Fruit Co. v. Webster, 73 Pac. 826, 828, 140 Cal. 183.

A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way or watercourse, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another. Sluice boxes, flumes, hose, pipes, railway tracks, cars, blacksmith shops, mills, and all other machinery or tools used in working or developing a mine, are deemed to be affixed to the mine. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3273; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 189; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4024.

The word "appurtenances," as used in the chapter relating to the conveyances of real estate, or in any instrument relating to real property, shall, unless otherwise qualified, mean all improvements, and every right, of whatever character, pertaining to the premises described. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 887.

Where a grantor devises real estate with its appurtenances, the word "appurtenances" includes all that is affixed, incidental, or appurtenant to the land. West Coast Lumber Co. v. Apfield, 24 Pac. 993, 86 Cal. 335.

"Appurtenances," as used with reference to conveyances of realty, means and includes all rights to and interests in other property necessary for the full and free enjoyment of the property conveyed. Jackson v. Trullinger, 9 Or. 393, 398.

"Appurtenances," as used in a conveyance which, after describing the land intended to be conveyed, contained a clause, "with all the buildings, etc., and appurtenances," was sufficient to convey any appurtenance already existing, but not to create a new one. Kenyon v. Nichols, 1 R. L. 411, 413.

Where improvements are made on tide lands intended to be used separate and distinct from the uplands, such improvements will not pass under a mortgage of lands appurtenant to the uplands. Book v. West, 69 Pac. 630, 632, 29 Wash. 70.

A deed conveying land and its appurtenances conveys only such things in the nature of fixtures as are appurtenant to the land itself. It does not convey the personal property or effects of the grantor, although they are situated upon the land at the time the conveyance takes effect. City of Lincoln v.

Lincoln St. Ry. Co. (Neb.) 93 N. W. 760, 772.

Same—Buildings.

An appurtenance is something which is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way or water course, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another; and the grant of a piece of land with the appurtenances will carry the dwelling house and adjoining buildings, and also the orchard, garden, and curtilage. McShane v. Carter, 22 Pac. 178, 179, 80 Cal. 310.

Same—Easements.

The right to use private ways, reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of land, is an "appurtenance" of the land. United States v. Harris (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 185, 191.

"Appurtenances," when used in a conveyance of a specific piece of land carved out of a larger piece owned by the grantor, and described by metes and bounds, was not sufficient to convey an easement to a right of way through the premises retained by the grantor, but only carried what was included within the boundaries conveyed. Grant v. Chase, 17 Mass. 443, 447, 9 Am. Dec. 161.

"Appurtenances," as used in a conveyance of a lot with all "appurtenances" thereunto belonging, included an easement, or a right of that nature, to have a house thereon rest partly on an adjoining lot. Bramble v. Kingsbury, 39 Ark. 131, 135.

A deed to realty with the "appurtenances" will not pass an easement of a stairway which was not erected when the conveyance was made nor referred to therein, but the grantor only conveys by deed as an "appurtenance" whatever he has the power to grant which is practically annexed to the granted premises at the time of the grant, and is necessary to their enjoyment in the condition of the estate at the time. Peters v. Worth, 64 S. W. 490, 492, 164 Mo. 431 (citing Philbrick v. Ewing, 97 Mass. 133; Whiting v. Gaylord, 66 Conn., loc. cit. 348, 34 Atl. 85, 50 Am. St. Rep. 87; Brace v. Yale, 86 Mass. [4 Allen] 393; Decorah Woolen Mill Co. v. Greer, 49 Iowa, loc. cit. 493; Spaulding v. Abbot, 55 N. H. 423).

Appurtenances include easements and servitudes used and enjoyed with the lands for the benefit of which they were created. Fond du Lac Water Co. v. City of Fond du Lac, 52 N. W. 439, 442, 82 Wis. 322, 16 L. R. A. 581; Cleary v. Skifflich, 65 Pac. 59, 63, 29 Colo. 362.

A deed conveying a described parcel of land with the "appurtenances" conveys to the grantee, as appurtenant to the land, the right to the free and unobstructed use and enjoyment of an alley adjoining the property, which the grantor had laid out and set apart for such use, and the fee to which was at the time of the conveyance in the grantor. Murphy v. Harker, 41 S. E. 585, 115 Ga. 77.

A conveyance of land carries with it an easement of the right of way created under the agreement between plaintiff and his grantor of certain roads, and that the parties shall have free access upon it and use thereof. Valentine v. Schreiber, 38 N. Y. Supp. 417, 422, 3 App. Div. 235.

"An appurtenant easement is an incorporeal right which, as the term implies, is attached to and belongs with some greater or superior right; something annexed to another thing, more worthy, and which passes as an incident to it. It is a species of what the civil law calls 'servitude.' It is incapable of existence separate and apart from the particular lands to which it is annexed, there being nothing for it to act upon. It is essential to the existence of an easement of this kind that there be two distinct tenements—the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation rests." Cadwalader v. Bailey, 23 Atl. 20, 21, 17 R. I. 495, 14 L. R. A. 300.

Ways are said to be appendant or appurtenant when they are incident to an estate, one terminus being on the land of the party claiming. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Koelle, 104 Ill. 455, 461.

A way is appurtenant to other lands when it is created for the convenience of their occupation, without respect to the ownership or number of occupants. In such case the right of way passes with the dominant estate as an incident thereto. Shields v. Titus, 22 N. E. 717, 720, 46 Ohio St. 528.

"Ways are appurtenant when they are incident to an estate, one terminus being on the land of another, inhere in the land, concern the premises, and are essentially necessary to their enjoyment. They are in the nature of covenants running with the land, must respect the thing granted, and concern the land or estate conveyed. A private right or easement running to a person's farm or residence over the land of another, which had been used continuously and uninterruptedly, under claim of right to and as the owners of such right of way and easements for 35 years by him and those under whom he claimed as owners of the farm, is one appurtenant to the land, and would pass as such with a conveyance of the farm. It is an interest in the land or right of way." Sanxay v. Hunger, 42 Ind. 44, 48.

Same—Easements not in existence.

"Appurtenance," as used in a deed conveying privileges and appurtenances, would include an appurtenant way if in existence. Blakeman v. Blakeman, 39 Conn. 320, 325.

The operation of the word "appurtenances" in conveyances is uniformly confined to an existing right, and is not understood as creating a new one. Accordingly, where land was sold to and from which the owner had been accustomed to pass by a certain path over other land belonging to him, no right of way passed under the word "appurtenances" occurring in the deed, for until the time of the sale it was impossible for any right of way as an easement to exist in favor of the land so sold. Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 133, 151, 57 Am. Dec. 156.

"Appurtenances," as used in a conveyance of certain property, together with all the "privileges and appurtenances" thereunto belonging, was not sufficient to create a new easement, though they might be sufficient to pass a right of way in actual existence, and are not equivalent to the words "all rights of way hereafter used or heretofore used." Gayetty v. Bethune, 14 Mass. 49, 53, 7 Am. Dec. 188.

Same—Land.

"A thing corporeal cannot properly be appurtenant to a thing corporeal, nor a thing incorporeal to a thing incorporeal." New York Cent. R. Co. v. Buffalo & N. Y. & E. R. Co. (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 501, 504; Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 25, 54, 9 L. Ed. 333; In re Metropolitan Elevated Ry. Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 278, 282; Investment Co. of Philadelphia v. Ohio & N. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 378, 380. According to this rule, land cannot be appurtenant to land. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Buffalo & N. Y. & E. R. Co. (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 501, 504; Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 382, 390; In re Metropolitan Elevated Ry. Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 278, 282; Harris v. Elliott, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 25, 54, 9 L. Ed. 333; Humphreys v. McKissock, 11 Sup. Ct. 779, 781, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. Ed. 473; Griffiths v. Morrison, 36 Hun. 337, 338; Investment Co. of Philadelphia v. Ohio & N. W. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 378, 380; Wilson v. Beckwith, 117 Mo. 61, 74, 22 S. W. 639. "It is, however, doubtless true that the word is frequently used in a more enlarged and comprehensive sense, and when it can be gathered from all the attendant circumstances that it was so understood and used by the parties, a corresponding effect should be given to it in the interpretation of a contract." Frey v. Drachos, 6 Neb. 1, 10, 29 Am. Rep. 353.

On a strict and technical definition of the word "appurtenant," there is room for contention whether one tract of land could be appurtenant to another tract or the family homestead thereon, when the tracts are owned by different persons, but under Const. 1868, art. 2, § 32, defining the family homestead as consisting of the dwelling house, outbuildings, and land appurtenant, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a 30-acre tract belonging to the head of the family could not be appurtenant to the family homestead, even though the dwelling house might be situated on an adjoining tract belonging to the wife of the head of the family. McClenaghan v. McEachern, 25 S. E. 296, 297, 47 S. C. 446.

The word "appurtenant" necessarily involves the idea that the owner of a dominant tenement has some legal right in the premises appurtenant to it, so that a tract of 30 acres, adjoining the homestead of a family, which is owned by the husband, and while the homestead is owned by the wife, cannot be said to be appurtenant to the homestead, even though the husband cultivates it, so as to exempt it as a part of the homestead. McClenaghan v. McEachern, 34 S. E. 627, 628, 56 S. C. 350.

Where the word "appurtenances" is used in a will, it will not be strictly construed where it is apparent that such use was not intended by the testator, and hence the word may carry a fee in lands appurtenant to lands devised, though, strictly speaking, land cannot be appurtenant to land. Otis v. Smith, 26 Mass. (9 Pick.) 293, 296.

"Appurtenance," as used in conveyances, passes nothing but the land, and such things as belong thereto and are part of the realty. Therefore, when a conveyance is of a piece of land, defined by boundaries, with "appurtenances," other land not included in boundaries will not pass as appurtenant to the grant. All that can be claimed as embraced in the word "appurtenances" are easements and servitudes necessary to the enjoyment of the land conveyed. Snoddy v. Bolen, 24 S. W. 142, 144, 122 Mo. 479, 24 L. R. A. 507.

The term "appurtenances," in a deed of certain described land and appurtenances, will not pass title in land laid out or dedicated to a highway, or any other land. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co. v. Kerrigan, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 13, 16.

Loc. Act Dec. 11, 1855, provided that the state issue bonds to a railroad company, that the company should signify its acceptance by filing a receipt therefor, and that when recorded in the office of the Secretary of State each certificate of acceptance should be a mortgage of the road, and every point and section thereof, and its appurtenances. Previously the state had granted to the railroad company lands granted to the state by Congress, and had provided that the company might sell the lands and issue those bonds, secured by mortgages of the land. Held, that the word "appurtenances" did not cover the lands so granted by the state. Wilson v. Beckwith, 117 Mo. 61, 74, 22 S. W. 639.

Same—Personal property.

"Appurtenances," as used in a deed of trust of certain real estate conveying all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and "appurtenances" thereto belonging or in anywise appertaining, means things belonging to another thing as principal, and which pass as incident to the principal thing. "The term as used in the conveyance passes nothing but the land, and such things as belong thereto and are part of the realty," and does not embrace personal property therein. Ottumwa Woolen Mill Co. v. Hawley, 44 Iowa, 57, 60, 24 Am. Rep. 719.

"Appurtenances" does not include personal property which was totally disconnected with the devised premises. Scheidt v. Belz, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 431, 437.

Technically, property tangible and corporeal, capable of sale or transfer, and of use in any other place, cannot be regarded as appurtenant to land. Bloom v. West, 32 Pac. 846, 848, 3 Colo. App. 212.

Same—Water rights.

"Appurtenances," as used in a will devising to testator's wife his homestead, with the "appurtenances," containing about fourteen and one-half acres of upland, exclusive of the water grant, means "the rights and privileges of a nature inferior to the fee of the upland. The water grant was a right and privilege of a nature inferior to the fee of the upland, and passes under the term 'appurtenances.'" Wetmore v. Peck (N. Y.) 66 How. Prac. 54, 55.

The term "appurtenance" in a conveyance of land containing a pond, supplied by conduits from other land owned by the grantor and land which he had formerly owned, was held not to include the right of continuing to take water from the tract of land which he had formerly owned, though the grantor afterward repurchased such land. Spencer v. Kilmer, 45 N. E. 865, 866, 151 N. Y. 390.

The term "appurtenant" does not mean, and never meant, "inseparable," so that the mere fact that the right to use water on land, if not a corporeal thing, was a separate and distinct property right from the land itself, does not indicate that it was not appertaining to the land. Frank v. Hicks, 35 Pac. 475, 483, 4 Wyo. 502.

To mill.

A deed to a mill sold under foreclosure proceedings, which had been operated in connection with a mill pond and dam, carried with it as an "appurtenance" the easement in the land overflowed by the mill pond, though the word itself was not used in the deed. Jarvis v. Seele Milling Co., 50 N. E. 1044, 1045, 173 Ill. 192, 64 Am. St. Rep. 107.

"Appurtenances," as used in a deed conveying a mill on a stream with the "appurtenances," should be construed to mean right to the use of the water of the stream, and all of it, for mill purposes, for it was a necessary incident to the use of the mill. Strickler v. Todd (Pa.) 10 Serg. & R. 63, 69, 13 Am. Dec. 649.

"Appurtenances," as used in a devise of a gristmill with its appurtenances, construed to include "everything necessary for the sale and free enjoyment of the gristmill and requisite for the support of the establishment, such as a dam, water, and race leading to the mill, a proper portion of ground before the mill for the unloading or loading of wagons, horses, etc., for without these appurtenances the gristmill could not be worked, and the bounty of the testator would be inoperative." Blaine's Lessee v. Chambers (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 169, 174.

A water right, granted in gross, does not become technically "appurtenant" to land and a mill upon and for which it is subsequently used by the grantee. Bank of British North America v. Miller (U. S.) 6 Fed. 545-547.

A water right in connection with a sawmill passes by the word "appurtenances" in a deed. Pickering v. Stapler (Pa.) 5 Serg. & R. 107, 110, 111, 9 Am. Dec. 336.

To railroad.

The term "appurtenant," in its legal, common acceptation, implies a thing as belonging to, accessory, or incident to some other thing. As used in its connection with land, it means a thing used with the land and for its benefit, annexed to and connected therewith; so that an appurtenant of a railroad implies that it is incidental to, connected and used with, the road, as a part of and essential thereto, such as depots, stations, switches, and switching yards, and the like. Wilson v. Ward Lumber Co. (U. S.) 67 Fed. 674, 677.

An exemption from taxation of the capital stock of a railroad company and the road, with fixtures and "appurtenances," including workshops, warehouses, and vehicles of transportation, does not include a hotel building erected within the space which the company is entitled to hold for a right of way, though it is built under a lease from the company, and is a convenience to passengers and a means of profit to the road. The ticket offices, however, which are kept within such building are exempt. Day v. Joiner, 65 Tenn. (6 Baxt.) 441, 442.

The word "appurtenant" has no inflexible meaning, but must be construed in connection with the nature and subject of the principal thing granted. Ordinarily, land cannot be appurtenant to other lands or distinct parcels, or pass with it as a part of or belonging to it, but where used in a deed by a railroad company, conveying all its right, title, and interest, together with all and singular the hereditaments and "appurtenances" thereunto belonging, it was sufficient to pass title to a lot contiguous to the line of way of the grantor and belonging to it, though such lot was not specifically set out in the description in the deed. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Maffit, 6 S. W. 600, 601, 94 Mo. 56.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage given upon a railroad, and its property of every kind or use, or adapted to use on or about its lines of railway, the question arises whether a pavilion was included in the mortgage. The trial court, after finding that such pavilion was covered by the phrase, "operated and held by the company in connection with its railroad, and for use on or about its lines," stated that such pavilion grounds were an important and necessary part of the appurtenances and equipments of said railroad. It was held that the term "appurtenances" was not used in its technical legal sense, since it would make the finding inconsistent with other findings that the pavilion grounds consisted of five acres of land, which by no legal possibility could be appurtenant to the railway in the technical legal meaning, as, for example, in the sense of the word "addition." Thus in Frey v. Drahos, 6 Neb. 10, 29 Am. Rep. 353, Lake, C. J., speaking of the word "appurtenances," said it is doubtless true that the word is frequently used in a more enlarged and comprehensive sense than its technical legal sense, and, when it can be gathered from the attendant circumstances that it was so used, a corresponding effect should be given to it in the interpretation of a contract, and such meaning will be given to it in the construction of such finding. California Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Pauly, 43 Pac. 586, 587, 111 Cal. 122.

"Appurtenances," as used in the phrase "appurtenances of a vessel," "must not be construed with a mere reference to the naked idea of a ship, for that which would be an incumbrance to a ship one way employed would be an indispensable equipment to another. With regard to a fishing vessel, the term 'appurtenances' includes all the tackle and furniture which are necessary to the proper operation of the vessel for the purposes for which it was designed." Swift v. Brownell (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 554, 557.

"It may not be a simple matter to define what is and what is not an 'appurtenance of a ship.' There are some things that are universally so, things which must be appurtenant to every ship, be its occupation what it may. But particular things may not become so from their immediate and indispensable connection with the ship in the particular occupation to which she is destined or in which she is engaged. A ship of war has a special character, and, necessarily, special appurtenances. A packet, and particularly a steam one, has its specialties. So a Greenland ship has a character superadded by her special occupation, and must have the machinery adapted to the catching of whales, and to the dressing of them on board the vessel." The Ontario (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 730, 741.

"Appurtenances," as used in the rule providing that in suits in rem against a ship, her tackle, sails, apparel, furniture, boats, or other "appurtenances" which are in the possession of a third person may be ordered to be delivered to the marshal, "applies to all objects on board belonging to the owners for the purpose of the voyage" which do not belong to the vessel as a navigating ship. The Witch Queen (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 396, 397.

In a bill of sale of a vessel and its "appurtenances," the ship's boat does not pass. Starr v. Goodwin (Conn.) 2 Root, 71.

The phrase "ship and her appurtenances," as used in 53 Geo. III, c. 159, whereby the owner and the ship and its appurtenances are liable to the extent of the value thereof for damages done to another ship in manner described by the act, means whatever is on board the ship, for the object of the voyage and adventure in which she is engaged, belonging to the owner. Gale v. Laurie, 5 Barn. & C. 156, 163.

All things belonging to the owners which are on board a ship and are connected with its proper use for the objects of the voyage and adventure in which the ship is engaged are deemed its appurtenances. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3469; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 386.

To tunnel right.

A right annexed to land is appurtenant where the connection has arisen either by grant or by prescription from long adverse enjoyment. Thus the grant of a tunnel right through a specified piece of ground, together with all and singular the appurtenances thereto belonging, carries with it the right to dump the waste rock at the mouth of the tunnel on the land owned by the grantors at the time of the conveyance of the tunnel right, since, in extracting or removing ore through the tunnel, there would arise the necessity for the disposition of waste rock, and earth that had to be removed in the prosecution of the work. Scheel v. Alhambra Min. Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 821, 823.

To water power or right.

Where a water power is granted, together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, by virtue of the phrase "privileges and appurtenances" the grantee has the right to maintain the dam at the same height as that at which the grantor had the right to maintain it, or, in other words, it imports a conveyance of all the water-power privileges which the grantor owned. Daniels v. Citizens' Sav. Inst., 127 Mass. 534, 535; Hathorn v. Stinson, 10 Me. (1 Fairf.) 224, 234, 25 Am. Dec. 228; Smith

v. Moodus Water Power Co., 35 Conn. 392, 401.

A mill site will not be held to be an appurtenance of a water right to which claimant of the mill site has acquired a vested interest, though such mill site is necessary for the enjoyment of the water right. Cleary v. Skiffich, 65 Pac. 59, 63, 28 Colo. 362, 89 Am. St. Rep. 207.

To wharf.

The word "appurtenance" may in some cases, when used in a devise or lease, be read as "usually held, usually occupied, or enjoyed therewith," when necessary to carry the intention of the parties into effect; and in one sense land is appurtenant to a building. So that, where a wharf passed as appurtenant to a lot, flats built on tide lands extending to deep water, when necessary to the use of the wharf, will pass with the wharf as an appurtenance thereto. Brown v. Carkeek, 44 Pac. 887, 888, 14 Wash. 443.

APROVECHAMIENTO.

"Aprovechamiento" is a term of the Spanish law, which when applied to pueblo lands has particular reference to the commons, as the dehesas and montes, and applies not only to the enjoyment, but a right to the enjoyment, of them. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 568.

APT TIME.

"Apt time" sometimes depends upon lapse of time, as when a thing is required to be done at the first term, or within a given time, it cannot be done afterwards; but it more usually refers to the order of proceedings as fit or suitable time; and hence as no time is prescribed within which a discharge in bankruptcy is to be pleaded, and the first step taken after such discharge was a motion to docket it, and be allowed to plead the discharge, it was done in "apt time," although it was a long time—some two years—after discharge. If it was done in the proper order, it makes the length of time elapsing immaterial. Pugh v. York, 74 N. C. 383, 384.

ARBITRAR.

The meaning of the verb "arbitrar," as given in the dictionaries, is to "adjudge or award," or "to strike out means or expedients." Sheldon v. Milmo, 36 S. W. 413, 416, 90 Tex. 1.

ARBITRARILY.

In holding that an instruction that the jury may disbelieve any witness, but that it would be a disregard of a juror's duty to arbitrarily disregard the evidence of a witness, was not erroneous. The court said the jury could not have misunderstood the court in the use of the word "arbitrarily." They doubtless understood it to mean that it would be a disregard of the juror's duty to disregard the evidence of a witness without any reason therefor. If there was no reason for disbelieving the witness, of course the jury could not help believing his testimony; and, if under these circumstances he disregarded his testimony, of course, he acted arbitrarily, and was not properly discharging his duty as a juror. State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771, 778.

ARBITRARY GOVERNMENT.

The difference between a free and an arbitrary government is that in the former limits are assigned to those to whom the administration is committed, but the latter depends on the will of the departments, or some of them. Kamper v. Hawkins, 1 Va. Cas. 20, 23.

ARBITRATION.

See "Compulsory Arbitration."

"Arbitration" is the act by which the parties refer any matter in dispute between them to the decision of a third party. Garr v. Gomez (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 649, 661.

"Arbitration" is a hearing and determination of a cause between parties in controversy by a tribunal selected by them. Duren v. Getchell, 55 Me. 241, 247.

"Arbitration" is the investigation and determination of a matter or matters of difference between contending parties by one or more unofficial persons chosen by the parties, and called "arbitrators" or "referees." Henderson v. Beaton, 52 Tex. 29, 43; Wood v. City of Seattle (Wash.) 62 Pac. 135, 143, 52 L. R. A. 369.

Arbitration is where the parties injuring and injured submit all matters in dispute concerning any personal chattels or personal wrong to the judgment of two or more arbitrators, who are to decide the controversy. Fargo v. Reighard, 39 N. E. 888, 890, 13 Ind. App. 39; Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Warner, 41 N. E. 969, 973, 13 Ind. App. 466.

Arbitration is a substitution by consent of parties of another tribunal for those provided by the ordinary processes of law. Boyden v. Lamb, 25 N. E. 609, 610, 152 Mass. 416.

"An 'arbitration' is a domestic tribunal created by the will and consent of parties litigant, and resorted to to avoid the expense of delay, and ill feeling consequent upon litigating in courts of justice. The arbitrators are generally selected from among the friends of the parties, and are not supposed to be well versed in the law, but are expected to settle all matters in dispute untrammelled by the niceties of the law, and in a manner that will be just and equitable." Relly v. Russell, 84 Mo. 524, 528.

Any controversy relating to personal property may form the subject of "arbitration." And in all cases of injury either to the person or property, where damages would be recoverable by action, the arrangement of the matter may be left to arbitration. Miller v. Brumbaugh, 7 Kan. 343, 349.

"Arbitration" partakes of judicial proceedings, and an award by arbitrators is regarded with great respect by the courts, for it is the decision of persons chosen to settle the differences of the parties selecting them. It can hardly be considered of equal dignity with a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the persons and the subject-matter. Shivley v. Knoblock, 35 N. E. 1028, 1029, 8 Ind. App. 433.

"Arbitration" is an arrangement for taking and abiding by the judgment of selected persons in some disputed matter instead of carrying it to the established tribunals of justice; and is intended to avoid the formalities, the delay, the expense, and vexation of ordinary litigation. When the submission is made a rule of court, the arbitrators are not officers of the court, but are the appointees of the parties, as in cases where there is no rule of court. In either case the submission names the disputed matter upon which the arbitrators are to adjudge, and often prescribes the principles according to which they are to proceed, and the rules they are to follow in their decision. In re Curtis-Castle Arbitration, 30 Atl. 769, 770, 64 Conn. 501, 42 Am. St. Rep. 200.

No technical phrases or set form of words are necessary to constitute a submission to "arbitration." It is sufficient if it appears from what has passed between the parties that they mutually agreed to submit the matter in dispute between them to the decision of the person or persons named, and mutually agreed upon by them for that purpose. McManus v. McCulloch (Pa.) 6 Watts, 357, 360.

"Arbitration," at common law, was but a judicial investigation out of court. Upon an arbitration, it is well settled, upon a long line of decisions, that a party must have notice of a hearing before the judicial body, and unless the oath is expressly waived by the parties the witnesses must be examined under oath, such examination being in the presence of the parties, who have the right to be cross-examined. People ex rel. Bliss v. Board of Sup'rs of Cortland County, 15 N. Y. Supp. 748, 750.

Unless the statute or the submission under which the arbitrators act and derive their authority provide to a contrary effect, or unless a contrary intention of the parties can be clearly and unmistakably gathered from the submission and attendant facts, the rule is general and imperative that all the arbitrators must unite in the award in order to render it valid. There is, however, a clear distinction between an "arbitration" of private import and one of public concern. In the latter a majority of the arbitrators chosen may act where all have met, but that rule does not obtain where the controversy is between individuals. Morgan v. Merchants' Co-operative Fire Ins. Ass'n, 64 N. Y. Supp. 873, 876, 52 App. Div. 61.

As action or suit.

See "Action"; "Suit."

Amicable lawsuit distinguished.

The words "arbitration" and "amicable lawsuit" are not convertible terms. The former carries with it the idea of settlement by disinterested third parties, and the latter by a friendly submission of the points in dispute to a judicial tribunal, to be determined in accordance with the terms of law. Thompson v. Moulton, 20 La. Ann. 535, 537.

Appraisal distinguished.

An act of the Legislature appropriating a sum of money for the purchase of certain relics to be paid on the certificate of three persons named, that the relics are in their opinion genuine, and that it is desirable in their judgment that they should be placed in the museum of the state library, is not a provision for "arbitration" to determine controversies between individuals, or in matters of private concern, in which all of the appraisers are required to act, but was an appointment of appraisers to act between an individual and the state, and is a matter of public concern, in which a majority act as the whole when all have met. People v. Nichols, 52 N. Y. 478, 481, 482, 11 Am. Rep. 734.

An "arbitration" is properly a submission to the decision of one or more persons of a matter in controversy or dispute between the parties. The authorities recognize a distinction between appraisers of value or persons selected to make a measurement or competition under a contract and arbitration properly so called. Where provisions are such in form that they require the submission of every controversy that may arise to arbitrators, and thus in terms oust the court of all jurisdiction in the matter, they are held invalid. But where they merely provide for the submission to arbitrators of the question of amount, so that the arbitrators have nothing to do but make an appraisal, they are generally sustained. An agreement in connection with the sale of land for the selection of persons called "arbitrators" to determine the value of the land constitutes an appraisal rather than an arbitration. Guild v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 45 Pac. 82, 84, 57 Kan. 70, 38 L. R. A. 77, 57 Am. St. Rep. 312.

Reference distinguished.

In holding that the term "arbitration" could not be applied to the carrying out of an agreement by which the value of merchantable timber standing on land sold was to be estimated by three appraisers, the court say that the theory of an arbitration is that it is substituted for a proceeding in court. There is a broad distinction between a submission to arbitration and the reference of a collateral or incidental matter to appraisement, measurement, or calculation. Noble v. Grandin, 84 N. W. 465, 468, 125 Mich. 383.

An "arbitration" requires nothing more than the consent of the parties uniting in the submission for its enlargement, but there is a well-defined distinction between the mere arbitration and a reference under the statute, which is a judicial proceeding. The referee could not extend or enlarge his own authority any more than he can create it originally. Lazell v. Houghton, 32 Vt. 579, 583.

ARBITRATION CLAUSE.

The term "arbitration clause" does not strictly include a stipulation in the articles of an association to insure upon cargoes, to the effect that the association shall finally determine the amount due on any loss, but such stipulation is an agreement inter se, which does not purport to submit controversies to disinterested persons. Perry v. Cobb, 34 Atl. 278, 279, 83 Me. 435, 49 L. R. A. 389.

ARBITRATOR.

See "Board of Arbitrators"; "Competent Arbitrators."

Arbitrators are judges chosen by the parties to decide the matters submitted to them, finally and without appeal. Burchell v. Marsh, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 344, 349, 15 L. Ed. 96.

An "arbitrator" is a private extraordinary judge, chosen by the parties who have a matter in dispute, and invested with power to decide the same, and the person is called an "arbitrator" because he generally has an arbitrary power, there being no appeal from his sentences, which are called "awards." Miller v. President, etc., of Junction Canal Co. (N. Y.) 53 Barb. 590, 595.

Arbitrators, when appointed, are judges, but those who appoint them are not necessarily such. Reigart v. McGrath (Pa.) 16 Serg. & R. 65, 66.

"Arbitrators" are judges chosen by the parties for themselves, and when so chosen they must be taken as they are, with their weaknesses and frailties, of which all have some, and while they act honestly and fairly, according to such abilities as they have, their proceedings are valid and binding. Silver v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. (U. S.) 40 Fed. 192, 194.

"Arbitrators" have the power of the court and a jury. They are to determine the matters in controversy submitted to them, and their oath obliges them to perform that duty justly and equitably. Their award, upon being filed, becomes a record of the court, and remains a record, unless appealed from or reversed. Kennedy v. Luhman, 13 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 131, 134.

"Arbitrators" are judges selected by the parties litigant. Their decisions will not be set aside because of the admission of illegal evidence, nor for an error in judgment nor partiality nor misconduct being shown. They are, in fact, elected as a court of general jurisdiction, so far as relates to the matter submitted, and it is not essential that it should adjust all matters in dispute. An award determining only one of the disputed matters is good so far as it goes. Vaughn v. Graham, 11 Mo. 575, 578, 579 (citing Pearce v. McIntyre, 29 Mo. 423).

An arbitrator is a judge appointed by the parties. He is, with their consent, invested with judicial functions in the particular case. He is to determine the right as between the parties in respect to the matter submitted, and all questions of fact or law upon which the right depends are, under a general submission, deemed to be referred to him for decision. The court possesses no general supervisory power over awards, and if arbitrators keep within their jurisdiction their award will not be set aside because they have erred in judgment, either on the facts or the law. This general principle is subject to the qualification that awards may be set aside for palpable error of fact, like a miscalculation of figures. It may also be set aside for error of law when the question of the law is stated on the face of the award, and it appears that the arbitrators meant to decide according to law, and did not. Fudickar v. Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 392, 399.

"Arbitrators" are sometimes considered as the substitutes and sometimes as the judges of the parties. They can do whatever the parties themselves can do, and more than the courts can do. Their power is revocable as a power of attorney. Dixon's Lessee v. Morehead (Pa.) Add. 216, 222.

As an agent.

"An arbitrator is not an agent. He is not acting for and in the stead of the party selecting him, but as a person vested with power by the law to examine and determine the matters in controversy which have been submitted to him, and whose imperative duty it is to do equal justice between the parties. His duties are more of a judicial than a fiduciary character, and his judgment partakes more of the nature of a judgment against than a contract on the part of the person to be charged." Collins v. Oliver, 23 Tenn. (4 Humph.) 439, 440.

"Arbitrators" are agents of both parties. Hence their acts are considered as the acts of the parties themselves, and a balance found by the arbitrators is considered as a balance struck by the parties on an account stated by themselves. It is on this theory that an award made pursuant to a submission not under seal has been held admissible in evidence under the court on an insimul computassent. Hays v. Hays (N. Y.) 23 Wend. 363, 367.

As a disinterested person.

An "arbitrator" is a disinterested person to whom a matter in dispute is submitted for decision. Garr v. Gomez (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 649, 661; Miller v. President, etc., of Junction Canal Co. (N. Y.) 53 Barb. 590, 595. An "arbitrator" is a disinterested person to whose judgment or decision matters in dispute are submitted by consent of parties. State v. Appleby, 25 S. C. 100, 104 (citing 2 Black. Comm. 16).

An "arbitrator" is said to be a private, extraordinary judge chosen by the parties to the matters in dispute, invested with power to decide the same. Gordon v. United States, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 188, 194, 19 L. Ed. 35. He should be disinterested, for no man can lawfully sit as judge in his own cause. Perry v. Cobb, 34 Atl. 278, 279, 88 Me. 435, 49 L. R. A. 389 (citing State v. Delesdernier, 11 Me. [2 Fairf.] 473).

Arbitrators are the agents of both parties alike, and not of one party only; and, like other judges, they are bound to exercise a high degree of judicial impartiality, without the slightest regard to the manner in which the duty has been devolved upon them. "Like jurors impaneled for the trial of a cause," said Judge Cushing in Strong v. Strong, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 560, "arbitrators are invested pro hac vice with judicial functions, the rightful discharge of which calls for and presupposes the most absolute impartiality." Grosvenor v. Flint, 37 Atl. 304, 305, 20 R. I. 21 (citing, also, Bradshaw v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 137 N. Y. 137, 32 N. E. 1055; Flint v. Pearce, 11 R. I. 576; Cleland v. Hedly, 5 R. I. 163; Peckham v. School Dist. No. 7, 7 R. I. 545).

As a judicial officer.

Arbitrators are not officers of the court, but the judges of the parties' own choosing. The court has no control over them. Farrington v. Hamblin (N. Y.) 12 Wend. 212, 213.

An arbitrator is a quasi judicial officer, under our laws, exercising judicial functions. There is as much reason in his case for protecting and insuring his impartiality, independence, and freedom from undue influence as in the case of judge or juror. An arbitrator appointed under a rule of court is not liable to an action by one party to the action referred to arbitration for fraudulently inducing, in pursuance of a conspiracy with the attorney of the other party to the action so referred, the other arbitrators to unite with him in an unjust award in favor of the latter party. Hoosac Tunnel Dock & Elevator Co. v. O'Brien, 137 Mass. 424, 426, 50 Am. Rep. 323.

As one chosen by both parties.

An arbitrator is one chosen by the parties to a dispute, and given authority to decide the same. In order to clothe a person with the authority of an arbitrator, the parties must mutually agree to be bound by the decision of the person chosen. Gordon v. United States, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 188, 195, 19 L. Ed. 35.

An arbitrator is a person selected by mutual consent of the parties to determine the matter in controversy between them; thus where one of two joint owners of property did not consent to the selection of an arbitrator the arbitration was void. City of Mobile v. Wood (U. S.) 95 Fed. 537, 538.

ARBITRIOS.

"The noun 'arbitrios,' in Mexican law, has a well-defined technical signification. Escribiche gives its meaning as the tax which, in default of propios, a town imposes with competent authority on certain articles of merchandise. As indicating the sources of revenue of a municipality, the words 'propios' and 'arbitrios' are usually found linked together, and when connected they are sometimes used as meaning the ways and means. The word 'arbitrios' was sometimes used in a general sense, as meaning the resources of the towns, and included their privileges in the royal lands as well as the taxes." Sheldon v. Milmo, 36 S. W. 413, 416, 90 Tex. 1.

ARCHBISHOP.

Bishop as including, see "Bishop."

ARCHITECT.

See "Practical Architect and Sanitary Engineer."

As a laborer, see "Laborer."

As an expert, see "Expert."

As a mechanic, see "Mechanic."

An "architect" is a person skilled in the art of building; one who understands architecture, or makes it his occupation to form plans and designs of buildings, and to superintend the artificers employed. Willson & Edwards v. City Council of Greenville, 43 S. E. 966, 967, 65 S. C. 426.

Architects and builders are well known as persons engaged, as a business, in planning, constructing, remodeling, and adapting to particular uses buildings and other structures; and if their experience and observation are sufficient, they may be regarded as especially skilled in the business, and qualified, prima facie, to testify as experts, on the question of the proper construction and safety of a building. Turner v. Haar, 21 S. W. 737, 738, 114 Mo. 335.

Architecture is the art of building according to certain determined rules. The owner does not know the rules. He employs an architect, who makes the plans in accordance with them, and if the architect undertakes to carry out his plan he is not to be heard after he has executed it as an architect to urge that, his employment having changed from an architect to that of a builder, he is no longer bound for his defective plan. Where a surety company signs a bond guarantying the safe execution of another contract as an "architect and contractor," it is equally as responsible as the architect and builder for the defectiveness of the specifications or the work, where the architect and builder are one and the same person. Louisiana Molasses Co. v. La Sasser, 28 South. 217, 220, 52 La. Ann. 2070.

ARCHIVE.

An "archive" is the original of a deed or other instrument which is left in the public archives as evidence of title. Guilbeau v. Mays, 15 Tex. 410, 414.

The word "archives," as used in the statutes of Texas, means public records and papers required or permitted by law to be filed in public places of deposit for preservation and use as evidence of the facts. It is not necessary that papers so required to be filed should be stated to be archives. But under article 57, Rev. St., providing, among other things, that all "books, transfers, powers of attorney, field notes, maps, plats, legal proceedings, official reports, original documents, and other papers appertaining to the land of the republic or the state of Texas, that have been deposited or filed in the general land office in accordance with any law of the republic or state of Texas," shall be deemed archives, there can be no doubt that a report of one appointed by a legislative act to examine and make true copies of the acts and charters founding certain towns, when duly filed in the general land office as required by the appointment, became a part of the archives. Texas M. Ry. Co. v. Jarvis, 7 S. W. 210, 214, 69 Tex. 537.

ARDENT SPIRITS.

"Ardent spirits," as used in a statute forbidding the sale of wine, gin, rum, brandy, whisky, cider spirits, and other kinds of "ardent spirits," by a less quantity than a quart, without a license, means the kind of spirits named in the statute; the words "ardent spirits" being a general term, the meaning of which was specified by a particular naming of the spirits intended to be included in the term, and hence, on an indictment for selling ardent spirits, it was necessary that the prosecution should prove that defendant sold one of the samples named in the statute. State v. Townley, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 311, 321.

"Ardent spirits" is a term applied to liquors obtained by distillation, such as rum, whisky, brandy, gin. Sarlis v. United States, 152 U. S. 570, 572, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 721, 38 L. Ed. 556.

The term "ardent spirits" does not include alcohol. State v. Martin, 34 Ark. 340, 341.

"Ardent spirits," as used in Rev. St. § 2139, providing that no "ardent spirits" shall be introduced into the Indian country, and that every person who introduces or attempts to introduce any ardent spirits or wines into such country shall be punishable, etc., is synonymous with the words "spirituous liquors," as there used. The term includes lager beer. United States v. Ellis (U. S.) 51 Fed. 808, 810.

ARE.

In holding that the statute providing that all children, wheresoever born, whose fathers or mothers are citizens at the time of the birth of such children, shall be citizens, etc., did not include a person born in a foreign country of parents also born in such country, although one of the parents was a native of Virginia, who removed to England before the Revolution, married there and resided in that country until after the peace, the court say: The right is not restricted to children whose fathers or mothers are or were citizens at the time of the birth of such children, but the right is extended as well to cases where the birth occurred before as where it might occur after the passage of the act. Previous cases are provided for by the words "were" and subsequent cases by the words "are" citizens at the time of their birth, etc. It is no objection to this construction that the word "are" is in the present tense, and must therefore have a present signification. Every present time is relative. It may have been present formerly, it may be present now, or it may be present at some future period. The word "are," therefore, although in the present tense, has, when applied to a transaction yet to come, a future signification, and is only equivalent to "shall" or "may be," and it must be so construed in the case before us, for it relates to parents who then were or might be citizens at the time of births then occurring or which might thereafter occur. Barzizias v. Hopkins & Hodgson (Va.) 2 Rand. 276, 293.

The words "are hereby granted," as used in Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850 (9 St. 519), conveying to the several states all the swamp lands and overflowed lands within their limits remaining unsold at the date of the act, import a present grant, and not a promise of one in the future, and therefore the statute passed title to the state on its passage, subject only to a determination as to what lands had been sold. Tubbs v. Wilhot, 11 Sup. Ct. 279, 138 U. S. 134, 38 L. Ed. 887.

Where a statute defining the time for making application for new trials provided (1) that the act should not apply to cases now pending in which motions are made for new trials, and (2) that the act should not apply to cases already tried in which motions for new trials may be made or are now pending, the words "are made," in the first proviso, were used in the sense of "shall be made," and not in the sense of "have been made." This consideration is rendered necessary by the fact that the second proviso embraces all cases which have been tried, so that in order to render the first proviso operative it is necessary to give the phrase this construction. In discussing the meaning of the words, the court says: "Grammatically speaking 'are made' is the passive voice of the verb 'to make.' It may refer to the past or to the future time. When the reference is to past time it signifies 'have been made'; when to future time, it signifies 'shall be made.'" Smith v. Davis, 85 Ga. 625, 11 S. E. 1024.

ARGILLITE.

"Argillite" is a term used by mineralogists for pulverized flake or slate rock, ordinarily known as clay slate. Plastic Slate-Roofing Joint-Stock Co. v. Moore (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 812, 813.

ARGOLS.

"Argols" and "crude tartar" are synonymous. The words are used convertibly by those who deal in the article. When wine ferments certain deposits cling to the sides or fall to the bottom of the casks. These deposits are mingled with a variety of impurities, such as glucose, leaves, sticks, and particles of dust, silicate, and other like things. By washing in cold water these impurities are removed, and the crude tartar is left free from their presence. Recknagle v. Murphy, 102 U. S. 197, 198, 26 L. Ed. 130.

ARGUE.

As used in rule 8 of the Supreme Court (40 Pac.), requiring that in all cases "to be argued" each party must furnish to the court printed briefs, "argued" means to be heard, to be submitted, and does not mean actual oral argumentation. Oregon Ry. Co. v. O'Brien, 13 Pac. 757, 3 Wash. T. 21.

ARGUMENT.

"Argument," as used in Code, § 3251, providing that costs shall be allowed a party for "argument" in the Court of Appeals, comprises within its meaning a submission of the reasoning on which counsel relies in a printed form, as well as by spoken address. Malcolm v. Hamill (N. Y.) 65 How. Prac. 506, 507.

In Sup. Ct. Rule 8, providing that exceptions to proceedings on appeal, or any technical objection to the record affecting the right of the appellant to be heard and the points of error assigned, must be in writing and filed at least one day before "argument" or they will be disregarded, "argument" means an oral argument before the court, and cannot mean that the argument was not had upon the merits until the briefs were filed. Agreeing to waive argument before the court and taking time to file briefs on the merits of the case was the same in effect as an oral argument, and a motion to dismiss the appeal should have been made and noticed before that time. State v. California Min. Co., 13 Nev. 203, 209.

ARISE—ARISING.

"Arise," as used in a lease of coal lands reserving the right to use any part of the surface in case of unforeseen contingencies which may "arise," means come into notice or become visible. Van Meter v. Chicago & V. M. Coal Min. Co., 55 N. W. 106, 108, 88 Iowa, 92.

In reason and law a contract may be said to "arise" as well where it is executed as where it is made. De Lovio v. Bolt (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 435.

The word "arising" refers to the present time or time to come, but cannot with any propriety refer to the time past and embrace former transactions. United States v. Heth, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 399-413, 2 L. Ed. 479.

Case or cause.

Statutes of limitations providing that, when a cause of action has "arisen" in another state, and by the laws of the state where the action arose it cannot be maintained thereon by reason of the lapse of time, no action shall be maintained thereon in this state, means when jurisdiction exists in the courts of the state to adjudicate between the parties upon the particular cause of action, if invoked; or, in other words, when the plaintiff has the right to sue the defendants in the courts of the state upon the particular cause of action, without regard to the place where the cause of action had its origin. Freundt v. Hahn, 63 Pac. 1107, 24 Wash. 8, 85 Am. St. Rep. 939 (citing Berry v. Krone, 46 Ill. App. 82); Hyman v. McVeigh, 10 Leg. News, 157.

A "cause of action" arises when that is not done which should have been done, or that is done which ought not to have been done. The time when a cause of action arises determines the place wherein it arises, for, when that occurs which is the cause of action, the place where it occurs is the place where the cause of action has arisen. Thus, where a foreign corporation doing business in New York purchased goods from another foreign corporation doing business at its domicile where the contract of sale was made, the cause of action for the purchase of goods arose at the place where the buyer was doing business, and therefore the seller could sue there, under a provision that one foreign corporation may sue another in New York where the cause of action arose within the state. Shelby Steel-Tube Co. v. Burgess Gun Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 871, 873, 8 App. Div. 444.

2 Rev. St. 168, § 2, providing that every circuit judge within the limits of a circuit shall have all the original jurisdiction vested in the chancellor in all causes and matters when "such causes shall have arisen" within the circuit of such judge, does not include an action for breach of a contract which was made within the judge's district, but which was to be performed outside of it, and where the default of the defendants on which the plaintiff rested his cause occurred in another district. Burckle v. Eckhart, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 132, 136.

"Arise," as used in a statute of limitations providing that an action shall be brought by an administrator to recover for the death of his intestate within one year after the cause of action shall have arisen, means to come into existence, and, inasmuch as no cause of action could arise or exist in favor of an administrator until he comes into existence as such, the action did not arise until the appointment of the administrator, and hence the statute did not begin to run from the killing of the intestate. Andrews v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 34 Conn. 57, 59.

One of the definitions of "arising" is "appearing," and one of the definitions of the verb "arise" is "to appear" or "to become known," "to become visible, sensible, or operative." Where plaintiff has procured a judgment under the joint debtor act, and proceedings are instituted against both defendants, the cause of action in such proceeding does not arise on the judgment, within the meaning of 2 Rev. St. p. 3, §§ 1, 3, 4, authorizing a judgment in such a case. Oakley v. Aspinwall, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 1, 37.

Code Civ. Proc. § 67, providing that actions against a public officer for an act done by him by virtue of his office must be tried in the county where the "cause of action or some part thereof arose," means where the debt for which the officer was sued was contracted or originated, and as an officer's official acts are confined to his county, and as the cause of action is his official act, it follows that the cause of action "arose" in the county in which the officer acted, and not out of the county where he did nothing by virtue of his office. All public officers, when sued about their official acts, should be sued in the county where they transact their official business. Steele v. Rutherford County Com'rs, 70 N. C. 137, 138.

"Arising," as used in Const. art. 8, § 5, providing that all civil and criminal business "arising" in any county must be tried in such county, etc., will not be held to have been used in the sense of having been commenced, so as not to fix the venue of the action, but in its ordinary sense. Konold v. Rio Grande W. Ry. Co., 51 Pac. 256, 257, 16 Utah, 151.

Arising in a justice's court.

There is no distinction between cases arising in a justice's court and actions originally commenced in that court, as used in Code, § 11, providing that an appeal should not be allowed to the Court of Appeals in an action originally commenced in a court of a justice of the peace. Cook v. Nellis, 18 N. Y. 126, 127.

Arising in naval forces.

"Cases arising in the naval forces" are cases originating in the naval forces or service, or, in other words, offenses against the laws regulating the navy, committed by a party while in the naval forces. The contention that, although an offense has been committed while in the naval service, yet a "case" does not arise until a charge is actually made, and, if the charge is not actually framed and presented till after the offender ceases to be in the service, it is not a case arising in the naval forces, is not maintainable. "A case," in ordinary parlance, is that which falls, comes, or happens; an event; also a state of facts involving a question for discussion. But the event—that which happens; the state of facts presenting the question for discussion—must have arisen, must have had an origin. What does "arising" mean, as here used? Certainly not merely making a statement of the pre-existing facts, which constitutes a "case" for judicial cognizance. Among the ordinary and most common definitions of the word "arise" are to proceed, to issue, to spring; and a case arising in the land or naval forces seems to be a case proceeding, issuing, or springing from acts in violation of the naval laws and regulations, committed while in the naval forces or service. In re Bogart (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 796, 798.

Arising on contract.

See, also, "Action on Contract."

Rev. St. § 3522, authorizing a filing of any claim "arising on contract" as a counterclaim in an action, means such demands as "would have been redressed at common law by any of the forms of action which might be resorted to, to recover damages for breaches of contract." Board of St. Louis Public Schools v. Broadway Savings Bank's Estate, 12 Mo. App. 104, 108.

As used in Comp. Laws, § 4995, authorizing an attachment in actions arising on contract, the term "arising on contract" must be construed to mean a debt or claim ascertained or ascertainable by reference to the contract, or that can be definitely fixed by the rules of law, and which is made to clearly appear by the statement in the affidavit of the grounds of the claim. This would include all claims for damages in which, from the contract and facts stated in the affidavit, a court, on applying the law, can definitely determine the amount which plaintiff is entitled to recover, and it would exclude all cases where the amount of the claim can be determined by no fixed rule of law, but it is to be determined entirely by the opinion of the court or jury. An action for breach of contract of marriage well illustrates the latter class of cases, inasmuch as no court, from the facts stated in the affidavit, could determine the amount plaintiff was entitled to recover. Damages in such a case might be any sum within the ad damnum clause. Coats v. Arthur (S. D.) 58 N. W. 675, 676.

As used in Hill's Code, § 73, requiring that a counterclaim must be a claim "arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint" as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, will be construed, in an action on a promissory note given for a machine purchased, to mean "any cause of action in favor of the defendant, and against the plaintiff, arising out of the contract or transaction between the parties of which the promissory note set out in the complaint is but the evidence." Wait v. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co., 31 Pac. 661, 662, 23 Or. 297.

Civ. Code, § 55, defining marriage as a personal relation "arising out of a civil contract" to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary, means a contract then and there to become husband and wife. The civil contract of the parties is simply that they forthwith enter into a certain status of relation. The rights and obligations of that status are fixed by society in accordance with the principles of natural law, and are above and beyond the parties themselves. They cannot modify the terms on which they are to live together, nor superadd to the relation a single condition. The personal relation created by the contract is not merely a contract. The contract is the portal through which the parties enter into the relation of marriage, and they can enter into that relation in no other way. Although all persons competent may marry at their own volition, the law fixes the rights and duties of those who are married. Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. 345, 348, 75 Cal. 1.

The words "arising on contract" in the first subdivision of section 129 of the Code, relative to two classes of actions, are to be regarded merely as a translation of the old Latin phrase "ex contractu," and extend into and include implied contracts, as well as those which are expressed. People v. Bennett (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. 343, 348.

A cause of action may be said to arise when the contract out of which it grows is entered into or made. Emerson v. The Shawano City, 10 Wis. 433, 435.

Arising on the trial.

Under a statute providing that appeals from the rulings and decisions of the superior court upon questions of law arising on the trial of criminal cases may be taken by the state in the same manner as by the accused, it is held that the phrase "questions of law arising on the trial" means all questions which could theretofore have been reviewed either upon motions of error or motions for a new trial, and hence the state may appeal from a ruling on a demurrer to a complaint in a criminal case, although such ruling might not with absolute strictness be said to be a question of law arising at trial. State v. Clerkin, 19 Atl. 517, 58 Conn. 98.

Arising under act of Congress.

A case "arising under act of Congress" is a controversy which turns on the existence, effect, or operation of an act of Congress, and hence a suit brought to determine the same is a case arising under such act within the statute. Hughes v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 18 Fed. 106, 110 (cited and approved Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Carland, 3 Pac. 134, 138, 5 Mont. 146).

Arising under Constitution or laws of United States.

"A case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States" is a case the correct decision of which depends upon a construction of the Constitution or an act or Congress. Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 379, 5 L. Ed. 257; Stanley v. Board of Sup'rs of Albany County (U. S.) 6 Fed. 561.

A case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States "is a case where, from the questions involved, it appears that some title, right, privilege, or immunity on which the recovery depends will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or law of the United States, or sustained by the opposite construction." Starin v. New York, 6 Sup. Ct. 28, 31, 115 U. S. 248, 29 L. Ed. 388; Germania Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 7 Sup. Ct. 260, 261, 119 U. S. 473, 30 L. Ed. 461.

Cases arising under the laws of the United States are such as grow out of the legislation of Congress, whether they constitute right or privilege, or claim, or protection or defense of the party by whom they are asserted. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 135, 141, 26 L. Ed. 96.

The phrase "suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States," as used in defining the limits of the jurisdiction of the federal courts, requires that the suit be one which really and substantially involves a suit or controversy as to a right which depends on the construction or effect of the Constitution or of some law or treaty of the United States. Carson v. Dunham, 7 Sup. Ct. 1030, 1032, 121 U. S. 421, 30 L. Ed. 992.

"Cases arising under the laws of the United States" are such as grow out of the legislation of Congress, whether they constitute a right or privilege, claim or protection, or defense of the party, in whole or in part, by whom they are asserted. Cunningham v. Neagle, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 679, 135 U. S. 1, 34 L. Ed. 55. The phrase cannot be construed to embrace a case in admiralty, for such a case does not arise under the Constitution or laws of the United States. These cases are as old as navigation itself, and the law admiralty or maritime, as it has existed for ages, is applied by our courts to the cases as they arise. American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 511, 543, 7 L. Ed. 242.

Acts which arise under the Constitution and laws of the United States must be understood to be those growing out of, created by, or brought into being by the laws of the United States. Bank of United States v. Roberts (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 728, 732.

Const. art. 3, § 2, declaring that the judicial power of the federal courts shall extend to all cases in law and equity "arising under the laws of the United States," etc., gives the federal courts jurisdiction of all suits on bonds of United States marshals, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties. United States v. Davidson (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 771, 772.

That a case may arise under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, it need not be of an unmixed character; if the principal right, the right of property in the subject in controversy, is given or created by an act of Congress made in pursuance of the Constitution, it is sufficient. Magill v. Parsons, 4 Conn. 317, 323, 331.

Under a statute punishing conspiracies against the United States of all kinds, a conspiracy to defraud the government, though it may be directed to the revenue, as it is punishable under such law, cannot be said in any just sense to "arise" under the revenue laws. United States v. Hirsch, 100 U. S. 33, 35, 25 L. Ed. 539.

In statutes providing for the removal of any cause of a civil nature, at law or in equity, brought in any state court, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, it is held sufficient to justify a removal by the defendant that the record at the time of the removal show that either party claim a right under the statutes or laws of the United States, but the suit must be one in which some title, right, or privilege or immunity on which the recovery depends will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or sustained by a contrary construction. Thus, if the only right claimed by the plaintiff is under a state law, a suggestion in his bill that defendant will contend that such state law is void, because in contravention of the laws of the United States, cannot give the circuit court jurisdiction. State of Tennessee v. Union & Planters' Bank, 14 Sup. Ct. 654, 656, 152 U. S. 454, 38 L. Ed. 511.

Arising under treaty.

Whenever a right grows out of or is protected by treaty, it is sanctioned against all the laws and judicial decisions of the state, and the person's rights thereunder are cases "arising" under treaties; but where a person's title is not affected by the treaty, and he claims nothing under a treaty, so that his title cannot be protected by it, the determination of his rights does not arise therein. Owings v. Norwood, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 344, 348, 3 L. Ed. 120.

"Arising out of a treaty," as used in Rev. St. § 1060, providing that the Court of Claims shall not have jurisdiction of "claims arising out of a treaty," means a claim where the right itself, which the petition makes the foundation of the claim, has its origin and derivation, its life and existence, from some treaty stipulation. United States v. Weld, 8 Sup. Ct. 1000, 1003, 127 U. S. 51, 32 L. Ed. 62.

Arising upon or concerning vessels.

The words "arising upon or concerning," in Rev. St. 566, which enacts that in case of admiralty and marine jurisdiction relating to any matter on contract or tort "arising upon or concerning" any vessel of 20 tons burden or upward, enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and employed in the business of commerce between places in different states and territories upon the Lakes and navigable waters connecting the Lakes, the trial of issues of fact shall be by jury when either require it, may be construed to apply to collisions, as well as contracts or torts actually occurring on board a vessel, and applies to either of two colliding vessels, though one of them is not a vessel within the description of the statute, as it is difficult to see why, if two vessels are interested in a contract or involved in a tort, the cause of action does not concern one of them as much as the other. The Erie Belle (U. S.) 20 Fed. 63.

ARM OF THE SEA.

Lord Hale says that "the sea is either that which lies within the body of the county or without it; that an arm or branch of the sea, within the fauces terræ, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of the county, but that part of the sea which lies not within the body of a county is called the main sea or ocean." He adds, "That is called an arm of the sea where the sea flows and reflows, and so far only as the sea flows and reflows," and in this he follows the exact definition given in the Book of Assizes, 22. This is the doctrine recognized by the courts of the country. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 196, 199; United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 51.

A sound is an "arm of the sea," within the common-law acceptance of the term, when it is navigable tide water. The Martha Ann (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 868, 869.

The term "arms of the sea" includes rivers in which the tide ebbs and flows. "That is called an arm of the sea where the tide flows and reflows, and so far only as the tide flows and reflows." Adams v. Pease, 2 Conn. 481, 484 (Hale, De Jure Maris, c. 4).

An "arm of the sea" may include various subordinate descriptions of waters where the tide ebbs and flows. It may be a river, harbor, creek, basin, or bay; and it is sometimes used to designate very extensive reaches of waters within the projecting capes or points of a country. United States v. Grush, Fed. Cas. No. 15,268 [5 Mason, 290]. Puget Sound, then, with its multitude of inlets, havens, harbors, and bays, may properly be held to be an arm of the sea. Smith v. United States, 1 Wash. T. 262, 268.

"Arm of the sea," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 5346, providing for the punishment of every person who upon the high seas, or in any "arm of the sea," or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, commits an assault on another, means such as are connected immediately with the high seas, and does not include the Great Lakes or the straits which connect Lake Huron and Lake Erie. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

ARMATURE.

An "armature," as the term is applied to a portion of the machinery used to generate electricity, is a coil of wire, wound on a metal core, and mounted on a shaft, and is revolved by the power communicated from the engine through the means of the belt. This armature is revolved in or between the ends of a large horseshoe magnet, the opening of which is downward. People v. Wemple, 15 N. Y. Supp. 711, 715, 61 Hun, 53.

ARMED.

In Rev. St. c. 118, § 25, providing for the punishment of a person making an assault "armed" with a dangerous weapon, "armed" means furnished or equipped with weapons of offense or defense. A person who has in his hand a dangerous weapon with which he makes an assault is certainly armed within the meaning of the statute. State v. Lynch, 33 Atl. 978, 979, 88 Me. 195.

ARMED FORCE.

The term within a statute authorizing certain officers of the peace or mayors of a city to call out an armed force in case of riot gives them no authority over the militia, it not being included in the term. Chapin v. Ferry, 28 Pac. 754, 756, 3 Wash. St. 386, 15 L. R. A. 116.

ARMED PROWLERS.

The Tennessee act of May 17, 1865, entitled "An act to punish all armed prowlers, guerillas, etc.," means armed persons wandering or roaming about over the country for the purpose of plundering or robbing the people, or for the purpose of plunder. Vaughn v. State, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 102, 107.

ARMED VESSELS.

It will be difficult to precisely mark the limits which would bring a captured vessel within the description of the acts of Congress as to "armed" vessels. Where there was on board of a vessel one musket, a few ounces of powder, and a few balls, the capacity of the vessel for offense is not sufficient to entitle it to be called an armed vessel. Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 64, 121, 2 L. Ed. 208.

ARMS.

See "Bear"; "Firearms"; "Loaded Arms."

"In the days of chivalry and knight-errantry, and at the present time where distinctions are recognized by law between wealth and other adventitious influences, and property or weakness, the adventurous and the great have adopted their insignia, suggested by valorous achievement, or other causes. These are called their arms or family escutcheon, and are usually engraved on their seals." And, as used in the statute requiring all notaries to keep a seal on which shall be engraved the arms of the territory, "arms" clearly means the "armorial insignia of a state or political community, intended to distinguish it from others." Kirksey v. Bates (Ala.) 7 Port. 529, 535, 31 Am. Dec. 722.

The term "arms," in its most comprehensive signification, probably includes every description of weapon or thing which may be used offensively or defensively. In its most restricted sense it includes guns or firearms of every description, as well as powder, lead, and flints, and such other things as are necessarily used in loading and discharging them, so as to render them effective as instruments of offense or defense, and without which their efficiency for these purposes would be greatly diminished, if not destroyed. State v. Buzzard, 4 Ark. (4 Pike) 18, 21.

The term "arms," as used in the chapter on offenses relating to the arrest and custody of prisoners, includes any deadly weapon. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 244.

In constitutional guaranty of right to bear arms.

"Arms," as used in Const. 1870, art. 2, § 5, providing that the citizens of this state shall have the right to keep and bear arms for their common defense, means such weapons as are used for the purposes of war, and does not include weapons not used in civilized warfare. Fife v. State, 31 Ark. 455, 458, 25 Am. Rep. 556.

The arms spoken of in the second article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States, providing that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, means such arms as are borne by people at war, or, at least, carried openly. State v. Smith, 11 La. Ann. 633, 634, 66 Am. Dec. 208.

The term "arms," in the Constitution of Tennessee, guarantying the right to carry arms, means "such weapons as are properly designated as such, as the term is understood in the popular language of the country, and such as are adapted to the efficiency of the citizen as a soldier when called on to make good the defense of a free people. The term includes the rifle of all descriptions, the shotgun, the musket, and repeater. Andrews v. State, 50 Tenn. (3 Heisk.) 165, 179, 8 Am. Rep. 8.

In Const. § 26, of the Declaration of Rights, declaring that free white men have a right to keep and bear arms for their common defense, "arms" is to be construed to mean such arms as "are usually employed in civilized warfare, and that constitute the ordinary military equipment," and hence Act 1837-38, c. 137, § 2, which prohibits any person from wearing any bowie knife, Arkansas toothpick, or other knife or weapon resembling such knives under his clothes or concealed about his person, is not unconstitutional. Aymette v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 154, 158.

The word "arms," in the phrase "the right to bear arms," evidently means the arms of a militiaman, the weapons ordinarily used in battle, to wit, guns of every kind, swords, bayonets, horseman's pistols, etc. That country is armed which has an army ready for fight. The call to arms was a call to put on the habiliments of battle, and it may be greatly doubted if in any author of the early days a use of the word "arms," when applied to people, can be found which includes pocket pistols, dirks, sword canes, toothpicks, bowie knives, and a host of other relics of past barbarism, or inventions of modern savagery of like character. Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, 475.

The word "arms," as we find it in the Constitution of the United States, securing to the people the right to keep and bear arms, refers to the arms of a militiaman or soldier, and the word is used in its military sense. The arms of the infantry soldier are the musket and bayonet; of cavalry and dragoons, the saber, holster pistols, and carbine; of the artillery, the fieldpiece, siege gun, and mortar, with side arms. The terms "dirks," "daggers," "slung shots," "sword canes," "brass knuckles," and "bowie knives" do not belong to military vocabulary. English v. State, 35 Tex. 473, 475, 476, 14 Am. Rep. 374.

ARMY.

Militia distinguished.

There is a broad distinction in the Constitution between the militia and the army, the powers conferred upon Congress in reference to one being widely different from the powers conferred and denied in reference to the other. An army is a body of men whose business is war. Borroughs v. Peyton (Va.) 16 Grat. 470, 475.

Navy included.

"Army," as used in Acts of Congress, and particularly in 12 Stat. 597, admitting to citizenship aliens enlisted in the "army" of the United States, on proof of one year's residence, etc., means the land force only, and excludes the naval forces or marine corps, "although the word in its most general sense might be taken to include all the organized and armed power of the nation." In re Bailey, 2 Fed. Cas. 360 (followed in Re Chamavas, 21 N. Y. Supp. 104, 105).

"Army" is a word of very general signification, analogous and equivalent to "military service," and perhaps of itself would embrace persons employed in the navy. When we speak of the military power of a country, we intend as well its seamen as its soldiers, its naval as well as its land forces. In its etymology the word "army" denotes men in arms, whether ashore or afloat, and historically we know that not until a comparatively recent period in any country was the navy distinguished as a separate establishment. Even now, only in some special case, do men speak of the army as distinguished from the navy. The term in law is nomen generalissimum, and includes the navy. In re Stewart, 30 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Rob.) 635, 636.

ARMY OFFICER.

See "Mounted Officer."

Act Cong. March 3, 1883 (22 St. at Large, 473), providing that all officers of the navy shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as "officers or enlisted man in the regular or volunteer army or navy or both," and shall receive all the benefits of such actual service, should be construed to include all men regularly in service in the army or navy, and that the expression "officers or enlisted men" is not to be construed distributively, as requiring that a person should be an enlisted man or an officer nominated and appointed by the President or by the head of a department, but that it was meant to include all men in service, either by enlistment or regular appointment in the army or navy. The word "officer" is used in the more general sense, which should include a paymaster's clerk. United States v. Hendee, 8 Sup. Ct. 507, 508, 124 U. S. 309, 31 L. Ed. 465; United States v. Cook, 9 Sup. Ct. 108, 109, 128 U. S. 254, 32 L. Ed. 464.

"Officers of the army on the retired list" are officers who have served a sufficient length of time to be entitled to be retired from active duty under ordinary circumstances, but who are still liable to be assigned by their superior officers to specified duties. Such officers are nevertheless members of the army, and in the military service of the government. United States v. Tyler, 105 U. S. 244, 26 L. Ed. 985. "It is impossible to hold that men who are by statute declared to be a part of the army, who may wear its uniform, whose name shall be upon its register, are subject to the rules and articles of war, and may be tried by military court-martial, and not by jury, are not in the military service." Hill v. Territory, 7 Pac. 63, 65, 2 Wash. T. 147.

"Officers," within the meaning of Act Cong. June 18, 1878, in reference to the pay of officers of the army, is limited to commissioned officers. Babbitt v. United States, 16 Ct. Cl. 202, 211.

Office and rank separate.

Under the statutes of the United States in reference to the army, the office of an officer of the army and his rank are not necessarily identical; the office has a rank attached to it, expressed by its title only; no other rank is conferred on the officer; the office remaining the same, the officer may have a different rank conferred on him as a title of distinction, to fix his relation or position with reference to other officers, as to privilege, precedence, or command, or to determine his pay. Wood v. United States, 2 Sup. Ct. 551, 553, 107 U. S. 414, 27 L. Ed. 542.

AROMATIC.

In the name "Wolf's Aromatic Schiedam Schnapps" the word "aromatic" is employed as expressive of one of the qualities of the liquor, and therefore cannot be claimed as a trade-mark. Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 480, 13 Am. Rep. 204.

ARPENT.

It not unfrequently happens in Louisiana that the word "arpent" is used when "acre" is meant, whereas there is a considerable difference between the two, the arpent being of 192 feet and the acre of 209 and a fraction. Randolph v. Sentilles (La.) 34 South. 587, 588.

ARRAIGN.

To "arraign" is nothing else but to call the prisoner to the bar of the court to answer to the matter charged upon him in the indictment. Crain v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 952, 956, 162 U. S. 625, 40 L. Ed. 1097; United States v. Curtis (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 726, 727 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. 322, 2 Hale, P. C. 216, c. 28); Goodin v. State, 16 Ohio St. 344, 347; Early v. State, 1 Tex. App. 248, 268, 28 Am. Rep. 409; State v. Weeden (Mo.) 34 S. W. 473, 475; People v. Frost (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 52, 54 (quoting 4 Bl. Comm. p. 322).

ARRAIGNMENT.

Arraignment is the calling of a person to the bar of the court to answer the matter charged against him. State v. Brock, 39 S.

E. 359, 360, 61 S. C. 141; State v. Weber, 22 Mo. 321, 325; Fitzpatrick v. People, 98 Ill. 259, 260; State v. Jackson, 82 N. C. 563, 568.

Lord Hale says: "An arraignment consists of three things: First, the calling the prisoner to the bar by his name and commanding him to hold up his right hand, which, though it may seem a trifling circumstance, yet it is of importance, for, by holding up his hand, constat de persona indictati, and he owns himself to be of that name; second, reading the indictment distinctly to him in English, that he may understand his charge; third, demanding of him whether he be guilty or not guilty, and if he pleads not guilty the clerk joins issue with him cul. prist. and enters the prisoner's plea, then demands how he will be tried; the common answer is 'by God and the country,' and thereupon the clerk enters po. se. and prays to God to send him a good deliverance." State v. Weber, 22 Mo. 321, 325; Crain v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 952, 956, 162 U. S. 625, 40 L. Ed. 1097; State v. Brock, 39 S. E. 359, 360, 61 S. C. 141. The holding up by the prisoner of his hand is not an indispensable ceremony, but calculated merely for the purpose of identifying the person. Any other acknowledgment will answer the purpose as well. Therefore, if the prisoner obstinately and contemptuously refuses to hold up his hand, but confesses he is the person named, it is fully sufficient. Then the indictment is to be read to him distinctly in the English tongue, that he may fully understand his charge, after which it is to be demanded of him whether he be guilty of the crime of which he stands indicted, or not guilty. Early v. State, 1 Tex. App. 248, 268, 28 Am. Rep. 409.

An "arraignment" consists of three parts: Calling the person to the bar by his name and requesting him to hold up his hand or do some other act of identification; reading the indictment to him in such language as to convey to his mind the nature of the charge against him; demanding of him whether he is guilty or not guilty. Elick v. Territory, 1 Wash. T. 136, 139.

Much of the common-law solemnity that was formerly used in a formal arraignment of those who stood indicted for crime is now dispensed with. There were reasons for an adherence to them which do not now exist. It was at one time necessary to ask him how he would be tried, but as the right to trial by battle never obtained with us, and the law has provided that every such issue shall be submitted to a jury of the country as the exclusive triers of fact, that question would be entirely meaningless. Our law does not demand that he shall formally and explicitly plead not guilty. If he requires a trial, or does not confess the indictment to be true, it is the duty of the court to enter a plea of not guilty, and proceed in the same manner as if he had formerly pleaded. Therefore, if the accused appear and plead to the indictment, no more formal arraignment is necessary. State v. Braunschweig, 36 Mo. 397, 398.

A plea of not guilty to the indictment is a sufficient "arraignment." State v. Grate, 68 Mo. 22, 27.

"No technical arraignment, such as requiring the prisoner to hold up his hand, the reading over the indictment to him, and asking him whether he be guilty or not guilty, is necessary." And therefore a record reciting the coming of the prosecuting attorney and the defendant in his own proper person and by counsel, and that the said defendant, for his plea to such bill of indictment upon his formal arraignment, pleads not guilty, shows a sufficient arraignment. State v. Weeden, 34 S. W. 473, 475, 133 Mo. 70.

"Arraignment," as used in Sess. Acts 1866-67, p. 931, c. 208, providing that a person indicted for an offense punishable with death may on his "arraignment" demand trial in the circuit court, merely means the calling of the prisoner to the bar to answer to the charge, and does not include the appeal. Whitehead v. Commonwealth (Va.) 19 Grat. 640, 643.

"Arraignment" is the bringing in of one indicted for a crime, reading the indictment to him in open court, and requiring him to plead thereto. In re Durant, 12 Atl. 650, 853, 60 Vt. 176.

Arraignment of a person accused of a public offense is nothing more than calling him to the bar of the court, and demanding of him, after explanation of the indictment, whether he pleads guilty or not guilty. The purpose of the arraignment is to obtain from the accused an answer; in other words, his plea to the indictment. United States v. McKnight (U. S.) 112 Fed. 982, 983.

An arraignment is the reading of an indictment by the clerk to the defendant, and asking him if he pleads guilty or not guilty to the indictment. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 1493; People v. Di Medicis, 80 N. Y. Supp. 212, 39 Misc. Rep. 438. The reading of the indictment to the jury in the hearing of the defendant was a substantial compliance with the statute. Utterback v. Commonwealth, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1515, 1517, 49 S. W. 479, 480, 105 Ky. 723, 88 Am. St. Rep. 328.

ARRANGE.

A promise to "arrange" a debt clearly imported an agreement to pay it. Abel v. Wilder, 77 Tenn. (9 Lea) 453, 455.

"Liquidated," when used in connection with claims which can be divided so as to allow actions to be brought in justices' courts, is synonymous with "arranged." Parris v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 631, 634.

ARRANGEMENT.

When taken by itself, "arrangement" has a different signification from the words "contract" or "agreement"; yet when taken in connection with the allegations of the complaint, that there was an "arrangement" between a railroad company and a copartnership for which plaintiff was working, requiring a railroad company to transport the employes of the copartnership, was a sufficient allegation of an agreement to that effect. Gilmore v. Westerman, 43 Pac. 345, 349, 13 Wash. 390.

Eastern Counties Railway Act, 6 & 7 Wm. IV, c. 106, § 111, enacts that in every case in which the owner of any land, or other person by the act capacitated to convey, shall, in their "arrangements with the company," have received or agreed to receive compensation for gates, bridges, etc., instead of the same being erected by the company, it shall not be lawful for such owners to pass or cross the railway from one part to the other, otherwise than by a bridge to be erected at the expense of such owners. Held, that the word "arrangements" included all contracts and agreements for the erection of crossings, and that a receipt of compensation under the act was an arrangement within the section, and hence that the landowner had no right thereafter to cross the railway without the erection of a bridge. Manning v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co., 12 Mees. & W. 237.

The Century Dictionary defines "arrangement" as "preparatory measure or negotiation; previous disposition or plan; preparation; commonly used in the plural, as 'we have made arrangements for a journey.'" Webster defines the word as meaning "preparatory measure; preparation; as 'we have made arrangements for receiving company.'" As used in 20 St. at Large S. C. p. 377, relating to usury, and providing that the act shall not apply to discounts or arrangements made prior to a certain date, includes an instance where, prior to the date specified, the amount, terms, and security for a loan had all been agreed upon, and all that remained to be done after that date was to execute the papers and transfer the money. Union Mortgage Banking & Trust Co. v. Hagood (U. S.) 97 Fed. 360, 364.

"Arrangement," as used in Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, means compositions between the debtor and creditor. While the natural meaning of the word "arrangement" is a "setting in order," the word is not limited to that meaning, but applies to and includes contracts or agreements between debtor and creditor for the settlement of their claims. Tetley v. Taylor, 1 El. & Bl. 521, 540.

ARRAS.

"Arras," as used in the Spanish law, "is that which the husband gives the woman on account of marriage." Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 254 (citing 1 Partidas, 507).

In White's M. Recoplacion, where "arras" is translated into "jointure," as conveying nearly the same meaning, the writer defines "arras" as "a dowry assigned to, or settled upon, the wife by her husband for her maintenance after his death, which cannot exceed in value or amount the tenth part of his fortune or property," and the right of the wife to arras is likened to her right to dower under the common law. Miller v. Dunn, 62 Mo. 216, 219.

ARRASENE.

"Arrasene" consists of goods formed of two or more strands or threads of silk, with short cross threads, interlaced or woven so as to make a kind of fringed thread or embroidery yarn. Mandel v. Spalding (U. S.) 26 Fed. 600, 610.

ARRAY.

See "Challenge to the Array."

"Array" is the whole body of persons summoned to attend a court, as they are arrayed or arranged on the panel. Durrah v. State, 44 Miss. 789, 796 (citing Comyn's Dig., Challenge, B).

By the "array" of grand jurors is meant the whole body of persons summoned to serve as such before they have been impaneled. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 398.

ARREARAGE—ARREARS.

"Arrear" is that which is behind in payment, or which remains unpaid though due, so that an affidavit that rent is in arrear is an affidavit that it is due and unpaid. Hollingsworth v. Willis, 8 South. 170, 64 Miss. 152.

The word "arrears" comes from the French "arriere," meaning behind, and signifies money unpaid at the due time, as rent behind, and such is its definition in all the dictionaries. It is unlike the word "due," in that due has more than one signification, and expresses two distinct ideas, at one time signifying a simple indebtedness with reference to the time of payment, while at other times it shows that the date of payment is past. But there is no such ambiguity about the word "arrears." Always it must be past due to be in arrears, and cases in the law concerning real property illustrate this meaning when used to express that rent is in arrears (citing Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Doug. 279; Birch v. Wright, 1 Term R. 378). Hence the power of a fraternal insurance company to declare its dues in arrears is limited to the time after such dues become due and payable. Wiggin v. Knights of Pythias (U. S.) 31 Fed. 122, 125.

"Arrearage," as used in the by-laws of a mutual benefit order, providing that a suspended member can be reinstated only on paying "all arrearages of every kind," means all the charges that have accrued, and which could have been justly demanded of the member had he not been in default, so that a member cannot claim reinstatement without paying assessments levied while he was suspended, although during such suspension he was not a member entitled to the benefits of the order. Sovereign Camp Woodmen of the World v. Rothschild, 40 S. W. 553, 557, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 463.

Of assessment.

"Arrearage," as used in P. L. 1886, p. 149, giving jurisdiction of cases involving arrearages of assessments to the commissioners of adjustment, does not necessarily mean an unpaid balance of a subsisting assessment, but any sum which has been assessed for a public improvement makes arrearages, without reference to the invalidity of the law under which it was imposed. The setting aside of such an assessment for total invalidity does not prevent the sum represented thereby from being regarded as an arrearage. State v. City of Newark, 18 Atl. 572, 573, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 138.

Of mortgage.

In a will of a testatrix, who had a mortgage on the estate of which her brother was tenant for life, and had also his bond for "arrears" of interest on that mortgage, a bequest giving to the brother the "arrears" of the mortgage did not mean the mortgage itself, but what might be due at the death of the testatrix. Hamilton v. Lloyd, 2 Ves. Sr. 416.

Of rent.

As chose in action, see "Rent in Arrears."

The phrase "arrearages of rent," as used in Acts 1715, c. 27, § 5, providing that actions of debt for "arrearages of rent" shall be limited to three years, includes an action of debt for the use and occupation of real estate. Ellder v. Henry, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 81, 85.

"Arrears of rent" are chattels real of a mixed nature, being partly in possession and partly in action, and, if the husband survive his wife, he, and not her representatives, shall have all those arrears which became due during the marriage in her right, by survivorship. Condit v. Neighbor, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 83, 92 (citing Clancy, Husb. & W. 10).

11 Geo. II, c. 19, § 1, provides that, in case any tenant of lands on the demise or holding whereof any rent is or shall be reserved, due, or made payable, shall fraudulently or clandestinely convey away or carry off or from said premises his goods or chattels, to prevent the landlord distraining the same for arrears of rent so reserved, due, or made payable, the landlord may seize the same wherever found. Held not to require that the rent should be in arrear at the time of the removal, and, where a tenant on the morning of the quarter day fraudulently removed his goods with intent to avoid a distress which became due on that day, such rent was within the meaning of the statute. Dibble v. Bowater, 2 El. & Bl. 564, 569.

On stock.

"Arrears," as used in the by-laws of a corporation prohibiting the transfer of corporate stock as long as the holder is in arrears, or in any form indebted to it, is to be construed as including subscriptions on stock after the making of a call therefor, and not subscriptions before such call is made. Kahn v. Bank of St. Joseph, 70 Mo. 262, 272.

ARREST.

See "Illegal Arrest"; "Legal Arrest"; "Privilege from Arrest"; "Warrant of Arrest."

An arrest is the taking, seizing, or detaining the person of another; touching or putting hands on him in the execution of process, or any act indicating an intention to arrest. United States v. Benner (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1084, 1086; Rhodes v. Walsh, 57 N. W. 212, 213, 55 Minn. 542, 23 L. R. A. 632; Lansing v. Case, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 221, 223.

An arrest "is the apprehending or detaining of the person in order to be forthcoming to answer an alleged or suspected crime." Ex parte Sherwood, 15 S. W. 812, 813, 29 Tex. App. 334; Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174, 176; Hogan v. Stophlet, 53 N. E. 604, 606, 179 Ill. 150, 44 L. R. A. 809.

An arrest is a restraint of the person, and taking of the party into actual custody, under legal process. Hart v. Flynn's Ex'r, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 190, 191; Emery v. Chesley, 18 N. H. 198, 201.

By "arrest" is to be understood "to take the party into custody." It is so used in works of authority. An arrest is the beginning of imprisonment; when a man is first taken and restrained of his liberty by power or color of a legal warrant. French v. Bancroft, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 502, 504.

To constitute a legal "arrest," the officer must lay his hand on the defendant or otherwise take possession of his person. He must make him his prisoner in an unequivocal form. Petit v. Colmary (Del.) 55 Atl. 344, 345.

To constitute an arrest, the officer must exercise a controlling authority over the defendant, and have the process in his hand to enforce. Lansing v. Case, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 221, 223.

Arrest is the taking of a person into custody that he may be held to answer for a public offense. Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 110; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 5571; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4092; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 5255.

An arrest is the taking of a person into custody in the manner authorized by law. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7912. An arrest is taking a person into custody in a case and in the manner authorized by law. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4635. An "arrest" is taking a person into custody in a case and in the manner authorized by law. An arrest may be made by a peace officer or by a private person. Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5236. An "arrest" is taking a person into custody in a case and in the manner authorized by law. An arrest may be made by a peace officer or by a private person. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 834.

Arrest is the taking of a person into custody, that he may be held to answer for a crime. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 167; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1601.

An "arrest" is made by an actual restraint of the person of the defendant or by his submission to the custody of the officer, under authority of a warrant or otherwise. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 2540.

An offer of a reward for the arrest and conviction of an unknown perpetrator of a crime cannot be taken literally, but the conditions thereof are substantially performed by a person who obtains possession of the facts necessary to secure his arrest and conviction, and gives them to some proper person interested, although he does not himself make the arrest, but this and the prosecution are made by the proper officers. Kinn v. First Nat. Bank, 95 N. W. 969, 971, 118 Wis. 537 (citing Haskell v. Davidson, 91 Me. 488, 40 Atl. 330, 42 L. R. A. 155, 64 Am. St. Rep. 254).

"Arrest," as used in Code 1892, § 1387, providing a reward for the arrest of any one who has killed another and is fleeing or attempting to flee before arrest, the term "arrest" refers to an arrest for the offense arising from the killing of another, and the fleeing before arrest means the fleeing of one, who has killed another, before arrest for the offense arising from that killing. So that, where one who wounded another, while his victim was still alive, was arrested and tried for assault with intent to kill and discharged, and, on his victim's subsequently dying, fled, one who then arrested him for the offense of killing his victim was entitled to the reward. Newton County v. Doolittle, 18 South. 451, 72 Miss. 929.

An arrest is usually made by taking the person into actual custody. The common practice is to put the hand upon the individual, and any touching, however slight, is enough. Genner v. Sparks, 1 Salk. 79. But no manual touching of the body or actual force is necessary to constitute an arrest, if the party be within the power of the officer and submits to the arrest. Butler v. Washburn, 25 N. H. (5 Fost.) 251, 258 (citing Horner v. Batten, Bull. N. P. 62); Emery v. Chesley, 18 N. H. 198, 201; Bissell v. Gold (N. Y.) 1 Wend. 210, 215, 19 Am. Dec. 480. But mere words will not make an arrest if the party resists and refuses to be arrested. Case v. State (Miss.) 17 South. 379, 381.

"To constitute a legal arrest, it is not necessary that the officer should touch the person of the individual against whom the precept has issued. It is sufficient if, upon being in his presence, he tells him he has such a precept against him, and the person says, 'I submit to your authority,' or uses language expressive of such submission. But it is not every touching of the person that will constitute an arrest; it must be touching with such an intent, as for instance, an officer has a ca. sa. against a defendant whom he meets in company, and goes up to him and shakes hands with him, without apprising him that he has such a precept. This might not be an arrest unless so intended and understood by the party. So if an officer meets the defendant in public company or on a highway and notifies him of his having a precept, and directs him to meet him at some particular place, this might be an arrest or not, as the parties intended." Jones v. Jones, 35 N. C. 443, 449.

The term "arrest" has a technical meaning, and implies that the person is restrained of his liberty by some officer of the law, armed with lawful process authorizing the arrest. The officer need not touch the person of such party to make the arrest effectual, but he must have and intend to have control of the party's person. Thus, if the officer come into a room and tell the person that he arrests him, and locks the door, there is an arrest. If the officer and the party to be arrested meet, and the former notifies the latter that he has process for his arrest, and the officer directs to meet him at a particular place, this would be a sufficient arrest if the officer and the party so agree and intend. State v. Buxton, 102 N. C. 129, 131, 8 S. E. 774, 775.

An actual touching of hands is not essential to constitute a valid arrest. If the defendant voluntarily consents to be considered under arrest, in consideration of being allowed his freedom of locomotion under the discretion of the officer, the arrest is complete. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 893.

Apprehension distinguished.

The word "arrest" is more properly used in civil cases, and "apprehension" in criminal. The word "arrest," among others, has the meaning of to take, seize, or apprehend a person by authority of legal process issued for that purpose. Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174, 176; Hogan v. Stophlet, 53 N. E. 604, 606, 179 Ill. 150, 44 L. R. A. 809.

In admiralty.

"The term 'arrest' is a technical term used in admiralty process to indicate an actual seizure of property." Pelham v. Rose, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 103, 107, 19 L. Ed. 602.

As imprisonment.

See "Imprison—Imprisonment."

"An arrest is an imprisonment." Blight v. Meeker, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 97, 98.

As substitute for ne exeat.

The "arrest" authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 551, authorizing the court to grant an order of arrest in an action wherein the judgment demanded would require the performance of an act, the neglect or refusal to perform which would be punishable by the court as a contempt, and there might be danger that the judgment or order requiring the performance of the act would be ineffectual, is a substitute for the writ ne exeat. Ensign v. Nelson, 1 N. Y. Supp. 685, 686, 49 Hun, 215.

Service of civil process.

A member of Congress while in his state on private business, with leave of absence, during a session of Congress, is not exempt from service of civil process under the Constitution of the United States, art. 6, declaring that Senators and Representatives shall in all cases, except treason and felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at sessions of their respective houses, in going to and returning from the same; the word "arrest," being construed in its strict sense, applying to arrest of their persons, and not relating to an exemption from suit. Worth v. Norton, 33 S. E. 792, 794, 56 S. C. 56.

In construing the constitutional provision that the members of each house shall in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same, the court, after quoting the definitions given in United States v. Benner (U.S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1084, Hart v. Flynn's Ex'r, 38 Ky. (8 Dana) 190, Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 174, and French v. Bancroft, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 502, said that this meaning of "arrest" was well known and understood at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and will be presumed to have been used in that sense, and such provision does not give them a privilege from the service of summons in a civil action. Rhodes v. Walsh, 57 N. W. 212, 213, 55 Minn. 542, 23 L. R. A. 632. A like construction was given to a similar provision in Const. Tex. art. 3, § 16. Gentry v. Griffith, 27 Tex. 461, 462.

"Arrest," as used in an act exempting from arrest persons necessarily attending on courts, means an actual detention of the person, and hence the service of a summons or citation on one while attending on a court is not within the statute. Huntington v. Shultz (S. C.) Harp. 452, 453, 18 Am. Dec. 660. As used in Rev. St. Ill. c. 12, § 8, providing that attorneys, judges, etc., shall be privileged from arrest while they are attending court, or going to and returning from it, means "the detention of the person in contradistinction to mere service of summons." Robbins v. Lincoln (U. S.) 27 Fed. 342, 343.

As defined by Gen. St. 1894, c. 105, "arrest" is "the taking of a person into custody, that he may be held to answer for a public offense, and is accomplished by an actual restraint of the person of the defendant, or by his submission to the custody of the officer; and the officer is required to inform the defendant that he acts under the authority of a warrant, and show the warrant if required." Subpœnas are put upon a different footing from the service of a criminal warrant, and there is no arrest in such case. Steenerson v. Polk County Com'rs, 68 Minn. 509, 516, 71 N. W. 687, 690.

ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

See, also, "Motion in Arrest of Judgment."

An arrest of judgment is the act of staying a judgment, or refusing to render judgment in actions at law and criminal cases, after verdict, for some matters intrinsic, appearing on the face of the record, which would render the judgment, if given, erroneous or reversible. The question raised by a motion in arrest of judgment is a question of law arising from the face of the record. Hence an objection that the act of the Legislature under which the term of court was held was not passed in a constitutional manner, as disclosed by the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, cannot be raised on such a motion. Browning v. Powers, 44 S. W. 224, 142 Mo. 322.

According to Blackstone, arrests of judgment arise from intrinsic causes appearing upon the face of the record, and he enumerates the grounds which will be sufficient to prompt this action of the court, as follows: "Where the declaration varies totally from the original writ; where the verdict materially differs from the pleadings and issues thereon; and where the case laid in the declaration is not sufficient in point of law to found an action upon." 3 Bl. Comm. 393. A standard writer says: "As a general rule, a judgment can be arrested only for some matter appearing, or the omission of some matter which ought to appear, on the face of the record itself." Byrne v. Lynn, 44 S. W. 311, 316, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 252 (citing 1 Black, Judgm. § 98).

An arrest of judgment is a setting aside of judgment after verdict, predicated on some defect which appears on the face of the record or pleadings. Rountree v. Lathrop, 69 Ga. 539, 540; People v. Kelly, 94 N. Y. 526, 530. It cannot be based on a mere affidavit showing the existence of a fact outside of the record, and which does not constitute a part of the same. People v. Kelly, 94 N. Y. 526, 530.

ARREST ON CIVIL PROCESS.

The words "arrested on civil process" in the section of the national guard act, providing that no officers or soldiers shall be arrested in civil suits while going to, remaining at, or returning from the place where he is ordered to attend for election of officers or military duty, cannot be construed to mean "privilege from suit." Land Title & Trust Co. v. Rambo, 34 Atl. 207, 174 Pa. 566.

ARRESTED FOR DRUNKENNESS.

A statement in a libelous article that the plaintiff was "arrested for drunkenness" is not an assertion that he was in fact drunk, but only that he was arrested on a charge of drunkenness. Stacy v. Portland Pub. Co., 68 Me. 279, 286.

ARRESTS, RESTRAINTS, DETAINMENTS OF KINGS, ETC.

See, also, "Restraint of Kings or Princes"; "Unlawful Arrest, Restraint and Detainment."

The words arrest, restraint, and detainment of all kings, in a marine policy insuring against arrest, restraint, and detainment of all kings, covers a loss caused by a vessel being unable to enter her port of destination by reason of a blockade, though she proceeds to other ports without attempting to enter the blockaded port. Schmidt v. United States Ins. Co., 1 Johns. 249, 262, 3 Am. Dec. 319.

An insurance on merchandise on board a vessel against usual sea risks, and also against "arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes, or people," should be construed to cover a blockade which prevents the vessel from entering her port of destination and requires her to put back to the port of departure. Vigers v. Ocean Ins. Co., 12 La. 362, 366, 32 Am. Dec. 118.

A policy of insurance on a vessel insured against "arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings." Held, that such clause was intended to insure against any interruption of the voyage by reason of foreign governmental action, and hence, if the vessel within a foreign port was blockaded in the course of her voyage and prevented from proceeding, she being a neutral vessel, and having on board a neutral cargo laden before the institution of the blockade, she sustained a loss within the clause entitling her to recover thereunder, the restraint being unlawful. Olivera v. Union Ins. Co., 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 183, 188, 189, 4 L. Ed. 465.

Arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes or peoples, within the meaning of a marine policy on a cargo of slaves against such arrests, restraints, and detainments, includes the issuing of a writ of habeas corpus by a judicial officer of a government within the control of which the vessel is driven by stress of weather, which results in the slaves being taken from the vessel and set at liberty. Simpson v. Charleston Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (S. C.) Dud. 239, 242.

ARRIVE—ARRIVAL.

See "Nonarrival"; "On Arrival"; "To Arrive."

"Goods 'arrive' when they reach their destination. The term necessarily involves the idea of cessation of transit. Goods shipped from Virginia to Alabama cannot be said to arrive in North Carolina, South Carolina, or Georgia, but only when they reach their destination in Alabama." In re Langford (U. S.) 57 Fed. 570, 573.

"Arrival," as used in a contract for the sale of goods to be shipped by a certain steamer, and providing that if there shall be no arrival there is no sale, refers to the goods which are the subject of the contract, and not the particular vessel by which they are shipped; meaning simply that if the goods never arrive at their destination the buyers shall not become liable for the price, and does not release the buyer from such liability if the goods arrive by another steamer than that by which they were originally shipped. Harrison v. Fortlage, 16 Sup. Ct. 488, 490, 161 U. S. 57, 40 L. Ed. 616.

"Arrival," within the meaning of Act Cong. Aug. 8, 1890, c. 728, 26 Stat. 313 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3177], providing that intoxicating liquors transported into another state, or remaining therein for use, etc., shall upon arrival in such state be subject to the operation of its laws enacted in the exercise of its police power, is to be construed to have reference to its arrival at its destination, and not at the state line, and therefore the power of the state does not attach when the goods first entered the state, and before they reach their destination. Rhodes v. Iowa, 18 Sup. Ct. 664, 667, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. Ed. 1088. Contra, see State v. Aiken, 20 S. E. 221, 232, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L. R. A. 345. The word as so used refers to the time when the goods have been placed in the railroad company's warehouse in readiness for the call of the consignee. But a delivery to the consignee is not essential to the idea of arrival. Southern Ry. Co. v. Heymann, 45 S. E. 491, 492, 118 Ga. 616.

Whisky purchased in North Carolina, being carried by the purchaser in a buggy from the place of purchase to his residence, will not be deemed to have arrived within the territorial limits of the state, nothing having been done to break the continuity of the transportation from the place of purchase. State v. Holleyman, 33 S. E. 366, 367, 55 S. C. 207, 45 L. R. A. 567.

22 Stat. 521, exempting from duty wearing apparel in actual use, and other personal effects of "persons arriving in the United States," means citizens returning, or foreigners visiting or immigrating. Astor v. Merritt, 4 Sup. Ct. 413, 419, 111 U. S. 202, 28 L. Ed. 401.

Laws 1898, c. 230, being the act in relation to the public administrator in the county of New York, in its reference to assets which "shall arrive within the county of New York after his death," means that the assets may arrive or come into the state in good faith in due course of business, and not for the avowed purpose of securing a resident plaintiff who can prosecute a negligence action against a foreign corporation on a cause of action arising in, and between residents of, another state. Hoes v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 66 N. E. 119, 121, 173 N. Y. 435.

ARRIVE—ARRIVAL (Of Vessel).

As anchoring.

The arrival of a vessel does not necessarily imply anchoring, nor is it necessary that she should be at anchor before she is considered as having "arrived." There can be no actual bounds within which a vessel must come, and no arbitrary distance can be determined in feet, yards, or fathoms which might not very soon be proven unreasonable and inexpedient, and a vessel is deemed to have arrived, within the wrecking rule in salvage cases, where she is within reasonable hailing distance, ready to receive and obey orders. Acosta v. The Halcyon (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 57.

To constitute the "arrival" of a certain quantity of oil in a vessel, the vessel must be moored within the time stipulated. Gray v. Gardner, 17 Mass. 188, 190.

As arrival at place of discharge.

"As between the shipowner and the charterer, the arrival of the ship is deemed to be complete from the time when the ship has arrived at the usual or designated place to discharge her cargo within the port, such as the public docks, although she may not be able to get a berth immediately so as to commence the discharge." Gronstadt v. Witt-hoff (U. S.) 15 Fed. 265, 268.

In a bill of lading providing that 24 hours after arrival at a certain port a certain time should be allowed for receiving the cargo, etc., "arrival" means going to the place at which the master may report his vessel, as ready to deliver her cargo and call upon the consignee to provide a place for delivery. Kenyon v. Tucker, 23 Atl. 61, 62, 17 R. I. 529.

There has been an arrival of a vessel within its charter party, providing for demurrage after arrival, where she was stopped in the harbor by the consignees, and the captain went ashore and was thereafter told to take his vessel to any point in the harbor to wait before discharging his cargo until it could be sold. Reed v. Weld (U. S.) 6 Fed. 304.

"Arrival," within a bill of lading providing for demurrage 24 hours after arrival, does not mean when the vessel has reached the wharf of the consignee, where the vessel was unable to do so because of ice in the harbor, but reached a neighboring wharf and tendered the cargo. Choate v. Meredith (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 648.

A policy obligating the underwriters to return to the assured seven pounds per cent. premium "for arrival" meant the arrival of the vessel at the place where the captain elected to discharge his cargo, and this though the point selected was a point two miles and a half outside the harbor where ships generally discharge, and from which the vessel was taken possession of by government officers and her cargo confiscated, thereby discharging the underwriters from liability for loss, and, the ship having "arrived" within the terms of the policy, entitled the assured to the discount. Dalglish v. Brooke, 15 East, 295, 296.

"Arrival," as used in Consular Act 1803, c. 62, § 1 (2 Story's Laws, p. 884; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9), imposing a penalty of $500 for not depositing a ship's register with the consul on arrival in a foreign port, means an arrival at a voluntary port of destination for purposes of trade. Parsons v. Hunter (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1,259, 1,260.

If a vessel is insured until she arrives at a particular port, and is destined to discharge cargo successively at two different wharves within that port, each being a distinct place for delivery of cargo, the risk ends when she has been moored 24 hours in safety at the first place. A vessel "arrives" at a particular port when she comes or is brought to the place where it is intended to discharge her, and where is the usual and customary place of discharge. When the vessel is insured to one or two ports and sails for one, the risk terminates on her arrival there. Simpson v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 174, 175.

"Arrived," as used in a marine policy providing that it shall continue in force until the vessel shall have arrived in a certain harbor, is to be construed to mean arrival at the particular point or place in the harbor which is the ultimate destination of the ship. Meigs v. Mutual Marine Ins. Co., 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 439, 453.

As arrival at port of destination.

Rev. St. § 2367 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1908], providing that if, after the arrival of any vessel within the limits of a collection district, any part of her cargo shall be unladen without authority of a customs officer, the merchandise so unladen shall be forfeited, held to mean the arrival of a vessel within a port with the intent to discharge her cargo, and hence, where the vessel has been driven ashore by stress of weather and unladen of her cargo without authority of a customs officer, the case is not within the statute. The Cargo ex Lady Essex (U. S.) 39 Fed. 765, 767.

Merely touching at a port, without coming to an entry or transacting any business, is not an "arrival" within Act Feb. 28, 1803, § 2, 2 Stat. 203, concerning consuls and vice consuls, requiring masters of vessels to deposit their ship papers with the consul on their arrival in a foreign port. It is difficult to determine the precise import of the word "arrival." Its common and obvious meaning is coming to some port or place, but in the fiscal navigation laws of the United States it is perhaps not most generally used in its original and etymological meaning, nor is it invariably used in one and the same sense, so that what is deemed by law to be an arrival for one, perhaps is not deemed to be so for another. In the twenty-fifth section of the collection law, requiring every master of a vessel coming from a foreign port, on his arrival within four leagues of the coast, or within the limits of any collection district, to exhibit and manifest his cargo to the officer of the customs who comes on board his vessel, it was used in the most common signification, and means coming within four leagues of the coast or within the limits of a district. And it was held in another case that the casual touching at a port for purposes not connected with the object of the voyage was not an arrival within Act Feb. 18, 1793, authorizing vessels in certain cases, when in a district to which they do not belong, to change their papers and take out a temporary register or license, which they are required, within 10 days after their arrival within the district to which they belong, to surrender, and take out new papers. In the section of the law under consideration in the case at bar, the word "arrival" means an arrival at the port of destination. Toler v. White (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 3, 6.

The ordinary meaning of the word "arrival," in the revenue laws, is the coming of a vessel to some place of her destination in the course of a voyage, some terminus embraced within the range of her employment, or of the expedition in which she is engaged. In this way it is used as contradistinguished from the phrase "touching at a port," though in a more loose sense a vessel is said to arrive at a port at which she touches. The strict and etymological meaning of the word "arrive" is to come to the shore, and in the French language, through which the word comes to us from the Latin, this meaning is preserved. The word implies a transitus and a terminus, a voyage made, and a point at which it terminates. United States v. Shackford (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1040.

The mere transit through the waters of the St. Mary's river for the purpose of proceeding to Spanish territory is not an "arrival" within the limits of the United States from a foreign port, within the act requiring a vessel so arriving to report or enter with a collector of the United States. The Apollon, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 362, 368, 6 L. Ed. 111.

The term "arrival," as used in the act of 1803, § 2, requiring the master of a United States ship, on its arrival in a foreign port, to deposit his register, sea letter, and Mediterranean passport, means arrival at a voluntary port of destination for the purposes of trade. Parsons v. Hunter (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1259, 1260. A Spanish fishing smack from Havana, which anchored within five miles of the mainland of Florida for the purpose of repairing a disabled mast, and which was not bound to and did not enter any port of the United States, is not within the provision of Rev. St. § 2773 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1862], providing that if any vessel, having arrived within the limits of any collection district from any foreign port, departs or attempts to depart from the same without making report or entry, she shall be liable to a penalty, etc., as such ship could not be said to have "arrived." The Javirena (U. S.) 67 Fed. 152, 155, 14 C. C. A. 350.

Act Cong. Feb. 28, 1803 (2 Stat. 203), declared that it shall be the duty of the master of a ship belonging to citizens of the United States, on his arrival at a foreign port, to deposit his passport with the consul. It was held that "arrival" means an arrival for the purpose of business, requiring an entry and clearance, and does not include putting into a foreign port to get information, without going to the harbor or wharves, and not entering or repairing, or needing the aid of a consul in any respect, and leaving the port within a few hours. Harrison v. Vose, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 372, 384, 13 L. Ed. 179.

Enter distinguished.

In reference to a vessel reaching port, the words "arrive" and "enter" are not synonymous, as there may be an arrival without an actual entry or an attempt to enter a port. An arrival within a port cannot be without an entry into the port. United States v. Open Boat (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 346, 351.

ARRIVING FROM SEA.

As far as the use of wharves is concerned, a boat returning from Galveston to the port of New Orleans is a "vessel arriving from sea," without any necessary connection with her former entry into the same port from which she cleared for the port of Galveston. The Thomas Melville (U. S.) 62 Fed. 749, 751, 10 C. C. A. 619.

ARROWROOT.

As starch, see "Starch."

ARROGATION.

Arrogation is a form of the ceremony of adoption. Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. 482, 497, 30 Am. Rep. 802.

ARSON.

See "Attempt to Commit Arson."

"Arson" at common law is defined by Lord Coke to be the malicious and voluntary burning of the house of another by night or by day. State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 455, 457 (citing 1 Hale, P. C. 566); State v. Fish, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 323, 324; State v. McGowan, 20 Conn. 245, 246, 52 Am. Dec. 336; People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76, 78; People v. Fanshawe, 32 N. E. 1102, 1103, 137 N. Y. 68, 73; Hester v. State, 17 Ga. 130, 132.

"Arson" at common law is usually defined as the willful and malicious burning of the house or outhouse of another man. Graham v. State, 40 Ala. 659, 664; Harrison v. State, 55 Ala. 239, 241; Giddens v. Mirk, 4 Ga. 364, 368; Mary v. State, 24 Ark. 44, 45, 81 Am. Dec. 60; McClaine v. Territory, 25 Pac. 453, 455, 1 Wash. St. 345; State v. Hannett, 54 Vt. 83, 86; State v. Dennin, 32 Vt. 158, 162; State v. McCoy, 62 S. W. 991, 992, 162 Mo. 383.

"The offense of arson is deemed at common law to be the voluntary and malicious burning of the house or barn of another." People v. Gates (N. Y.) 15 Wend. 159, 161 (quoting 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 1104).

Arson at common law was the malicious and willful burning of the house or outhouse of another; and whether the house was a dwelling house or an outhouse, though not contiguous to the dwelling, nor under the same roof as a barn or stable, its burning might, at common law, constitute arson. Allen v. State, 10 Ohio St. 287, 300.

The following definition of the offense at common law is given by Sir Matthew Hale: "The felony of arson or willful burning of houses is described by Lord Coke to be the malicious and voluntary burning of the house of another by night or by day. It extendeth not only to the very dwelling house, but to all houses that are a part thereof, though not contiguous to it, or under the same roof, as in case of burglary, the barn, stable, cow house, sheep house, dairy house, milk house; but if the barn be not parcel of the dwelling house, it is not felony unless the barn have hay or grain in it." State v. Porter, 90 N. C. 719, 720.

"Arson as well by the statutes of this state as by the common law is an offense against property. It consists in destroying the property of another through the agency of fire. The burning of a man's own house is not a felony at common law. But if a man set fire to his own house maliciously, intending thereby to destroy an adjoining house, if the latter is burned, it is a felony; if not it is a great misdemeanor." People v. Henderson (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 560, 561 (quoting 1 Hale, P. C. 568, 2 East, P. C. 1027).

The burning of any building so situated as to endanger a dwelling house was felonious arson at common law. Hill v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 192, 195.

At the common law "arson" was defined to be the willful and malicious burning of the dwelling house of another. The statutes have left the definition of the crime as it stood at common law. The offense is a crime against the security of a dwelling house as such, and not against the building as property. State v. Hannett, 54 Vt. 83, 86.

"Arson" is defined under the common law to be the willful and malicious burning of the house of another, and under Sand. & H. Dig. § 164, as the willful and malicious burning of the house or other tenements of another. While other sections of the statute make it arson to burn structures not subjects of arson at the common law, still the definition of arson at common law was not in other respects changed by the statute. State v. Snellgrove (Ark.) 71 S. W. 266.

The burning of a stack of hay is not arson at the common law, nor under the statutes of Illinois. Creed v. People, 81 Ill. 565, 571.

Willfully and maliciously setting fire to or burning a corn crib is not arson, within

Cr. St. § 140, declaring that the willful and malicious setting fire to or burning any barn, stable, coachhouse, ginhouse, storehouse, or warehouse shall be deemed arson. State v. Jeter, 24 S. E. 889, 890, 47 S. C. 2.

Pen. Code, art. 651, defines "arson" as being the willful burning of any house included within the meaning of article 652, and article 652 defines a "house" as any building or structure inclosed with walls and covered, whatever may be the material used for the building. Held that, since a building ceases to be a building or structure after it is torn down, the burning of the material of which it was formerly composed would not constitute the burning of a house, and was therefore not arson. Mulligan v. State, 7 S. W. 664, 25 Tex. App. 199, 8 Am. St. Rep. 435.

Arson is the willful, malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. Rev. Code S. D. § 7382. In subsequent sections arson is divided into four degrees, with a different punishment for each, but each degree comes clearly within the general definition of arson, so that an information which accuses the defendant of the crime of arson, and charges facts constituting arson in the third degree, does not accuse the defendant of one crime and state facts constituting a different crime. State v. Young, 82 N. W. 420, 421, 9 N. D. 165.

Code, § 137, Purd. Dig. p. 144, pl. 248, provides that any person maliciously attempting to burn a barn that is a parcel of a dwelling shall be guilty of felonious arson. Commonwealth v. Weiderhold, 4 Atl. 345, 112 Pa. 584.

Completeness of burning.

Arson is the setting fire to a dwelling house inhabited at the time, though only a part of it is consumed. People v. Butler (N. Y.) 16 Johns. 203.

"The willful setting on fire of an inhabited dwelling house, though the fire should afterwards go out of itself or be extinguished by another, constitutes the crime of arson." People v. Cotteral (N. Y.) 18 Johns. 115, 116.

In order to constitute arson there must be an actual burning of some portion of the building; but it was not necessary at common law that the building should be wholly consumed. If any portion of the building was burned the offense was complete. State v. Dennin, 32 Vt. 158, 162.

"The burning of a house, necessary to constitute arson at common law, must be an actual burning of the whole or some part of the house; but it is not necessary that every part of the house should be wholly consumed, or that the fire should have any continuance, and the offense will be complete, though the fire should be put out or go out itself." Peo- ple v. Fanshawe, 19 N. Y. Supp. 865, 869, 65 Hun, 77.

Not limited to dwellings.

In this country the English law of arson has been considerably changed by modifying the statute, and it was competent for the Legislature to make it arson to willfully burn any boat, vessel, railroad car, etc., though the statute omitted the element of malice. State v. McCoy, 62 S. W. 991, 992, 162 Mo. 383.

The definition of "arson" according to Blackstone is the malicious and willful burning of the house or outhouse of another man. But according to Wharton's Criminal Law, upon authority of Hale's Pleas of the Crown, it is said to be arson at common law to maliciously burn another's barn stored with hay or grain. So an indictment charging arson or barn burning does not charge separate offenses, though the Code prescribes a less punishment for barn burning than for arson. Sublett v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 35 S. W. 543.

In the common law arson was a crime against the habitation rather than against property rights, but under statutes a greater number of things are embraced which were not subjects of arson at the common law, and the language employed evidences its intention to enlarge its common-law meaning. Thus the phrase, "the property of any other person," relates to and qualifies dwelling house, and indicates that it constitutes arson to burn a storehouse or any other building the property of another person just as certainly as it does the dwelling house the property of any other person. Lipschitz v. People, 53 Pac. 1111, 1112, 25 Colo. 261.

Intent to destroy.

Pen. Code, § 447, defines "arson" as the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. Under such definition there can be no arson in the absence of this intent to destroy. People v. Mooney, 59 Pac. 761, 762, 127 Cal. 339.

Arson is the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. There must be, to constitute the crime of arson, the malicious and willful burning of a building and an intent to destroy it. To constitute arson, where the action is sufficient in other respects, it is immaterial whether the motive be revenge or any other kind of malicious mischief. People v. Fong Hong, 53 Pac. 265, 266, 120 Cal. 685.

Gen. St. c. 29, art. 7, § 1, prescribes the punishment for arson, but it does not define the offense. The common law therefore controls in this respect. The felony of arson at common law is the malicious and voluntary burning of the house of another by night or by day. It must be a willful and malicious burning, otherwise it is not felony, but only a trespass. And therefore negligence or mischance does amount to arson. Alkman v. Commonwealth, 18 S. W. 937, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 894.

As offense against habitation.

"Arson" as defined by the common law is an offense against the security of the habitation rather than against the property which was burned. State v. Gilligan, 50 Atl. 844, 845, 23 R. I. 400.

The gist of the offense is the danger to the life of persons who were dwelling in the house. It was an offense against the habitation, and regarded the possession rather than the property, and when the burning of any other house than a dwelling was included within the offense, as the burning of barns and other outhouses, it was on the theory that the flames would extend to the dwelling and endanger the habitation. At the common law there was no question of value. It mattered not whether the house burned was worth thousands of dollars or only a few shillings, or whether it was a palace or not. It was the safety of the inhabitants of the structure that the law sought to protect. McClaine v. Territory, 25 Pac. 453, 455, 1 Wash. St. 345.

Arson is the burning of any house, edifice, structure, vessel, or other erection capable of affording shelter for human beings. It is not necessary that the house, edifice, structure, vessel, or other erection should have been intended for or had been used as a habitation, but it is sufficient if it be capable of affording shelter for human beings, and for that reason the willful and malicious burning of a building which was not intended or was not used as a habitation is an offense against the person rather than the property, and in that respect differs from arson as defined by the common law, which was an offense against the security of the habitation rather than against the property which was burned. People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, 320.

As offense against possession.

The distinguishing characteristic of arson at common law is that it is an immediate offense against a possession; and therefore, if a tenant, however short his term, set fire to a house he occupied, it was not arson. State v. Moore, 61 Mo. 276.

"Arson" is defined by Pen. Code, § 447, as the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. By section 452 it is provided that it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have ownership in the building set on fire; it is sufficient that at the time of the burning another person was rightfully in possession. Under such provision an owner of a building who was in possession could not be convicted of arson for burning it, though the building was so situated as to endanger the lives of inhabitants of other buildings. People v. De Winton, 45 Pac. 708, 709, 113 Cal. 403, 33 L. R. A. 374, 54 Am. St. Rep. 357.

"The offense is a crime against the security of the dwelling house as such, and not against the dwelling as property. In case where the ownership is in one and the occupancy in another, the indictment properly avers that the dwelling house belongs to the latter. If the occupant is in possession rightfully, and burns the house, he cannot in legal sense be guilty of burning the dwelling of another; he burns his own dwelling house." State v. Hannett, 54 Vt. 83, 86.

If the landlord or reversioner sets fire to his own house, of which another is in possession under lease, etc., it is arson, for during the lease the house is the property of the tenant. Harris' Case, Foster, 113; 4 Bl. Comm. 222; Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 199. So if it is in the possession of a copyholder. Spaulding's Case, 1 East, P. C. 1025; 1 Leach, Cr. Law, 218. The principle of the rule is that it was for the protection of the person in the actual and immediate possession of the house. The offense is against the possession of another. Breeme's Case, 1 Leach, 220; 2 East, P. C. 1026; Pedley's Case, 1 Leach, 235; 1 Hale, P. C. 567, note; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law, 1106. And the court will not inquire into the estate or interest which such person has in the house burned. It is enough that it was his actual dwelling at the time. People v. Van Blaricum (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 105; State v. Roe, 12 Vt. 93; State v. Fish, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 323, 324.

ARSON IN THE FIRST DEGREE.

Arson in the first degree consists in willfully setting fire to or burning in the nighttime a dwelling house in which there shall be at the time some human being, whether the house belongs to the person setting fire to it or not. Shepherd v. People, 19 N. Y. 537, 540; Woodford v. People (N. Y.) 2 Cow. Cr. R. 123, 125.

ARSON IN THE SECOND DEGREE.

"Every person who shall willfully set fire to or burn, in the nighttime, any shop, warehouse, or other building, not being the subject of arson in the first degree, but adjoined to or within the curtilage of any inhabited dwelling house, so that such house shall be endangered, shall upon conviction be adjudged guilty of arson in the second degree." People v. Durkin (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 243, 248 (quoting 2 Rev. St. p. 666, § 2).

ARSON IN THE THIRD DEGREE.

"A person who willfully burns or sets on fire either a vessel or other vehicle, a building, structure, or other erection which is at the time insured against loss or damage by fire, with intent to prejudice the insurer thereof, is guilty of arson in the third degree." Pen. Code, § 488. People v. Fanshawe, 19 N. Y. Supp. 865, 868, 65 Hun, 77.

In common law the crime of arson consisted in the malicious and willful burning of the house or outhouse of another. By Rev. St. 1899, § 1875, it is provided that every person who shall willfully set fire to or burn any house, building, barn, stable, boat, or vessel of another, or any office or depot or railroad car of any railroad company, or any house of public worship, college, academy, or school house or building used as such, or any public building belonging to the United States or this state, or to any county, city, town, or village, not the subject of arson in the first or second degree, shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of arson in the third degree. State v. McCoy, 62 S. W. 991, 992, 162 Mo. 383.

By Crimes Act, § 57, it is provided that every person who shall burn any building, boat, or vessel, or any goods, wares, merchandise, or other chattels which shall at the time be insured against loss or damage by fire with intent to defraud or prejudice the insurer, whether the same be the property of such person or any other, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of arson in the third degree. State v. Jessup, 22 Pac. 627, 628, 42 Kan. 422.

ART.

Art is the skillful and systematic arrangement or adaptation of means for the attainment of some desired end. Suther v. State, 24 South. 43, 45, 46, 118 Ala. 88.

Art is practical skill as directed by theory or science. It relates to practice or performance, and is a mere application of knowledge. Rifle shooting is an art as distinguished from a science. Vredenburg v. Behan, 33 La. Ann. 627, 637.

"Arts," as the term is used in the statement that seduction must be accomplished by means of temptation, deception, arts, etc., is skillful and systematic arrangement or adaptation of means for the attainment of some desired end. The arts of the seducer are crafty devices by words or acts or both which influence the female to yield to sexual intercourse. They need not be concurrent with the act of sexual intercourse. If her consent is attributable to the influence of the arts or deception, and the act follows as a result of the consent thus gained, the offense will be seduction. Hall v. State, 32 South. 750, 758, 134 Ala. 90.

"The word 'art' is sometimes used very broadly, as for instance when it is used in contradistinction to 'nature,' or as in the phrase 'the arts of war and peace.' But it is also used, especially when used without any qualifying adjective or phrase, to signify art in its higher manifestations, or art par excellence, as represented in works of art by those who are distinctively denominated 'artists.' In this sense the word is used to designate the group of arts known as 'fine arts,' as distinguished from the useful or mechanical and industrial arts." Almy v. Jones, 21 Atl. 616, 17 R. I. 265, 12 L. R. A. 414.

In apprenticeship.

A covenant to teach an apprentice the "art and mystery of the tanning business" means the covenant is to make the apprentice as good a workman in the trade as those generally are who have regularly learned it. Barger v. Caldwell, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 129, 131.

In copyright law.

See "Works of Art."

A work on the subject of bookkeeping, though only explanatory of well-known systems, may be the subject of copyright, and, considered as a book conveying information and detailed explanations of the art, it may be a valuable acquisition to the practicable knowledge of the community, but there is a clear distinction between the book as such and the art which it is intended to illustrate. The same distinction may be predicated of every other art as well as that of bookkeeping. A treatise on the use of medicines, or the construction of plows or watches, would be the subject of copyright, but no one would contend that the copyright would give the exclusive right to the art or manufacture therein described. Baker v. Seldon, 101 U. S. 99, 102, 25 L. Ed. 841.

In patent law.

See "Useful Art."

Process synonymous, see "Process."

"Art," as used in the patent acts, means a useful art or manufacture which is beneficial, and which is described with exactness in its mode of operation. Smith v. Downing (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 511.

"Art," as used in Rev. St. § 4886 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3382], authorizing the grant of a patent to any person who has invented or discovered any new or useful art, is synonymous with "process," which was defined in Cochrane v. Deener, 94 U. S. 780, 24 L. Ed. 139, to be a mode of treatment of certain materials to produce a given result; an act or series of acts performed on a subject-matter to be transformed and reduced to a different state or thing. Carnegie Steel Co. v. Cambria Iron Co. (U. S.) 89 Fed. 721, 754.

Without attempting to define the term "art," as used in the patent act, with logical accuracy, we may take as examples of it some things in their concrete form, exhibit what we all concede to come within a correct definition, such as the art of printing, that of telegraphy, or that of photography. The art of tanning leather might also come within the category, because it requires various processes and manipulation. Jacobs v. Baker, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 295, 297, 19 L. Ed. 200.

ART INSTITUTE.

"Art institute," as used in a will bequeathing a fund for an art institute, means an institution or establishment resembling such as exist in Europe for the promotion of fine arts, or the art whose aim is beauty rather than utility, though not necessarily to the exclusion of utility when the two can be combined. Almy v. Jones, 21 Atl. 616, 17 R. I. 265, 12 L. R. A. 414.

ARTESIAN WELL.

From Artesien of Artois, in France, where this kind of well was first made, an artesian well is a perpendicular perforation or burrowing into the ground, deep enough to reach a subterranean body of water whose sources are higher than the plain where the perforation is made, and so force up to the surface a constant stream of water. Andrews v. Cross (U. S.) 8 Fed. 269, 275.

An artesian well consists of a well pit sunk in the earth until a water-bearing stratum is reached where the water lies under pressure of such a head that when struck by the well pit it will come into the pit so rapidly that a stream of water is produced flowing by the force of its own current from the earth into and through the well pit to the surrounding surface. Andrews v. Carman (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 868, 869.

A contract of a waterworks company with a city, requiring that artesian wells should be sunk to procure the water supply, means one the water of which comes from beneath the impermeable stratum, so as to be uncontaminated by surface matter, but it need not be a flowing well. In Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines an artesian well is defined to be "a well or bore hole in which water is obtained by means of a perforation bored vertically down through impermeable strata into underlying strata of a more or less permeable character, such stratum to be charged with water. Properly speaking an artesian well is one in which the water from the lower stratum rises above the surface of the superincumbent impermeable strata, but by extension the phrase has been applied of late years to any wells in which waters of the lower stratum are enabled to rise sufficiently near to the surface to allow of their being economically used." Foster v. City of Joliet (U. S.) 27 Fed. 899, 905.

The primary definition in all the dictionaries of the word "artesian" indicates a well from which the water flows naturally without artificial pressure; but the secondary definition of this word in the Century and Standard Dictionaries and others seems to indicate that it may be applied also to wells from which the water is made to flow by artificial means. The word "artesian," therefore, becomes a term of equivocal significance, standing unexplained in a contract, and parol evidence is admissible to explain its meaning in a contract for the digging of an artesian well. Hattlesburg Plumbing Co. v. A. E. Carmichael & Co., 31 South. 536, 537, 80 Miss. 66.

An "artesian well" is defined for the purpose of the act relating thereto to be any artificial well the waters of which if properly cased will flow continuously over the natural surface of the ground adjacent to such well at any season of the year; provided nothing of the act shall apply to water flowing from mining shafts. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 164.

ARTFULLY.

The expressions "artfully and purposely framed," "unfairly and secretly computed," and "unjustly and unfairly attempted," used in a plea of justification in regard to the official act of a cashier, do not necessarily imply moral obliquity. Kerr v. Force (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 336, 387.

ARTICLE.

See "Single Article."

Other articles, see "Other."

Perishable articles, see "Perishable Property."

Proprietary articles, see "Proprietary."

"Article" is derived from the Latin word "articulus," meaning connecting two parts of the body; one of the parts thus connected; a separate member or portion of anything; a single clause in any writing; a particular item of several that make up an account; a portion of a complex whole; a distinct portion of an instrument; a distinct part. Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 36 S. E. 14, 15, 126 N. C. 437.

As used in Tariff Act 1890, par. 373, relating to the duties on laces, tuckings, lace window curtains, and other similar tumboured articles, "article" should be construed in its general sense as indicating a commodity. Field v. United States (U. S.) 73 Fed. 808, 809, 20 C. C. A. 19.

"Article," as used in Act March 3, 1883, Schedule N, § 2502, levying a duty on articles composed of India rubber, is to be construed in its broad sense as meaning things manufactured, unmanufactured, or partially manufactured. In common usage "article" is applied to almost every separate substance or material, whether as a member of a class, or as a particular substance or commodity. Junge v. Hedden (U. S.) 37 Fed. 197, 198; Id., 13 Sup. Ct. 88, 89, 146 U. S. 233, 36 L. Ed. 953.

The word "article" as defined by lexicographers is a distinct portion or part, a joint or a part of a member, one of various things. It is a word of separation to individualize and distinguish some particular thing from the general thing or the whole of which it forms a part, as an article in an agreement, an article of faith, an article of a newspaper, or an article of merchandise. It is derived from the Greek, the original or radical word meaning "to join" or "to fit to" as a part, and it is only very recently, as will be found by consulting the dictionary (see Allison's Am. Dict. 1813; Worcester's Dict. 1847), that it has been applied to denote such material or corporeal things as goods or physical property, and then only in the sense of something that is separate and individual in itself, as salt is a necessary article, or a hammer is a useful article. In Earle v. Cadmus (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 237, the defendant stipulated that he was not to be liable in the carriage of baggage for an amount exceeding $50 upon any article, and it was held that the word "article" was properly used, and meant any article coming under the denomination of baggage. The term "article" in the receipt of a common carrier containing a clause limiting his liability to $50 for the article forwarded, when the receipt was for one package which consisted of three cases of drugs strapped together, was construed to apply to each of the cases of drugs, and not to the entire package. Wetzell v. Dinsmore (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 193, 195.

Bottles.

The words "article" and "commodity" as used in the statute forbidding the purchase of them from any slave embrace most immovable things which can be the subject of commerce between white persons and slaves, and a black bottle comes clearly within the definition. Shuttleworth v. State, 35 Ala. 415, 417.

Growing crop.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 39, § 14, prohibits any person from selling any article of personal property after having conveyed the same by mortgage with intent to defraud, etc. Held, that the term "article of personal property" meant any personal property or any kind of personal property, and so applies to a growing crop. State v. Williams, 21 N. W. 746, 748, 32 Minn. 537.

Horse.

The term "goods or articles" includes a horse, as used in Gen. St. p. 503, § 15, relating to the receiving of stolen goods or articles. State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 429, 442.

As used in Act 21 & 22 Vict. 100, 105, enacting that every person who shall sell any article on which tolls are imposed, shall forfeit a certain sum, etc., and with a schedule annexed in which a toll was imposed on horses, the word "article" would include horses. Llandaff & Canton District Market Co. v. Lyndon, 8 C. B. (N. S.) 515, 523.

Money.

"Articles," as used in Bankr. Act 1867 (14 Stat. 522) § 14, providing for the setting apart to the bankrupt in addition to certain things of other articles and necessities to a certain amount, cannot be construed to include money, unless such money is the proceeds of specific things which ought to be set apart under the head of articles. In re Welch (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 605.

Timber.

A municipal ordinance forbidding any person to incumber any street, etc., by placing thereon any building materials or any article or things whatsoever, will be construed to include a flagstaff. Dreher v. Yates, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 473, 477.

Laws 1883, c. 183, authorizing any corporation under its terms to appoint one or more persons to examine weights, scales, and measures to weigh, gauge, or inspect flour, produce, provisions, liquor, lumber, or any other article of produce or traffic commonly dealt in by the members of such corporation, will be construed to include floating logs; and hence the statute authorizes the appointment of persons to measure such logs. State v. Lumbermen's Board of Exchange, 23 N. W. 838, 839, 33 Minn. 468, 471.

Trunk.

The term "article," as used in a contract limiting the liability of the carrier to an amount not exceeding $100 on any article, does not mean a trunk or piece of baggage, and its entire contents, in gross, but means any article contained in a piece of baggage. Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 36 S. E. 14, 15, 126 N. C. 437; Hopkins v. Westcott (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 495, 496.

Vessels.

"Articles," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890 (26 Stat. 567), requiring duties to be levied on all articles imported from foreign countries and mentioned in schedules therein contained, does not include a pleasure yacht. While a vessel is an article of personal property as distinguished from real estate, it is not an article as the word is ordinarily used. The Conqueror, 17 Sup. Ct. 510, 512, 166 U. S. 110, 41 L. Ed. 937.

A provision of the federal constitution that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state does not apply to the imposition of taxes on foreign vessels engaged in export trade. Aguirre v. Maxwell (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 212, 213.

Article of commerce and trade.

What is an article of commerce is determined by the usages of the commercial world, and does not depend upon the declaration of any state. Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 680, 698, 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. Ed. 700.

"Articles of trade and commerce," as used in Act March 7, 1846 (P. L. 78), authorizing the councils of the city of Pittsburgh to levy and assess an annual tax on goods, wares, and merchandise, and on all articles of trade and commerce sold in the city, including sales at auction or otherwise, should be construed to include butcher's meat sold by one who slaughters his own cattle and sells the fresh meat derived therefrom at a stall in the market in the city, for the use of which stall he pays an annual rental to the city. City of Pittsburgh v. Kalchthaler, 7 Atl. 921, 922, 114 Pa. 547.

Natural gas, when brought to the surface and placed in pipes for transportation, is an "article of commerce" as much as iron, ore, coal, petroleum, or any other of the like products of the earth. It is a commodity which may be transported, an article which may be bought and sold in the markets of the country. State v. Indiana & Ohio Oil, Gas & Mining Co., 120 Ind. 575, 577, 22 N. E. 778, 6 L. R. A. 579.

Article of domestic or family use.

A will giving to a certain person all testator's plate, family jewelry, trinkets, and ornaments of the person, and all his furniture and other "articles of domestic use or ornament," should be construed to include books, for if they are used they are articles of domestic use, and if they are not used they are articles of domestic ornament. Cornwall v. Cornwall, 12 Sim. 298, 303.

Rev. Code, § 2376, providing that the wife's estate should be liable only on contracts for "articles of comfort and support of the household," suitable to the degree and condition in life of the family and for which the husband would be responsible at common law, does not apply to debts contracted by the husband for family supplies, and for materials for the improvement and benefit of the wife's estate. Lee v. Sims, 65 Ala. 248, 253.

The word "articles" within a statute making the separate estate of a wife liable for articles necessary for a family includes professional services of a physician and medicines furnished by him to the family. May v. Smith, 48 Ala. 483, 490.

1 Wds. & P.—33

"Article for family use" properly means articles for use or consumption in the family, and the phrase is not broad enough to include a watch ordinarily carried about the person of one member of the family. Gooch v. Gooch, 33 Me. 535.

Article of food or provision.

The act of July 6, 1812, provides that if any citizen of the United States or person inhabiting the same shall transport or attempt to transport over land or otherwise, in any wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or otherwise, naval or military stores, arms, or munitions of war, or any articles of provision from the United States to Canada, etc., the thing by which the articles are transported together with the articles themselves shall be forfeited, and the person aiding or privy to the same shall forfeit a certain sum and be guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the act should be construed to include living fat oxen, they being articles of provision within the true intent and meaning of the act. United States v. Sheldon, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 119, 120, 4 L. Ed. 199.

The term "articles of food" in the by-law of October 6, 1802, making it unlawful for any person to buy up any provision or article of food coming to market, does not include rye chop, which is a food for horses only. Boteler v. Washington (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 962.

Rye chop, which is a food for horses, is not an "article of food" within a law making it unlawful to buy up any provision or article of food coming to market. Boteler v. Washington (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 962.

Article of which gas is component part.

The phrase, "article of which compressed gas forms a component part," in Pen. Code, § 389, as amended by Laws 1900, c. 494, prohibiting the manufacture of compressed gas in a tenement or dwelling house, or of any article of which such gas forms a component part, includes the manufacture of soda water. People v. Lichtman, 72 N. Y. Supp. 511, 512, 65 App. Div. 78.

Article of glass.

"Articles of glass cut, engraved, painted, or colored," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1833, do not include merchandise consisting of glass disks of various colors and sizes colored and cut in imitation of precious stones. United States v. Popper (U. S.) 66 Fed. 51, 52, 13 C. C. A. 325.

Article of iron.

The manufactures, articles, or wares not specifically enumerated, composed wholly or in part of iron and steel, etc., in Tariff Act 1883, fixing a duty thereon, includes iron and steel wire hair pins, which are not dutiable as pins, solid head and others, as the latter class of pins have been distinguished in former tariff acts from hair pins. Robertson v. Rosenthal, 10 Sup. Ct. 120, 121, 132 U. S. 460, 33 L. Ed. 392.

Article of lace.

Lace aprons are dutiable as articles of wearing apparel under Tariff Act 1890, par. 349, and not as articles made wholly or in part of lace under par. 373. In re Boyd (U. S.) 55 Fed. 599, 600, 5 C. C. A. 223.

Article of manufacture.

St. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100, requiring that every "article of manufacture" containing the designs described by registration shall contain certain marks as a caution to the public that the design has been registered, did not fix any limit to the size of the article put forth for trade, and anything so put forth was equally an article of manufacture whether manufactured and sold as a pattern or for actual use, and could not be construed to mean only such articles as were the subjects of sale and not the patterns thereof. Heywood v. Poetter, 1 El. & Bl. 439, 447.

"Articles of gold and silver manufacture," as used in Laws 1864, c. 318, which provides that no innkeeper in this state who shall constantly have in his inn an iron safe in good order, and suitable for the safe custody of money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, and who complies with the requirements of this act, shall be liable for the loss of such articles by any guest, includes all articles of gold and silver manufacture which may be in the possession of the guest, whether they are such as are usually worn by a guest on his person or not; hence they would include a watch and chain which is usually worn by a guest. Stewart v. Parsons, 24 Wis. 241, 242.

The term "articles of gold manufacture," in a statute providing that no innkeeper who constantly has in an iron safe suitable for the custody of articles of gold and silver manufacture, etc., shall be liable for the loss of any such article by any guest, etc., includes a watch and chain. Lang v. Arcade Hotel Co., 9 Ohio Dec. 372, 376.

Article of measurement.

"Articles of measurement," as used in a charter of the railroad company providing that for the transportation of goods, produce, merchandise, and other articles it should not charge more than 50 cents per 100 pounds for each 100 miles on heavy articles, and 15 cents per cubic foot on articles of measurement, cannot be construed as a matter of law to include cotton packed in bales in the manner used for the purpose of transportation, but it must be determined by the custom or usage prevailing among carriers at the date of the charter. Bonham v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co., 13 S. C. 267, 276.

Article of merchandise.

The expression, "article of merchandise," as used in title 11 of the Penal Code, signifies any goods, wares, work of art, commodity, compound, mixture, or other preparation or thing which may be lawfully kept or offered for sale. Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 365.

Article of personal use and ornament.

A will giving to testator's widow all his clothing, household and kitchen furniture, linen, china, plate, plated ware, jewelry, pictures, engravings, books, bric-a-brac, and "articles of personal use and ornament," cannot be construed to include a yacht, but were meant to embrace articles of personal use and ornament in the house like unto those enumerated. In re Parry's Estate, 41 Atl. 448, 449, 188 Pa. 33, 49 L. R. A. 444, 68 Am. St. Rep. 847.

St. 1879, c. 133, enacting that the wearing apparel and articles of personal ornament of a married woman, and "articles necessary for her personal use," acquired by gift from her husband, not exceeding $2,000 in value, shall be and remain her sole and separate property, includes articles the use of which is attended with pleasure and enjoyment, as books, music, or a musical instrument, or which might be used as a means of education or perhaps of obtaining a livelihood, as well as those which minister only to strictly physical comfort. Hamilton v. Lane, 138 Mass. 358, 360.

Article of wood.

Const. art. 207, releasing from taxation for 20 years the capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of furniture and other "articles of wood," refers to particular substances or commodities manufactured from lumber by hand, by art or machinery, ready for immediate, convenient, and general use, complete in themselves without further manipulation or work on them, such as shingles, laths, posts, and cross-ties, dressed lumber planed, tongued, and grooved, weatherboards planed, dressed, and ready for general use, moldings, sashes, doors, and blinds, boxes, pickets, and turned stairwork; but not such as planks, joists, sills, etc., which are intended for parts of a particular structure. Carpenter v. Brusle, 12 South. 483, 484, 45 La. Ann. 456; Rosedale Cypress Lumber & Shingle Co. v. Brusle, 12 South. 484, 485, 45 La. Ann. 459.

"Articles of wood," within the meaning of Const. art. 207, includes shingles, laths, pickets, cross-ties, dressed flooring, molded window cases, dressed and beveled weather boarding, car roofing and car siding cut to any length. White Castle Lumber & Shingle Co. v. Browne, 12 South. 485, 45 La. Ann. 454; Plaquemine Lumber & Implement Co. v. Browne, 12 South. 485, 486, 45 La. Ann. 459.

"Articles of wood," within the meaning of Const. art. 207, includes shooks, which are pieces of wood cut or sawed into sizes and shapes by means of machinery, to be put together into boxes; but the term does not include paper boxes. Washburn v. City of New Orleans, 9 South. 37, 39, 43 La. Ann. 226.

The term "articles of wood," as used in Const. art. 230, cannot be construed to include weather boarding, ceiling, flooring, molding, and other like lumber products needing to be further manipulated, cut, or trimmed to be fitted into place. The readiness for immediate use of an article of wood which has been manufactured has been uniformly held the test of the constitutional exemption from taxation. Globe Lumber Co. v. Clement, 34 South. 595, 110 La. 438.

Article used in packing.

Under an insurance policy covering a packing house and "articles used in packing," whatever coal was in the yard for the purpose of the packing business, and necessary to be used in it, was covered by the terms of the policy. Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Favorite, 46 Ill. 263, 270; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Same, 49 Ill. 259, 261.

ARTICLED CLERK.

"Articled clerk" does not prima facie mean an articulated clerk to an attorney. There are other trades and professions to which such a term may be as properly applicable as to the profession of an attorney or solicitor. Queen v. Reeve, 4 Q. B. 211, 212.

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION.

The instrument by which a private corporation is formed is called "articles of incorporation." Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2088; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 402; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 404; People v. Golden Gate Lodge No. 6, 60 Pac. 865, 866, 128 Cal. 257.

ARTICULATE SPEECH.

An application for a patent for a telephone stated that the object was to produce vocal sounds, and it was contended in an action for infringement that "vocal sounds" and "articulate speech" were not convertible terms, either in acoustics or in telegraphy. The court said articulate speech necessarily implies a sound produced by the human voice, and as the patent on its face is for the art of changing the intensity of a continuous current of electricity by the undulations of the air caused by sonorous vibrations, and speech can only be communicated by such vibrations, the transmission of speech in this way must be included in the art. The question is not whether "vocal sounds" and "articulate speech" are used synonymously as scientific terms, but whether the sound of articulate speech is one of the vocal or other sounds referred to in this claim of the patent. We have no hesitation in saying that it is, and that if the patent can be sustained to the full extent of what is now contended for, it gives to Bell and those who claim under him the exclusive use of his art for that purpose, until the expiration of the statutory term of his patented rights. Dolbear v. American Bell Tel. Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 778, 781, 126 U. S. 1, 31 L. Ed. 863.

ARTIFICE.

Any scheme or artifice to defraud, see "Any."

"Artifice" is defined as a subtle or deceptive or any contriving trickery, cunning, strategy, finesse, as lure by artifice, so that its use in the definition of seduction as the act or persuading or inducing a woman of previous chaste character to depart from the path of virtue by the use of any species of artifice, persuasions, or wiles which are calculated to have or do have that effect, and which result in her ultimately submitting herself to the sexual intercourse of the person accused, shows that deception is an essential element of the crime of seduction. State v. Hamann, 80 N. W. 1064, 1065, 109 Iowa, 646.

If the means used to accomplish a seduction were calculated to overcome the will of a young girl, and were intended to create in her mind an affection for her seducer, and had that effect, and under that influence she yielded her person to him, it constituted an "artifice" within the law. Hawn v. Banghart, 39 N. W. 251, 253, 76 Iowa, 683, 14 Am. St. Rep. 261.

"Artifice," as defined by Webster, is a trick or fraud by which a thing desired by a person exercising a fraud is accomplished; thus the representations of a seducer that there was nothing wrong in the act and that no one would ever find it out, which proved false by reason of the woman becoming a mother, were sufficient to constitute an artifice within the seduction laws. State v. Hemm, 48 N. W. 971, 974, 82 Iowa, 609.

ARTIFICER.

An artificer is one who buys goods to reduce them by his own art and industry into other forms. Lansdale v. Brashear, 19 Ky. (3 T. B. Mon.) 330, 335.

A framework knitter working as a weaver of gloves for a subcontractor, in frames provided by him, at an agreed gross price per dozen pairs, was an "artificer," within the meaning of St. 1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 37, requiring employers to pay artificers in the current coin of the realm. Chawner v. Cummings, 8 Q. B. 311, 321.

In construing a statute exempting the tools of a mechanic, who is defined by Dr. Johnson as a manufacturer, an artificer, the court gives Dr. Johnson's definition of an artificer as one by whom anything is made. Parkerson v. Wightman (S. C.) 4 Strob. 363, 365.

Contractor.

"Artificer," as used in Truck Act (St. 1 & 2 Wm. IV) c. 37, prohibiting the payment of artificers in anything other than current coin of the realm, means a person actually engaged in performing labor, and does not apply to persons taking contracts for labor to be done by others, or persons who speculate on the labor market. Ingram v. Barnes, 7 El. & Bl. 115, 135; Sharman v. Sanders, 13 C. B. 166, 174.

ARTIFICIAL.

"Artificial" is defined in one sense as being artful, subtle, crafty, and ingenious, and is so nearly like that of "artifice" that a distinction would be without a difference, and hence its use in an instruction that in order to constitute seduction there must be some artificial or false promise, etc., is not erroneous, though "artificial" has acquired other meanings. State v. Hamann, 85 N. W. 614, 113 Iowa, 367.

ARTIFICIAL CAUSE.

There is an observable distinction between "natural" and "artificial" causes of injury; that is, those resulting in ordinary course from causes beyond human control, and those created by voluntary choice or agency. Thus, if a person is taken sick and dies in his own house he is entitled to appropriate attendance therein and burial therefrom, and no one will be heard to complain, for the consequences are natural, unavoidable, and such as every neighbor must in the nature of things expect and submit to. This is a lawful thing. But where the occupant of a house advertises and invites persons in all parts of the country to send dead bodies to his establishment to be temporarily stored, cut up, artistically coffined, and furnished with elaborate funeral outfits, services, hearses, and carriages, human agency, acting in choice, makes a business of other people's misfortunes, and parades death in the presence of the neighbors to their pleasure or discomfort according to the view in which they regard such displays. This is objectionable and illegal. Rowland v. Miller, 15 N. Y. Supp. 701, 702.

ARTIFICIAL COLORING MATTER.

Where in the manufacture of vinegar low wine formed from fermented grain is previously to its acetification passed through roasted malt, not for the purpose of adding any substantial ingredient to the vinegar, but for the purpose of giving it color as well as aroma and flavor, and without this treatment it would be colorless, the vinegar so produced contains artificial coloring matter within the meaning of 85 Ohio Laws, p. 259, § 2, enacted to prevent the adulteration of vinegar. Weller v. State, 40 N. E. 1001, 1002, 53 Ohio St. 77.

ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

"Artificial flowers or parts thereof," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, pars. 355, 425, include artificial leaves made to resemble leaves of oak, ivy, currant, etc., and manufactured of colored cotton cloth, metal, and wax, cotton being the component material of chief value. In re Zelmer (U. S.) 66 Fed. 740, 741.

ARTIFICIAL FORCE.

An artificial force is a natural force so transformed in character or energies by human power as to possess new capabilities of action. This transformation of a natural force into a force practically new involves a true inventive act. Wall v. Leck (U. S.) 66 Fed. 552, 555, 13 C. C. A. 630 (citing 1 Rob. Pat. §§ 92, 96, 99, 103).

ARTIFICIAL GRAINS.

Grass piquets consisting of stalks of oats or wheat and grass dyed to imitate their natural color are properly assessed as artificial or ornamental grains and flowers, under Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1. Schedule N, par. 425, 30 Stat. 191 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1675]. Herman & Guinzeberg v. United States (U. S.) 121 Fed. 201, 202.

ARTIFICIAL PERSONS.

Artificial persons are such as are created and designed by human laws for the purpose of society and government, which are called corporations or bodies politic. Chapman v. Brewer, 62 N. W. 320, 322, 43 Neb. 890, 47 Am. St. Rep. 779 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 123).

Artificial persons are persons created by law for the purpose of society and government. "The plain and broad distinction between a natural and an artificial person is that while the former may do any act which he is not prohibited by law from doing, the latter can do none which the charter giving it existence does not expressly or by inference to enable it to perform these functions authorize it to do, and when it transcends the limits within which it is confined by its charter these acts are void." Smith v. Alabama Life Ins. & Trust Co., 4 Ala. 558, 568.

ARTIFICIAL PRESUMPTION.

Artificial presumption is where the existence of the one fact is not direct evidence of the existence of the other, but the one fact existing and being proved the law raises an artificial presumption of the existence of the other. Thus forbearance to enforce a pecuniary demand for 20 years is not direct evidence that the money has been paid, but on the fact of forbearance the law raises a presumption that the demand has been satisfied, since it wisely supposes a man will sooner recover and enjoy what belongs or is due to him unless prevented by some impediment. The law gives to the evidence a technical efficacy beyond its simple and natural force and operation. Gulick v. Ioder, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 68, 72, 23 Am. Dec. 711.

ARTIFICIAL ROADS.

In an act prohibiting a street railway company from using "artificial roads," it is manifest that the term expressed more than was expressed in the act by the words railroads and turnpikes. Nothing else than graded and paved streets seem to meet the description, unless it be plank roads, and if such alone were intended it would have been natural to have named them with railroads and turnpikes, rather than to have used the more comprehensive term. Commonwealth v. Central Pass. Ry., 52 Pa. (2 P. F. Smith) 506, 516.

ARTIFICIAL SUCCESSION.

Artificial succession is the succession between predecessors and successors in a corporation aggregate or sole. Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 100.

ARTIFICIAL WANTS.

The distinction between natural and artificial wants, to satisfy which water is used, seems to be derived from a distinction which has sometimes been designated as a difference between the use of water for ordinary and extraordinary purposes. The real difference here pointed out between the classes of uses is that, as is assumed, water of a stream may be used for ordinary purposes, without regard to the effects of such use, in case of deficiency below, while with reference to extraordinary uses the effects on those below must always be considered in determining its reasonableness. Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 762, 69 Cal. 255.

ARTIFICIAL WATER COURSE.

A water pipe through which water is conducted from a reservoir to a mill is an "artificial water course." Standard v. Round Valley Water Co., 19 Pac. 689, 690, 77 Cal. 399.

ARTISAN.

Laws 1897, c. 418, § 70, entitled "Artisan's lien on personal property," and providing that one who makes, alters, or repairs personal property at the request or consent of the owner shall have a lien on such article, refers to skilled labor, and not to common labor, as cutting, skidding, and drawing logs, since "artisan" signifies one skilled in some kind of mechanical craft. O'Clair v. Hale, 54 N. Y. Supp. 386, 387, 25 Misc. Rep. 31.

The term "artisan, builder, and mechanic," in Gould's Dig. c. 112, § 1, giving a mechanic's lien to all artisans, builders, and mechanics of every description who shall perform any work and labor on any building, edifice, or tenement, does not include one selling lumber to be used in the construction of a dwelling house. Duncan v. Bate-man, 23 Ark. 327, 328, 79 Am. Dec. 109.

The term "artisan, mechanic, or tradesman," in the statute giving a lien to any mechanic, artisan, or tradesman on any article of value altered or repaired by him, includes a civil engineer, and he is entitled to a lien on field notes, maps, charts, and drawings made by him. Amazon Irr. Co. v. Briesen, 41 Pac. 1116, 1119, 1 Kan. App. 758.

ARTIST.

See "Professional Artist."

"Artist," as used in Act Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164, 23 Stat. 333 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibiting the immigration of aliens under contract to perform labor and exempting from the operation of the statute professional artists, etc., does not include milliners, dressmakers, tailors, cooks, and barbers. In this connection the word "artist" should be taken in its popular sense, as meaning a person skilled in the fine arts. United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 41 Fed. 28, 29.

A daguerreotypist or ambrotypist is rather an artisan than an artist. His labor is more manual than mental. He works more by rule than under the inspiration of genius. The process by which he accomplishes his undertaking is mainly mechanical, and success in his vocation demands, not creative power, but dexterity, contrivance, and the skillful application of fixed rules. He follows an art, but not one of the fine arts, and he alone is an artist in the appropriate sense of the word who professes and practices one of the latter. Barnes v. Ingalls, 39 Ala. 193, 201.

ARTISTS' COLORS.

"Artists' colors," within Act Oct 1, 1890, par. 61, imposing a duty on artists' colors of all kinds, are such colors as are named in paragraphs 50-60 inclusive (paint and color schedule), when of a fine grade and specially prepared and put up for the use of artists. Rich v. United States (U. S.) 61 Fed. 501.

AS.

"As they now lie," as used in a bill of sale of all the boats, canoes, sails, oars, paddles, fittings, and fixtures of every kind as they now lie at Winter Harbor, refer to quality or condition rather than to quantity and number. Neal v. Flint, 33 Atl. 669, 673, 88 Me. 72.

As near as.

"The phrase 'as this plaintiff is able to determine,' in an affidavit in attachment stating indebtedness at a sum ascertained as near as may be and as this plaintiff is able to determine, means as near as this plaintiff is able to determine. Such an affidavit is sufficient, though the statute requires that the amount of indebtedness be stated as near as may be." Hawes v. Clement, 25 N. W. 21, 23, 64 Wis. 152.

As being or is.

When used in an indictment charging that the defendant as the commissioner of city works entered into a conspiracy, "as" will be regarded as used in the sense of being, so that the charge in substance is that he entered into the conspiracy while he was commissioner of city works, and hence the indictment is not defective. People v. Willis, 54 N. Y. Supp. 642, 647, 34 App. Div. 203.

Under an instrument providing that a gift shall take effect at the maker's death, "until then the property to remain as my own," the word "as" is the qualifying word, and shows that the donor did not intend to hold the property absolutely up to the period to which he had postponed the enjoyment of the interest he had given, and until the death of the donor the property was to remain, not his own, but as his own. Elmore v. Mustin, 28 Ala. 309, 313.

The word "as" means "like," it does not mean the thing itself, but something like it; and hence an averment that a draft drawn and sold and a requisition obtained as false pretenses does not constitute an averment that the letters, draft, and requisition were false pretenses. United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 419, 428.

An allegation that defendant "as a regular practicing physician" gave a prescription is not a sufficient allegation that the defendant was a regular practicing physician or was a physician at all. It is indirect and inferential, and was not sufficient to support an indictment under Pen. Code, art. 405, which prohibits any physician giving a prescription to one not actually sick and without making a personal examination; the word "as" not being in effect "is." McQuerry v. State, 51 S. W. 247, 248, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 571.

The use of the words "as the property," in a return on an execution reciting the levy on certain real property as the property of a certain person, is to be construed as showing a levy on the entire estate which such person owns in the property. Longworthy v. Featherston, 65 Ga. 165, 166.

As used in a will bequeathing to testator's wife a third of the remainder of his real and personal estate, "as and for her right of dower" during her life, should be construed to mean the whole right which she should have or be entitled to on his death. Steele v. Fisher (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 435, 437.

As for the purpose.

Code, § 1020, provides that every estate in land is to be taken as a fee simple, though the words necessary to create a fee are not used, unless it appears that a similar estate was intended. Section 1048 declares that where an absolute power of disposition was given, not accompanied by a trust, and no remainder is limited on the donee's estate, he is entitled to a fee. Section 1049 recites that a power of disposition is deemed absolute if the donee is enabled in his lifetime to dispose of the fee for his own benefit. A will bequeathed to testatrix's husband her residence "as a home" with power to sell and convey the same at his discretion. Held, that the phrase "as a home" did not operate to limit the interest given to him to a life estate. Smith v. Phillips, 30 South. 872, 873, 131 Ala. 629.

In order that any pistol should be concealed as a weapon within the meaning of a statute making it a misdemeanor to wear any pistol concealed as a weapon, it must be carried for the purpose of having it convenient for use in fight. Carr v. State, 34 Ark. 448, 450, 36 Am. Rep. 15; Lemmons v. State, 20 S. W. 404, 405, 56 Ark. 559.

The owners of land leased to a club all their grant in a certain section for and during the existence of the club, with the clause whenever said club shall cease to exist as now organized this lease shall be determined and cease. Held, that the words "as now organized," as so used, referred to the purpose of organization of the club and not to its mode of organization, and, therefore, the fact that the club became incorporated, the corporation taking the property and assuming the debts of the club as it had previously existed, did not work a forfeiture of the lease. Alexander v. Tolleston Club of Chicago, 110 Ill. 65.

As in the character of.

"As," when preceding a word indicating representative character, such for instance as agent, trustee, etc., means "in the character of." Hayes v. Crane, 50 N. W. 925, 48 Minn. 39.

Covenant that the grantor would warrant and defend the premises as executors are bound by law to do will be held to mean that the grantor only warranted the title in so far as executors could do so by law, and that he did not mean to bind himself personally. Glenn v. Allison, 58 Md. 527, 530; Day v. Brown, 2 Ohio (23 Ham.) 345, 348; Thayer v. Wendell (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 905.

One binding himself on a note "as principal" renounces the character of surety with the privileges attached thereto. McMillan v. Parkell, 64 Mo. 286, 288.

Where, in an action to recover goods held by defendant as trustee for the benefit of creditors, it was adjudged that plaintiffs recover of the defendant "as trustee" the costs incurred by them, the quoted words are only descriptive of the capacity in which the defendant received the goods for which he was sued, but have no legal effect upon the judgment, and may be construed as surplusage. Sass v. Hirschfield, 56 S. W. 941, 942, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 396.

Rev. St. U. S. § 4281 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2942], providing that if any shipper of certain articles which are specifically named, and among which are pictures, shall lade them as freight or baggage on any vessel without at the time giving notice to its owner, master, or agent of the true character and value of the property shipped, and having the same entered upon the bill of lading, the master and owner of such ship or vessel shall not be liable as carriers thereof in any form or manner, cannot be construed as relieving the carrier from all liability for loss, but only relieves him from his liability as carrier, and not as bailee of the goods. It relieves him from his liability only as an insurer, and not as an ordinary bailee. "Liable as carrier" can only mean the liability attached by law to that public employment. Wheeler v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co., 26 N. E. 248, 125 N. Y. 155, 21 Am. St. Rep. 729.

In a will giving property to a wife, for her benefit during her natural life, as trustee for testator's children, the words "as trustee for testator's children" were not intended to restrict the beneficial use of the property to the children during the widow's lifetime, but that the widow was to have the beneficial use of the property for life when at the same time holding it in trust for the children who were to be entitled to it at her death. Fisher v. Fisher, 2 Atl. 608, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 16.

A written undertaking given by the solicitor of the assignee of a bankrupt tenant on whose lands a distress had been put by the landlord, conditioned that "we, as solicitors to the assignees, undertake," etc., bound those who personally signed it; the term "as solicitors" being merely descriptive of the character which they fill and which induced them to undertake. Burrell v. Jones, 3 Barn. & Ald. 47.

A will in which the testator gave to his widow an estate for life in all his property, real and personal, the wife being named as executrix of the will, and testator providing that, if the executrix should find it necessary or if she should see fit to dispose of any part or all of the estate, she should have power as executrix to sell and dispose of it, implies a fiduciary disposition of the proceeds realized from the sales inherent in the office by virtue of which she was to exercise the power; but she is not thereby authorized to sell and dispose of the testator's property for her own use. Pratt v. Douglas, 38 N. J. Eq. (11 Stew.) 516, 534 (cited and approved in Stevens v. Flower, 19 Atl. 777, 779, 46 N. J. Eq. [1 Dick.] 340).

The words "as such," in Rev. St. art. 2248, providing that in any actions by and against executors, administrators, or guardians in which judgment may be rendered for or against them as such neither party shall be allowed to testify, etc., limited the application of the law to those cases in which judgment could be rendered for or against the guardian in his representative capacity, that is to say, a judgment which is in effect a judgment in favor of or against his ward, and which does not affect him personally. Jones v. Parker, 3 S. W. 222, 225, 67 Tex. 76.

As in same or like manner.

The word "as" is defined in the last edition of Webster's Dictionary as follows: "Like; similar to; of the same kind; in the same manner; in the manner in which." This is obviously the ordinary import of the word in a bill of lading restricting the carrier's liability "except as forwarder." The carrier's liability was to be "similar to that of forwarders," or "of the same kind." They were liable in the same manner, or in the manner in which forwarders are liable. Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Cal. 11, 30, 85 Am. Dec. 211.

Const. 1895, art. 5, § 25, provided that each of the justices of the Supreme Court and the judges of the circuit court should have the same power at chambers to issue writs of habeas corpus, etc., as when in open court. It was held that the phrase "as when in open court" meant that each of the justices and judges mentioned should have the same power at chambers to issue the writ specified as all of the judges might issue when in open court. Salinas v. C. Aultman & Co., 27 S. E. 385, 387, 49 S. C. 325 (quoted and approved in La Motte v. Smith, 27 S. E. 933, 934, 50 S. E. 558).

1 Rev. St. 1876, pp. 142, 147, providing that in voluntary assignments no party aggrieved shall be deprived from having an appeal as in other civil actions, do not give the appeal of itself, but merely provide that nothing in the act contained shall prevent the appeal as in other civil actions, and, therefore, whether the appeal lies depends on whether in civil actions the appeal lies in the case. Cravens v. Chambers, 55 Ind. 5, 6.

2 Rev. St. p. 176, § 635, providing that in sales in cases of foreclosure a copy of the order of sale and judgment shall be issued, etc., to the sheriff, who shall thereupon proceed to sell the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy the judgment, interest, and cost as upon execution, means that the law regulating sales on execution should apply to, in all respects, sales under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, and sale of the rents and profits is authorized thereby. Brownfield v. Weicht, 9 Ind. 394, 396.

An agreement by B. to sell certain leases and good will in trade, as he holds the same, for the term of 28 years, held to be construed as meaning that the vendee is to purchase the leases without inquiring into the title of the lessor. Spratt v. Jeffery, 10 Barn. & C. 249, 258.

Civ. Code, § 230, providing that the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise "treating it as a legitimate child," thereby adopts it as such, means the treating of such child by its father as he would naturally treat his legitimate child, not as the majority of men in his financial circumstances would or should treat their children. Every man furnishes the rule by which he must be measured. No imaginary standard of excellence can be created. Blythe v. Ayres, 31 Pac. 915, 916, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L. R. A. 40.

The words "as if," and the words "in the same manner as if," mean exactly the same. Suydam v. Voorhees (N. J.) 43 Atl. 4, 6.

Code 1886, § 2590, providing that, when a personal injury is received by a servant or employé in the service of the master, the master is liable to answer in damages as if he were a stranger not engaged in such service or employment, literally interpreted would mean that the employé stood in the same position as a trespasser or a mere licensee, but it is apparent that such is not the intention, and the words must be construed only as protecting the employé against the special defense growing out of and incident to the relation of employer and employé, and as taking from the employer such special defenses, and leaving to him all the defenses, which he has by the common law against one of the public not a trespasser nor a mere licensee. Mobile & B. Ry. Co. v. Holborn (Ala.) 4 South. 136, 147.

The words "as if feme sole," when unrestricted by the context, have been quite uniformly considered by the courts, in construing statutes relating to married women, as giving the largest possible power, and practically emancipating the wife from contractual limitations imposed upon her as a married woman with respect to the subject-matters of the act. In Real Estate Inv. Co. v. Roop, 19 Atl. 278, 132 Pa. 496, 7 L. R. A. 211, the Chief Justice specifically names these words as the proper ones for the Legislature to use if a limited power were intended to be given. And he says, "If, however, it was intended to confer this broad power, and place a married woman on the same plane as a feme sole, it could have been done in a few lines, declaring that hereafter a feme covert should have the same power to contract debts as a feme sole." Under Act April 9, 1873, § 9, as amended by Act April 27, 1879, providing that a married woman above the age of 21 years may give bond with or without warrant of attorney just "as if * * * feme sole," a married woman may execute a bond to secure a debt not her own. Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Co. v. Stewart (Del.) 36 Atl. 88, 2 Marv. 275.

Where a corporation which is bound by its charter to keep certain roads and bridges in repair enters into an agreement with the state for the exchange of certain lands, and the agreement provides that until such exchange the corporation shall remain bound as now to keep the roads and bridges in repair, the phrase "bound as now" embraces no new obligation nor furnishes any new remedy, but is a mere statement of the obligation of the corporation, and hence no action lies on such contract against the corporation for failure to keep a bridge in repair. Commonwealth v. Boston & Roxbury Mill Corp., 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 296, 297.

A constitutional provision that in order that no inconvenience may arise from the change from a territorial to a state government all suits, actions, etc., contracts, and claims shall continue as if no change had taken place, does not guaranty the same means of enforcing a judgment as that had before the Constitution, but its object was merely to save all contracts, judgments, etc., so far as the right to enforce them was concerned, leaving the means of enforcing and carrying them out subject to such changes as the adoption of the Constitution or the Legislature under it might make, and hence it does not exempt a judgment rendered prior to the Constitution from the operation of the homestead exemption clause therein. Cusie v. Douglas, 3 Kan. 123, 128, 87 Am. Dec. 458.

A will in which testator declared that his whole estate after his wife's death should be divided among his heirs or next of kin as though he had died intestate and unmarried should be construed as meaning that his estate should go as personally to his next of kin under the intestate laws. Appeal of Perot, 102 Pa. 235, 244.

The word "as," in Laws 1876, c. 18, giving the police justice of Troy, appointed thereunder, the same powers as courts of special sessions in towns, and further providing that they, as such courts of sessions, shall have jurisdiction of offenses of the grade of misdemeanors, is construed to mean "in like manner." People v. Elliott (N. Y.) 12 Hun, 364, 365.

The word "as," employed in a statute in the phrase "excepting proceedings as for contempt to enforce civil remedies," was manifestly used in what Lord Coke calls a similitudinary sense, to show that, while the proceedings referred to resembled proceedings for contempt, they are not the same thing, nil simile est idem. In re Bolton's Estate (Pa.) 13 Phila. 340, 346.

"As," as used in an indictment charging that certain letters and drafts were written, sent, drawn, and sold, and caused and procured to be issued without any authority therefor, and not for or on account of a public service, but for private gain and benefit of a certain person, and with intent to defraud the United States, and as false pretenses to enable him to obtain for his own use and benefit the same represented, thereby means like, not the thing itself, but something like it. United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 419, 428.

As it, that, or which.

A statute prohibited the use of any instrument or the giving of any drug for the purpose of procuring an abortion, unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life. Held, that the word "as," used in this connection, is synonymous with "it." The court says: "Philologists give to 'as,' when used in the English language, where the context seems to require it, the same meaning as 'it' or 'that' or 'which.'" Thus the statute might be read, "unless the same were done, it were necessary," etc. Beasley v. People, 89 Ill. 571, 577.

In a complaint in an action for damages alleging that defendant refused and neglected to cut plaintiff's wheat as defendant had agreed and contracted, the word "as" cannot be construed to mean that the work was not performed in the manner agreed and contracted, in other words, was not well done, but means that the defendant did not cut the wheat at all. Worcester, in his dictionary, in a note to the word "as," remarks, "'as' sometimes takes the place of a relative pronoun, and is equivalent to 'who' or 'which,'" and this quality may properly be given to it in the connection in which it here used. So understood the allegation in effect is that such defendant refused and neglected to cut plaintiff's wheat which defendant had agreed and contracted to do. Kelley v. Peterson, 2 N. W. 346, 347, 9 Neb. 76.

As when, importing a contingency.

"As" is sometimes used for "when," and will be so construed when used in a mortgage on crops securing advances as evidenced by book account or note. Finance Co. of Iowa v. Anderson, 76 N. W. 748, 749, 106 Iowa, 429.

A devise to certain children "as" they arrive at the age of 21 means "when" they arrive at such age. Appeal of Seibert, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 501, 504.

A representation that a building was occupied as a storehouse, made to secure insurance, necessarily imports that the building is not occupied for any other purpose. Wall v. East River Mut. Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 370, 373.

A provision in a will ordering the executor to place a sum of money at interest sufficient to pay a certain sum to certain children as they severally arrived at age gave a vested right, notwithstanding the word "as" in such connection ordinarily imports a contingency. Fisher v. Johnson, 38 N. J. Eq. (1 Stew.) 46, 47.

Where a legacy is given to a person as he arrives at a certain age, and there is no other controlling evidence of intention, the word "as" is to be construed as meaning that the legacy is contingent. Colt v. Hubbard, 33 Conn. 281, 286.

Aforesaid equivalent, see "Aforesaid."

Const. art. 3, specified the residence in election districts necessary for voters, and a subsequent paragraph, relating to qualified voters removing out of the state and after returning, required an election in the election district as aforesaid. Held, that the words "as aforesaid" as so used referred to the former provision, and required a similar residence in the election district by former residence on their return to the district. Fry's Election Case, 71 Pa. (21 P. F. Smith) 302, 306, 10 Am. Rep. 698.

"As aforesaid," as used in a will relating to property devised and bequeathed as aforesaid, could only apply to previous clauses of the will, and it could not by implication be extended to subsequent provisions in a codicil. Roberts v. Wills, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 591, 598.

Testator gave to his wife all his personal estate, together with the premises in question for life. The will also recited: "I give, devise, and bequeath unto my only child A., now the wife of B., and to her heirs lawfully upon her body begotten, and assigns, forever, after the decease of my said wife, all my whole estate, both real and personal, which said estate, both real and personal, as aforesaid, I do hereby devise and bequeath unto my said daughter A. and to her heirs and assigns as aforesaid after the decease of my said wife as aforesaid, exclusive of her said husband B., whom for certain reasons I do hereby exclude and forever debar of inheriting any part of my said estate." It was contended that the intention of the testator was to convey to his daughter the fee, on the ground that the words "as aforesaid" in the latter clause of the devise referred to and were substituted for the word "forever" in the first clause, so that it should be read, "which said estate I devise and bequeath to my said daughter A., her heirs and assigns, forever." Held, that while this construction and argument was ingenious, it was not sound, for instead of introducing a new devise in the will, the testator only recited the one already made for the purpose of coupling it with an exclusion of the husband, so that the words "as aforesaid" refer to and stand for the particular description of heirs before mentioned, and do not refer exclusively to the word "forever." Doremus v. Zabriskie, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 404, 411.

The words "as aforesaid," in Act March 24, 1835, c. 195, providing that any person may be arrested on mesne process on any contract, etc., and held to bail or committed to prison, etc., provided any creditor, his agent, or attorney shall make oath that he has reason to believe and does believe that such debtor is about to depart and take with him property or means as aforesaid, decidedly indicate that it is necessary to allege in the oath the fact of good reason to believe and the belief that the person to be arrested is about to depart, etc. Whiting v. Trafton, 16 Me. (4 Shep.) 398, 401.

Certain tenements were devised to H. by name for her life, provided that S. and A., to whom and to whose children the reversion and inheritance of the premises were intended if H. should die without issue, should give H. £1,000 for life, then the testator devised all and singular the said estate and premises called, etc., to S. and A. for their lives, share and share alike, and on the death of either, their moiety unto and among the children of the survivor and their heirs as tenants in common, provided that if H. should die in possession of the premises, single and without issue, then he gave said estate to S. and A. and to the issue of their bodies lawfully begotten, and to their heirs and tenants in common as aforesaid. Held, that the words "as aforesaid" as they are used drew down to the second clause the limitations of the first, and showed that the testator meant that S. and A. and their children should take the same estate on H. dying in possession without issue as they would have done if the £1,000 had been paid. Meredith v. Meredith, 10 East, 503, 509.

In a will the expression "lawful issue as aforesaid" shows the intention of the testator that the general word "issue" should be qualified by attaching to it a meaning previously mentioned in the instrument; so that where the only previous meaning of "issue" was that of the children of testator's wife, the expression "lawful issue as aforesaid" should be construed to mean "children." Walker v. Petchell, 1 C. B. 651, 661.

"As aforesaid," as used in Sess. Laws 1891, p. 33, as amended by Sess. Laws 1893, p. 145, making it unlawful to catch salmon between 6 o'clock Saturday night and 6 o'clock Sunday night in any of the streams of the state between August 10th and September 10th, and making it unlawful to have in one's possession salmon which may have been caught as aforesaid, does not relate to the streams, but to the time and manner of taking the fish from them. "As" qualifies caught, making the sentence read by transposition, "caught as aforesaid in any of the streams," and means fish caught during the closed season aforesaid in any of the streams. State v. McGuire, 33 Pac. 666, 670, 24 Or. 366, 21 L. R. A. 478.

When used in a pleading alleging that after the execution by the defendant of the said deed of settlement, "as aforesaid" must be construed to refer to that which is necessary to make the defendant a party to the instrument; that is, that he not only sealed and delivered it, but that he also signed it. Wills v. Sutherland, 4 Exch. 211, 218.

AS BEST HE CAN.

See "Best He Can."

AS COLLATERAL.

The phrase "as collateral," as used in a letter wherein the writer promised to forward mortgaged notes as collateral, has a well known and unmistakable meaning, and is utterly inapt as descriptive of a mere accommodation lending. Meyer v. Moss (La.) 34 South. 332, 336.

AS CONVENIENT.

See "Convenience—Convenient."

AS THE CROW FLIES.

The phrase "as the crow flies" is a popular and picturesque expression to denote a straight line, which is the proper mode of measuring the distance from one given point to another. Stokes v. Grissell, 78 Eng. Com. Law, 678, 689.

AS CUSTOMARY.

A marine insurance policy, providing that the cargo was to be received and delivered at ports of loading and discharging as customary, refers to the manner of receiving and delivering the cargo, and has no reference to a delay occasioned by the wharf at which the insured vessel was to unload being occupied by another vessel, or to a delay in consequence of a lack of teams to take the cargo away. Davis v. Wallace (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 182, 185.

AS EARLY AS CONVENIENT.

See "Convenience—Convenient."

AS FAR AS.

A contract by the owners of a steamboat to tow a canal boat up a river "as far as the ice would permit" did not mean that they should take up the boat if it was physically possible, but required the steamboat to tow the canal boat as far as possible without imminent hazard from the ice. Vanderslice v. Newton, 4 N. Y. (4 Comst.) 130, 131.

AS FAST AS.

A contract of sale of certain barrels of whisky, one of the provisions of which was that 25 barrels be shipped by each steamer from P., "or as fast as that," imports an option on the part of the shippers as to the number they will ship at each time. Peck v. Waters, 104 Mass. 345, 350.

A charter party stipulating that the ship should be discharged "as fast as custom of the port will admit," and demurrage to be charged after the expiration of ten days, does not mean the time when the discharge of the vessel is to be begun, but means the process of discharging her. If there should be any special custom at the port at which the vessel was to be unloaded by which unloading the vessel would be delayed, the charterer was not to be accountable for it. It has reference to such custom as a custom of a particular port. It is not reasonable to regard the reference as applicable to a custom which is not peculiar to that port, but of general and universal prevalence, and hence as the custom is universal that a vessel seeking a berth to unload has no right to displace another which is in it before her, she must necessarily wait her turn. Such custom was not the one referred to in the charter party. Futterer v. Abenheim (Pa.) 10 Phila. 225.

A charter party providing that a ship should discharge her cargo as fast as she can deliver in ordinary working hours means that the delivery should be by every ordinary means at the disposal of the vessel; hence, a delivery from three hatches of a vessel constructed with four hatches was not a compliance with the terms. Hine v. Perkins (U. S.) 55 Fed. 996, 998, 5 C. C. A. 377.

The phrase "as fast as she can deliver," in the charter for a ship requiring her to discharge her cargo as fast as she can deliver, is to be construed as entitling the ship to deliver at her greatest speed, without regard to any custom of the port of delivery. The Glenfinlas (U. S.) 48 Fed. 758, 1 C. C. A. 85.

AS FOLLOWS.

The use of the words "as follows," in a request to the court to charge the jury in writing and as follows, restricts the request to the written matter which follows, and would not indicate to the judge that he was expected to put the whole charge in writing. Phillips v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 41 S. E. 805, 806, 130 N. C. 582.

AS FULLY AS.

The Pennsylvania act giving to a municipal corporation authority to subscribe for stock in a railway company "as fully as an individual" is to be so construed as to give the city authority to issue its negotiable bonds in payment of the stock. Seibert v. City of Pittsburgh, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 272, 274, 17 L. Ed. 553.

The statute giving national banks power to sue in any court of law or equity as fully as natural persons must be construed as including all cases in which the court would have jurisdiction if the bank were a natural person. In other words Congress must be supposed to have assumed that these corporations should be regarded for jurisdictional purposes as citizens of the state where located. St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Allen (U. S.) 5 Fed. 551, 554.

AS GOOD AS.

A charge that another "as good as" stole is not equivalent to a charge of larceny, and therefore not slanderous per se. Stokes v. Arey, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, Law) 66, 67.

A bond to convey land by as "good a deed as can be had" means by a deed of general warranty, and is not fulfilled by a deed where two of the grantors, having no other interest than the dower right of one of them, warrant the title only against those claiming under them. Day v. Burnham, 11 S. W. 807, 89 Ky. 75.

AS HERETOFORE.

In the provision in the Constitution that judicial power shall be vested in the Court of Errors and Appeals in the last resort in all things "as heretofore," the quoted phrase, if descriptive of the jurisdiction of the court, has no important signification, as the jurisdiction of all constitutional courts, by necessary intendment, are established as they existed antecedent to the date of the Constitution. Harris v. Vanderveers' Ex'r, 21 N. J. Eq. (6 C. E. Green) 424, 428.

AS HIS INTEREST MAY APPEAR.

An insurance policy, providing that the loss should be paid to the mortgagee "as his interest may appear," means that the company will pay the mortgagee to the extent of his lien or charge on the premises. Sias v. Rodger Williams Ins. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. 187, 188; Franklin Sav. Inst. v. Central Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 119 Mass. 240; Footte v. Hartford Fire & Marine Ins. Co., Id. 259, 261.

The words "as their interest may appear," in a mortgage slip attached to a fire policy which makes the policy payable to the mortgagees as their interest may appear, which policy is assigned as collateral to the mortgagee, operate to extend the assignment to any interest subsequently arising and appearing at the time of the loss. Ware v. Barnard & Leas Mfg. Co., 94 Ill. App. 498, 499.

AS IF.

The provision of a statute that, if there should be no property on which to levy an execution against a corporation, the stockholders designated in the act would be liable as if the contract had been made by them personally, the words "as if" mean "in the same manner and to the same extent"; that is, just as if the incorporators instead of the corporation had contracted the debt. New England Commercial Bank v. Stockholders of Newport Steam Factory, 6 R. I. 154, 187, 75 Am. Dec. 688.

AS THE LAW DIRECTS.

Where a testator devised land to his widow for life, remainder to his heirs, to be divided among them "as the law directs" in the case of dying intestate, such term should be construed to mean as the law was at the time of making the will, and not as it might be at the death of the tenant for life, and as by such limitation the estate may be given to persons who may not be the testator's heirs at law at the death of the life tenant, or in shares different from those prescribed by law at that time, such provision prevents the application of the rule in Shelley's Case. Quick's Ex'r v. Quick, 21 N. J. Eq. (6 C. E. Green) 13, 18.

AS LIMITED BY LAW.

See "Limited by Law."

AS LONG AS.As long as she keeps my name.

A devise of property to testator's wife for her own use as long as she keeps my name is plainly a gift during widowhood, and therefore passes an estate for life, determinable on her second marriage. Long v. Paul, 17 Atl. 988, 991, 127 Pa. 456, 14 Am. St. Rep. 862.

As long as she lives.

A will wherein the testator directed that his real estate should remain the absolute property of his wife "as long as she lives" meant that the wife was given the life estate. Modlin v. Kennedy, 53 Ind. 267, 268.

"As long as she lives," as used in a devise of real property to testator's wife, limits the duration of the estate to her life. Modlin v. Kennedy, 53 Ind. 267, 268.

As long as they can make it pay.

The clause "as long as they can make it pay," in a contract to work in a mine for which the persons were to receive a certain sum for all the ore they produced, has no special signification. It is not in any sense ambiguous, and can have no different meaning when applied to mining than it has in any mechanical or agricultural employment. It is a term used daily in all the different enterprises and occupations in which men are engaged, and its scope is so well understood that no evidence is necessary to show what it is or that it means anything different in one case than in another. When a party agrees to sell articles of merchandise or deliver the productions of his labor to another at a certain price as long as he can make it pay, every one must clearly understand that the term is dependent on conditions over which the promisee has no control, and in so far as any one has the power to make the term effective it is lodged solely in the promisor, who, by judicious purchases or skillful manipulation of labor, may be able to make a transaction pay when a more careless, negligent, or improvident person would be unable to do so. This serious element of uncertainty destroys all mutuality in the contract, and gives the promisor full power to say when a further execution of the contract will not be advantageous because he cannot make it pay. Davie v. Lumberman's Min. Co., 53 N. W. 625, 626, 93 Mich. 491, 24 L. R. A. 357.

premises to the lessee determinable on a nonperformance of the conditions and duties named in the lease on his part to be performed, for the lease was not a lease for years merely. The term "as long as wood grows and water runs" extends as fully beyond the use of the land as the term "forever." Arms v. Burt, 1 Vt. 303, 18 Am. Dec. 680.

A conveyance to the grantee to "endure as long as the waters of the Delaware should run" is to be construed as conveying a life estate and not a fee. Foster v. Joice (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 555.

AS NEAR AS MAY BE.

Rev. St. U. S. § 914 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 684], provides that in the Circuit Courts of the United States the practice, pleadings, forms, and modes of proceedings in civil causes shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, etc., existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such District or Circuit Courts are held. Held, that "as near as may be" does not mean "as near as may be possible," nor "as near as may be practicable"; the words are only directory and advisory, leaving it within the discretion of the court to reject any subordinate provision in the state statute which in their judgment would unwisely incur the administration of the law or tend to defeat the ends of justice in their tribunals. Rock Island Nat. Bank v. Thompson, 50 N. E. 1089, 1091, 173 Ill. 593, 64 Am. St. Rep. 137 (citing Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898); Mexican Cent. R. Co. v. Pinkney, 13 Sup. Ct. 859, 865, 149 U. S. 194, 37 L. Ed. 699; Beardsley v. Littell (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1178, 1179; Phelps v. Oaks, 6 Sup. Ct. 714, 715, 117 U. S. 236, 29 L. Ed. 888; In re Rugheimer (U. S.) 36 Fed. 369, 373.

The circuit courts are required by Rev. St. § 914, to conform as near as may be to the practice of the state courts. The words "as near as may be," in this act, impose a discretion and devolve a duty upon the judge not to allow justice to be delayed by the application of state court rules to cases for which they were not intended and to which they ought not to be applied. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Charleston Bridge Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 628-632, 13 C. C. A. 58 (citing Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 301, 23 L. Ed. 898).

In Act Feb. 24, 1858, authorizing the release of a prisoner for debt on giving bond pending the question of his final acquitment, and providing that all subsequent proceedings should be in like manner as near as may be as if the debtor were actually in prison under the remand of the court, the phrase "as near as may be" manifestly contemplates some variation from the prescribed course.

Potter v. Robinson, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 114, 117.

AS NEAR AS PRACTICABLE.

In Laws 1875, c. 422, requiring that iron girders of an elevated railroad should be placed on each side of the streets as near as practicable on a line parallel with the curbstone, the phrase "as near as practicable" relates not to the curb and to the parallelism of the line of the columns with that of the curb, and means that the line of the columns must be parallel to the curb. In re Brooklyn Elevated R. Co., 11 N. Y. Supp. 161, 163, 57 Hun, 590.

The incorporation of the words "as near as practicable" in an order of supervisors laying out a road, describing it as following a specified line as near as practicable, invalidates the location, as such order must definitely fix the location of the road. Sonnek v. Town of Minnesota Lake, 52 N. W. 961, 962, 50 Minn. 558.

AS NEARLY AS CAN BE CONVENIENTLY DONE.

The phrase "as nearly as the same can be conveniently done," in Rev. St. c. 7, § 27, making it the duty of the assessor to assess upon the polls one-sixth part of the whole sum to be raised as near as the same can be conveniently done, except, etc., operates as a modification of the rule that the polls shall be assessed an exact one-sixth part, and authorize such an assessment approximating a sixth part, which will avoid the minute divisions of small sums. Goodrich v. Inhabitants of Lunenburg, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 38, 39.

AS NEARLY AS MAY BE.

"As nearly as may be," as used in Const. art. 3, § 4, providing the legislature shall so alter the senate districts that each shall contain as nearly as may be an equal number of inhabitants, meant as near as it may be practicable to make them, having regard to the number of inhabitants, and in effect deprives the legislature of any discretion. People v. Monroe County Sup'rs, 19 N. Y. Supp. 978, 985.

"As nearly as may be," as used in Const. art. 3, § 5, requiring the members of the assembly to be apportioned among the several counties as nearly as may be according to the number of their respective inhabitants, does not mean as nearly as a mathematical process can be followed. It is a direction addressed to the Legislature in the way of a general statement of the principle upon which the apportionment should be made. The legislative duty should be to make the district of an equal number of inhabitants as nearly as may be, and how far that may be carried out in actual practice must depend generally upon the integrity of the Legislature. People v. Rice, 31 N. E. 921, 929, 135 N. Y. 473, 16 L. R. A. 836.

Const. art. 3, § 4, in declaring that each separate district shall contain an equal number of inhabitants as nearly as may be, meant that a discretion is conferred on the Legislature in making such apportionment, which discretion will not be reviewed. People v. Rice, 20 N. Y. Supp. 293, 297, 65 Hun, 236.

AS NEARLY AS POSSIBLE.

The chattel mortgage act, in requiring an affidavit of consideration by the holder of the mortgage stating the consideration of the mortgage and "as nearly as possible" the amount due and to grow due thereon, indicates that the act does not require precise and exact naming of a definite sum, but only a statement as nearly as possible of the amount due. Green v. McCrane, 37 Atl. 318, 321, 55 N. J. Eq. 436.

In Civ. Code, § 498, requiring street railway tracks to be placed "as nearly as possible" in the middle of the street, the quoted words are equivalent to "as nearly as practicable." "The use of the words 'as nearly' in connection with 'as possible' shows that it was foreseen that a location in the middle of the street could not always be made, and we think that from the nature of the case the meaning must be that the location must be controlled in some degree by the circumstances of the particular case." Finch v. Riverside & A. Ry. Co., 25 Pac. 765, 766, 87 Cal. 597.

AS NEARLY AS PRACTICABLE.

Const. art. 4, § 23, in providing that the system of town and county government shall be "as nearly uniform as practicable," did not mean that the system shall be absolutely uniform, nor that the same state of things shall exist in all the counties, but rather that the general system should be the same, modified only by differences reasonable according to circumstances. State v. Milwaukee County Sup'rs, 25 Wis. 339, 350.

AS OF ANY TERM.

The phrase "as of any term," in a warrant of attorney authorizing judgment to be confessed on a note as of any term, does not authorize the confession of a judgment in vacation; the intention being clearly manifest that the judgment should be confessed at some term. Whitney v. Bohlen, 42 N. E. 162, 163, 157 Ill. 571.

AS OF RIGHT.

"As of right," as used in St. 2 & 3 Wm. IV, c. 71, § 5, providing that in all pleadings to actions of trespass and in all other pleadings wherein before the passing of the act it would have been necessary to allege a right of easement (set up as a defense) to have existed from time immemorial, it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right, the party who avers the right must mean such as could be inferred to exist by custom, prescription, or nonexisting grant. Kinlock v. Nevile, 6 Mees. & W. 795, 806.

AS PER.

A recital in a deed that it was made as per agreement of certain date means nothing more than that the deed was a satisfaction of the contract, and the grantee in the deed is not affected by the preliminary contract. Close v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry., 19 N. W. 886, 888, 64 Iowa, 149.

In a claim filed against an estate for work and labor done and for board, care, and money expended "as per contract," the phrase did not restrict the claimant to proof of a special express contract, but included not only an express but an implied contract, and hence claimant was entitled to recover on proof that the services had been rendered and that they were not mere gifts. Harrison v. Lindley, 104 Ill. 245, 248.

The words "as per statement," when attached to an aggregate sum, import that an itemized or more particular statement has been furnished the party charged with the aggregate amount of the demand, and that he is in possession of the information which a statement in detail would furnish him. Albion Phosphate Min. Co. v. Wyllie (U. S.) 77 Fed. 541, 545, 23 C. C. A. 276.

AS PROVIDED BY LAW.

"As provided by law," as used in Code, § 310, providing that plaintiff may at any time in three years after the active energy of a judgment lien has expired revive the judgment by service of summons on the debtor as provided by law, does not mean simply that the manner of service on the debtor should be legal, but it should be construed as used to meet the condition brought about by the death of the debtor or defendant in execution, making it necessary to revive the judgment against his executor as provided by law, and it having been provided in another section of the Code that an execution could be renewed, providing that it might be renewed by service on the debtor, his heirs, executors, and administrators, as provided by law, should be construed to mean service on the debtor, his executors, or administrators, since the right to revive an execution necessarily involves the right to revive a judgment. Chester & C. R. Co. v. Marshall, 18 S. E. 247, 248, 40 S. C. 59.

AS SECURITY.

See "Held as Security."

AS SHALL SEEM BEST.

See "Seem Best."

AS SOON AS.

"As soon as" means immediately at or after another event, hence the promise to pay plaintiff an additional salary as soon as the company's affairs were straightened up was dependent upon the straightening up of the affairs of the company and not an absolute promise. Blodgett v. Hall, 32 N. Y. Supp. 788, 790, 11 Misc. Rep. 626.

The phrase "as soon as collected," as used in an instrument reciting a certain amount due A. "to be paid as soon as collected from my accounts," is "not intended to show that the debt was conditional, depending for its existence as valid demand against the makers upon the fact that the sum to be paid could be collected out of the accounts referred to, but only to prescribe the time of payment by reference, not to days and years, but to a reasonable time for the collection of the accounts." Ubsdell v. Cunningham, 22 Mo. 124, 126.

The use of the words "as soon as circumstances will permit," in an instrument for the payment of a sum of money as soon as circumstances will permit, prevents the instrument from being a promissory note, and a recovery cannot be had on such instrument without proof of the ability of the maker to pay. Salinas v. Wright, 11 Tex. 572, 577.

A promise to pay as soon as the promisor receives funds as an assignee makes the promise conditional, and is very different from a promise to pay forthwith or generally. Cartledge v. West (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 377, 379.

Plaintiff agreed to sell defendants certain stock, and defendants agreed to take it, and pay plaintiff a specified amount therefor; such payments to be made "as soon and fast as they were able, financially, to do so, without sacrificing their interests in, or the property of," such company. Held, that defendants were bound to perform such contract within such time as was reasonable for the disposition of their property. Fisher v. Chadwick, 34 Pac. 899, 4 Wyo. 379; Chadwick v. Hopkins, Id.

AS SOON AS CAN BE.

A contract for the purchase of cotton on a certain plantation to be delivered "as soon as it can be picked out" and shipped does not mean as soon as it can possibly and by any number of hands be picked, but it means the time in which it will or may with ordinary diligence be picked out by the hands belonging to the plantation, and not by the largest number which the proprietor could employ. In other words the picking was to be in convenient season, according to the usual operations of agriculture. Waddell v. Reddick, 24 N. C. 424, 429.

Where a paper promised to pay, with interest, a specified sum of money "as soon as the crop can be sold or the money raised from any other source," such phrase meant that the maker should have a reasonable amount of time within which to procure in one mode or the other the means necessary to meet the liability, and could not be construed to mean that if the crop should never be sold, and the defendants could not procure the money from any other source, the debt should never be paid. Nunez v. Dautel, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 560, 562, 22 L. Ed. 161.

A notice of motion to amerce, given for a day specified, at a certain hour, or as soon thereafter as the court can attend to the same, means the day following the one mentioned if such day was a legal holiday, for that such day was a legal holiday the party receiving the notice must be legally presumed to have knowledge, and that the court would not be held on the day named, and that the day following was intended. White v. Rockefeller, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 299, 301.

Notice of an intended motion for a certain day in term, without saying "or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard," is sufficient, as the words are superfluous, and the party may make his motion on any other day in term. Anonymous (N. Y.) 1 Johns. 143.

A note in which the maker promises to pay "as soon as I can" is to be construed as a promise to pay presently. Kincade v. Higgins, 4 Ky. (1 Bibb) 396, 397.

AS SOON AS CONVENIENT.

See, also, "Convenience—Convenient."

An estate devised in trust to be sold "as soon as convenient," or with all possible diligence, is to be sold within a reasonable time after the testator's death, and is considered by the court as sold the moment the testator is dead; for where there is a trust, that is always considered as done which is ordered to be done, and the court cannot measure the time, and the trust is vested for the purposes thereof from the death of the testator. Hutchin v. Mannington, 1 Ves. Jr. 366, 367.

"As soon as convenient," as used in a trust providing that the trustees as soon as convenient after the testator's death should sell and dispose of the property, either by public or private sale, and stand possessed of the proceeds on certain trusts for certain persons, required a sale of the property within a reasonable time, and vested the cestui que trust with an estate, as and from the date of the death of the testator. Walker v. Shore, 19 Ves. 387, 390, note.

The use of the phrase "as soon as they can conveniently locate and construct," in the charter of a railroad company authorizing them as soon as they conveniently can to construct a road with one or more tracks, and to make or erect warehouses, etc., is not a limitation upon the power to compel the company to exercise its whole authority in the very beginning. It would be an unreasonable construction of its charter to require provision to be made for all the unknown wants of the future. The increase in trade and business and the changes taking place often require new and increased facilities. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Williams, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 103, 107.

A direction that certain bequests of money in trust shall be paid out of the income of the estate "as soon as convenient" after one year after testator's death, or sooner if the executor has funds, did not mean that the legacy should not bear interest after one year from the testator's death. Gillon v. Turnbull (S. C.) 1 McCord, Eq. 148, 149.

AS SOON AS MAY BE.

"As soon as may be," as used in St. 1864, c. 111, § 1, providing that exceptions are required to be transmitted to this court as soon as may be, if question of law is reserved, means a reasonable time. Bentley v. Ward, 116 Mass. 333, 334.

A covenant whereby the covenantors agreed to sell a certain vessel "forthwith as soon as may be, for the largest sum that we can reasonably obtain," allows a reasonable latitude as to the time and manner of making the sale. Adams v. Foster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 156, 157.

AS SOON AS POSSIBLE.

The expression "as soon as possible," in a contract by one person to convey certain lands to another as soon as possible, means, under the circumstances, as soon as it shall be within the vendor's power, or as soon as he has the ability to convey. Snodgrass v. Wolf, 11 W. Va. 158, 164, 165.

It was contended that the words "as soon as possible" in a contract did not mean within a reasonable time, but meant as quickly as the work can be done with the best appliances, unlimited facilities, and the utmost diligence; the word "possible" being synonymous with the word "practicable." It was held that without being understood as conceding this argument has any force it may be noted that it does not avail to import into the writing the expression of a fixed time for the completion of the work.

Williams v. Rittenhouse & Embree Co., 64 N. E. 995, 997, 198 Ill. 602.

Where a debtor whose debt was barred by the statute of limitations said to his creditor "I will pay it as soon as possible," the words "as soon as possible" did not constitute any restriction or limitation of the meaning and force of the acknowledgment of the existence of the debt. Norton v. Shepard, 48 Conn. 141, 143, 40 Am. Rep. 157.

The phrase "as soon as possible," or the word "forthwith," has a meaning as strong as the word "immediately," which is defined by Bouvier as implying strictly not deferred by any lapse of time, but as usually employed meaning rather within a reasonable time, having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the case. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. Courtney (U. S.) 103 Fed. 599, 607, 43 C. C. A. 331.

A contract by a manufacturer to furnish certain specified goods "as soon as possible" means within a reasonable time, regard being had to the manufacturer's ability to produce them, and the orders he may already have in hand. Atwood v. Emery, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 110, 115; Florence Gas, Electric Light & Power Co. v. Hanby (Ala.) 13 South. 343, 348; Hinds v. Kellogg, 13 N. Y. Supp. 922; Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie, 29 Moak, Eng. R. 102, 105; Arthur v. Wright, 10 N. Y. Supp. 368, 369, 57 Hun, 22.

A contract of sale whereby the vendors agreed to ship the property sold "as soon as possible" from Glasgow, which required transportation by water, means shipment as soon as possible by any of the ordinary modes of transportation, and cannot be construed as meaning as soon as possible by sail or any other special mode of transportation. Pope v. Filley (U. S.) 9 Fed. 65, 66.

The words "as soon as possible," in a contract by which one agreed to complete shipments of goods sold as soon as possible on the opening of navigation, were equivalent in their legal effect and meaning to the words "with all reasonable diligence," or "without unreasonable delay." Rhodes v. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 426, 431.

"As soon as possible," as used in a bill of lading requiring delivery "as soon as possible," is equivalent to a provision for quick dispatch, and requires the consignee to make use of all means of discharge readily available, and does not admit of a detention of the vessel to suit the convenience or business purposes of consignor and consignee. Egan v. Barclay Fibre Co. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 527.

"As soon as possible," as used in a contract, means that the thing agreed to be done shall be done with all possible expedition. Sentenne v. Kelly, 13 N. Y. Supp. 529, 531, 59 Hun, 512.

An order for threshing machinery, requiring its delivery as soon as possible, requires delivery at the earliest moment of time practical to meet the purchaser's object in making the order. Robinson v. Brooks (U. S.) 40 Fed. 525, 527.

The phrase "as soon as possible," in a fire policy requiring proofs of loss to be furnished as soon as possible after the fire, means that the insured must do all that he can toward having proofs presented promptly. Brink v. Hanover Ins. Co., 80 N. Y. 108, 116.

"As soon as possible," as used in insurance policies requiring the assured to give notice of loss as soon as possible, construed to mean as soon as could be under the circumstances, or within a reasonable time, or as soon as practicable. As soon as possible cannot mean instantly or directly, for it might be impossible to do the act instantly. Palmer v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 44 Wis. 201, 208; McPike v. Assur. Co., 61 Miss. 37, 43; Ben Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Flynn, 98 Pa. 627, 634; Columbia Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 507 513, 9 L. Ed. 512; Home Ins. Co. v. Davis, 98 Pa. 280, 283; Scammon v. Germania Ins. Co., 101 Ill. 621, 624; State Ins. Co. v. Maackens, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 564, 569.

The phrase "as soon as possible," in an insurance policy requiring that notice of loss, accident, or death should be given to the insurer as soon as possible, means with due diligence, or without unnecessary procrastination or delay under the circumstances of the case. Edwards v. Baltimore Fire Ins. Co., 3 Gill, 176, 186; Phillips v. Protection Co., 14 Mo. 220, 231; Providence Life Ins. & Inv. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 310, 315; Provident Life Ins. & Inv. Co. v. Baum, 29 Ind. 236, 241; Konrad v. Union Casualty & Surety Co. (La.) 21 South. 721, 722. Notice was held to have been given immediately, within the meaning of an accident policy, of a death by drowning occurring on February 26th, by a notice given on or after April 20, 1896, the body of deceased not having been found until 15 days after his death, and the beneficiary having no notice of the existence of the policy till April 20th. Konrad v. Union Casualty & Surety Co. (La.) 21 South. 721, 722.

AS SOON AS PRACTICABLE.

"As soon as practicable after death," as used in a will directing the executors to dispose of certain property as soon as practicable after testator's death, does not prevent the direction to sell from being imperative, but only gives the executors a certain discretion as to the time or times of such sale. Ford v. Ford, 33 N. W. 188, 196, 70 Wis. 19, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117.

"As soon as practicable," as used in a contract requiring that it should be performed as soon as practicable, is practically synonymous with "speedily." It does not, however, require that the contract should be performed directly, and perhaps not within a reasonable time, but as soon as conditions warranted under all the circumstances. Duncan v. Topham, 8 C. B. 225, 230.

The word "practicable" means "feasible." An act is practicable of which conditions or circumstances permit the performance. Thus in an act requiring the city council to call an election to fill a vacancy in the office of mayor as soon as practicable, until legally in session, it is, of course, impracticable for it to order the election; but at its first regular meeting after the vacancy occurs there is no reason why it should not proceed to the ordering of an election, and hence it may be compelled to do so. Rizer v. People (Colo.) 69 Pac. 315, 316.

AS SPEEDILY AS CAN BE.

"As speedily as the same can be done," as used in St. 1784, c. 2, relating to the distribution of insolvent estates, and providing that when an executor or administrator of an insolvent estate is dissatisfied with the allowance of a claim by the commissioners, the creditor shall commence his action at common law as speedily as the same can be done after notice of such dissatisfaction, does not mean that the action should be brought in all cases to the term of court next succeeding the notice, but means that the action should be brought as speedily as possible, having regard to the place of residence and other circumstances of the party in each particular case. Guild v. Hale, 15 Mass. 455, 457.

AS SPEEDILY AS POSSIBLE.

An agreement of liquidation which provided that the firm was to be closed up "as speedily as possible" meant that it was the duty of the liquidating partner to sell within a reasonable time. Smith v. Underhill, 19 N. Y. Supp. 249, 252, 64 Hun, 639.

"As speedily as possible," means within a reasonable time or without unreasonable delay, so that where a landlord fails to repair premises within a reasonable time, where the lease requires repairs as speedily as possible, the tenant may surrender the premises. Bacon v. Albany Perforated Wrapping Paper Co., 49 N. Y. Supp. 620, 621, 22 Misc. Rep. 592.

AS SPEEDILY AS PRACTICABLE.

Rev. St. § 7087, in providing that a list of school books, selected by a majority of the board, shall be transmitted to the clerks, who shall record the same, and thereafter, "as speedily as practicable," the books used in the necessary schools shall be made to conform to the list as adopted, requires the duty to be performed not when they may think best, nor when they may conceive it to be for the interest of the people, but with all practicable speed. State ex rel. Roberts v. School Directors of City of Springfield, 74 Mo. 21, 23.

ASCERTAIN—ASCERTAINMENT.

According to Worcester, "ascertain" is to make sure or certain; to fix; to establish; to determine; to settle. Brown v. Lyddy (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 451, 456.

"Ascertained," as used in St. 9 Geo. IV, c. 40, § 41, relating to the settlement of an insane pauper, which "cannot be ascertained" by the justices, reasonably means "cannot be decided on." Reg. v. Inhabitants of Heyop, 8 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 547, 559.

A provision in a lease that, if a renewal was refused by the lessor, he should pay to the lessee the value of a certain building, to be "ascertained" by disinterested persons, meant made sure, fixed, established, determined, and would seem to demand the observance of the usual mode of investigation in order to establish, to determine, to settle the value. Brown v. Lyddy (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 451, 456.

The word "ascertain," as used in a contract providing that the buyer of growing hops, if he should ascertain that they were not in the condition required, might terminate the contract, reserves the right to the buyer merely to acquire information, not to decide as to the condition of the hops. Lilienthal Bros. v. Stearns (U. S.) 121 Fed. 197, 198.

Webster, in defining the word "ascertain," gives, among others, the following definition: "To make certain to the mind; to make sure of; to determine." The use of the word in instructions in an action against a vendee of land purchased under a bond of title, defended on the ground that the vendor did not have title, that the verdict should be for the defendant if he had "ascertained" that representations made by plaintiff as to his title were false, is erroneous; the issue involved being whether plaintiff had title in fact. Pughe v. Coleman (Tex.) 44 S. W. 576, 578.

By the phrase, used in reference to vested remainders, that "the person must be ascertained" before the remainder is vested, is meant "that the person must be one to whose competency to take no further or other condition attaches; one in respect to whom it is not necessary that any event shall accrue or condition be satisfied, save only that the precedent estate shall determine." Bunting v. Speek, 21 Pac. 288, 291, 41 Kan. 424.

Arbitration implied.

The words "valuation to be ascertained by two persons, whose decision shall be final," in a contract for the lease of certain lands, which provides that at the expiration of the term of the lease the owner of the buildings may remove them, or defendant may purchase them at a valuation to be ascertained by two persons, whose decision shall be final and binding, is to be construed as only an agreement for the purpose of valuation, and not as a submission to arbitration. California Annual Conference of M. E. Church v. Seitz, 15 Pac. 839, 841, 74 Cal. 287.

A policy of insurance, providing that the loss should be "ascertained and settled by a committee," did not mean that the loss should be submitted to arbitration in its proper sense, but it was merely a condition precedent to the insured's right of action on the policy that the loss had been determined at least by a committee. California Annual Conference of M. E. Church v. Seitz, 15 Pac. 839, 841, 74 Cal. 287.

The word "ascertain," as used in Const. art. 11b, § 4, providing that in all cases of claims against corporations the exact amount shall be first ascertained before action against the original subscribers for their individual liability, means judicially ascertained, and to judicially ascertain the amount due from a corporation to a creditor means to have the finding and judgment of a court as to such amount. German Nat. Bank of Lincoln v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Holstein, 74 N. W. 1086, 54 Neb. 593 (citing Globe Pub. Co. v. State Bank of Nebraska, 41 Neb. 175, 59 N. W. 683; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Gibson, 37 Neb. 750, 56 N. W. 616; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Funk, 49 Neb. 353, 68 N. W. 520; State v. German Sav. Bank, 50 Neb. 734, 70 N. W. 221); New Hampshire Sav. Bank v. Richey (U. S.) 121 Fed. 956, 962, 58 C. C. A. 294.

As judicially ascertained.

Comp. St. c. 10, § 17, provides that, when the incumbent of an office is re-elected or reappointed, he shall qualify by taking the oath and giving the bond as required, but, when such officer has had public funds or property in his control, his bond shall not be approved until he has produced and fully accounted for such funds and property, and, when it is "ascertained" that the incumbent of an office holds over by reason of the non-election or nonappointment of a successor, or of the neglect or refusal of the successor to qualify, he shall qualify anew within 10 days from the time at which his successor, if elected, should have qualified. Held, that "ascertained" means found out, or learned for certainty, by trial, examination, or experiment, and hence, where the returns of an election at which the officer's successor was to be chosen showed that a certain person had received a plurality of the votes, whether he was elected depended upon whether he was eligible to be elected, which could only be determined by judicial inquiry, and the officer is not debarred from holding over by failure to requalify within 10 days from the time when his successor should have qualified; for he could not determine whether such successor was elected or not, and he is only required to requalify within 10 days from the "ascertainment" of the fact that his successor is ineligible. State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 754, 31 Neb. 632.

As learn in any manner.

A tax collector "ascertains" who are the insolvent or defaulting taxpayers in his county, when he finds out who they may be. Perry County v. Selma, M. & M. R. Co., 58 Ala. 546, 565.

"Ascertain," within the meaning of a statute providing that, on an application for the probate of a will, the surrogate shall ascertain whether any of the persons interested are minors, and, if so, their names and places of residence, and, if there be such, appoint a special guardian to take care of their interests, is not limited to an ascertainment by means of an examination of the original petition, containing the requisite information, though it is the common way of furnishing such information; but when, after proceedings to probate are actually begun, a minor becomes interested by reason of the death of one of the parties, and the surrogate ascertains that fact, it is his right and duty to bring in such minor and appoint a guardian for him, and how the surrogate ascertains the fact is immaterial. Russell v. Hartt, 87 N. Y. 19, 23.

ASCERTAINMENT.

"Ascertainment," as used in Rev. St. § 2931, requiring notice of an intention to recover a tax alleged to have been wrongfully collected, to be given within 10 days from the "ascertainment and liquidation" of the same, means the ascertaining, and demanding and receiving the same, necessarily implying payment. Laidlaw v. Abraham (U. S.) 43 Fed. 297, 299.

Act Cong. 1864, § 14, declares that the decision of the Collector of Customs is conclusive, unless the party, if dissatisfied with his decision, gives notice thereof within 10 days after the "ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs," and within 30 days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation appeals therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury. Held, that "ascertainment and liquidation" is synonymous with the decision of the Collector of Customs. Such ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs—that is, the proper officers in the collector's office or department—is the decision of the Collector. When the duties are ascertained and liquidated in the usual manner by such officers, and the usual indicia thereof by checks and stamps are placed on the usual papers in the Collector's office, such transaction is the decision of the Collector of Customs in the premises. United States v. Cousinery (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 677, 679.

ASHES.

In the metropolitan paving act (St. 57 Geo. III, c. 29), relating to the removal of "dust, cinders, or ashes," this phrase cannot be construed to include the refuse in which metal remained, after a brass founder had extracted a quantity of metal from the ashes, which fell into the ash pit during the process of casting, and which he gave to his apprentices, by whom it was sold to brass refiners, who extracted from the ashes a further quantity of metal; for such ashes were valuable for commercial purposes. Law v. Dodd, 1 Exch. 845, 849.

ASKED.

The word "asked," as used in the records of court, as follows: "The defendants were then asked by the court if they had secured the aid of counsel, and of their right to be represented by counsel," is equivalent to saying that they were informed of their right, as the word "informed" is used in Pen. Code, § 987, providing that, if a defendant appear for arraignment without counsel, he must be informed that it is his right to have counsel. People v. Miller, 70 Pac. 735, 737, 137 Cal. 642.

ASPHALT.

"Asphalt," as used in a patent in reference to pavements, is not limited in meaning to the Trinidad deposit, or to the so-called "American mixture," but includes as well the bituminous paving material used in France and elsewhere, comprising natural rock, asphalt, and compositions of bitumen and lime or sand particles. United States Repair & Guaranty Co. v. Assyrian Asphalt Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 235, 236.

ASPHALT PAVING.

"Ordinary paving, called 'asphalt,' is overlaying of a mixture of asphalt, lime, and sand upon a body of rock and stone." Olsson v. City of Topeka, 21 Pac. 219, 220, 42 Kan. 709.

ASPHYXIA.

Asphyxia was originally a want of pulse or cessation of the motion of the heart and arteries; as now used, apparent death or suspended animation, particularly from suffocation or drowning or the inhalation of gases. State v. Baldwin, 12 Pac. 318, 328, 36 Kan. 1.

ASPORTATION.

"Asportation" is a taking out of the possession of the owner without his privity and consent. Wilson v. State, 21 Md. 1, 9.

"Asportation," as used in reference to larceny, means the removing of the property alleged to have been stolen from the place where it was put. Any removal with intent to steal will constitute an asportation, if its location be appreciably changed, as where an article is moved from one part of the room to another part of the same room. State v. Higgins, 88 Mo. 354, 355.

"Asportation," in larceny, is a removing of the property alleged to have been stolen from that place where it was before; but it is not necessary, in order to constitute asportation, that it be quite carried away. Where a person had lifted a bag from the bottom of the boot of a coach, and was detected before he got it out of the boot, it was held a complete asportation. Rex v. Walsh, 1 Moody, Cr. Cas. 14, 15.

ASS.

The word "ass," as used in a provision of the Code punishing the felonious taking or stealing of any horse, mule, or ass, includes animals of both sexes and all ages embraced under such terms. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 6553.

ASSAILANT.

The word "assailant," as used in Code 1886, § 3727, providing that, when the killing in any sudden encounter or affray is caused by the "assailant" by the use of a deadly weapon which was concealed before the commencement of the fight, his adversary having no deadly weapon drawn, such killing is murder, means only the one who commits the first assault; and this section has no application where the assailant is killed by the assailed. Scales v. State, 11 South. 121, 124, 96 Ala. 69.

ASSAULT.

See "Aggravated Assault"; "Felony Assault"; "Indecent Assault"; "Secret Assault"; "Simple Assault."

The term "assault," when used in statutes without qualification, is to be understood according to its established meaning in the criminal law. Smith v. State, 78 N. W. 1059, 1060, 58 Neb. 531.

"Assault" seems to be a generic term, applying to and embracing all offenses of personal violence, not amounting to a felony, done or admitted to be done to another in his presence. Hardy v. Commonwealth (Va.) 17 Grat. 592, 601.

An assault is an attempt to commit a violent injury upon the person of another. Goodrum v. State, 60 Ga. 509, 510; Groves v. State, 42 S. E. 755, 757, 118 Ga. 516, 59 L. R. A. 598; Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 55, 59; Sweeden v. State, 19 Ark. 205, 213 (citing 3 Greenl. Ev. § 59); State v. Harrigan (Del.) 55 Atl. 5, 6.

An assault is an offer or attempt to strike the person of another. State v. Myerfield, 61 N. C. 108, 109; Same v. Hampton, 63 N. C. 13, 14; State v. Gladden, 73 N. C. 150, 155.

"An assault is an attempt or offer by force and violence to do a corporal injury to another." State v. Wyatt, 41 N. W. 31, 32, 76 Iowa, 328; State v. Shields (Ohio) 1 West. Law J. 118, 119; Hays v. People (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 351, 352; State v. Godfrey, 20 Pac. 625, 627, 17 Or. 300, 11 Am. St. Rep. 330. As by striking at him with a weapon or without a weapon, being within striking distance, or presenting a gun at him at a distance the gun will carry, or pointing a pitchfork at him, being within reach of it. People v. Lee (N. Y.) 1 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 364, 365. And when the assault is consummated it becomes a battery. List v. Miner, 49 Atl. 856, 858, 74 Conn. 50; Lewis v. Hoover (Ind.) 3 Blackf. 407, 408.

"An assault is an attempt or offer to beat another, without touching him, as if one lifts up his cane or his fist in a threatening manner to another, or strikes at him, but misses him." Prince v. Ridge, 32 Misc. Rep. 666, 66 N. Y. Supp. 454 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 120).

An assault is an intentional attempt to strike, within striking distance, which fails of its intentional effects either by preventive influence or by misadventure. Lane v. State, 85 Ala. 11, 14, 4 South. 730.

An assault is defined "as an unlawful setting upon one's person." Geraty v. Stern (N. Y.) 30 Hun, 426, 427.

An assault is an attempt to commit a violent injury. Consequently an assault with intent to commit any specified crime constitutes an attempt to commit that crime. Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 55, 59.

"Assault or beating," as used in admiralty rule 16, declaring that, in all suits for an "assault or beating" on the high seas, the suit shall be in personam only, means any case in which the gravamen of the action is an assault or beating, although the injuries alleged arise, not only from assaults and beatings, but also injuries from every ill treatment and all cases of actionable personal abuse. Smith v. The Challenger, 7 Pac. 851, 853, 2 Wash. T. 447.

Affray distinguished.

An assault is an unlawful attempt or offer to do personal injury to another. An assault is entirely distinct from affray; the peculiar characteristic of the latter being its publicity, while an assault may be a complete offense without regard to the place where it is committed. Commonwealth v. Simmons, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 614, 616; Childs v. State, 15 Ark. 204, 205; State v. Brewer, 33 Ark. 176, 178; State v. Sumner (S. C.) 5 Strobb. 53, 56.

The qualities that distinguish an affray from an assault and battery are that two or more persons must be engaged in the same combat and in a public place. Thompson v. State, 70 Ala. 26, 28.

Battery distinguished.

An assault "is an offer or attempt by force to do a corporal injury, as if one person strike at another with his hands or with a stick, and miss him; for, if the other be stricken, it is a battery, which is an offense of a higher grade, or if he shake his fist at any person, or present a gun or other weapon within such distance as that a hurt might be given, or the drawing of a sword and brandishing it in a menacing manner. But it is essential, to constitute an assault, that an intent to do some injury should be coupled with the act, and that intent should be to do a corporal hurt to another." United States v. Hand (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 103, 104.

An "assault" is defined to be "any attempt to commit a battery or any threatening gesture, showing in itself or by words accompanying it an immediate intention, coupled with an ability, to commit a battery." A "battery" is defined as "the use of any unlawful violence upon the person of another with intent to injure him, whatever be the means or degree of violence used, thus making it necessary that two things should concur; one physical, and the other mental—an act and an intent accompanying it." McKay v. State, 44 Tex. 43, 48.

As attempt to commit a battery.

"Assault" is any attempt to commit a battery, or any threatening gesture, showing in itself, or by words accompanying it, an immediate intention coupled with an ability to commit a battery. Garnet v. State, 1 Tex. App. 605, 607, 28 Am. Rep. 425.

An assault is an act done toward the commission of a battery, and must immediately precede the battery. Fox v. State, 34 Ohio St. 377, 380.

"Any attempt to commit a battery, or any threatened gesture, showing in itself or by words accompanying it an immediate intention, coupled with ability, to commit a battery, is an assault." Farrar v. State, 15 S. W. 719, 720, 29 Tex. App. 250.

In committing an assault, it is sufficient that there be an act done indicating an intention to commit a battery immediately, coupled with the ability to do it. This, of course, must not be an act of preparation for some attack in an intended difficulty not then pending in fact. Higginbotham v. State, 23 Tex. 574, 577.

An "assault" is made by one who, in striking distance of another, attempts to strike at him or hit him. An assault is an attempt to strike. Commonwealth v. Brungess, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 13, 14.

Execution of attempt.

An assault may be committed without inflicting any personal injury. Any act tending to infringe the sacredness of the person of another constitutes an assault. State v. Myers, 19 Iowa, 517, 518.

To constitute an assault, it is not necessary that the attempt be actually executed on the person. The attempt by the use of a weapon or missile, whether the object is reached or not, is an assault, if the attempt is actually made to do the injury. State v. Jones (Del.) 47 Atl. 1006.

According to Whart. Cr. Law, to constitute an "assault," there must be some movement toward physical violence. It must amount to an attempt; for the purpose to commit violence, however fully indicated, if not accompanied by an offer to carry it into immediate execution, falls short of an actual assault. Cutler v. State, 59 Ind. 300, 302.

To constitute an assault, there must be a use of some unlawful violence on the person of another with intent to injure such person, or some threatening gesture, showing in itself or by words accompanying it an immediate intention to commit a battery. Carroll v. State, 6 S. W. 190, 24 Tex. App. 366.

"Neither a purpose to make an assault nor any amount of preparation for doing so will constitute an assault, unless followed by some hostile demonstration against the person toward whom the purpose is contemplated. If the defendant had gone and procured a gun for the express purpose of taking the life of a person, but after coming up with such person made no demonstration toward the accomplishment of that purpose, he would not have been guilty of an assault with intent to kill." State v. Painter, 67 Mo. 84, 89.

There may be an assault without personal injury, since any unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability to commit a violent injury, is an assault, and this, although the assailant failed to commit the injury intended, owing to the interference of others or otherwise. State v. Smith (Del.) 33 Atl. 441, 9 Houst. 588.

Force.

An assault implies some unlawful physical force, partly or fully put in motion. Jambor v. State, 75 Wis. 664, 676, 44 N. W. 963, 967.

Though force and violence are included in all definitions of assault, or assault and battery, yet, where there is a physical injury to another person, it is sufficient that the cause is set in motion by the defendant, or that the person is subjected to its operation by means of any act or control which the defendant exerts. If one should hand an explosive to another, and induce him to take it by misrepresenting its qualities, and the other in ignorance should receive it and cause it to explode, and be injured, the offending party would be guilty of a battery, that would necessarily include an assault. Commonwealth v. Stratton, 114 Mass. 303, 305, 20 Am. Rep. 350.

Gestures or menace.

An assault is an attempt unlawfully to apply any actual force to the person of another, directly or indirectly; the act of using gestures toward another, giving him reasonable ground to believe that the person using the gestures meant to apply actual force to his person. Malland v. Malland, 86 N. W. 445, 83 Minn. 453; Morgan v. O'Daniel (Ky.) 53 S. W. 1040.

"An assault is an attempt or offer to do another personal violence, without actually accomplishing it. A menace is not an assault; neither is a conditional offer of violence. There must be a present intention to strike. To constitute an assault, it is not necessary that the defendant actually strike at the person on whom the assault is charged to have been committed. Raising a stick with intention to strike, so near to the party assailed as to endanger his person, and forcing him, under a well-grounded apprehension of personal injury, to strike in self-defense or to save himself by flight, is an assault." Johnson v. State, 35 Ala. 363, 305.

"In order to constitute an assault, there must be something more than a mere menace. There must be violence begun to be executed. But where there is a clear intent to commit violence, accompanied by acts which, if not interrupted, will be followed by personal injury, the violence is commenced, and the assault is complete." People v. Yslas, 27 Cal. 630, 633.

"Any gesture or violence, exhibiting an intention to assault, is an assault, unless immediate contact is impossible." Bishop v. Ranney, 7 Atl. 820, 821, 59 Vt. 316.

"A menace is not an assault; neither is a conditional offer of violence. There must be a present intention to strike." Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1, 18, 31 Am. Rep. 1.

An assault is an attempt to commit a battery, or any threatening gesture showing in itself, or by words accompanying it, an immediate intention, coupled with an ability, to commit a battery; and, in order to constitute an assault, the intention and ability to inflict an injury must concur. Spears v. State, 2 Tex. App. 244, 245.

A motion of the hand to strike a person, even though the motion or movement falls short of actual contact, constitutes an assault. Norris v. Whyte, 57 S. W. 1037, 1040, 158 Mo. 20.

Direction against the person unnecessary.

To constitute an assault, it is not necessary that the party assaulting should have an intention to hurt the person assaulted, or that he should lay his hands upon him; and hence, where one met another driving a team of horses, and seized the lines in front of such person and prevented them being driven by plaintiff, so that another person could take them by the heads and turn them around, the person so seizing the lines was guilty of an assault, for the force which he applied to the horses and sleigh just as effectually touched the person of the driver as if he had taken him by his ears or shoulders and turned him right about face. The horses and sleigh were the instruments with which he directed and augmented his personal and physical force against and upon the body of the driver. The driver received bodily harm, for one receives bodily harm in a legal sense when one touches his person against his will with physical force intentionally hostile and aggressive, or projects such force against his person. For the moment the driver was deprived by the defendant of his own control of his own person and was controlled, intimidated, and coerced by the hostile, aggressive, physical force of the defendant. People v. Moore, 3 N. Y. Supp. 159, 160, 50 Hun, 356.

An "assault" is an attempt, or the unequivocal appearance of an attempt, with force or violence, to do a corporal injury, and may consist of any act which shall convey to the mind of the person set upon a well-grounded apprehension of personal violence. Thus, where defendant went to plaintiff's home, where she was alone with her children, and told her to move out, as he intended to burn the house, and plaintiff found that defendant had poured kerosene oil on the house and was striking a match as about to set fire thereto, and he pointed a pistol at her, and said that, if she did not go back in the house, he would shoot her and the children, he was guilty of an assault. Kline v. Kline, 64 N. E. 9, 158 Ind. 602, 58 L. R. A. 397.

An "assault" is defined to be an attempt with force or violence to do a corporal injury to another; and the kicking and striking of a person's horse with a board several times, while holding it while such person was sitting in the wagon, would be an assault upon such person, for it would probably result in a corporal injury to him. Clark v. Downing, 55 Vt. 259, 262, 45 Am. Rep. 612.

Intent.

"An assault is an intentional attempt by force or violence to injure the person of another." Cluff v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 308, 317; State v. Foreman (Del.) 41 Atl. 140, 1 Marv. 517; Garnet v. State, 1 Tex. App. 605, 607, 28 Am. Rep. 425; State v. Godfrey, 20 Pac. 625, 627, 17 Or. 300, 11 Am. St. Rep. 830; Stewart v. Hunter, 16 Pac. 876, 880, 16 Or. 62, 8 Am. St. Rep. 267.

An assault necessarily imports an intent to do personal violence to another. Murdock v. State, 65 Ala. 520, 522; People v. McMakin, 8 Cal. 547, 548.

It may consist of any act tending to such corporal injury, accompanied with such circumstances as denote, at the time, an intention, coupled with a present ability, of using actual violence against the person. Hays v. People (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 351. An assault is defined to be an attempt with force or violence to do a corporal injury to another, and may consist of any act tending to such corporal injury, accompanied with such circumstances as denoted at the time an intention, coupled with a present ability, of using actual violence against the person. Degenhardt v. Heller, 68 N. W. 411, 412, 93 Wis. 662, 57 Am. St. Rep. 945; Tarver v. State, 43 Ala. 354, 366.

An "assault" is an intent by violence to do an injury to the person of another. It must be intentional, for if it can be collected, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, that there is not a present purpose to do an injury, there is no "assault." State v. Davis, 23 N. C. 125, 127, 35 Am. Dec. 735; Smith v. State, 39 Miss. 521, 525.

An intent to do violence is an essential ingredient to the offense, but the degree of violence, of course, is immaterial. The least or slightest wrongful and unlawful touching of the person of another is an assault. Malland v. Malland, 86 N. W. 445, 83 Minn. 453.

"Most of our decisions recognize the view of the text-books that there can be no criminal assault without present intention, as well as present ability of using some violence against the person. 1 Russ. Crimes (9th Ed.) 1019; State v. Blackwell, 9 Ala. 79; Tarver v. State, 43 Ala. 354. In Lawson v. State, 30 Ala. 14, it was said that to constitute an assault there must be the commencement of an action which, if not prevented, would produce battery." Chapman v. State, 78 Ala. 463, 465, 56 Am. Rep. 42.

An assault is an inchoate violence to the person of another, with the present means of carrying the intent into effect. The essence of an assault is the intention to do harm. Perkins v. Stein, 22 S. W. 649, 650, 94 Ky. 433, 20 L. R. A. 861.

An assault is an intentional attempt by violence to do injury to another. If there is no such intention, no present purpose to do such injury, there is no assault. Thus, where a verdict finds that, in an action for assault, the defendant did not aim or present the revolver at plaintiff, as charged, when discharged or immediately thereafter, and discharged the same with the intention of frightening the plaintiff, but without intending to do him any bodily harm, the verdict acquits him of assault. Degenhardt v. Heller, 68 N. W. 411, 412, 93 Wis. 662, 57 Am. St. Rep. 945.

Where defendant raised his hand against prosecutor within striking distance, and at the same time said that, if it was not for prosecutor's advanced age, he would strike him, etc., there was no "assault," because the words explained the action and took away the idea of his intention to strike. Commonwealth v. Eyre (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 347.

Lying in wait.

We are aware that it is said in some of the books that lying in wait or besetting a man's house is an assault, but this must be understood where the lying in wait or besetting a man's house is done with intention to beat him or to do some other violence to his person, and so we find the law to be laid down in 2 Com. Dig. 130. This is, indeed, implied in the very nature of the offense, for an "assault" is defined to be an attempt, with force or violence, to do a corporal injury to another. Metcalf v. Conner, 16 Ky. (Litt. Sel. Cas.) 370, 372.

Present ability to commit.

An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability to commit a violent injury on the person of another. State v. McCune, 51 Pac. 818, 819, 16 Utah, 170; State v. Mills (Del.) 52 Atl. 268, 267, 3 Pennell, 508; State v. Di Guglielmo (Del.) 55 Atl. 350; United States v. Barnaby (U. S.) 51 Fed. 20; Harrison v. Ely, 11 N. E. 334, 120 Ill. 83; Stevens v. People, 158 Ill. 111, 117, 41 N. E. 856; Hunt v. People, 53 Ill. App. 111, 112; Bloomer v. State, 35 Tenn. (3 Sneed) 66, 68; People v. Helbing, 61 Cal. 620, 621; People v. Stanton, 39 Pac. 525, 526, 106 Cal. 139; Maxey v. State, 52 S. W. 2, 4, 66 Ark. 523; Pratt v. State, 49 Ark. 179, 181, 4 S. W. 785; State v. Sullivan, 24 Pac. 23, 24, 9 Mont. 490; Bryant v. State, 51 Pac. 879, 881, 7 Wyo. 311; Chander v. State, 39 N. E. 444, 446, 141 Ind. 106; Woodworth v. State, 43 N. E. 933, 145 Ind. 276; State v. Trulock, 46 Ind. 289, 290; Greathouse v. Croan (Ind. T.) 76 S. W. 273, 276; People v. Ryan, 27 N. Y. St. Rep. 916, 918, 8 N. Y. Supp. 241 (citing Hays v. People, 1 Hill, 351); State v. Warren, 5

Pac. 134, 136, 18 Nev. 459; Bodeman v. State (Tex.) 40 S. W. 981, 982; Donnelley v. Territory (Ariz.) 52 Pac. 368, 370.

The term "assault" has a legal meaning, and has been defined to be an inchoate violence to the person of another, with the present means of carrying the intention into effect, or an unlawful setting on one's person, or an unlawful effort or attempt, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another. Stivers v. Baker, 9 S. W. 491, 492, 87 Ky. 508; People v. Lilley, 5 N. W. 982, 985, 43 Mich. 521; Bishop v. Ranney, 7 Atl. 820, 821, 59 Vt. 316; Perkins v. Stein, 22 S. W. 649, 650, 94 Ky. 433, 20 L. R. A. 861.

An assault is an attempt to do violence to the person of another with the means at hand to carry that intention into effect. State v. Burton (Del.) 47 Atl. 617, 619, 2 Pennewill, 472, 499; State v. Lewis (Del.) 55 Atl. 3, 4; State v. Lockwood (Del.) 1 Pennewill, 76, 39 Atl. 589.

An "assault" is defined to be an inchoate violence to the person of another, with the means of carrying the intent into effect. State v. Smith, 80 Mo. 516, 518.

An assault consists of an offer to do bodily harm by a person who is in a position to inflict it. State v. Hunt (R. I.) 54 Atl. 773.

An assault is the attempt of a person in a rude and revengeful manner to do an injury to another person, coupled with the present ability to do it. Hendle v. Geller (Del.) 50 Atl. 632.

An assault is an attempt in a rude, insolent, and angry manner unlawfully to touch, strike, beat, or wound any other person, coupled with present ability to carry such attempt into execution. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 7055. And hence the word "assault," as used in an information charging that the defendant an assault did make in and upon the person of another, is sufficient to charge defendant's present ability to carry his attempt into execution, the word "assault" including all the elements of the statutory definition. State v. Levan, 63 Pac. 202, 203, 23 Wash. 547.

Assault is not only the felonious striking of another with intent to injure, but any attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do some bodily hurt to another, whether from wantonness or malice, by some means calculated to produce the end if carried into execution, as by striking at him with a stick or other weapon, or without a weapon, although the person assaulted be not struck, or even by raising up the arm or a cane in a menacing manner, or any similar act, accompanied with circumstances denoting intention, coupled with a present ability of using actual violence against the person of another, constitutes an assault. Davis, Cr. Law, pp. 353, 354. Although there must be present ability to inflict an injury, yet if a man is advancing in a threatening attitude to strike another, so that the blow can almost immediately reach him if he were not stopped, it constitutes an assault. Berkeley v. Commonwealth, 14 S. E. 916, 88 Va. 1017 (citing Russ. on Crimes, 363).

Putting in fear of violence.

An assault is an unlawful attempt, by force or violence, to do an injury to the person of another, and may be proved by evidence of striking at another with or without a weapon or missile, and whether the aim be missed or not, or by evidence of striking, kicking, or pushing at another with the fists, feet, privy member, or any portion of the assailant's body, and the like, in a manner which conveys to the mind a well-grounded apprehension of personal violence; the person so assaulted being within probable reach of the assailant or of the weapon or missile. State v. Smith (Del.) 33 Atl. 441, 9 Houst. 588.

An instruction that an assault is an unlawful attempt to commit violence on the person of another, with the present ability to do so, is not erroneous in leaving out the words, "with full force and violence," since the element of violence is clearly indicated. State v. Cody, 62 N. W. 702, 703, 94 Iowa, 169.

The offense may consist also in putting another in fear of violence. State v. Baker, 38 Atl. 653, 654, 20 R. I. 275.

There need not be even a direct attempt at violence, but any indirect preparation towards it would be sufficient; hence one having another in his power, and within reach, threatening and exerting the means to accomplish meditated violence upon the person, is guilty of an assault. Hays v. People (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 351, 352.

Unlawful arrest.

An action for malicious prosecution, and not an action for assault and false imprisonment, is the proper remedy when an arrest is made by a duly qualified officer, under process fair on its face, and issued from a court of competent jurisdiction, the suit being based on a failure to enter the writ in court. Lisabelle v. Hubert, 50 Atl. 837, 23 R. I. 450.

Unlawful attempt.

An "assault," as ordinarily defined, is any unlawful attempt or offer, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, whether from malice or wantonness. State v. Baker, 38 Atl. 653, 654, 20 R. I. 275. An assault is an attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do injury to a person, either from malice or wantonness. Commonwealth v. Ruggles, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 588, 590 (citing 1 East, P. C. 406); Smith v. State, 39 Miss. 521, 525; Tarver v. State, 43 Ala. 354, 366.

ignominious corporal penalties, where they are connected with any intent to murder. Cornellison v. Commonwealth, 2 S. W. 235, 240, 84 Ky. 583.

"An assault is any unlawful physical force, partly or fully put in motion, creating a reasonable apprehension of immediate physical injury to a human being; as raising a cane to strike him, pointing in a threatening manner a loaded gun at him, and the like." Stewart v. Hunter, 16 Pac. 876, 880, 16 Or. 62, 8 Am. St. Rep. 267. It is any unlawful physical force, partly put in motion, and creating a reasonable apprehension of an immediate physical injury. State v. Aleck, 5 South. 639, 41 La. Ann. 83; State v. Gorham, 55 N. H. 152, 168; State v. Baker, 38 Atl. 653, 654, 20 R. I. 275.

An "assault" is defined as an unlawful offer or attempt, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another. Tomlin v. Hildreth, 47 Atl. 649, 651, 65 N. J. Law, 438.

"To constitute an assault, there must be an attempt to inflict violence upon the person, or the accused must make a threatening gesture, showing in itself, or by words accompanying it, an immediate intention, coupled with the ability, to inflict unlawful violence upon the person." An instruction, in a prosecution for an assault with intent to commit murder, that if defendant cut prosecutor with a knife it was an assault, is erroneous, in not stating that the violence must have been unlawful. Ponton v. State, 34 S. W. 950, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 597.

An assault may be entirely lawful, as either excusable or justifiable, and it involves, as defined in Tomlins' Law Dictionary, every "attempt or offer, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another"; and hence an instruction defining an assault as an attempt "with unlawful force to inflict bodily injury" was erroneous. Drew v. Comstock, 23 N. W. 721, 723, 57 Mich. 176.

Use of dangerous weapons.

The use of any dangerous weapon, or the semblance thereof, in an angry or threatening manner, with intent to alarm another, and under circumstances calculated to effect that object, constitutes an assault. Hunt v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 858, 859.

An assault is an unlawful attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do bodily injury to another. An assault may be completed without touching the person of the one assaulted, as by lifting a cane, clinching the fists, or pointing a gun at him; but words alone, however abusive, cannot amount to an assault. Where a person stands near another with a rifle in his hands, and pointed down, with his hand on the lock, and, a part of the time at least, the gun cocked, and which could be raised in a position to shoot quick as a flash of lightning, constitutes nothing short of a malicious assault. State v. Hatfield, 37 S. E. 626, 631, 48 W. Va. 561.

An assault is an intentional attempt by violence to do an injury to the person of another. State v. Davis, 23 N. C. 125, 35 Am. Dec. 735. It is an attempt unlawfully to apply any—the least—actual force to the person of another, directly or indirectly. Where defendants, one with a pistol in his hand, one with a drawn sword, one with a pistol in his pocket, went to the door of the prosecutor's house, where he was sitting, with the admitted purpose of compelling him to accompany them, and ordered him to go with them, they were guilty of assault, though they were prevented from actually doing violence to his person by the interference of others. State v. Reavis, 18 S. E. 338, 113 N. C. 677.

"To constitute an assault, it is not necessary that serious bodily injury be inflicted upon the person assaulted. The drawing of a gun or a pistol on another with intent to use it is an assault." United States v. Reeves (U. S.) 38 Fed. 404, 409.

An "assault" is defined as follows: Whoever, having present ability to do so, unlawfully attempts to commit a violent injury on the person of another, is guilty of assault. Thus where the prosecuting witness, on coming out of her house at night, was confronted by a man who pointed a gun at her, which was afterwards found on the ground loaded, and accused, to whom it was found to belong, was found in the house and ordered to retire, and upon being seen on the street attempted to escape, he was guilty of assault. Bryant v. State, 51 Pac. 879, 881, 7 Wyo. 311.

To constitute an assault with a gun or pistol, it is necessary that the weapon be presented at the party, charged to be assaulted, within a distance to which a gun or pistol may do execution. Tarver v. State, 43 Ala. 354, 356.

Pointing a gun at another person within shooting distance may constitute an assault. State v. Lightsey, 43 S. C. 114, 115, 20 S. E. 975.

The drawing of a pistol on another, accompanied with a threat to use it unless the other immediately leave the spot, is an assault, although the pistol is not pointed at the person threatened. People v. McMakin, 8 Cal. 547, 548.

Flourishing a cocked pistol in an angry manner, and pointing it at a person, constitutes an assault, although the person flourishing the pistol may have no special ill will against the person at whom it is pointed. Justice v. Phillips, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 439.

What of consent imported.

"Assault," as used in Pen. Code, § 240, defining an "assault" as an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another, means an attempt to commit a violent injury without the consent of the party assaulted. People v. Gordon, 11 Pac. 762, 70 Cal. 467.

An assault implies force upon one side and repulsion, or at least want of consent, upon the other. An assault upon a consenting party would therefore be a legal absurdity. Wait, Act. & Def. p. 334, § 11. "Consent is generally a full and perfect shield when that is complained of as a civil injury which was consented to." Cooley on Torts. Harm suffered by consent is not in general a basis of a civil action. If the defendant is guilty of no wrong against the plaintiff, except a wrong invited and procured by the plaintiff for the purpose of making it the foundation of an action, it would be most unjust that the procurer of the wrongful act should be permitted to profit by it. Courtney v. Clinton, 48 N. E. 799, 801, 18 Ind. App. 620 (citing 1 Jagg. Torts). It must be without the consent of the person assaulted, or with consent if it be obtained by fraud. It is not necessary that there be an intention to strike, it being sufficient that gestures are used giving reasonable grounds of belief that force will be applied. Morgan v. O'Daniel (Ky.) 53 S. W. 1040.

An "assault" is defined as an attempt unlawfully to apply any—the least—actual force to the person of another, directly or indirectly, without the consent of the person assaulted, or with such consent if it is obtained by fraud. Liebscher v. State (Neb.) 95 N. W. 870, 871.

Words or threats.

It is not every threat, when there is no actual personal violence, that constitutes an assault. There must in all cases be the means of carrying the threat into effect. Ford v. Schllessman, 83 N. W. 761, 763, 107 Wis. 479 (citing Stephens v. Myers, 4 Car. & P. 348).

Mere threats are not sufficient, but there must be violence actually offered within such a distance of the person menaced that harm might ensue if the one committing the assault were not prevented. People v. Lilley, 5 N. W. 982, 985, 43 Mich. 521 (citing 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 59, 82, 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 419).

Mere words cannot constitute an assault. Prince v. Ridge, 66 N. Y. Supp. 454, 32 Misc. Rep. 666.

"Words alone cannot constitute an assault. They may endanger the public peace, but do not break it. There is no assault unless there be some act amounting to an attempt or offer to commit personal violence, and hence where one, being within striking distance, raises a weapon for the purpose of striking another, at the same time declaring that if such other will perform a certain act he will not strike him, and such other performed the required act, in consequence of which no blow was given, there is an assault." State v. Morgan, 25 N. C. 186, 188, 38 Am. Dec. 714.

An assault includes threatening words, accompanied by advances in a threatening attitude; but mere words do not amount to an assault, and, though they may mitigate, they do not justify, an assault. Keyes v. Devlin (N. Y.) 3 E. D. Smith, 518, 523.

The gist of the offense of assault is the intent with which the injury is inflicted or attempted, and while not every threat when there is no actual violence, constitutes an assault unless the threat is carried into effect, yet if the accused approaches within striking distance, and has the ability to strike and commit injury, and intends so to do, such conduct will constitute an assault, though no actual injury occurred. State v. Malcolm, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 413, 415.

It is said that a mere purpose to commit violence, however plainly declared, if not accompanied by an effort to carry it into immediate execution, falls short of an actual assault. Hence no words can amount to an assault. Smith v. State, 39 Miss. 521, 525.

Every laying on of hands upon the person of another, and every blow or push, constitutes an assault, in respect of which an action for damages is maintainable. Every attempt, also, to offer with force and violence to do hurt to another, constitutes an assault, such as striking at a person with or without a weapon, or advancing with the hand uplifted in a threatening manner with intent to strike, although the person is stopped before he gets near enough to carry the intent into effect. But as regards threatening gestures, if the parties, at the time the gestures are used, are so far distant from each other that immediate contact is impossible, there is no assault. A mere threat, unaccompanied by an offer or threat to strike, is not an assault. The mere touching of a person, without threats or violence, is not an assault unless it is done in a hostile or insulting manner. Clayton v. Keeler, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1051, 1053, 18 Misc. Rep. 488.

ASSAULT IN THE FIRST DEGREE.

An assault in the first degree is when a person, with intent to kill or commit a felony on the person or property of another, assaults him with a deadly weapon, or by other means or force likely to produce death. Pen. Code, § 217. People v. Rockhill, 10 N. Y. Cr. R. 584, 586, 26 N. Y. Supp. 222; People v. Terrell, 11 N. Y. Supp. 364, 365, 58 Hun, 602; People v. Dartmore, 48 Hun, 321, 322, 2 N. Y. Supp. 310.

ASSAULT IN THE SECOND DEGREE.

A person who willfully or wrongfully wounds another with or without a weapon, or willfully or wrongfully assaults by the use of anything likely to produce bodily harm, under circumstances not amounting to assault with intent to kill, shall be guilty of assault in the second degree. Pen. Code, § 218. People v. Cole, 2 N. Y. Cr. R. 108, 112; People v. Terrell, 11 N. Y. Supp. 364, 365; People v. Connor, 6 N. Y. Supp. 220, 53 Hun, 352; People v. Terrell, 11 N. Y. Supp. 364, 365, 58 Hun, 602; People v. McKenzie, 6 App. Div. 199, 200, 39 N. Y. Supp. 951, 952; People v. Dartmore, 48 Hun, 321, 322, 2 N. Y. Supp. 310; People v. Hannigan, 58 N. Y. Supp. 703, 704, 42 App. Div. 617.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

An assault and battery is the use of any unlawful violence upon the person of another with intent to injure him, whatever the object, means, or degree of violence used. Garnet v. State, 1 Tex. App. 605, 607, 28 Am. Rep. 425; Foster v. State, 8 S. W. 664, 665, 25 Tex. App. 543.

Assault and battery "is a violent attempt, coupled with a present ability, to do a bodily injury, resulting in a battery." Harrison v. Ely, 11 N. E. 334, 120 Ill. 83.

An assault and battery is a successful attempt to commit violence on the person of another. Razor v. Kinsey, 55 Ill. App. 605, 614.

An assault and battery is an unlawful beating, or other wrongful physical violence or constraint, inflicted on a human being without his consent. Tomlin v. Hildreth, 47 Atl. 649, 651, 65 N. J. Law, 438.

"To constitute an assault and battery, unlawful violence must be inflicted upon the person charged to have been assaulted; not merely violence, but it must be unlawful violence." Ponton v. State, 34 S. W. 950, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 597.

Rev. St. 1894, § 1983, provides that whoever, in a rude, insolent, or angry manner, unlawfully touches another, is guilty of assault and battery. Chandler v. State, 39 N. E. 444-446, 141 Ind. 106.

An assault and battery is the beating of another person, and a person is a human being, and includes a slave. Commonwealth v. Lee, 60 Ky. (3 Metc.) 229, 230.

An "assault and battery" may be defined to be any touching of the person of an individual in a rude or angry manner, without justification. To be an assault and battery, it is not necessary that the person who sustains it should be a citizen of the government. All natural persons who by law are entitled to protection may be the subject of assault and battery. Slaves are chattels, and their right to protection belongs to the master. Free negroes without any of the political rights which belong to a citizen are still regarded by the law as possessing both natural and civil rights, and an indictment will lie for an assault and battery committed on a free negro. State v. Harden (S. C.) 2 Speers, 152, 153, note.

Crimes Act, § 43, imposes a penalty for assault and battery and beating another. Held that, where an indictment alleged that the accused committed an "assault and battery" on the person of M., the allegation was sufficient, inasmuch as "assault and battery" convey the same meaning as "assault and beat." State v. Beverlin, 2 Pac. 630, 631, 30 Kan. 611.

"Assault and battery," when used in an indictment or information, mean a simple battery where the necessary acts and facts constituting a more serious assault are not set forth. Key v. State, 12 Tex. App. 506, 513.

St. 3 and 4 Wm. IV, c. 42, § 21, enact that it shall be lawful for defendant in all personal actions, except actions for assault and battery, false imprisonment, libel, slander, malicious prosecution, or criminal conversation, by leave of any court where such action is pending, to pay into court a sum of money by way of compensation, in such a manner as the judge may direct. Held, that "actions for assault and battery," as used in the statute, meant assaults committed on the persons of the plaintiff and his wife, and hence battery of a son or servant was not included. Newton v. Holford, 6 Q. B. 921, 925.

That which would be an assault and battery in a drawingroom or in the streets of a city cannot be so considered among the rough inmates of a ship at sea. If striking at a man without touching him or holding up the fist at him, or any rude or angry touching of the person, would be considered an assault and battery on board ship, no vessel could arrive without a plentiful crop of actions equally injurious to both parties. Generally speaking, a seaman should recover damages for an assault and battery from an officer of a ship: First, where personal violence was inflicted on him, although not excessively, but wantonly and without any provocation or cause; second, where there was provocation or cause given by the seaman, but the punishment was cruel and excessive, having no reasonable proportion to the provocation or fault for which it was inflicted; third, the employment of a deadly or dangerous weapon; the instrument used should be that which is ordinarily used for such occasions. Forbes v. Parsons (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 417, 419.

Intent.

Assault and battery is where one intentionally inflicts unlawful violence on another. The Lord Derby (U. S.) 17 Fed. 265, 266.

To constitute an assault and battery, unlawful violence must be used on the person of another, and such violence must be used with the intent to injure the person on whom it is inflicted, and if the violence is unaccompanied by such intent it does not constitute the offense. Ware v. State, 7 S. W. 240, 241, 24 Tex. App. 521 (citing Willson, Tex. Cr. Laws, §§ 809, 811).

Assault and battery is the use of any unlawful violence on the person of another. It is not necessary, to constitute an assault and battery, that there be a specific intention of striking or otherwise injuring the person injured, but if one of two persons, fighting, unintentionally strikes a third, the person so striking is liable in an action by the third person for an assault and battery. James v. Campbell, 5 Car. & P. 372.

An assault and battery is an unlawful attempt or offer, with force or violence, to inflict a bodily hurt upon another, or the using of wrongful physical violence or constraint on such person, without his consent, with an intent to injure such person. The intent to injure must appear from the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, which does not appear from the mere pushing down of the assaulted person. If this was done in anger it would be ample evidence of the intent to injure, but the mere pushing down of one person by another does not make such person guilty of an assault, for it might have been an accident or in play; but intent to injure can be presumed from the fact of an actual injury to the person charged to have been assaulted by being pushed down, where an injury is caused by violence to the person. Rutherford v. State, 13 Tex. App. 92, 94.

An assault and battery is the use of any violence on the person of another with intent to injure. To constitute the offense, two acts must concur, one physical, the other mental; that is, there must be a physical act done by the assailant which takes effect on the person of the party assailed, and also an intention on the part of the assailant to inflict an injury; and, if the natural consequences of the act or violence is an injury, the law presumes that the injury was intended, unless it be shown that the intention was innocent and not culpable. Donaldson v. State, 10 Tex. App. 307, 312.

"An assault and battery is where one intentionally inflicts unlawful violence upon another." In Leane v. Bray, 3 East, 593, it is said: "Whenever one willfully or negligently puts in motion any force, the direct result of which is an injury, it constitutes an assault and battery. Being bitten by a dog is not an assault and battery, within the meaning of admiralty rule 16, requiring that proceedings in case of assault and battery shall be in personam only, and hence a pilot who is bitten by a dog" may maintain an action in rem against the vessel. The Lord Derby (U. S.) 17 Fed. 265, 266.

Negligence or defective appliance.

An unintentional case of injury occurring through negligence and without design, even when trespass would lie, is not an assault and battery within the meaning of Gen. St. c. 10, § 1, providing that a right of action for assault and battery shall cease or die with the person injuring or the person injured. Perkins v. Stein, 22 S. W. 649, 650, 94 Ky. 433, 20 L. R. A. 861.

"Assault and battery," in Code Civ. Proc. § 3228, subd. 3, providing that if the plaintiff in an action for assault and battery recovers less than $50 he shall have costs not to exceed the amount of his recovery, means an act vi et armis, and does not include an action by an employé for injuries sustained by reason of the defective appliance. Rieger v. Fahys Watch-Case Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 788, 789.

ASSAULT TO DO SERIOUS BODILY HARM.

Assault with intent to murder distinguished, see "Assault with Intent to Commit Murder."

ASSAULT TO HAVE IMPROPER CONNECTION.

Assault with intent to commit rape distinguished, see "Assault with Intent to Commit Rape."

ASSAULT TO MURDER.

The phrase "assault to murder," in a recognizance, is a sufficient designation of the offense of assault with intent to murder. Wills v. State, 4 Tex. App. 613, 615.

ASSAULT WITH DANGEROUS WEAPON.

To constitute an assault with a dangerous weapon, it is necessary that the weapon should be presented at the party intended to be assaulted within the distance at which it may do execution. Firing a pistol at another who is within shooting distance, or in the direction where he is standing, merely with intent to frighten him, is an assault with a dangerous weapon. State v. Baker, 38 Atl. 653, 654, 20 R. I. 275.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT MURDER.

The intent is an essential ingredient of a correct definition of "assault with intent to murder." Johnson v. State, 1 Tex. App. 609, 610.

To constitute an assault with intent to murder, the specific intent must exist, and it does not exist unless, if death had ensued, the consummated offense would have been murder. Smith v. State, 3 South. 551, 552, 83 Ala. 26.

"To constitute an assault with intent to murder, an assault and battery, or an assault, must be committed; that is, the violence inflicted or attempted to be inflicted must be unlawful, and to this must be added the specific intent to kill, and, in addition to this, the accused must be prompted by malice." Ponton v. State, 34 S. W. 950, 85 Tex. Cr. R. 597.

An assault becomes and is an "assault with intent to murder" when it is committed with a deadly weapon and with intent to kill the person assaulted, done unlawfully and intentionally and with malice aforethought, and under such circumstances that, had death resulted therefrom to the person assaulted, the killing would have been murder. Alvarez v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 1013, 1014.

The essential elements of the statutory offense of an assault with intent to murder, that which converts it into a felony, is the intent to take the life of the person assailed. Unless, if the attempt had been consummated, the offense would have been murder in the one or the other of its degrees, there can be no conviction of the felony. When there is evidence of the assault upon the particular person named in the indictment, the determination of the guilt or the innocence of the felony necessitated the inquiry whether, if death had ensued, the offense would have been murder. McCormick v. State, 15 South. 438, 439, 102 Ala. 156 (citing 1 Whart. Cr. Law [9th Ed.] § 641; Lawrence v. State, 84 Ala. 424, 5 South. 33; Meredith v. State, 60 Ala. 441).

To constitute the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, there must be an actual intent to kill, and that under such circumstances as would make the killing murder. People v. Ochotski, 73 N. W. 889, 891, 115 Mich. 601.

Assault with intent to murder includes the additional attempt with violence to do an injury to the person of another, with the added intent to commit murder. In order to support the verdict, the jury must find not only the assault, but that if the injured person had died from the effects of the wounds, the person would then have committed the crime of murder. State v. Foreman (Del.) 41 Atl. 140, 1 Marv. 517.

An assault with intent to murder may be committed by administering poison in coffee of the person against whom the attempt is made, for such an assault may be committed without the use of a weapon of any kind. Johnson v. State, 17 S. E. 974, 975, 92 Ga. 30.

Ability to commit.

"The authorities agree that to constitute this offense the ability to kill must concur with the intention to murder. Some authors insist that the personal ability to perform the deed must be commensurate with the intention, both being defeated by some special cause independent of the offender and the instruments or means attempted to be used." Mullen v. State, 45 Ala. 43, 45, 6 Am. Rep. 691.

"An assault to commit murder is an unlawful intent, coupled with a present ability, to kill a human being, with malice aforethought, and with an unlawful attempt to commit such crime." People v. Devine, 59 Cal. 630.

A definition of "assault to commit murder" as "the attempt to kill a person, coupled with the present ability to do so," is not a full definition of the crime. People v. Ye Park, 62 Cal. 204, 206.

Consummation necessary.

To constitute the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, there must coexist a consummated assault, as contradistinguished from a mere attempt, and a specific intent, to commit murder. State v. Feamster, 41 Pac. 52, 53, 12 Wash. 461.

Act 1829, c. 23, § 52, declares that whoever shall feloniously and with malice aforethought assault any person with intent to commit murder, etc., shall be punished. Held, that the term "assault" as there used meant an actual assault on the person, coupled with a felonious intent, and that a mere constructive assault, such as besetting the house of another, was not such an assault as was contemplated by the section. Evans v. State, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 394, 396; State v. Freels, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 228, 229.

Assault with intent to kill distinguished.

An assault with intent to murder is such an assault that, if death had been caused by it, the assailant would have been guilty of murder as made with an intent, the result of malice, and aforethought, and, so far as the motive gives character to the offense, an assault with intent to murder is a crime of deeper turpitude and deserving of more severe punishment than an assault with intent to kill. An assault with intent to murder includes intent to kill, and if the former is proved it merges the latter, and, if the former is not and the latter is proved, there may be a conviction of the lower offense. State v. Reed, 40 Vt. 603, 607.

Assault to do serious bodily harm distinguished.

In order to authorize a conviction for an assault with intent to murder, it must appear that at the time of the assault it was the intent of the accused to kill the injured party. Hence an instruction that where an assault is made by one person upon another with a deadly weapon, or such weapon as by its use as a weapon is calculated to produce death or serious bodily harm, and under such circumstances as, had death ensued to the person assaulted, would be murder, such assault would be an assault to murder, was erroneous, because omitting the indispensable element of a specific murderous intent. Courtney v. State, 13 Tex. App. 502, 505.

To justify a conviction for assault with intent to murder, it must be shown that it was the object and intent of the assault. An intent to inflict serious bodily injury, and the infliction of serious bodily injury without such intent, is not sufficient. Whilst it is true that, if an assault be committed with intent to inflict serious bodily injury from which death might likely ensue, the offense will be murder, still, where such was the intent, and death does not ensue, the assault cannot be said to be an assault with intent to murder. In other words, the intent to murder is the gist of the offense, and no intent short of that will sustain a conviction for assault with intent to murder. Harrell v. State, 13 Tex. App. 374, 377; Gillespie v. State, 13 Tex. App. 415.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT RAPE.

An assault with intent to rape on a woman is any attempt to have carnal knowledge of a woman without her consent by force, threats, or fraud. Or an assault with intent to rape is constituted by the use of any threatening gesture, showing in itself, or by words accompanying, an immediate intention, coupled with an ability, to have carnal knowledge of a woman, without her consent, by force, threats, or fraud. Jones v. State, 18 Tex. App. 485, 488.

In cases of assault with intent to commit rape, the intent with which the assault was made is of the essence of the offense, and in order to justify a conviction the jury must be satisfied, not only that the prisoner had the ability and intended to gratify his passions on the person of the woman assaulted, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance she might make. State v. McCune, 51 Pac. 818, 819, 16 Utah, 170; Shields v. State, 23 S. W. 893, 895, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 498; Dunn v. State, 79 N. W. 719, 721, 58 Neb. 807; Stevens v. People, 41 N. E. 856, 858, 158 Ill. 111.

To constitute the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, there must have been an intent to commit rape, and that intent must have been manifested by an assault for that purpose upon the person of the prosecutrix. Both of these ingredients are necessary to constitute the offense. An assault in such case may imply force upon one side and a want of assent upon the other. The jury must be satisfied that the accused did use force, and that against the will of the prosecutrix, in an attempt to have sexual intercourse with her. Garrison v. People, 6 Neb. 274, 282, 283.

If the defendant did in fact intend forcibly to know a female carnally and against her will, and the effort be made to accomplish his purpose, the mere desisting from further effort on account of resistance and inability to overcome the resistance, or from fear, does not relieve him from the guilt of an assault with intent to rape. Taylor v. State, 50 Ga. 79, 81.

Where one makes an assault upon a woman with intent to ravish her, he is guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape, though, when the woman resists, he changes his purpose and desists from the attempt. State v. Ellick, 52 N. C. 68, 70.

A verdict that the defendant is guilty of an "assault with attempt to commit rape" is tantamount to saying that he is guilty of an assault with "intent" to commit a rape. Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367, 369.

Rape necessarily includes an assault and battery. To sustain an indictment for assault with intent to commit a rape, it is not necessary to allege or prove a battery. But a battery may be one of the facts by which the offense is made out. It then constitutes a part, though not an essential part, of the offense. If not alleged, there is no variance; if alleged, there is no duplicity. Commonwealth v. Thompson, 116 Mass. 346, 348.

Laws 1868-69, c. 167, par. 2, provides that every person who is convicted of ravishing and carnally knowing any female over the age of 10 years by force and against her will, or of carnally knowing and abusing any female child under the age of 10 years, shall suffer death; and paragraph 3 provides that every person convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape shall be imprisoned, etc. Held, that under these provisions rape is the carnal knowledge of any woman above the age of 10 years against her will, and of a woman child under the age of 10 years with or against her will, and that therefore an assault with intent to carnally know and abuse a female child under the age of 10 years is an assault with an intent to commit rape. State v. Johnston, 76 N. C. 209, 211.

Pen. Code 1895, art. 633, defines "rape" as the carnal knowledge of a woman without her consent, obtained by force, threats, or fraud, or of a female under the age of 15 years, other than the wife of the person, with or without her consent, and with or without the use of force, threats, or fraud. Article 608 provides that, if any person shall assault a woman with intent to commit the offense of rape, he shall be punished, etc. Article 611 defines an "assault with intent to commit" a crime as the existence of facts which bring the offense within the definition of an "assault," coupled with the intent to commit such other offense. Article 587 defines an "assault" as an attempt to commit a battery, etc. Article 640 provides that if, on the trial of an indictment for rape, that offense, though not committed, was attempted by the use of any means spoken of in articles 634 to 636 (viz., force, threats, or fraud), but not such as to bring the offense within the definition of "assault with intent to commit rape," the jury may convict of an attempt to commit the offense. Held, that there could be no assault of a female consenting to sexual intercourse, though under 15 years of age, and therefore, rape not having been consummated, a defendant could not be convicted of an assault with intent to rape; nor, since there was no force, threats, or fraud used, was he guilty of an attempt to commit the offense as provided in article 640. Hardin v. State, 48 S. W. 803, 804, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 426.

An assault, it is said, implies force upon one side and resistance on the other, and it is a legal anomaly to charge the defendant with an assault with intent to commit rape upon a female child under 10 years of age, who in law has neither power to resist nor assent thereto. But under Rev. St. c. 164, § 41, providing, if any person shall assault any female with intent to commit the crime of rape, he shall be punished, etc., which section has direct reference to the two sections preceding it, and was designed to embrace assaults upon females, whether upon one of the age of 10 years or more, or upon one under 10 years of age, with intent to commit the substantive crime, an indictment alleging an assault with intent to carnally know and ravish, by force and against her will, a female child under 10 years of age, is good. Fizell v. State, 25 Wis. 364, 368.

Hill's Ann. Laws, § 1733, provides that any person over 16 years who shall carnally know any female under 16, or any person who shall forcibly ravish any female, shall be deemed guilty of rape. Section 1740 provides for the punishment of an assault with intent to rape, and the statutes were enacted at the same time. Held, that they will be interpreted in pari materia, and hence one may be guilty of an assault with intent to rape a female under 16 who consented. State v. Sargent, 49 Pac. 889, 890, 32 Or. 110.

Consent of person assaulted.

An assault with intent to commit rape is necessarily an assault with intent to carnally know and ravish by force and against the will of the prosecutrix, and the fact that the act is without the consent of the prosecutrix is a necessary ingredient of the offense; hence it is held that a charge that, for the purpose of prosecution for assault with intent to rape, it was immaterial whether the prosecutrix did actually consent or not, and that the evidence upon that point was only relevant in so far as it tended to show what the intention of the accused was, is erroneous. Hull v. State, 22 Wis. 580.

While it is true that if the liberties taken with a prosecutrix for rape, and the ensuing intercourse, were with her consent, there can be no conviction either of rape or of assault with intent to commit rape, yet an assault may be made by the prisoner with intent to commit rape which will justify a conviction for such crime, though it may not appear that at the time of the consummation of the prisoner's purpose there was such want of consent as to constitute the higher crime. State v. Cross, 12 Iowa, 66, 68, 79 Am. Dec. 519.

The common-law definition of "rape" is "the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will." The same definition is adopted by our statute. Under this definition an assault is a necessary ingredient of every rape or attempted rape. But it is not a necessary ingredient of the crime of carnally knowing a child under the age of 12 years, with or without her consent, defined in the statute, and also called "rape." Here are two crimes, differing essentially in their nature, though called by the same name. To one, force and resistance are essential ingredients, while to the other they are not essential; they may be present or absent without affecting the criminality of the fact of carnal knowledge. So, under an indictment charging rape upon a female under the age of 12 years, where the offense was not fully committed, the defendant may be convicted of an attempt to commit rape, though the child consented to all he did; but in such case he cannot be convicted of assault with intent to commit rape. There can be no assault upon a consenting female, although there may be what the statute designates "rape." State v. Pickett, 11 Nev. 255, 257-259, 21 Am. Rep. 754.

Assault to have improper connection distinguished.

There is a distinction between an "assault to commit a rape" and an "assault with an intent to have improper connection." Any such obscene or indecent familiarity with the person of a female against her will, when the latter is the extent of the purpose and intent of the aggressor, is an aggravated assault, and whatever may be the cause, or brutal, abusive character of the assault, if it appear from the evidence that it was not the object or intent of the aggressor to accomplish his desired purpose by force, against the will, and without consent, then the more aggravated offense has not been committed. Irving v. State, 9 Tex. App. 66, 69; Pefferling v. State, 40 Tex. 486, 493.

Attempt to commit rape distinguished.

See "Attempt to Commit Rape."

Rape distinguished.

By the common law "rape" is a crime, and "assault with intent to commit rape" is a crime. Each has a well-defined meaning, which has not been altered by statute. The latter crime is properly designated either as an "attempt to commit rape" or an "assault with intent to commit rape." Both names have received the sanction of this court, and each is a correct legal designation of the crime. The words "an assault with actual violence upon the body of a female, with intent to commit rape," found in Gen. St. § 1407, mean the same as "an attempt to commit rape," which legally designate a common-law crime. Rookey v. State, 38 Atl. 911, 912, 70 Conn. 104.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL.

Assault with intent to murder distinguished, see "Assault with Intent to Commit Murder."

"Assault with intent to kill," as used in Hill's Code, § 1740, providing that if any person shall assault another with the intent to kill he shall be punished, etc., implies an unlawful and felonious attempt to take the life of another, and in general the verb "to kill" in such a connection requires only intent to do what would constitute, if done, either murder or manslaughter. State v. Lynch, 26 Pac. 219, 20 Or. 389.

An instruction that, to constitute the offense of assault with intent to kill, the jury must find and believe that defendant, intending to kill the prosecuting witness, assaulted her with a deadly weapon, and that the assault was made with the intent upon the part of defendant, on purpose and with malice aforethought, to kill said witness, is not wrong because not stating that the cutting was done feloniously. State v. Miller, 6 S. W. 57, 60, 93 Mo. 263.

"An assault with intent to kill is such an assault as that, had death ensued, the crime would have been manslaughter, and the intent is the result of sudden passion or emotion, without time for deliberation or reflection." State v. Reed, 40 Vt. 603, 607.

As felony.

See "Felony."

As infamous crime.

See "Infamous Crime."

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO ROB.

Pen. Code, § 99, defines "assault with intent to rob" as where any person shall with any fixed weapon unlawfully and maliciously assault another, or by menaces, or in any forcible manner, demand money, goods, or chattels, with intent to commit robbery. Erwin v. State, 43 S. E. 719, 117 Ga. 296.

The expression "an assault with intent to rob" necessarily comprehends and embraces all that is meant by "an assault with intent to commit the offense of robbery," and therefore might be used interchangeably in instructions; "rob" and "robbery" being synonymous in meaning. Robinson v. State, 11 Tex. App. 309, 313.

ASSEMBLE.

The word "assembled" in the bankruptcy act, providing that a resolution must be adopted by a certain proportion of the creditors assembled, includes every creditor who appears at any session of the meeting and proves his debt, though at the time the vote is taken he is not present or represented by proxy. In re Richmond, 14 N. Y. Daily Reg. 869, 7 Cent. Law J. 435.

A school is not in session at the time of an interruption complained of where it has "assembled" together, there being a clear distinction between the assembling of the individual members of a collective body and their due organization as such. All the pupils of a school may have assembled in a schoolroom, ready to enter upon the duties of the day, their teacher may also be among them, and yet it may be that school is not in session. State v. Gager, 28 Conn. 232, 236.

Pen. Code, art. 180, prohibits the making of any noise which shall willfully disturb any congregation assembled for religious worship. Held, that the words "assembled for worship," as there used, did not limit the statute to a disturbance while services were actually being conducted, but that the congregation should be held to be "assembled" so long as any persons composing it remained on the premises after the services were concluded. Dawson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 59, 60.

"Assembled," as used in an indictment for disturbing the peace, stating that the disturbance occurred at a place where people "commonly assembled," is equivalent to the words "commonly resort" as used in the statute relating to such offenses. Hammond v. State (Tex.) 28 S. W. 204.

ASSEMBLY.

See "General Assembly"; "Public Assembly"; "Religious Assembly"; "Riotous Assembly"; "Tumultuous Assembly"; "Unlawful Assembly"; "Worshipping Assembly."

"Assembly," as used in St. 1849, c. 59, providing that for every person who shall willfully disturb any school or other "assembly" of people met for a lawful purpose, etc., is not confined to assemblies for school or educational purposes, but includes meetings assembled for the discussion of subjects of temperance, or political gatherings, or meetings for amusement, and all public meetings held for lawful purposes. Commonwealth v. Porter, 67 Mass. (1 Gray) 476, 477.

Code, § 3257, providing punishment for interrupting or disturbing an "assembly of people met for religious worship," includes an interruption made after the conclusion of the services and the dismissal of the congregation, but while a portion of the people still remain in the house, and but a reasonable time has elapsed for their dispersion, it not being necessary that the interruption or disturbance should be made during the progress of the religious services. Kinney v. State, 38 Ala. 224, 225. See, also, Dawson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 59, 60.

The words "assemblage engaged in religious worship," in a statute forbidding the disturbance of an assemblage engaged in religious worship, will not be limited in meaning to an assemblage which is actually engaged in worship at the time of the disturbance, but includes the time within which the congregation is coming together at the appointed place, and all times thereafter until there is a final dispersion. Lancaster v. State, 53 Ala. 398, 399, 25 Am. Rep. 625.

A religious congregation is a religious assembly within the act relating to the disturbance of public worship, though the congregation assembled had been dismissed and the church authorities were engaged in a trial of a member of the church for certain offenses. Hollingsworth v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 518, 519.

ASSEMBLY OF DELEGATES.

An "assembly of delegates," within the meaning of acts regulating caucuses and nominations for office, is an organized assemblage of delegates representing a political party or principle which cast 5 per cent. of the total number of votes cast for member of Congress at the last general election. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 498.

ASSEMBLY OF ELECTORS.

An "assembly of electors," within the meaning of an act relating to the nomination of candidates, is an organized body of not less than 100 electors of the state, or electoral division thereof for which the nomination is made. B. & C. Comp. Or. 1901, § 2791.

ASSENT.

See "Express Assent"; "Mutual Assent."

"Assent" is defined as to admit a thing is true; to express one's agreement, acquiesce, concurrence; to yield, agree, approve, accord; the act of the mind in admitting or agreeing to anything; concurrence with approval; consent. Norton v. Davis, 83 Tex. 32, 36, 18 S. W. 430 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Lexicographers define 'assent' as the act of the mind 'in agreeing to, or assenting to a thing; consent or agreement.'" Hawkins v. Carroll County Sup'rs, 50 Miss. 735, 759.

"Assent," as used in Act May 29, 1885 (P. L. 29), declaring that natural gas companies shall not enter on or lay down their pipes on any street of any borough or city without the "assent" of the council of such borough or city by ordinance duly approved, is used in its ordinary sense as consenting or agreeing to accept some proposition. Appeal of City of Pittsburgh, 7 Atl. 778, 781, 115 Pa. 4.

Where an act authorized the construction of a railroad, and required it to "assent" to certain provisions of the law, the term is one purely appropriate to contract. The assent of the company was essential to give the law binding and obligatory force. An act of incorporation is nothing more than an offer until consummated by acceptance, and in that case and for that purpose the word "assent" was manifestly used. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 12 Gill. & J. 399, 433, 38 Am. Dec. 319.

"Assent" means to approve, ratify, and confirm. It is the very language of contract. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (Md.) 4 Gill. & J. 1, 180.

A person does not "assent" to the offer of another party so as to constitute a contract unless the assent comprehends the whole of the proposition. It must be exactly equal to it in extent and terms, and must not qualify it by any new matter. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance of an offer on terms varying from those proposed, is not an "assent," but a rejection of the offer. Baker v. Johnson County, 37 Iowa, 186, 189.

To constitute an "assent," the proposition of one party must be met by an acceptance of the other, which corresponds with it, which cannot be the case when the proposition is misunderstood by the party to whom it is made. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Jackson, 24 Conn. 514, 517, 63 Am. Dec. 177.

"Assent," as used in a special issue submitted to a jury requiring them to find whether plaintiff assented to the sale of a steamer to a corporation at or before the sale and the filing of a lien, while not synonymous with the word "consent" as used in a requested finding, had practically the same meaning, and could not have been understood in that connection by the jury as meaning anything different than "consent." Kornegay v. Styron, 11 S. E. 153, 154, 105 N. C. 14.

To "assent" is to give one's approval to a thing, to agree thereto, to concur therein, to confirm the idea that the party does not wish to retract; and the words, used in a certificate of acknowledgment of a married woman, that she "assents" thereto, are equivalent to the statutory words that she "wishes not to retract the same." Norton v. Davis, 83 Tex. 32, 36, 18 S. W. 430.

Assent is evidenced by a proposition emanating from one side, and an acceptance of it on the other, the proposition and acceptance together constituting what is sometimes called a "meeting of minds." Fuller v. Kemp, 16 N. Y. Supp. 158, 160.

According to Crabb's English Synonyms, there may be a recognized and real difference between the words "assent," "consent," "permit," and "allow." He says: "As the act of an equal, we 'consent' to that in which we have a common interest with others; we 'permit' or 'allow' what is for the accommodation of others; we 'allow' by abstaining to oppose; we 'permit' by direct expression of our wills." Contracts are formed by the consent of the parties who are interested. "Assent" may be given to anything, whether positively proposed by another or not; but "consent" supposes that what is consented to is proposed by some other person. Cowen v. Paddock, 17 N. Y. Supp. 387, 388, 62 Hun, 622.

A man cannot be said to assent to a contract unless he is endowed with such degree of reason and judgment as will enable him to comprehend the subject of negotiation. Jacks v. Estee, 73 Pac. 247, 249, 139 Cal. 507.

Assent is evidenced by a proposition emanating from one side, and acceptance on the other, the proposition and acceptance together constituting what is sometimes called a "meeting of the minds." Assent may sometimes be inferred from conduct, but in the interpretation of the person's contractual intentions we comprehend conduct to include the aggregation of the acts of a person respecting the subject-matter of the alleged contract. It would be manifestly unfair to single out one of a series of acts which, standing alone, would be indicative of intention to assent, and to exclude from consideration all other acts which unequivocally point to refusal, and unmistakably qualify the former. Fuller v. Kemp, 16 N. Y. Supp. 158, 160.

Affirmative act implied.

The word "assent," as used in Const. 1865, art. 11, § 14, relating to the assent of the qualified voters before a municipal subscription can be made to the stock of the corporation, means an affirmative, positive act, and mere inaction of voters by failing to vote does not express their assent within the meaning of the section. State ex rel. Woodson v. Brassfield, 67 Mo. 331, 339.

Carried out not synonymous.

To "assent" to a thing is not synonymous with "to perform" it. Assent to a proposition creates, but does not carry out, a contract. Without assent there is no contract. To assent is not performance. Until assent there is no contract to perform. Hence "assent" is not synonymous with "carried out," as used in an agreement which was to be "carried out" within a certain time. Cartmel v. Newton, 79 Ind. 1, 5.

Consent distinguished.

Consent distinguished, see "Consent."

Knowledge implied.

"Assent" implies knowledge of some kind in the party assenting to that to which he assents. He cannot well be said to assent to or dissent from something of which he is supposed to be in ignorance, so that, where a creditor has no knowledge of the assignment for the benefit of creditors, his act in attempting to secure his own claim cannot be held to show assent or dissent to the assignment, so as to entitle him to or preclude him from sharing in the assignment. National Bank of Commerce v. Graham (Colo.) 66 Pac. 684, 686.

Assent is the act of the mind, that intelligent power in man by which he conceives, reasons, and judges, and of which it is a primary, invariable, and most familiar law that it cannot act with reference to external objects until, through the medium of its senses, it is impressed with or knows their existence. Hence, without such impression or knowledge, there can be no assent. Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, 257.

Assent is primarily an act of the understanding. It presupposes that the person to be affected has knowledge of his right, as such is its use in the rule that waiver implies assent. Hanscom v. Home Ins. Co., 38 Atl. 324, 326, 90 Me. 333.

Assent implies permission, so that, where a sheriff did not know that a prisoner had been absent from the jail until informed of it after his death, he will not be held to have assented to an escape. Cortis v. Dailey, 47 N. Y. Supp. 454, 456, 21 App. Div. 1.

Implied from knowledge.

The assent in writing of the husband to a mortgage by his wife, as required in Gen. St. c. 108, § 3, is given by the husband signing the mortgage note as guarantor, on the face of which was a memorandum that it was secured by mortgage on the land, for by signing the note described as secured by the mortgage delivered with it he recognized the existence of the mortgage. Cormerais v. Wesselhoeft, 114 Mass. 550, 552.

In Gen. St. 1878, c. 34, § 142, providing that, if any corporation organized under the authority of the act shall violate any of its provisions and thereby become insolvent, the directors ordering or "assenting" to such violation shall be jointly and severally liable for all such debts contracted after such violation, "assenting" should be construed to mean "failure to object to" transactions in violation of the statute. For executing accommodation papers and making loans, whereby the corporation became insolvent, and in which they acquiesced, something more than mere negligence would be necessary to amount to assent; that is, something amounting to willful, or at least intentional, violation of the legal duty, either ordering the act done, participating in doing it, or assenting to its being done, with knowledge that it was being or about to be done. Such assent need not be expressed. If a director knew that a violation of law was being or was about to be executed, and did not object when he had the liberty of doing so, this would amount to assent. Patterson v. Minnesota Mfg. Co., 42 N. W. 926, 927, 41 Minn. 84, 4 L. R. A. 745, 16 Am. St. Rep. 671.

As permit.

See "Permission—Permit."

As vote for.

In the Constitution of 1821, requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members elected to each branch of the Legislature to the passage of any bill creating, continuing, or altering any body politic or corporate, "assent" means that two-thirds of the members of each house shall agree to such measure by voting therefor. Hawkins v. Carroll County Sup'rs, 50 Miss. 735, 760.

Under a constitutional provision that a county, city, or town may not become a stockholder or lend its credit unless two-thirds of the qualified voters shall assent thereto, it is held that the word "assent" should be construed in its ordinary sense as meaning "agreeing" or "consenting to," and that this assent can be manifested in the election only by an affirmative action—by actually voting. Hawkins v. Carroll County Sup'rs, 50 Miss. 735, 755.

Const. art. 11, § 14, provides that the General Assembly shall not authorize any county, city, or town to become a stockholder in or to loan its credit to any company, association, or corporation unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, at a regular or special election held therein, shall "assent" thereto. Held, that "assent" should be construed to mean an affirmative, positive act by the voters, and not that if no one says "nay" all shall be taken as saying "yea"; that is, voters who do not vote at an election cannot be held to express an assent to the proposition voted on at such election. As defined by Webster, to "assent" is "to admit, yield, or concede, or to express an agreement of the mind to what is alleged or proposed." One staying away from the polls does not express an agreement of his mind to a proper vote upon, or simply manifest thereby an indifference on, the subject. State ex rel. Woodson v. Brassfield, 67 Mo. 331, 335.

ASSESS.

"The primary meaning of the term 'assess' is to apportion the amount of a tax to be paid or contributed, and from this meaning has arisen a secondary or derivative use of the word, signifying the valuation of property for the purpose of forming the basis upon which the tax is to be computed. The term is also used at times to include all the steps involved in imposing a tax upon property. In the Century Dictionary, and also in the Imperial Dictionary, its primary meaning is given to be: To set, fix, or charge a certain sum by way of tax, as to assess each individual in due proportion. Skeat in his Etymological Dictionary defines the word: To fix a rate of tax. He also says: 'Assess and assessment are coined words due to the use of the law Latin assessor, one whose duty it was to assess, i. e. to adjust and fix the amount of the public tax.' In Murray's Historical Dictionary of the English Language the word is defined: To settle, determine, or fix the amount of (taxation, fines, etc.), to be paid by a person or community, or by each member of a community. In Abbott's Law Dictionary the term is defined: To determine by rules of law a sum of money to be paid; to rate the proportional contribution due from another person to a fund; to fix the amount payable by a person, or each of several persons, in satisfaction of an established demand. In Anderson's Law Dictionary it is defined: To rate or fix the proportion which each person is to pay of a tax; to tax; to adjust the shares of a contribution by several persons towards a common object, according to the benefit received; to fix the value or the amount of a thing; to determine by rules of law a sum to be paid; to rate the proportional contribution due to a fund." Allen v. McKay, 52 Pac. 828, 831, 120 Cal. 332.

The word "assess" is used as meaning to impose a tax. People v. Priest, 169 N. Y. 432, 435, 62 N. E. 567, 568.

To "assess" a tax is to declare a tax to be payable. Valle v. Fargo, 1 Mo. App. 344, 347 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.).

The word "assess," in a tax law requiring the supervisor to assess, means to set, fix, or charge a certain sum to each taxpayer. Seymour v. Peters, 67 Mich. 415, 418, 35 N. W. 62, 65.

An alternative writ of mandamus seeking to compel the collection of a special municipal tax to pay a judgment is not objectionable for the use of the words "to assess, levy and cause to be collected a special tax," etc., though the municipal officers have nothing to do with the valuation of the property for taxing purposes and with the collection of taxes. The words "assess" and "levy" mean rather to lay a tax on the taxable property, as the same is already valued for ordinary taxing purposes, no matter whether such taxation tableau was made up by the state or city authority. United States v. Port of Mobile (U. S.) 12 Fed. 768, 770.

"Assessed," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 11, § 121, requiring notice to be given to the person in whose name lands are "assessed" for taxes in order to perfect a tax title, means the return of the assessment book by the assessor to the county auditor, properly filled out, showing lands assessed to the purported owner. The word "assessed" has several meanings, and there is a great difference between assessing the land and assessing the taxes. The lands are assessed at the time mentioned, while the taxes may not be assessed until the different equalization boards have acted on the property lists and values, and the taxes are actually apportioned and levied. Elde v. Clarke, 59 N. W. 484, 485, 57 Minn. 397.

As assessment.

The terms "assessment" and "assess" are not always used in the same sense. The accurate meaning of the word "assessment," doubtless is the determination of the liability of property to taxation, and its valuation for that purpose. But the term "assess" is also used as meaning to impose a tax. People v. Priest, 62 N. E. 567, 568, 169 N. Y. 432.

"Assessed," as used in Rev. St. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502], providing that nothing in the national banking act shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of personal property of the owner or holder of such shares in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which such association is located, subject to the restriction that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is "assessed" on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, refers to the entire process of assessment, which in the case of national bank shares includes both their valuation and the rate of percentage on such valuation. Boyer v. Boyer, 5 Sup. Ct. 706, 709, 113 U. S. 689, 28 L. Ed. 1089.

As fix value.

"Assess," as used in P. L. 193, imposing a tax on debts owing to corporations, and requiring such tax to be "assessed" on the value of the debts, means to determine the amount of the corporation loans liable to taxation at their nominal value. Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Commonwealth, 18 Atl. 410, 411, 129 Pa. 429.

"To assess property is simply to place a value upon it. To assess taxes is to fix or settle the amount to be levied or raised upon the property." Bridewell v. Morton, 46 Ark. 73, 78; Moss v. Hindes, 28 Vt. 279, 281.

As used in a verdict reciting that the jury does assess the damage at so much, "assess" means "to fix the amount of the damages or the value of the thing to be ascertained." Roddy v. McGetrick, 49 Ala. 159, 162.

The word "assessed," as used in the constitutional provision that no bonded debt incurred by any company or municipality shall exceed 8 per cent. of the taxable property therein, has and had at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a well-defined meaning when applied to taxable property, and the framers of that provision must be assumed to have used it in the same sense in which it was used in the various acts of the Legislature relating to the subject of taxation. It must be regarded as meaning the value placed upon property for the purpose of taxation by officials appointed for that purpose. The reference is to the past, and not to the future; to an assessment already made and completed and entered upon the records. The word "assessed" in the constitutional provision, being in the same tense, implies the same meaning. State v. Cornwell, 18 S. E. 184, 186, 40 S. C. 26; State v. Tolly, 16 S. E. 195, 196, 37 S. C. 551.

As levy.

In Const. § 181, providing that "the General Assembly may by general laws confer upon the authorities of any county, etc., respectively, the power to assess and collect taxes," the word "assess" means to levy a tax, and does not mean the valuation of property for taxation. South Covington & C. St. Ry. Co. v. Town of Bellevue, 49 S. W. 23, 25, 105 Ky. 283, 57 L. R. A. 50.

"Assessing and collecting," as used in a city ordinance providing for the assessing and collecting of taxes, is used in a general sense, so as to include the operation, called "levying" the tax. City of San Luis Obispo v. Pettit, 25 Pac. 694, 695, 87 Cal. 499.

"Assessed" is not synonymous with "levied," as used in a lease providing that the lessee should pay all taxes levied during the term of the lease. "To assess a tax is to declare a tax to be payable; to levy it is to raise or collect it. There is a wide difference between taxes assessed and taxes levied, and no tax can be levied until the assessor's return is made and acted upon by the county court, and the book placed in the hands of the collector." Bouvier says: "Assessment is the making out of a list of property, and fixing its valuation or appraisal. It is also applied to making out a list of persons, embracing their occupations, chiefly with the view of taxing such persons and their property." Jacob's Law Dictionary, under the title "levy," says, "The term is used in the law for to collect, or to exact, as to levy money," etc. Valle v. Fargo, 1 Mo. App. 344, 347.

The charter of a railroad required that it should pay a state tax, but "that no other tax or impost should be levied or assessed on the company." Held, that the word "assessed," as there used, meant levied or imposed, and that the word could not have the force of describing special levies for public improvement, but merely described the act of levying the tax or impost, and therefore the company was not exempted from assessments for local improvements by such provision. New Jersey Midland R. Co. v. Jersey City, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 97, 99.

As not applicable to license taxes.

"Assess" is defined as the setting, fixing, or charging a certain sum upon, by way of tax; as to assess each individual in due proportion (Cent. Dict.); to adjust or affix the proportion of a tax which a person, of several liable to it, has to pay; to distribute taxation in a proportion founded on the proportion of burden and profit; to place a valuation upon property for the purpose of apportioning a tax. Thus the use of the word "assess" in a constitution providing that the Legislative Assembly shall not levy taxes upon the inhabitants or property in any county, etc., for county, town, or municipal purposes, but may vest by law in the corporate authorities power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes, indicates that such provision relates only to taxation proper, and not to license taxes. State v. Camp Sing, 44 Pac. 516, 519, 18 Mont. 128, 32 L. R. A. 635, 56 Am. St. Rep. 551.

ASSESSABLE.

See "Nonassessable."

In a petition for the revenue of an assessment for taxation of property, containing a statement that the "assessable" valuation of the property was fixed by the commissioners, the use of the word "assessable" is not equivalent to the allegation that the real value of the property is such sum. In re Bronx Gas & Electric Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 875, 877, 27 Misc. Rep. 371.

ASSESSED AGAINST HIM.

The words "assessed against him," as used in an act relating to poll taxes, requiring every person to show, as a condition precedent to his right to vote, that he has paid the poll tax assessed against him for the year next preceding the election at which he wishes to vote, mean the poll tax due by the voter for the year next preceding the election in which the vote is to be cast, and to which he is made subject under the revenue laws of the state, whether the name of the voter appears on the books of his county trustee or not. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1225.

ASSESSMENT.

As calls on corporate stock.

"Assessment," as used in Const. art. 6, § 5, declaring that the superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases at law which involved the legality of any tax, impost, "assessment," toll, or municipal fine, does not include installments or calls which are made by private corporations on their stockholders in accordance with an agreement on their part to pay into the corporate treasury the amounts subscribed by them to the capital stock, though such installments are sometimes called assessments, but the term as used in the Constitution has reference to such as are authorized by those provisions of the Constitution which relate to revenue and taxation, and to such as may be made on the authority of a municipal or other public corporation for the purpose of meeting the costs and expenses of some public improvement, and the subjects named in the provision, namely, tax, impost, toll, and municipal fine, imply a charge imposed by public authority for some public purposes, and, under the rules by which the maxim noscitur a sociis is applied, it is clear that the assessment referred to is of a kindred nature. Arroyo Ditch & Water Co. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 28 Pac. 54, 55, 92 Cal. 47, 27 Am. St. Rep. 91.

"Assessments," as understood in contracts relating to the payment of subscriptions to corporations, means a rating or fixing by the board of directors which every subscriber is to pay of his subscription, when notified of it and when called on. Spangler v. Indiana & I. C. Ry. Co., 21 Ill. (11 Peck) 276, 278.

"Assessments," as used in the corporation statutes of Washington territory in reference to payments on corporation stock, is synonymous with the term "calls" on unpaid subscriptions as used in such statutes. Stewart v. Walla Walla Printing & Publishing Co., 20 Pac. 605, 606, 1 Wash. 521.

As charges or premiums in insurance.

"Assessment," as used in reference to payments due a beneficial association, means the payments to be made to the supreme conclave of the association, and not payments to the subordinate conclave, which latter payments are designated "dues." Warwick v. Supreme Conclave Knights of Damon, 32 S. E. 951, 955, 107 Ga. 115.

In construing the charter of a mutual fire insurance company which declared that no insurance should be considered as binding until the payment of a premium, and that in default of a payment of "assessments" the insurance should be suspended, and that the insured should have no claim for losses until his assessment was paid, the court said: "That 'assessments' and 'premium' are interchangeable words, and mean the same thing. They are the consideration for the contract. In stock companies an annual premium is required. In mutual companies the premiums consist of the assessments made from time to time to pay losses and expenses." Hill v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 88 N. W. 392, 394, 129 Mich. 141.

Costs of suit.

Comp. Laws, § 914, providing that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and also in all cases at law in which the title or right of possession to or possession of real estate or mining claims, or the legality of any "assessment tax, impost, toll or municipal fine" is involved cannot be construed to mean the cost of the proceedings had in justices' courts for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the amount and description of a debt alleged to be due from a garnishee defendant to the principal defendant, for a fine is a sum of money paid, or required to be paid, by way of penalty. It is a pecuniary punishment for doing something prohibited, or failing to do something commanded to be done, by law. In all legal proceedings there must be costs, and one party or both must pay them. The general requirement is that they shall fall upon the party in the wrong or in default, the party to pay the costs not as a punishment, but because of the party's fault. They are in no just sense a fine, tax, impost, or assessment, so as to give the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction. Wearne v. Haynes, 13 Nev. 103, 104.

Dues of benevolent association distinguished.

See "Dues."

As an incidental or temporary expense.

Where a trustee was directed to collect rents, and, after paying therefrom all taxes, "assessments," and expenses of every nature in respect to the trust, to pay over the remainder to testator's sister for life, and to distribute the trust estate among nieces at her death, such direction as to the payment of assessments related only to incidental and temporary expenses of the estate, and hence a life tenant was not required to bear the entire expense of a street extension assessment levied on improved trust property, but only such proportion as the value of the life estate bore to the value of the property. In this connection the court remarks that, though the word "assessment" is broad enough to include such assessments as those in question, we are nevertheless of the opinion that, as used in the provision of the will, it referred, not to assessments of a permanent character, such as result from the laying out of a street or the construction of sewers, but that it was merely an additional word employed by the testator to emphasize his intention to include all expenses which may be termed the "current expenses" of the trust estate. The word "assessment" being equivocal, its construction is to be determined by the context. The words with which it is associated are "taxes," "rates," "expenses for insurance and repairs," and "other expenses and outgoings," all of which are words relating to the usual expenses and outlays incident to the care and management of an estate, and which are of a temporary character. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Armington, 46 Atl. 403, 404, 21 R. I. 33.

ASSESSMENT (In Taxation).

See "Entire Assessment"; "Frontage Assessment"; "Last Assessment"; "Local Assessments"; "Special Assessment"; "Swamp Land Assessment."

"Assessments," as the term is used in the law relative to taxation, means the adjustment of the shares of the contribution by several toward a common beneficial object according to the benefit received. Adams, Meldrum & Anderson Co. v. City of Shelbyville, 57 N. E. 114, 122, 154 Ind. 467, 87 Am. St. Rep. 240; Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329, 333, 335.

The term "assessments," as used in Chicago City Charter 1851, c. 5, § 2, conferring on the city power to levy and collect taxes on real and personal estates when required, among other purposes, for the erection of a city hall or bridewell, provided the estimated cost may be apportioned and collected by a series of annual assessments, was not there used to signify the taxes, but rather the proceedings for raising them. Stephani v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 2 Ill. App. (2 Bradw.) 249, 252.

An assessment of taxes "is the act of fixing and determining the proportion of tax chargeable to the distinct items of property." Webb v. Bidwell, 15 Minn. 479, 483 (Gil. 394, 397).

As used in Const. art. 7, § 15, providing that the annual "assessments" made on land should be a special lien thereon, the word "assessments" means the sum which has been ascertained as the apportioned part of the tax to be charged against the particular piece of property, embracing more than simply the amount. It includes the procedure on the part of the officials by which the property is listed, valued, and, finally, the pro rata declared. State v. Farmer, 59 S. W. 541, 542, 94 Tex. 232.

"Assessment," as used in Const. art. 8, § 4, declaring that the Legislature shall provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages by general laws, and restrict their power of taxation, assessment etc., being "in juxtaposition to that of taxation," has "a specific meaning, and includes all the steps necessary to be taken in the legitimate exercise of the power." Hurford v. City of Omaha, 4 Neb. 336, 347.

The word "assessment," as used in the statute providing that every action to set aside a certificate or tax deed for any error or defect going to the validity of the assessment, shall be brought within a year after the tax sale, does not mean merely the valuation of the property for taxation, or the assessment of benefits as a basis for the apportioning the cost of the improvements; it includes the whole statutory mode of imposing the tax complained of. Levy v. Wilcox, 70 N. W. 1109, 1110, 96 Wis. 127.

The term "assessment," as used in Comp. St. c. 14, art. 1, § 69, subd. 15, authorizing cities or villages to borrow money to a certain amount of the assessed valuation of the taxable property according to the last preceding assessment therefor, does not mean merely the act of the local assessor, but the complete act of all the agencies employed in determining the amount and value of property available for taxation. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Village of Wilber, 88 N. W. 660, 662, 63 Neb. 624.

The word "assessment," as used in Const. art. 4, § 31, forbidding the enactment of special laws for the assessment or collection of taxes, is not used in the limited sense of valuing property for the purpose of apportioning taxes, but embraces all the proceedings for raising money by the exercise of the power of taxation, from the inception of the proceedings to its conclusion. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Forest County, 70 N. W. 77, 79, 95 Wis. 80. See, also, Weeks v. City of Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 242, 259.

"Assessment," as used in Sp. Acts 1872, incorporating the Orphanage of the Good Shepherd and the Church Home for Females, and exempting these institutions from assessment and taxation, means laying a tax, or determining the share of tax to be paid by each individual, and relates to special taxes or enforced contributions for construction of streets or other local improvements as well as to taxes for the support of the government, for the act of assessment must precede collection in each case. Kilgus v. Trustees of Orphanage of Good Shepherd, 22 S. W. 750, 751, 94 Ky. 439.

The action of a state board of equalization in directing the county auditor to add to the various assessments therein such an amount as will have the effect in the aggregate of making the entire assessment roll of the county correspond in value with the assessment rolls of other counties of the state is not an assessment. Davis v. Pacific Imp. Co., 70 Pac. 15, 18, 137 Cal. 245.

As relating to assessor's duties.

"Assessment," as used in Const. Ill. which limits the power of counties to contract indebtedness to 5 per cent. of the last assessment for state and county taxes, means the assessment made by the county assessors, and not that ascertained by the State Board of Equalization. People v. Hamill (Ill.) 17 N. E. 799, 801.

As used in Const. art. 4, § 20, prohibiting the Legislature from passing local or special laws upon certain subjects, among which is that for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, and township purposes, the term "assessment" has reference to the duties of a subordinate officer known under our laws as an "assessor," whose duty it is to ascertain the value of taxable property and determine the exact amount which each individual is liable for, and prohibits merely a local or special law respecting or regulating the manner or mode of assessing taxes; hence a law, local or special in its nature, directing the levy of the tax, and in no way regulating the manner in which the proportion of each person is to be ascertained—that is, assessed—is not unconstitutional. Gibson v. Mason, 5 Nev. 283, 304.

As used in Comp. St. c. 16, § 97, providing that there shall be summoned freeholders for the purpose of assessing damages for the right of way appropriated by railroads, and that either party may have the right to appeal from such assessment, the word "assessment" covers all the official acts of the commissioners or assessors. Gifford v. Republican Valley & K. R. Co., 20 Neb. 538, 541, 31 N. W. 11.

The assessment of land under the Oregon laws is made by entry in the appropriate column in the assessment roll of the name of the owner and a description of the property, with its valuation, which, in case of a lot or block situated in any city, village, or town, a plat of which is recorded, may consist of the number of such lot and block, with the name of the village or town in which the same is situated. Kelly v. Herrall (U. S.) 20 Fed. 364, 369.

Collection not included.

"Assessment," as used in Laws 1880, c. 309, § 3, providing that every action or proceeding to set aside any sale of land for the nonpayment of taxes, or to cancel any tax certificate, or to restrain the issuing of any tax certificate or tax deed for any error or defect going to the validity of the assessment and affecting the groundwork of such tax, shall be commenced within one year from the date of such tax sale, means the statutory method of imposing taxes upon property; that is, the assessing and levying the tax, and not its collection or enforcement. Prentice v. Ashland County, 14 N. W. 297, 298, 56 Wis. 345; Urquhart v. Wescott, 26 N. W. 552, 553, 65 Wis. 135. It has relation only to the statutory method of imposing taxes upon property, and hence a want of proper notice of sale for taxes is not an error or defect going to the validity of the assessment and affecting the groundwork of the tax, within the meaning of the statute. Urquhart v. Wescott, 26 N. W. 552, 553, 65 Wis. 135.

Entirety implied.

"Assessments," as used in Act April, 1871, providing that whenever any assessment is set aside the township committee may appoint new commissioners to make a new assessment, signifies an entirety, so that no new assessment can be made until the entire original assessment is set aside. Winkler v. Inhabitants of West Hoboken, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 406, 407.

As levy.

Distinguished from levy, see "Levy (of Taxes)."

The best lexicographers tell us that the terms "levy" and "assessment" in law mean the same thing. To assess a tax is not the exercise of the taxing power. It is only a ministerial act authorized by the Legislature, to whom the taxing power ordinarily and expressly belongs. Kinney v. Zimbleman, 36 Tex. 554, 582.

The term "assessment," as sometimes used, denotes the valuation of the property by the assessors for the purposes of taxation, and it is sometimes used to denote the levying of a tax upon persons or property, and as used in Const. art. 14, § 11, providing that all assessments shall be on property at its cash value, it refers to the valuation, and not to the levy of a tax. Williams v. City of Detroit, 2 Mich. 560, 565.

As listing and valuation.

An "assessment," strictly speaking, is an official estimate of the sums which are to constitute the basis of apportionment of the taxes between individuals subject to taxation within the district. As the word is more commonly used, an "assessment" consists in two processes, listing the person's property, etc., to be taxed, and of estimating the sums which are to be the guide in an apportionment of the tax between them. Southern Ry. Co. v. Kay, 39 S. E. 785, 786, 62 S. C. 28; State v. Cheraw & D. R. Co., 32 S. E. 691, 695, 54 S. C. 564; Lyman v. Howe, 42 S. W. 830, 64 Ark. 436; City of Chicago,

v. Fishburn, 59 N. E. 791, 793, 189 Ill. 367; People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539, 545, 25 L. Ed. 705. Such is its use in Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that property must be taxed in proportion to its value, and article 3, § 29, providing that taxes upon property shall be laid upon its actual value as the same shall be ascertained by an assessment made for the purpose of laying such tax, so that an assessment or valuation is an essential to the tax. State v. Cheraw & D. R. Co., 32 S. E. 691, 695, 54 S. C. 564. As used in the Constitution of South Carolina, providing that all taxes shall be levied on the same assessment which shall be made for state taxes, it means "valuation." Southern Ry. Co. v. Kay, 39 S. E. 785, 786, 62 S. C. 28. And is so used in Rev. St. U. S. § 1924, declaring that all taxes in the territory shall be equal and uniform, and that assessments shall be according to the value of the property. City of Seattle v. Yesler, 1 Wash. T. 571, 576.

An "assessment" is a valuation made by authorized persons according to their discretion, as opposed to a sum certain or determined by law. City of Baltimore v. Proprietors of Green Mount Cemetery, 7 Md. 517, 523; State v. Smith, 63 N. E. 214, 215, 158 Ind. 543, 63 L. R. A. 116. It is a valuation of the property of those who are to pay the tax, for the purpose of fixing the proportion which each man shall pay. State v. Smith, 63 N. E. 214, 215, 158 Ind. 543, 63 L. R. A. 116; City of Chicago v. Fishburn, 59 N. E. 791, 793, 189 Ill. 367. By Const. Ill. "assessment" is a valuation to be determined according to the discretion of persons elected or appointed in such manner as the General Assembly shall direct. City of Chicago v. Fishburn, 59 N. E. 791, 793, 189 Ill. 367.

A tax assessment is merely a valuation of the property taxed. Gray v. Stiles, 49 Pac. 1083, 1100, 6 Okl. 455.

An assessment is the determination of the value of the thing taxed and the amount of the tax required of each individual, and it may be designated by officers or by the law itself. United States v. Erie Ry. Co., 2 Sup. Ct. 83, 84, 107 U. S. 1, 27 L. Ed. 385.

With reference to municipal improvements, an assessment is an official estimate of the sums which are to constitute the basis of an apportionment of a tax between the individual subjects of taxation within the district. San Antonio St. Ry. Co. v. City of San Antonio, 54 S. W. 907, 909, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 341.

The term "assessment," when employed in connection with general taxation, means more than a mere valuation, and when an assessment is spoken of as the basis for levying and collecting taxes it means an official listing of persons and property, with a statement of the value of the property of each for the purpose of taxation. Pomeroy Coal Co. v. Emlen, 24 Pac. 340, 342, 44 Kan. 117.

As used in Laws 1899, c. 712, §§ 42-45, as amended by Laws 1900, c. 254, providing for the assessment of a special franchise tax by the State Board of Tax Commissioners, and its review by certiorari, the term "assessment" should be construed in its accurate sense as referring to the judicial or quasi judicial determination by which the liability of the property to taxation and its valuation are established. It is not used in the sense of "assess," which also means to impose a tax. People v. Priest, 62 N. E. 567, 568, 169 N. Y. 432.

Under the statute giving the board of equalization power to examine the various county assessments and equalize the same, it was contended that the term "assessments" was synonymous with "valuations," and here imports the value already determined; that such valuations already fixed are the aggregate of material with which the board could deal; that they may adjust, distribute, and equalize this aggregate of valuations among the several counties, but that they cannot add to its volume. It was held, however, that such was not the meaning of the term, and where it appears that the assessments of one county were made at the true cash value, and the assessments of all the other counties are less, the board of equalization had power to raise the assessment of the other counties by such percentage as would make them equal to the true cash value of the property. Wallace v. Bullen, 52 Pac. 954, 959, 6 Okl. 17.

The term "assessment" is defined to mean an act of assessing, determining or adjusting the amount of taxation charged, damages, etc., to be paid by an individual or company of a community. A finding that certain lots are wholly omitted from the assessment for benefit of a sewer is equivalent to saying that such property was not considered by the commissioners—was not appraised. J. & A. McKechnie Brewing Co. v. Trustees of Village of Canandaigua, 44 N. Y. Supp. 317, 321, 15 App. Div. 139.

"Assessment," as used in Const. art. 11, § 1, providing that the Legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, does not mean "assessments" as technically used, but means the listing and valuing of the whole property for general taxation. Hines v. City of Leavenworth, 3 Kan. 187, 199.

"Assessment," as used in Acts April 21, 1868, authorizing the drainage of certain swamp land, and authorizing certain commissioners to purchase certain property and to pay for the same out of the moneys raised by assessment, "has a like significance with that word as used in the general tax laws, in defining the duties of the assessor, and is intended to designate the results of the labors of the managers, which is expressed by the statement of the quantity of land of each owner, the class in which it is rated, and the amount of the imposition." Britton v. Blake, 35 N. J. Law (6 Vroom) 208, 214.

As local improvement assessment.

"Assessments" are special and local impositions on property in the immediate vicinity of an improvement for the public welfare, which are necessary to pay for the improvement, and laid with reference to the special benefit which such property derives from the expenditure. Reeves v. Treasurer of Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333, 338; Reinken v. Fuehring, 130 Ind. 382, 384, 30 N. E. 414, 15 L. R. A. 624, 30 Am. St. Rep. 247 (citing Palmer v. Stumph, 29 Ind. 329); Hill v. Higdon, 5 Ohio St. 243, 247, 67 Am. Dec. 289; Raymond v. Cleveland, 42 Ohio St. 522, 527; Hale v. City of Kenosha, 29 Wis. 599.

An "assessment" is a charge laid on individual property, because the property on which the burden is imposed receives some benefit different from the general one which the owner enjoys in common with others as a citizen. Walker v. Jameson, 37 N. E. 402, 403, 140 Ind. 591, 28 L. R. A. 679, 49 Am. St. Rep. 222.

"An assessment is a tax on property levied according to benefits conferred on the property, and has been recognized as a permissible mode of raising money for the construction of roads and ditches." Adler v. Whitbeck, 9 N. E. 672, 677, 44 Ohio St. 539.

Testator bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate, to be held on specified trusts, and the income thereof to be paid in certain shares, "after defraying the expenses incident to estates, the taxes, repairs, assessments, and insurance thereof." Held, that the word "assessments" as there used meant assessments for municipal improvements, and not taxes, and hence such assessments must be paid out of the income. Stephen's Ex'rs v. Milnor, 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 358, 373.

The phrase "taxation and assessment," as used in Laws 1864, c. 1, granting an exemption from taxation and assessment in respect to a certain railroad company and its property, including its capital stock, etc., and declaring that the payment by the company of a certain percentage of its gross earnings should be in full of all taxation and assessment whatever, includes a special assessment for local improvements. City of St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co., 23 Minn. 469, 474; First Division of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Paul, 21 Minn. 526, 529.

"Tax" or "assessment," under a charter providing that the property and effects of a corporation should be exempt therefrom, include as well assessments for benefits derived from public improvements, as taxes levied for general revenue. Hudson County Catholic Protectory v. Kearney Tp., 28 Atl. 1043, 1044, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 385.

An exemption to a cemetery association of "all taxes and assessments," was construed to include special assessments for sewer purposes as well as other taxes, although sewer assessments did not exist at the time the grant of the exemption was made. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery v. Tripp, 14 R. I. 199.

The word "assessment" means laying a tax or determining the share of tax to be paid by each individual. It relates as well to taxes for support of government as to enforced contributions for the construction of streets or other local improvements, for the act of assessment must precede collection in either case. Therefore the exemption granted a charitable corporation from "assessment and taxation" by special acts of 1872 does not of itself indicate a legislative intent to exempt the corporation from the cost of improvement of streets on which their property abuts. Had such been the intention, it would have been plainly indicated by additional or other words than the insufficient term "assessment." Kilgus v. Trustees of Orphanage of Good Shepherd, 22 S. W. 750, 751, 94 Ky. 439, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 318.

The word "assessment," as used in Act Cong. Jan. 17, 1870, exempting certain property from any and all taxes or assessments, special, municipal, or county, includes special assessments for local improvements. District of Columbia v. Sisters of Visitation (D. C.) 15 App. Cas. 300, 306.

"An assessment is usually induced by the request, made known according to the provisions of the charter of a municipal government, of a majority of the inhabitants of the assessment district, and is levied for the benefit of the property situated within the particular district, the assessment being an equivalent from the owner for the improvement made to the value of the property; and such assessments are not collected like public taxes, but generally a particular mode of recovering the charge is pointed out by the statute." Wood v. Brady, 5 Pac. 623, 68 Cal. 78.

"Assessment," as used in Const. art. 11, § 3, providing that the Legislature shall provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit so as to prevent abuses in assessments and taxation, and in contracting debts of such municipal corporation, means special taxation for municipal improvements, and not taxation in general. The word "assessment," when having reference to the general assessment of taxes, has never in common practice been used alone as expressing that idea; on the contrary, where that is the idea to be conveyed, it is said "the assessment of taxes," as men say, "the levying of taxes" or "the collection of taxes". When used alone, its established meaning is the specific taxation for municipal improvements. Weeks v. City of Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 242, 259.

"Assessments" on real property in New York on local improvements are special contributions paid by an abutting owner in addition to and exclusive of the general taxes which he pays as one of the general public. The assessment is not to be regarded as a burden, but as a compensation paid by the owner of the lot for the inherent value derived by him from the local improvement. Abendroth v. Manhattan R. Co., 7 N. Y. St. Rep. 43, 48.

Occupation tax.

An occupation tax is an "assessment" within the provisions of a statute granting the city of Savannah full power and authority to make assessments and lay taxes on the inhabitants on said city and those who transact or offer to transact business therein. Savannah, T. & I. H. Ry. v. City of Savannah, 37 S. E. 393, 394, 112 Ga. 164.

As public assessments.

The word "assessments" in Laws 1897, c. 137, § 16, as amended by Laws 1877, c. 31, providing that cemetery lands and property of any association formed pursuant to the act, and any property held in trust for the purposes mentioned in section 9 therein, shall be exempt from all public taxes, rates, and assessments, is to be construed to mean public assessments. Batterman v. City of New York, 73 N. Y. Supp. 44, 45, 65 App. Div. 576.

As specific sum charged or valuation.

The word "assessment," when used in connection with taxation, may have more than one meaning. The ultimate purpose of an assessment in such a connection is to ascertain the amount that each taxpayer is to pay. Sometimes this amount is called an "assessment." More commonly the word "assessment" means the official valuation of a taxpayer's property for the purpose of taxation. State v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 60 Conn. 326, 335, 22 Atl. 765, 768.

"Assessment," as used in Act 1890, is used in the sense of "valuation," and not in the sense of final imposition of a specific sum for taxes or a local improvement. People v. Village of New Rochelle, 31 N. Y. Supp. 592, 593, 83 Hun, 185.

Assessment "has been employed in two different senses, sometimes as expressing the assessment or valuation of property—to enter it on the lists for the purpose of taxation—and sometimes as indicating the charge of special taxes imposed on land as its portion of the expenses of a benefit conferred by a local improvement." First Division of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Paul, 21 Minn. 526, 529.

"Assessment," as used in Gen. St. 1889, providing that no suit to set aside a special assessment or to enjoin the making of the same shall be brought after the expiration of 30 days from the time the amount due on each lot for such assessment has been ascertained, means a specific amount charged on the property, and not the mere fact of valuation. Lynch v. Kansas City, 24 Pac. 973, 974, 44 Kan. 452; Hammerslough v. Same, 26 Pac. 496, 497, 46 Kan. 37.

An accurate meaning of the word "assessment" is doubtless the determination of liability of the property to taxation, and its valuation for that purpose. When the statute provided that "an assessment of a special franchise, by the State Board of Tax Commissioners, may be reviewed," the word "assessment" is plainly used in an accurate sense as referring to the judicial or quasi judicial determination by which the liability of the property to taxation, and its valuation, are established. People v. Priest, 169 N. Y. 432, 435, 62 N. E. 567, 568.

"Assessment," as used in the statutes, is the determining the value of a man's property for the purpose of levying a tax. The whole sum to be raised is ascertained by the assessors from the reports of the city comptroller, and from other sources named in the statutes. The aggregate is then distributed over the assessed property, and, as the statute expresses it, is properly set down or extended in the several assessment rolls which have been theretofore placed in their hands by the tax commissioners. McMahon v. Beekman (N. Y.) 65 How. Prac. 427, 433.

As a tax.

See, also, "Tax—Taxation."

The word "assessments," in Mich. Const. art. 14, § 12, providing that all assessments heretofore authorized shall be on property at its cash value, and section 13, providing that the Legislature shall provide for an equalization by a state board for the year 1851, and every five years thereafter, of the assessments on taxable property, does not mean "taxes" in any sense but the valuation of the property for the purpose of raising taxes. Woodbridge v. City of Detroit, 8 Mich. 274, 280.

As valid assessment.

The term "assessment" clearly implies a valid assessment. The mere vain attempt to impose a legal assessment does not constitute an assessment. Gable v. City of Altoona, 49 Atl. 367, 370, 200 Pa. 15.

As used in Pol. Code, § 3649, declaring that any property discovered by an assessor to have escaped "assessment" for the last preceding year, which may be owned or controlled by the same person, may be assessed at double its value, the word "assessment" means a valid assessment. City of San Luis Obispo v. Pettit, 25 Pac. 694, 695, 87 Cal. 499.

ASSESSMENT COMPANY.

In insurance and business circles the words "assessment company" mean that the money to pay a death loss is collected by an assessment made on those members which survive the member, the insurance on whose life is paid. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Marye, 8 S. E. 481, 85 Va. 643.

ASSESSMENT CONTRACT.

An "assessment contract" is defined by Rev. St. 1889, § 5960, as one wherein the payment of the benefit is in any manner or degree dependent upon the collection of an assessment on persons holding similar contracts. Folkens v. Northwestern Nat. Life Ins. Co., 72 S. W. 720, 721, 98 Mo. App. 480.

ASSESSMENT DISTRICT.

The term "assessment district" is used to designate any subdivision of territory, whether the whole or any part of any municipality, in which by law a separate assessment of taxable property is made by the assessor or assessors elected or appointed therefor. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 1031.

ASSESSMENT FUND.

The "assessment fund" of a mutual benefit association is the balance of the assessments, less expenses, and out of this beneficiaries are paid. Kerr v. Minnesota Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 39 Minn. 174, 177, 39 N. W. 312, 314, 12 Am. St. Rep. 631.

ASSESSMENT PLAN.

Laws 1891, c. 418, providing for the granting of a license by the state to mutual beneficiary associations providing life insurance on the "assessment plan," means a company which does not have what is known as a "legal reserve," but merely an emergency fund, and reserves a right in its contract to increase or lower the rates of assessment specified in said contract as the basis of said assessment, according as the needs of the corporation may demand or permit, though it agrees to pay the assured a definite sum, and at the same time fix an absolute rate of assessment upon its members beyond which it cannot go. The mere fact that the company was authorized to receive premiums in advance does not destroy its character as an insurance association providing insurance on the assessment plan. State v. Root, 54 N. W. 33, 37, 83 Wis. 667, 19 L. R. A. 271.

ASSESSMENT PROCEEDINGS.

See "Proceedings."

ASSESSMENT ROLL.

An "assessment roll" means the list or roll of taxable property and persons, completed, verified, and deposited by the assessors, and not as it appears after equalization by the board of supervisors. Oswego County Sav. Bank v. Town of Genoa, 59 N. Y. Supp. 829, 834, 28 Misc. Rep. 71 (citing Town of Solon v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 35 Hun, 1); Adams v. Brennan, 18 South. 482, 72 Miss. 894.

"Assessment rolls," as used in County Seat Act (Gen. St. c. 26, p. 297, § 4), declaring that for the purpose of determining the number of the electors in a county the assessment roll of the several township assessors shall be evidence as to the number of electors, means the assessment rolls of personal property, and not the registration lists of adults, authorized by Gen. St. c. 86. In re Linn County Seat, 15 Kan. 500, 532.

ASSESSOR.

An "assessor" is an officer whose duty it is to put an official valuation on property which is called on to contribute to the public revenue. Kuhlman v. Smeltz, 33 Atl. 358, 171 Pa. 440.

Assessors are subordinate officers clothed by statute with certain limited powers and duties. Some of their duties are judicial in their nature, and as to those duties they are protected to the same extent that other judicial officers are protected, but they possess such powers only as the statute confers upon them, and when they go beyond those powers their acts are absolutely void. They are required by law to ascertain the taxable property within their towns, and are personally liable to one who is compelled to pay taxes on exempt property assessed by them. Lapolt v. Malthy, 31 N. Y. Supp. 686, 687, 10 Misc. Rep. 330.

Assessors are citizens chosen from their respective towns who, in theory of law and in fact, have personal knowledge of the value of the real estate in their towns. People v. Barker, 48 N. Y. 70, 76.

The term "assessor," as used in the Constitution, providing for assessors, is not understood as defining an officer whose valuation of property for taxes is necessarily final. From the earliest period in our American jurisprudence, assessors have been employed in almost every state for the purpose of making the primary valuation of property for taxation, and in none of them was this valuation final, but was subject to correction and alteration by some supervisory board or officer. In employing the term "assessor," the framers of the Constitution must be understood to have used it in this popular sense. Savings & Loan Soc. v. Austin, 46 Cal. 415, 476.

In People v. Barter, 48 N. Y. 70, it is said that "assessors" are citizens chosen from their relative towns, who, in theory of law and in fact, have personal knowledge of the real estate in their towns. People v. McNamara, 45 N. Y. Supp. 456, 458, 18 App. Div. 17.

Assessors are public officers, sworn to a faithful discharge of their duty, which may be compelled by mandamus at the suit of an individual. Knight v. Thomas, 45 Atl. 499, 501, 93 Me. 494.

An "assessor" is a quasi judicial officer vested by the statute with a discretion which he exercises in determining the value of tangible property. West Portland Park Ass'n v. Kelly, 45 Pac. 901, 903, 29 Or. 412.

"Assessors" are quasi judicial officers when acting within the sphere of their jurisdiction, and their assessments when made become judgments, to be enforced by a warrant in the nature of a special execution. Wilson v. Wiggins, 54 Pac. 716, 718, 7 Okl. 517.

The statute of 1868, relating to "assessors" means the board of assessors. Noyes v. Hale, 137 Mass. 266, 271.

The words "assessor" or "assessors," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include town, district, or deputy assessors. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 1.

In statutes relative to elections the term "assessors" shall mean the assessors of taxes of a city or town. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 104, c. 11, § 1.

ASSETS.

See "Available Assets and Resources"; "Equitable Assets"; "Legal Assets"; "Net Assets"; "New Assets"; "Non-leviable Assets."

"The word (derived from the French 'assez,' enough) is given by both legal and literary lexicographers the double signification of the property of a deceased person appropriable to the payment of his debts, and the entire property of a mercantile or trading corporation; but at this day these are not two different meanings, but rather one and the same idea, applied merely to different things. It is synonymous in both cases with the word 'property.'" Valden v. Hawkins, 59 Miss. 406, 419.

In its common acceptance "assets" means property. Lowber v. Le Roy, 4 N.

Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 202, 217; Republic Life Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 25 N. E. 680, 682, 135 Ill. 150, 12 L. R. A. 328.

"Assets" means everything which can be made available for the payment of debts; the means which a party has as compared with his debts or liabilities. Stanton v. Lewis, 28 Conn. 444, 449.

The "assets" of a school district embrace claims not matured as well as claims matured. Jasper Dist. Tp. v. Sheridan Dist. Tp., 47 Iowa, 183, 185.

The word "assets" is of much broader application than is ordinarily given to the word "credits." Burrill says: "The real and personal property of a party deceased, which, either in the hands of his heir or devisee, or of his executor or administrator, is chargeable with the payment of his debts and legacies, and is applicable to that purpose, is, in a large sense, assets. In a larger sense, the property or effects of any individual or corporation, available for the payment of his or its liabilities." Board of School Directors of Town of Pelican v. Board of School Directors of Town of Rock Falls, 51 N. W. 871, 873, 81 Wis. 428.

The word "assets" means something belonging to a person, but not of an intangible nature. Where a bequest of "credits" was made by a testator, the word was used in the sense of "assets," and an interest in an insurance business passed thereunder. Brandon v. Yeakle, 50 S. W. 1004, 1005, 66 Ark. 377.

The word "assets," as used in Acts 9th Gen. Assem., c. 172, § 4, providing that, when one district township shall be divided into two or more entire townships for civil purposes, there shall be an equitable division made of the then existing assets and liabilities between the old and new districts, is used with reference to the real property—the schoolhouse and land—owned by the districts, together with all other property it is intended shall be taken into account in settling equitably the rights of the separate districts growing out of the division. Williams Dist. Tp. v. Jackson Dist. Tp., 36 Iowa, 216, 219.

Of bankrupt or insolvent.

"Assets," as used in the amendatory bankrupt law of 1874, forbidding a discharge to a debtor whose assets shall not equal 30 per cent. of demands proved, means all property, of every name, kind and nature, chargeable with the debts of the bankrupt, that comes into the control of the assignee by reason of its having ever been owned or possessed by the bankrupt. In re Taggart (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 619, 620.

The term "assets," as used in N. Y. Laws 1869, c. 902, providing for the winding up of insolvent corporations, and authorizing the court to appoint a receiver of all the assets of the company, means "all the property, real and personal, of any company coming under its provisions." In re Attorney General v. Atlantic Mut. L. Ins. Co., 8 N. E. 193, 194, 100 N. Y. 279.

The word "assets," in Act April 8, 1892, § 1, giving laborers a preferred claim in the assets of their employers on the insolvency of the latter, "seems to have been used in the ordinary or usual business sense of the word, as intended to include all the property which would come to the receiver's possession, whether subject to liens or not, rather than to the technical or legal sense applied to the word under the sixty-third section of the corporation act when it was held to mean only the company's ultimate rights in the property." Fitzgerald v. Maxim Powder Mfg. Co. (N. J.) 33 Atl. 1064, 1067.

The "assets of a bankrupt" includes all the estate real and personal of the bankrupt, and all debts due to him or to any person for his use, and all his rights of action for property or estate, and any cause of action which he has against any person arising from contract, but does not include a cause of action founded in tort. Wilson v. National Bank of Rollo (U. S.) 3 Fed. 391, 393.

The word "assets," as used in bankruptcy rule 15, providing that where there are no assets the bankruptcy court need not appoint a trustee where no creditors appear at the first meeting, is used in the sense that there is no property available to the payment of the claims of creditors or expenses of trustees, and not that there is absolutely no property, and therefore it cannot be held that the appointment of a trustee is necessary in order to make a valid order with reference to exempt property. Smalley v. Laugenour, 70 Pac. 786, 789, 30 Wash. 307.

Of corporation.

The word "assets," when applied to the property of a corporation, embraces its real estate, as well as personal property, stock, and choses in action. Dauphin County v. Union Canal Co. (Pa.) 2 Pears. 38, 39.

The double liability of the stockholders of a bank is not an "asset" which it, as an insolvent debtor, can by its deed of assignment pass to its assignee, or in any manner vest the enforcement thereof in him. Runner v. Dwiggins, 46 N. E. 580, 581, 147 Ind. 238, 36 L. R. A. 645.

The term "assets," as used in an order of court directing the sale of all "assets," property, and business of an insolvent corporation, means only property which belonged to the corporation as such, and not unnamed and perhaps undiscovered causes of action which the receiver might have maintained, not in the right of the corporation, but solely in the right of creditors. It means such as sets as belong to the corporation itself and passed to the receiver in its right, and hence a right of action for capital withdrawn and refunded by the corporation to its shareholders without payment of its corporate debts is not an asset to be sold under the order. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Langdon, 46 N. W. 310, 313, 44 Minn. 37.

Of decedent's estate.

"The broadest definition of 'assets' that I have seen is that given by Justice Story, who says that in an accurate and legal sense, all the personal property of the deceased which is of a salable nature and may be converted into ready money is deemed assets. But the word is not confined to such property for all other property of the deceased which is chargeable with his debts or legacies, and is applicable to the purpose, is in a large sense assets." Marion v. Marysville St. R. & P. Co. (U. S.) 49 Fed. 436, 437 (quoting Story, Eq. Jur. 531); Wilson v. Tootle (U. S.) 55 Fed. 211, 213.

The "assets" of an estate are such as constituted the power of an executor or administrator, or such as he is intrusted with by law by virtue of his office, to dispose of in the course of his administration. In other words, whatever an executor or administrator takes as such or in respect to his office is to be considered assets. Commissioners Freedman's Savings & Trust Co. v. Earle, 4 Sup. Ct. 226, 231, 110 U. S. 710, 28 L. Ed. 301 (quoting from Story, Eq. Jur. § 551).

"Assets" are defined by Bouvier as property in the hands of an heir, or in the hands of executors, administrators, or trustees, which is legally or equitably chargeable with the obligations of such heir, or which the executor, administrator, or trustee is as such required to discharge. Favorite v. Boohar's Adm'r, 17 Ohio St. 548, 557.

The assets of an estate "are described to be all those goods and chattels, actions and commodities, which were of the deceased in right of action or possession as is known and so continued to the time of his death, and which after his death the executor or administrator doth get into his hands as duly belonging to him in right of his executorship or administratorship, and all such things as do come to the executor or administrator in lieu or by reason of that, and nothing less, shall be said to be assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, to make him chargeable to a creditor or legatee." Todd v. Neal's Adm'r, 49 Ala. 266, 275 (quoting Shep. Touch. p. 496); Smedley v. Philpot, 3 Mees. & W. 573, 580. It is not necessary in all cases that the money or chattels shall have come to the actual possession of the executor; it is sufficient if it be in his power to receive them, and if he has actually dealt with them as received. Smedley v. Philpot, 3 Mees. & W. 573, 580.

The term "assets," in Pub. St. c. 136, § 11, extending the time for bringing creditors' actions against administrators in case of the receipt of new assets, does not include the proceeds of a mortgage given by the heirs of law, without leave of court, on lands of which their intestate ancestor died seised. Shute v. Wilkins, 40 N. E. 848, 163 Mass. 491.

2 Rev. St. p. 147, § 6, declares that "assets" of a decedent are debts secured by mortgages, bonds, notes, or bills, among other things, but this, of course, means debts due the deceased. Sedgwick v. Ashburner, 1 Bradf. Sur. 105, 108.

Same—Personal property.

The word "assets" signifies personal property applicable to the payment of the debts of a decedent. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 2514, subd. 2.

The term "assets" does not denote any particular species of property, but it is derived from the French word "assez," which means sufficient or enough—that is, that there is enough in the hands of the heir to pay the ancestor's debts; and so whatever descended to the heir from the ancestor by common law was assets, and therefore when, by our law, the personal estate is made to descend to the heir, it must also be regarded as assets. Hall v. Martin, 46 N. H. 337, 342.

Same—Real estate and chattels real.

The term "assets," as used in the Code, conferring on probate courts authority to grant letters of administration within their respective counties, where the intestate, not being an inhabitant of the state, dies out of the county leaving "assets" therein, includes both real and personal assets, and therefore comprehends land or real estate according to its ordinary signification. Bishop v. Lalouette's Heirs, 67 Ala. 197, 200. The word "assets," in Code 1886, § 2013, authorizing the granting of letters of administration on the estates of nonresidents who die leaving assets, includes, as has been declared, lands situated in the county where the administration is granted. Nicrosi v. Giuly, 5 South. 156, 157, 85 Ala. 365.

"Assets," when used in the common law, in stating that the heir is bound to the extent of the assets descending is meant the real estate which the testator charged with such debts by a speciality. "The word 'assets' in this connection always meant real estate." People v. Brook, 14 N. E. 39, 40, 123 Ill. 246.

Where a testator subjected his whole estate to the payment of his debts, and empowered his executors to sell his land and convey to the purchaser, he thereby converted his whole real estate into equitable assets subject to the payment of all his debts equally. Black v. Scot (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 507, 516.

"Assets" is property belonging to an estate, either of a bankrupt or a decedent, subject to administration by the assignee, trustee, or executor for the benefit of creditors, heirs, or distributees. The word "assets" includes such articles representing real estate of a decedent as are usually denominated "chattels real," as leases, etc. Shears v. Rogers, 3 Barn. & Adol. 362, 371.

Same—Right of action for decedent's death.

The word "assets," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 49, § 2, giving a probate court jurisdiction to direct administration of an estate of a deceased person who was not an inhabitant of the state but left "assets" therein, should be construed to include the right of action given by Gen. St. 1878, c. 77, § 2, to an administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate, caused by the negligence of the defendant, although, strictly speaking, the cause of action did not belong to the deceased in his lifetime, but only accrued at his death, and also that, when realized on, the proceeds form no part of his general estate, but belong to his next of kin. Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 46 N. W. 79, 44 Minn. 5.

Same—Trust property.

Property held by a trustee for the testator is legal assets, for, although the benefit of the trust, if resisted, cannot be enforced without equitable aid, yet the analogy of the law will regulate the application of the fund. To constitute equitable assets, the trust imposed by the party or the court must be for the benefit of creditors generally. Commissioners Freedmen's Savings & Trust Co. v. Earle, 4 Sup. Ct. 226, 230, 110 U. S. 710, 28 L. Ed. 301.

"Assets" includes only those things in which the decedent had a beneficial interest at his death, and does not include those things which he held in trust, or as a bailee or factor of another; and the rule is that if a testator held money or other property in his hands belonging to others, whether in trust or otherwise, and such money or property was not distinguishable from the mass of the decedent's own property, it falls within the description of "assets." First Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 23 Pac. 986, 988, 14 Colo. 259, 20 Am. St. Rep. 257.

Of insurance company.

The reserve fund of a mutual insurance company held in trust for division on the dissolution of the company among its then members is not an "asset" of the company, within the general meaning of the term. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Aberle, 46 N. Y. Supp. 10, 11, 19 App. Div. 79 (citing In re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 131 N. Y. 354, 30 N. E. 114; People v. Life Union, 83 Hun, 598, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1120).

ASSETS IN HAND.

"Assets in hand" is such property as at once comes to the executor or other trustee for the purpose of satisfying claims against him as such. Favorite v. Booher's Adm'r, 17 Ohio St. 548, 557.

ASSIGN.

See "Duly Assigned."

See, also, "Assign Over."

"Assign," as defined by Webster, means to allot, to make or set over, to transfer, to sell or convey; and Bolles, in his dictionary, says that the word "assigning" means allotting, appointing, transferring. Bump v. Van Orsdale (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 634, 638.

The meaning of the word "assign" is to mark out, to allot, to apportion, to make over; and there can be no assignment unless it discloses and designates what is marked out, or allotted, or apportioned, or made over. Franz Falk Brewing Co. v. Mielenz, 37 N. W. 728, 730, 5 Dak. 136.

To "assign" is to make over a right to another. Hogg v. Mendenhall, 19 Minn. 335, 336 (Gil. 289, 290).

The words "assigned and heard by the full court sitting in Boston" are equivalent to "entered and heard by the full court" sitting in Boston. Commonwealth v. Robertson, 38 N. E. 25, 26, 162 Mass. 90.

A writing by which certain persons "hereby sell and assign" to certain persons named a fixed amount of money to become due from a third party does not change the character of the instrument from an order to an ordinary assignment. Nelson v. Nelson Bennett Co., 71 Pac. 749, 750, 31 Wash. 116.

As conveyance or transfer.

"To assign" means to make a right over to another, as to assign an estate, an annuity, bond, etc., over to another; a transfer by one person to another of any property, real or personal, or of any estate or right therein. Seventh Nat. Bank v. Shenandoah Iron Co. (U. S.) 35 Fed. 436, 440; Richie v. Cralle, 56 S. W. 963, 964, 108 Ky. 483 (citing Bouv. Dict.; Webst. Dict.).

"Assign," in a statute relative to negotiable instruments, means transfer. It is the appropriate word for a transfer of personal property, and particularly for a transfer of a right in action. Haug v. Riley, 101 Ga. 372, 379, 29 S. E. 44, 47, 40 L. R. A. 244.

"Assigned," as used in Sess. Laws 1867, c. 76, p. 110, authorizing an attachment whenever the plaintiff shall make an affidavit that the defendant has "assigned, secreted or disposed of" his property with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, means the transfer of the legal title to the property, and possibly any conveyance of an interest therein. Gulle v. McNanny, 14 Minn. 520, 522 (Gil. 391, 393), 100 Am. Dec. 244.

"Assigned" or "duly assigned" has no fixed or precise meaning; a bond may be "duly assigned" for one purpose, and not for another. It may be assigned conditionally, and for the purpose of being canceled on a certain event, or to await some future appointment or direction of the assignor, or in trust for a third person or for the use of the assignor himself. Allen v. Pancoast, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 68, 74.

"Assign" is defined "to transfer or make over to another." Thus a paper which states, "I hereby assign, release and deliver to J. S. all my right, title and interest in the security or property covered by the following described chattel mortgages," is an assignment of the mortgages, and not a cancellation of them. Aultman, Miller & Co. v. Sloan, 73 N. W. 123, 124, 115 Mich. 151.

As delivery.

In an agreement whereby a debtor agreed to "assign" all the debts then due and owing to him for the use and benefit of his creditors in full satisfaction of their respective debts, and also all his stock in trade, "assign" means to set over or transfer, and when applied to movables a delivery will satisfy it, and hence, by the delivery and receipt of the debts and stock in trade, there was an assignment of them. "The word 'assign' has various significations, and must be taken according to the subject-matter." Watkinson v. Inglesby, 5 Johns. 386, 391.

The term "assign" or "assignment," in respect to the transfer of choses in action, is not peculiar to written transfers. It is the usual and appropriate word to denote any transfer of a chose in action, legal or equitable, in writing, by parol or otherwise, and is so used in the books. The term "assign" in Code, § 3059, providing that the claim of a landlord for rent may be by him assigned, etc., includes assignments by delivery merely, as well as in writing. Wells v. Cody, 20 South. 381, 383, 112 Ala. 278.

To "assign" is to make over a right to another. Hence an allegation in a complaint that plaintiff duly assigned a promissory note to defendant imports that plaintiff delivered such note to defendant, actually or constructively, and that such assignment was accepted by defendant. Hong v. Mendenhall, 19 Minn. 335, 336 (Gil. 289, 290).

"Assigned," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 307, providing that when a negotiable instrument has been assigned to a person before its maturity for a valuable consideration, without notice of any discount or defense against it, he shall be compelled to allow only just discounts against himself, means transferred from one to another. The form of the transfer, whether written or verbal, is immaterial. The statute extends its protection to all assigns coming within its terms, though they may not have acquired their instruments in accordance with the technical rules regulating transfers under the law merchant. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank v. Berrott, 57 S. W. 340, 341, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 662 (quoting Word v. Elwood, 90 Tex. 130, 37 S. W. 414).

As grant of land.

To "assign" is the power to grant, and "grant," when used in an instrument, is construed as an operative word of conveyance, and the words "I assign the within," when used in a deed, are effectual not only to pass title to the paper on which the deed was written, but also to pass title to the land described in the deed. Harlowe v. Hudgins, 19 S. W. 364, 365, 84 Tex. 107, 31 Am. St. Rep. 21.

The words "transfer" and "assign" are not the usual operative words in a conveyance of real estate, but are sufficient to transfer the title. Sanders v. Ransom, 20 South. 530, 531, 37 Fla. 457.

"Assigns," as used in an instrument by which the government "assigns" to certain persons a tract of land within described limits, that they might establish thereon a proposed colony, means a setting apart of the land as a tract upon which the persons therein named can perform their proposed colonization, and not a conveyance. It is not a grant of the land on condition that a colony be established, but it is assigned as a place where a colony may be established. The grant was not a conveyance subject to defeasance, but amounted only to a designation and setting apart of the tract as a tract within which the grantees could establish a colony in conformity to the colonization law, and upon such establishment obtain title to a fixed quantum of land within the tract, which never having been done, no title to anything passed by the grant. Interstate Land Co. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 275, 279.

Guaranty of payment not implied.

The word "assign" implies no guaranty, and, on the assignment of seven bonds secured by a mortgage, the several assignees were alike entitled to come in and share the fund pro rata, according to the bonds held by them respectively. Appeal of Perry, 22 Pa. (10 Harris) 43, 45, 60 Am. Dec. 63.

As the term was used in a contract transferring a bond from the defendant to the plaintiff, in which defendant assigned all his interest therein to plaintiff, it did not import a covenant on defendant's part guarantying that the maker of the bond would pay the same, on which the assignee could maintain an action against the defendant on the maker's default. Garretsie v. Van Ness, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 20, 24, 2 Am. Dec. 333.

As indorsement.

As used in a petition for the foreclosure of a mortgage securing a note, alleging that on a certain date the mortgagee in the mortgage for a valuable consideration "assigned" such note and mortgage to the plaintiff, the word "assigned" should be construed as meaning to transfer or make over, in its broad sense, including all transfers of whatever nature. Under an allegation that an instrument has been assigned to the plaintiff, plaintiff may introduce proof of any fact tending to show an assignment. The mode in most cases is not material, so that there was an intention to pass the entire title to the thing assigned. A transfer of negotiable paper by indorsement is but one of the modes by which it may be assigned or transferred, and hence plaintiff may introduce evidence tending to show a transfer thereof by indorsement. Mundy v. Whittemore, 19 N. W. 694, 695, 15 Neb. 647.

To "assign" is to transfer to another. A bill or note may be assigned by delivery without indorsement, in which case the assignor's liability is somewhat different from that of an indorsement. The writing on a note, "I assign over the within note to P.," is an indorsement, and not an assignment. Davidson v. Powell, 19 S. E. 601, 114 N. C. 575.

An averment in the complaint in a suit on a promissory note that it was "assigned in writing" is not the equivalent of "assigned by indorsement in writing." A general "indorsement," both from its etymology and in its technical use, means a writing on the back of a note. A mere assignment in writing may be on a separate piece of paper, and in such case the record would not show anything to bind the payee, unless he was made a party to the suit. Reed v. Garr, 59 Ind. 299, 300; Williams v. Osbon, 75 Ind. 280, 283.

Personalty referred to.

As used in a will directing the assignment of property, properly the word "assign" refers to personalty not reduced to money, and not to realty. Story v. Palmer, 18 Atl. 363, 365, 46 N. J. Eq. (1 Dick.) 1.

Pledge.

A power to "sell and assign" will not authorize an agent to pledge the property of his principal, as in such case the terms themselves exclude the idea of any other disposition than a sale out and out. Chetwood v. Berrian, 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 203, 207.

The word "assign" as used in a lease prohibiting the lessee from assigning, etc.,
1 Wds. & P.—36

means an absolute transfer of all the lessee's interest in the demised estate, and hence does not include a pledge of the lease as collateral security. Doe ex dem. Pitt v. Hogg, 1 Car. & P. 160.

Sublease.

Conditions in a lease that the lessor shall not "assign over" or otherwise part with this indenture, or the premises thereby leased, or any part thereof, etc., is not broken by the underletting of the whole or a part of the premises for a period less than the whole term. Jackson v. Harrison (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 66, 70. See, also, Doe ex dem. Holland v. Worsley, 1 Camp. 20, 21.

As transfer in writing.

Code, § 952, declares that accounts may be assigned, and permits the assignee to sue in his own name, subject to defenses which the debtor might have against the creditor at any time prior to suit brought. Held, that the word "assigned," as there used, contemplated an assignment in writing; that the true use of the word "assigned," when applied to the transfer of a written instrument, implies a written assignment, unless it is controlled by some adjunct, such as by delivery or the like; and therefore the use of the word "assigned," in connection with accounts, must be construed to have the same meaning, and to require an assignment in writing. Andrews v. Brown, 1 Iowa (1 Clarke) 154, 156; Williams v. Soutter, 7 Iowa (7 Clarke) 435, 448.

In an action on a note, an averment that it had been duly "assigned" must be construed to mean a transfer in writing, as distinguished from one by delivery; this being the true definition of the word when applicable to contracts, as indicated both by usage and etymology. Ragland v. Wood, 71 Ala. 145, 149, 46 Am. Rep. 305.

ASSIGN OVER.

In a lease covenanting that the tenant shall not "let or assign over" the said premises, or any part thereof, without license of the lessor in writing, the word "over" is annexed to the word "assign," and the covenant necessarily means that if the lessee part with the premises, even for a part of the term, his lease should be vacated. Gregson v. Harrison, 2 Term R. 425, 429.

The word "assign," as used in a lease, means and includes any transfer of the interest of the lessee, and a condition against the assignment is therefore broken by execution of a sublease by the lessee. Doe ex dem. Holland v. Worsley, 1 Camp. 20, 21.

ASSIGNABILITY.

"Assignability" and "survivability" of things in action are convertible terms. Tanas

v. Municipal Gas Co., 84 N. Y. Supp. 1053, 1058, 88 App. Div. 251.

The "assignability" and "survivability" of things in action are convertible terms, and furnish a clear and intelligible rule to determine what injuries to property, rights, or interests will survive to the personal representative of the injured party. The rights of property only which are in their nature assignable and capable of enjoyment by an assignee are those for which a right of action survives to the personal representative," and hence an action by a wife to recover the value of a horse killed by her husband while he was in a state of intoxication caused by liquor sold him by defendants may be revived and continued by the personal representatives of the wife. Morenus v. Crawford, 5 N. Y. Supp. 453, 456, 51 Hun, 89.

The attribute of assignability is not confined to rights in action belonging to natural persons, but includes those belonging to artificial persons. Grocers' Nat. Bank v. Clark (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 26, 27.

ASSIGNABLE.

See "Not Assignable."

"Assignable," as used in Ky. St. § 474, providing that all bonds, appeals, or notes for money or property shall be "assignable" so as to vest the right of action in the assignee, should be construed in the sense of "transferable" or "negotiable." Richie v. Cralle, 56 S. W. 963, 964, 108 Ky. 483.

ASSIGNABLE BY INDORSEMENT.

The words "assignable by indorsement," as used in Comp. Laws, § 2285, providing for the transfer of a certificate of sale of land for tax in that manner, means that the assignment itself, as well as the name, should be written on the instrument. Territory v. Perea, 30 Pac. 928, 929, 6 N. M. 531.

ASSIGNED.

A statement by a mercantile commercial agency that a certain firm had "assigned," being false, is libelous per se. Mitchell v. Bradstreet Co., 22 S. W. 358, 359, 116 Mo. 226, 20 L. R. A. 138, 38 Am. St. Rep. 592.

ASSIGNEE.

See "Voluntary Assignee."

As defined by Jac. Law Dict., an assignee of a thing is one who is the owner of it, who has the whole estate of the assignor, and possesses the thing in his own right. Allen v. Pancoast, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 68, 74.

In Comp. St. Neb. c. 73, providing that any mortgagee, his personal representative or "assignee," who shall refuse to discharge the same on proper request shall be liable in damages, the term "assignee," being unlimited, applies without restriction, without regard to the form of the assignment. Daniels v. Densmore, 48 N. W. 906, 32 Neb. 40.

The word "assignee," as used in Rev. St. p. 818, c. 134, § 2, prohibiting the examination of a party to an action as a witness in his own behalf where such party claims as assignee and the original assignor is dead, "is employed in its more usual and appropriate sense of one suing or defending to enforce rights or avoid demands devolving upon him in a representative capacity; of one standing in the place of the original assignor to assert rights which had accrued to, or defeat claims which had arisen against, such assignor before the assignment, by virtue of which the same rights pass to and the same claims accrued against the alleged assignee. I think the term 'assignee' means a person who claims under the assignor, and in subordination to his rights and duties, and that it cannot be applied to one who, as the unqualified owner of property, sues or defends strictly in his own right." Wisconsin Bank v. Morley, 19 Wis. 62, 70.

An assignee is one to whom some right in property is transferred. The character of assignee cannot be acquired unless there is something to be assigned and a right springing from a defeated purchase. Ely v. State Land Office Com'rs, 13 N. W. 784, 785, 49 Mich. 17.

The word "assignee," as contained in a deed which recited that it was between the grantor of the first part and the "assignee" of the grantor of the second part, and that it was in consideration of the conditions of the assignment made this day for the benefit of the creditors of the grantor, relates to the character in which the grantee took, and means that he took not as purchaser, but in trust for creditors, and the term "assignee" negatives any supposition of an intention to vest an estate in fee in the grantee himself. McDermith v. Voorhees, 27 Pac. 250, 251, 16 Colo. 402, 25 Am. St. Rep. 286.

"An 'assignee' is one who has transferred to him in writing the whole interest of the original patent, or the undivided part of such whole interest, in every portion of the United States." Potter v. Holland (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1154, 1157.

Assignee by operation of law.

In common acceptance the word "assignee" is limited to an assignee in fact, and does not comprehend an assignee by operation of law, as used in Code Civ. Proc., disqualifying a witness from testifying in his own behalf as against the assignee of a decedent; nor does it comprehend an assignee through the medium of that legal operation which is effected by an order of court. Thus, when a receiver, in obedience to an order of court, turns over the residuary assets of the receivership to a trustee for the interested parties, such trustee does not become an assignee. Pulsifer v. Arbuthnot, 53 Pac. 70, 59 Kan. 380.

An "assignee" is defined by Webster as a person to whom an assignment is made. A person appointed or deputed by another to do some act, perform some business, or enjoy some right, privilege, or property, is an assignee of a bankrupt. An assignee may be by special appointment or deed, or be created by law. Bouvier defines an "assignee" as "one to whom an assignment has been made." Assignees are either assignees in fact or assignees in law. An assignee in law is one in whom the law vests the right, as an executor or administrator. The common acceptance of the word "assignee" is limited to an assignee in fact, and does not comprehend an assignee by mere operation of law. It is so used in Code Civ. Proc. § 322, providing that no person shall testify in his own behalf in respect to any transaction had with a deceased person when the adverse party is executor, etc., or "assignee" of such deceased person, and hence a sheriff who has left a writ of attachment upon chattels, or the attachment creditor, is not an assignee. Burlington Nat. Bank v. Beard, 42 Pac. 320, 55 Kan. 773.

As creditor.

See "Creditor."

Executor, administrator, or legatee.

An "assignee" is one to whom an assignment is made, but an administrator is not included in the term as used in Gantt, Dig. § 911, providing that every plaintiff suing as an assignee may be required to give security for costs. Tucker v. West, 31 Ark. 643, 646.

An executor may be deemed an assignee in law to the testator; that is, he takes without appointment of the person, but by operation of law. The testator names the individual as executor, but it is the law which makes him the assignee of the property. A legatee or devisee occupies no such position. What he receives is not by operation of law, as in the case of an executor, but by direct gift from the testator. Hight v. Sackett, 34 N. Y. 447, 451.

Although the words "assign and assignee" are frequently used to designate and include executors and administrators, the assignee of an assignee in perpetuum, the heir of an assignee, the assignee of an heir, the assignee of an assignee's executor, and the devisee, yet, in a statute where the words "personal representative" are also used in the same connection, the term "assignee" cannot have such enlarged sense. Page v. Johnston, 23 Wis. 295, 296.

"Assignee," as used in Code, § 399, providing that a party may be examined as a witness in his own behalf, or in behalf of another party, in the same manner and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness, provided, however, that he shall not be examined in his own behalf in respect to any transaction had personally by him with a deceased person against parties who are the executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or "assignees" of such deceased person, when they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from said deceased person, or have been sued as such executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or assignees, cannot be construed to include a legatee of the testator. Willey v. Whitney (N. Y.) 25 How. Prac. 75, 77.

Grantee or purchaser.

As used in Code, § 399, providing that the testimony of a witness shall be incompetent against a party prosecuting or defending an action as executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, or "assignee" of a deceased person, the word "assignee" includes a grantee of the deceased, though the word "grantee" is not used in the statute, since such grantees are within the reason of the act, and the word "assignee" must be held to include them. Mattoon v. Young, 45 N. Y. 696, 699.

Code 1886, § 2707, provides that in an action by a mortgagee or his "assignee" against the mortgagor or one holding under him defendant may, if the jury ascertain the amount due on the mortgage debt, pay the debt, and that on payment thereof a writ of possession shall not issue. A purchaser at foreclosure sale of such premises brought ejectment against the mortgagor to recover possession. Held, that the purchaser was not an assignee of the mortgagee, within the meaning of the statute, in a mortgage, as he sued in his own right as owner of the land, and not by virtue of any assignment directly from the mortgagee. Matkin v. Marx, 11 South. 633, 634, 96 Ala. 501.

As immediate assignee.

The phrase "assignee of the inventor or discoverer," as used in Rev. St. § 4895 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3385], providing that patents may be granted and issued or re-issued to the "assignee of the inventor or discoverer," but the assignment must be entered of record in the Patent Office, in one sense means no other than the person or corporation to whom the inventor or discoverer has executed an assignment. An "assignee of an inventor" did not cease to be "assignee of the inventor or discoverer" of a patent because it became an assignor thereof to another, although it did cease to have any legal or equitable interest in the invention after executing the assignment. The language of the section is as literally and accurately satisfied when the patent is issued to the inventor's assignee as it is when it is issued to the assignee's assignee. The latter is an assignee of the patent, but not strictly the assignee of the inventor. The patent may issue to the person who, by the records of the office, is assignee of the patent, although not technically the assignee of the inventor. Consolidated Electric Light Co. v. Edison Electric Light Co. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 719, 721.

"Assignee," as used in Rev. St. § 4895 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3385], providing that patents may be granted and issued or reissued to the "assignee" of the inventor or discoverer, but the assignment must first be entered of record in the Patent Office, means the assignee in any degree of the inventor, and however remote, and is not limited to the immediate assignee of such inventor, and hence the reissue was properly made to the fourth assignee in succession of the original patent. Selden v. Stockwell Self-Lighting Gas Burner Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 390, 396.

Indorsee.

The word "assignee" or "assignment" has no certain fixed or technical meaning, as the word "indorsed" has when used in reference to promissory notes or bills of exchange. An assignment may be by deed, by writing, by mere parol and delivery, or by the application of equitable principles to a certain state of facts. Allen v. Pancoast, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 68, 72.

"Assignee," as used in Code Iowa, § 2081, declaring that nothing in the statute relating to usury shall be construed to prevent the proper assignee in good faith and without notice of any usurious contract from recovering against the usurer, does not mean innocent indorsees of mercantile paper, but means that class of assignees who, in the absence of such a provision, would step into the shoes of their assignors with just the same rights, remedies, and equities to which their assignors were entitled. In strict legal parlance we do not use the term "assignee" when we mean to designate the indorsees of bills and notes. Palmer v. Call (U. S.) 7 Fed. 737, 745.

As legal representative.

See "Legal Representative."

Negotiability implied.

The words "or its assignees," as used in a municipal bond reciting that it is payable to a certain railroad company "or its assignees," is to be construed as equivalent to the words "or order," and to render the bond transferable by indorsement. Porter v. City of Janesville (U. S.) 37 Fed. 617, 619.

Parties beneficially interested.

In Rev. St. § 629 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 503], providing that no Circuit Court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover on a note or chose in action in favor of an assignee unless the suit might have been brought in such court if no assignment had been made, the term "assignee" covers not merely persons to whom is technically transferred the contract in controversy, but any one who by virtue of any transfer to him can claim its beneficial interest. Plant Inv. Co. v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co., 14 Sup. Ct. 483, 485, 152 U. S. 71, 38 L. Ed 358; Virginia Carolina Chemical Co. v. Sundry Ins. Co. (U. S.) 108 Fed. 451, 458. By the term "assignee" is meant one who sues under and by devolution of interest from another. So that a person who purchased insured premises, and to whom the policy of insurance was assigned, does not stand in the relation of an assignee, since such assignment constitutes in effect a new contract between the insurance company and the purchaser. Virginia Carolina Chemical Co. v. Sundry Ins. Co. (U. S.) 108 Fed. 451, 458.

As real party in interest.

See "Real Party in Interest."

Receiver.

As receiver, see "Receiver."

The word "assignee" includes a receiver appointed under the insolvency act of 1881, § 2. Bliss v. Doty, 36 Minn. 168, 169, 30 N. W. 465, 466.

A receiver represents no particular interest or class of interests. He holds for the benefit of all who may ultimately show an interest in the property. He stands no more for the creditor than the owner. They are not assignees, and the principles of common law applicable to assignees do not define or determine the character of a receiver's possession, or its effect upon the rights of those interested in the property in their possession. New York, P. & O. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 268, 278.

Surviving partner.

The term "assignees," as used in Code Proc. § 299, prohibiting evidence of transactions with a deceased person against parties who are executors, administrators, heirs at law, next of kin, or "assignees" of the deceased, cannot be construed to include the surviving partner of a firm of which the deceased was a member, for at his death the partnership was dissolved, and the effects remained in the hands of the survivor, subject to the partnership debts and accounts. It became his duty to wind up and settle the concern of the firm, to pay the partnership debts and obligations, and to distribute the surplus according to the respective shares of those entitled to it. For this purpose, after the dissolution of a partnership by the death of one of its members, the legal interest subsists, although for all other purposes the partnership is actually terminated, and the survivor holds the assets still as partnership property and by virtue of his original power as partner, and he is in no sense the assignee of the deceased, so that the reception of evidence by the plaintiff as to transactions had personally by him with the deceased was not prohibited. Tremper v. Conklin (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 456, 457.

ASSIGNEE FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

An "assignee for the benefit of creditors" succeeds only to the rights of his assignor, and takes the property subject to all existing liens and equities. The assignee is the mere representative of the debtor, enjoying his rights only, and bound where he would be bound. Barron v. Whiteside, 43 Atl. 825, 826, 89 Md. 448.

An "assignee for the benefit of creditors" is a party who claims under the assignor. He is not a bona fide purchaser for value. He stands in the shoes of an assignor, and can assert no claim to the property which the assignor could not. Textor v. Orr, 38 Atl. 939, 940, 86 Md. 392 (citing Luckemeyer v. Seltz, 61 Md. 313, 315; Tyler v. Abergh, 65 Md. 18, 3 Atl. 904).

An "assignee in a voluntary assignment for creditors" is not merely the representative for creditors, as a receiver appointed by the courts, who is the embodiment of the creditors merely, but stands in the place of his assignor, with all the property which his assignor can pass to him, with the duty to divide it between creditors who may elect to come in. Wimpfheimer v. Perrine (N. J.) 50 Atl. 356, 357.

An "assignee for the benefit of creditors" stands in the shoes of the assignor, and has the powers only of the assignor as to the collection of outstanding funds. Thus, where securities have been deposited with superintendent of insurance by an insurance company, to be held in trust for the policy holders, the assignee of such company cannot recover such securities without first showing that the company is no longer liable to any of its policy holders. State v. Matthews, 60 N. E. 605, 606, 64 Ohio St. 419.

An "assignee for the benefit of creditors" is to be considered primarily as a trustee for the creditors. Slater v. Oriental Mills, 27 Atl. 443, 444, 18 R. I. 352.

An "assignee for the benefit of creditors" is a trustee, and subject to the good faith and responsibilities as such. In re Brown's Estate, 44 Atl. 443, 445, 193 Pa. 281.

"Assignees," as used in Act Cong. March 2, 1799, § 65, providing that in all cases of insolvency, or where any estate in the hands of executors, administrators, or "assignees" shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased, the debts due the United States on any bond or bonds for the payment of duties shall be first satisfied; and any executor, administrator, or assignee, or other person who shall pay any debt due from the person or estate for whom or for which they are acting, previous to the debt or debts due to the United States, shall be personally liable therefor, "means only such persons as become vested with or possessed of the property of the living debtor in one or other of the cases of insolvency pointed out in the statute, and is not to be so extended as to embrace heirs or devisees, or any other description of persons; for assignees are not only distinguishable, but are clearly distinguished in the law itself, from those who succeed to the title and possession of property upon and in consequence of the demise of the debtor." United States v. Crookshank (N. Y.) 1 Edw. Ch. 233, 237.

Receiver.

That receivers appointed by the direct order of the court, and executors and administrators receiving their appointment from the court, are officers of the court whose appointments they bear, so that property in their hands by virtue of such appointment is in custodia legis and not subject to attachment, has passed beyond the point of doubt, and is well settled by the decisions of all the courts to which counsel have called attention. But an assignee in Iowa does not receive his appointment from the court, and while, under the statutes of that state, he is subject to the orders of the state, and may even be removed by that court for causes provided in the statutes, yet his appointment is wholly the voluntary act of the assignor, and the property received by him under the assignment is not entitled "in custodia legis," so as to exclude a federal court from acting with reference thereto or as to the validity of the assignment. Rothschild v. Hasbrouck (U. S.) 65 Fed. 283, 285.

ASSIGNEE IN FACT.

An "assignee in fact" is one to whom an assignment has been made in fact by the party having the right to assign. Starkweather v. Cleveland Ins. Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1091, 1092; Tucker v. West, 31 Ark. 643, 646.

ASSIGNEE IN LAW.

An "assignee in law" is one in whom the law vests the right, as an executor or administrator. Bouvier; Tucker v. West, 31 Ark. 643, 646.

An "assignee in law" is one in whom the law vests the right and control in the property. To this class an assignee in bankruptcy belongs; he is like an administrator or executor, upon whom, when appointed by the proper authority, the law confers the right and power to control the property thus committed to his charge, paramount to all others. Starkweather v. Cleveland Ins. Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1091, 1092.

ASSIGNMENT.

See "Equitable Assignment"; "New Assignment."

Assignment or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

An "assignment" is a transfer of property. Hoag v. Mendenhall, 19 Minn. 335, 336 (Gil. 289, 290) (citing Bouvier, Law Dict.; Worcester, Dict.).

The idea of an assignment is essentially that of a transfer by one existing party to another existing party of some species of property or valuable interest. Andrews v. National Bank of North America (N. Y.) 7 Hun, 20, 22 (citing Hight v. Sackett, 34 N. Y. 447).

The word "assignment" means the act by which one person transfers to another, or causes to vest in another, his property, or an interest therein. Harlowe v. Hudgins, 19 S. W. 364, 365, 84 Tex. 107, 31 Am. St. Rep. 21.

An "assignment" is the transferring or making over to another of the whole of any property, real or personal, in possession or in action, or of any estate or right therein. Brown v. Crookston Agricultural Ass'n, 34 Minn. 545, 546, 26 N. W. 907, 908.

An "assignment" does not differ in its essential elements from any other contract. There must be persons competent to contract, a valuable consideration, legal subject-matter, and mutual assent of the contracting parties. No contract is raised by a mere overture or offer to enter into an agreement not definitely and expressly assented to by both parties. Thus, where a debtor offered to assign a claim to a creditor, but the creditor did not assent to the same, there was no assignment. Commercial Bank v. Rufe (U. S.) 92 Fed. 789, 795.

In order to constitute "an assignment," it is essential that the dominion and control of the assignor over the assigned fund should be terminated. Dirimple v. State Bank, 65 N. W. 501, 91 Wis. 601, 606. Especially is this a requisite where the assignment is wholly without consideration, and merely a donation. Hence a letter from an insured to the insurer requesting that such insurance be made payable in case of his death to his son was not an assignment by the insured of such insurance, since he still retained dominion over it, and could cancel, and, with the consent of the insurer, modify, the same. Alvord v. Luckenbach, 82 N. W. 535, 536, 106 Wis. 537.

Assignment by delivery or in writing.

An "assignment" in law, as defined by Webster, is a transfer of title or interest by writing, and such is its use in Code, § 2244, providing that all choses in action arising upon contract may be assigned, etc. Turk v. Cook, 63 Ga. 681, 682.

"Assignment," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 3637, providing that any person becoming a shareholder in a corporation by assignment of stock shall succeed to all the rights and liability of his assignor, means a transfer by writing, as distinguished from one by delivery. Burnsville Turnpike Co. v. State, 20 N. E. 421, 422, 119 Ind. 382, 3 L. R. A. 265.

Under the statutes of Arkansas, providing that bonds may be transferred by "assignment" so as to vest the legal title and the right of action in the assignee, the transfer of a bond by delivery merely is no assignment thereof. Hardie v. Mills, 20 Ark. 153, 154.

No particular form of words is required to constitute a valid "assignment" of a chose in action. Any act showing an intent to transfer the parties' interest is sufficient for that purpose. Maclin v. Kinealy, 41 S. W. 893, 895, 141 Mo. 113.

The term "assignment" does not necessarily imply or require writing, and, when alleged of any subject, it should always be construed in connection with the law of transfer applicable to that particular subject-matter. Hutchings v. Low, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 246, 247.

An "assignment" is defined as the setting over or transferring the interest a man has in anything to another. This definition includes the case of the transfer of a note payable to bearer by delivery merely. Edison v. Frazier, 9 Ark. (4 Eng.) 219, 220.

"An 'assignment' is the setting over or transferring the interest a man hath in anything to another, and the word is often used by writers on mercantile law to express such a transfer;" hence a transfer of negotiable paper by indorsement or delivery is an assignment thereof. Jagoe v. Alleyn (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 580, 582.

The term "assign" or "assignment," in respect to the transfer of choses in action, is not peculiar to written transfers. It is the usual and appropriate word to denote any transfer of a chose in action, legal or equitable, in writing, by parol or otherwise, and is so used in the books. The term "assign," in Code, § 3059, providing that the claim of a landlord for rent may be by him assigned, etc., includes assignments by delivery merely, as well as in writing. Wells v. Cody, 20 South. 381, 383, 112 Ala. 278.

No formal "assignment" of an account is necessary, any act showing an intent to transfer the party's interest being sufficient. Smith v. Sterritt, 24 Mo. 260, 262.

No particular form of words or written instrument is required by the law to constitute an "assignment" of an insurance policy. Any order, writing, or act which makes an appropriation of the fund amounts to an equitable assignment, and an oral or written declaration may be as effectual as the most formal instrument. Opitz v. Karel, 95 N. W. 948, 950, 118 Wis. 527, 62 L. R. A. 982 (citing Crooks v. First Nat. Bank, 83 Wis. 31, 52 N. W. 1131, 35 Am. St. Rep. 17).

Any transfer of property, whether by gift or otherwise, is in a general sense an "assignment." 1 Bouv. 155. True, there must be an actual delivery of the thing assigned, or its equivalent, such as a written evidence of the transfer, intending to vest thereby the subject of the transfer in present in the assignee, but it is not essential that the delivery shall be directly to the assignee. If the delivery is made to a third person with intent on the part of the assignor to surrender dominion over the thing assigned, and the assignee assents to the transaction, that is sufficient. Stoll v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 92 N. W. 277, 278, 115 Wis. 558.

As assignment for benefit of creditors.

The word "assignment," as used in Civ. Code, § 106, providing that, when cross-demands have existed between persons under such circumstances that if one had brought an action against the other a counterclaim could have been set up, neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the assignment or death of the other, does not mean an ordinary transfer of the claim or cause of action by the party in whose favor it exists, but rather in the sense in which it is employed in proceedings in bankruptcy and insolvency. Hade v. McVay, 31 Ohio St. 231, 238; Salladin v. Mitchell, 61 N. W. 127, 128, 42 Neb. 859.

The word "assignment," in Insolvency Act 1881, § 4, includes the proceeding by which the property of the insolvent is passed over to the receiver. Bliss v. Doty, 36 Minn. 168, 169, 30 N. W. 465, 466.

Within the meaning of Laws 1897, c. 418, § 15, declaring that no assignment of a building contract or money due thereunder shall be valid until the contract of assignment, or copy thereof, is filed by the county clerk of the county where the property is situated, the word "assignment" is to be construed as only meaning an ordinary assignment, and not an assignment for the benefit of creditors. An ordinary assignment and one for the benefit of creditors have nothing in common, save a partial similarity of name. Each belongs to an entirely different group of contracts, and disregarding words, and considering merely the idea, two entirely unrelated concepts result. To constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors, there must be voluntary transfer by a debtor of all his property to an assignee for the payment of his debts, and in this state the assignee is simply a trustee, and not the absolute owner. The material and essential characteristics of a general assignment is the presence of a trust. The assignee is merely trustee, and not absolute owner. He buys nothing and pays nothing, but takes the title for the performance of trustees. John P. Kane Co. v. Kinney, 71 N. Y. Supp. 8, 9.

As assignment of whole interest.

"An assignment is understood by the common law as a parting with the whole property." Potter v. Holland (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1154, 1156 (quoting 2 Bl. Comm. 326).

An "assignment" is a transfer or setting over of property, or of some right or interest therein, from one person to another, and, unless in some way qualified, it is properly the transfer of one whole interest in an estate or chattel or other thing. Where a policy of insurance forbids an assignment under penalty of forfeiture, it must be an absolute assignment or transfer, and a delivery as collateral security would not be such an assignment. Griffey v. New York Cent. Ins. Co., 3 N. E. 309, 311, 100 N. Y. 417, 53 Am. Rep. 202.

An "assignment of an estate" for life or for years is a transfer of the whole interest of the assignor to some one, other than the immediate reversioner or remainderman, holding an estate which is larger than that of the assignor. Scott's Ex'x v. Scott (Va.) 18 Grat. 150, 159, 160.

As change of title.

Assignment "means a class of acts by which the right or title to something is transferred to another before the object of the transfer has become property in possession, and a right under a contract, express or implied, which has not been reduced to possession, is therefore assignable, as a chose in action; but if the right has been reduced to possession, there is nothing left to transfer, and an assignment passes no property or rights thereof. So a passbook representing deposits made in a bank is assignable, and an assignment of the book transfers an equitable title to any deposits represented by the books." Cross v. Sacramento Sav. Bank, 6 Pac. 94, 96, 66 Cal. 462.

"Assignment is a setting away or transferring the interest a man hath in any action to another." Hutchings v. Low, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 246, 248 (quoting Jacob's Law Dict.).

The "assignment" of the interest in a lease is a sale of such interest, the parties then becoming joint owners of the lease and jointly liable thereon. Jackson v. O'Hara, 38 Atl. 624, 625, 183 Pa. 233.

The term "assignments and transfers," as used 5 Stat. U. S. 456, § 12, providing that all "assignments and transfers" of the right secured by such statute prior to the issuing of the patent for public lands under pre-emption laws shall be null and void, cannot be construed as meaning a conveyance with covenants for title and with warranty purporting to pass the fee simple of lands and tenements. The term "assignments and transfers" is used, when applied technically, to describe a transfer of an estate for years, or an equitable interest, or a chattel. Franklin v. Kelley, 2 Neb. 79, 88.

As a conveyance.

See "Conveyance."

Guaranty of payment implied.

"An 'assignment' is the appointing and setting over a right to another, and imports nothing more than that the assignor transferred to the assignee his interest in the bond assigned, with authority, before the statute making bonds assignable for the assignee, to sue in the name of the assignor, and after the statute in his own name, and no implied contract grows out of the transaction that the assignor will pay if the obligor is unable to." Garrettsie v. Van Ness, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 20, 30, 2 Am. Dec. 333.

An "assignment relates only to nonnegotiable securities." The assignor in effect agrees that the assignee shall recover the full amount of the bonds from the debtor, and if, after the exercise of due diligence, he is unable to do so, he, the assignor, will make good the amount received by him upon the assignment. In all cases the actual consideration may be shown, and this constitutes the measure of recovery by the assignee against the assignor. Welsh v. Ebersole, 75 Va. 651, 657.

An assignment neither includes nor implies becoming in any way a party to the payment, or responsible for the insolvency or default of the maker. Paine v. Smith, 24 N. W. 305, 307, 33 Minn. 495.

Change of beneficiaries of policy.

In a provision on the back of a certificate in a benefit society that in case of the "assignment" of the within certificate the beneficiary must consent thereto, and said assignment must be approved by the secretary, otherwise the assignment shall be void, the word "assignment" does not embrace a change of beneficiaries made by the assured, but means a formal transfer of the certificate from the insured to another person. Carpenter v. Knapp, 70 N. W. 764, 768, 101 Iowa, 712, 34 L. R. A. 128.

Consignment of goods for sale.

The terms, "assignment, transfer or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely or conditionally," in Gen. St. c. 118, § 89, forbidding any assignment, transfer, or conveyance, directly, indirectly, absolutely, or conditionally, by an insolvent debtor with a view to prefer a creditor, includes a consignment of goods to be sold for or on account of the consignor, and therefore such a consignment is prohibited by the statute if the consignee is authorized by it to apply the avails of the sales to the payment of a pre-existing debt which the consignor owes him. Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342, 344.

Check.

Devise.

Under a will by which testator provided that if a sale, "assignment," or pledge be made by any of his children of their interest in the property devised, it shall work a forfeiture thereof, the devise by one of such children of her share in such property is not an assignment of her share, within the meaning of this clause. The idea of an "assignment" is essentially that of transfer by one existing party to another existing party. Miller v. Worrall, 44 Atl. 890, 891, 50 N. J. Eq. 134.

Enforcement of lien distinguished.

The "assignment of a lien" is by no means the enforcement of a lien. The enforcement of a lien would follow the assignment of it, and would be a distinct and independent proceeding. Dorsey v. Omo, 48 Atl. 741, 743, 93 Md. 74.

Equitable assignment distinguished.

The distinction between legal assignments that may be enforced in an action at law and an equitable assignment that can only be enforced in an equitable action seems to be that an assignment to be valid as a legal assignment must be of a debt or fund in existence at the time, and of the whole thereof, or of a part of a debt or fund then in existence, and an assignment or order transferring the fund accepted by the debtor or person holding the fund; but in an equitable assignment of a specific debt or fund, or part thereof, it is not an essential element that the debt should have been earned or the fund be in esse at the time of the assignment, or that the assignment or order transferring the specific debt or fund, or part thereof, should be accepted by the debtor or holder of a specific fund. Sykes v. First Nat. Bank, 49 N. W. 1058, 1062, 2 S. D. 242.

To make a grant or assignment valid at law, the thing which is the subject of it must have an existence, actual or potential, at the time of such grant or assignment. A mere possibility is not assignable, but courts of equity support assignments not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests and expectations, and also of things which have no present, actual, potential existence, but rest in mere possibility only. Mitchell v. Winslow (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 527, 531.

As indorsement.

"Assignment" and "indorsement" are synonymous, and mean a transfer. State v. McLeran (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 311, 313.

The words "assignment" and "indorsement" are frequently used interchangeably. Buckner v. Real Estate Bank, 5 Ark. (5 Pike) 536, 41 Am. Dec. 105.

"Assignment," as applied to commercial paper, in its original sense means a transfer or conveyance of the right and title of the seller, and not an indorsement. Yet the term is frequently used to denote an indorsement. Undoubtedly the owner of a note may transfer his title thereto without becoming liable as an indorser, but the rule is that if he writes his name on the note, without words limiting his liability, he thereby becomes an indorser. Andrews v. Whitehead (Tex.) 60 S. W. 800, 801.

The word "assignment," as used in the statute prohibiting the assignment of a beneficiary certificate in a fraternal association, and requiring that in case of a change of beneficiaries the consent of the association shall be first had and a new certificate be issued, is equivalent to the word "indorsement," and relates only to the indorsement or transfer of such certificate, and not to the assignment of the claim thereunder which has accrued. Shuman v. Supreme Lodge Knights of Honor, 81 N. W. 717, 718, 110 Iowa, 480.

As to bonds and notes not negotiable, the legal title to them passes by assignment only, and as to them "indorsement" is not equivalent to "assignment." As to them assignment means more than indorsement; it means indorsement by one party with intent to assign, and the acceptance of that assignment by the other party. Bank of Mariette v. Pindall (Va.) 2 Rand. 465, 475.

An indorsement on a bill or note is not merely a transfer of title, but a fresh and substantive contract by which the indorser becomes a party to the bill or note, and liable for its payment on certain conditions. An "assignment" means a transfer of title. It neither includes nor implies becoming in any way a party to the payment, or responsible for the insolvency or default of the maker. Paine v. Smith, 24 N. W. 305, 307, 33 Minn. 495.

Lease or sublease distinguished.

An "assignment" is properly a transfer or making over to another of the right one has in any estate, and it differs from a lease only in that by a lease one grants an interest less than his own, reserving to himself a reversion, while in assignments he parts with the whole property. State v. Proprietors of Bridges over the Passaic and Hackensack, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 384, 389 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 317, 326).

An "assignment of a lease," as contradistinguished from a "sublease," signifies a party with a whole term, and whenever the whole term is made over by the lessee, though in the deed by which this is done the land and power of re-entry for nonpayment are reserved to the lessee, the indorsement amounts to an assignment, and not a sublease. Craig v. Summers, 49 N. W. 742, 743, 47 Minn. 189, 15 L. R. A. 236 (citing 1 Wood. Landl. & Ten. [Am. Ed.] § 258); Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 458, 86 Am. Dec. 394.

There is a marked difference between an assignment of a lease and a sublease. By an assignment the lessor parts with his whole interest in the estate, whereas by a sublease he grants an interest less than his own, reserving to himself a reversion. A lease of a part only of leased premises is a sublease, and not an assignment of a lease. Shannon v. Grindstaff, 40 Pac. 123, 124, 11 Wash. 536.

If a tenant parts with the demised premises for the whole of his term, although his deed purports an underlease, yet it is in legal effect an assignment of the lease. Thus, where a lessee leases the premises to another for a term longer than the limit of his lease, such lease amounts to an assignment of his lease. Mulligan v. Hollingsworth (U. S.) 99 Fed. 216, 222.

An "assignment," as applied to leasehold interests, is properly defined to be a transfer or making over to another of the right one has in the unexpired residue of a term or estate for years. An "assignment," as contradistinguished from an "underlease," signifies a parting with the whole term. Where an alienor, by any instrument whatever, whether reserving conditions or not, parts with his entire interest, he has made a complete assignment; or, if he has transferred his entire interest in a part of the domicile, he has made an assignment pro tanto; if he retains a reversion in himself, he has made a sublease. Thus, where the holder of a leasehold interest in premises, part of which defendant held under a sublease for five years, executed to plaintiff an instrument which purported to be a lease of a portion of the premises held by the defendant for the same five years, such instrument operated as an assignment of the lease held by defendant, and not as a sublease to plaintiff. Stover v. Chasse, 28 N. Y. Supp. 740, 741, 6 Misc. Rep. 394.

Mortgage or pledge.

Pledge distinguished, see "Pledge."

"Assignment," as used in a fire insurance policy prohibiting the assignment of a policy without the consent in writing of the insurance company, means a transfer of the title to and a control over the property insured, and cannot be construed as including a deposit of the policy of insurance with a creditor of the assured as a security, collateral or original, for a debt. Ellis v. Kreutzinger, 27 Mo. 311, 314, 72 Am. Dec. 270.

"Assignments," as used in a statute providing that conveyances and assignments made in contemplation of insolvency shall be void, does not include a mortgage. Bates v. Coe, 10 Conn. 280, 294.

As the word "assignment" in Rev. St. § 6343, providing that all assignments in trust to a trustee or trustees, made in contemplation of insolvency, with intent to prefer one or more creditors, shall inure to the benefit of all, etc., embraces every form of conveyance that will operate to transfer title to property, it includes a deed of all the debtor's property, and the contemporaneously executed written agreement authorizing the grantee to sell and convey the same, and to apply the proceeds thereof in a manner which will prefer certain creditors. Maas v. Miller, 51 N. E. 153, 162, 58 Ohio St. 483.

Payment of pre-existing debt.

The words "conveyance," "transfer," "assignment" or "incumbrance," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 67, 30 Stat. 564 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3449], providing that all "conveyances, transfers, assignments or incumbrances of his property or any part thereof made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of a petition with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors shall be void," applies to a transfer or incumbrance of property, real or personal, rather than to the payment of money upon a pre-existing debt. Blakey v. Boonville Nat. Bank (U. S.) 95 Fed. 267, 268.

Seal unnecessary.

An "assignment" does not, like the term "deed" or "specialty," signify an instrument under seal. A mere written assignment, founded upon a valuable consideration, is just as available for the purpose of passing to the assignee the equitable title to land as an instrument under seal. Barrett v. Hinckley, 14 N. E. 863, 864, 124 Ill. 32, 7 Am. St. Rep. 331.

Subrogation distinguished.

See "Subrogation."

Transfer of land.

In the law of contracts the word "assignment" seems to be broad enough to include the transfer of an interest in lands and tenements. Tiede v. Schneidt, 81 N. W. 826, 827, 105 Wis. 470.

Transfer to partner.

The word "assignment," as used in a fire insurance policy insuring partnership property, and providing that there shall be no assignment of the interest of the insured without the consent of the company in writing, means an assignment to a stranger, and not an assignment by one of the partners to the other, for, when underwriting for a firm, the insurers will be presumed to know and be satisfied with each and every of its members. They are also presumed to know that on the death of either of two partners, the survivor for all purposes becomes the sole legal, and on a favorable state of the account the sole equitable, owner of the partnership assets. They know, too, that on a voluntary dissolution of the firm, if one partner has drawn out more than his share, the other will thereby have been made the sole owner of the assets remaining. They therefore agree in effect that a transfer of the interest from one partner to another is within the original understanding, and that it shall form no objection, in case of loss, to the right of recovery. It is an assent necessarily implied from the nature of the contract, and given in advance. Wilson v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 511, 512.

Of lease.

Act Feb. 15, 1844, authorizing receivers to sell the real estate and franchises of the corporation, and providing that nothing contained in the act should be construed to invalidate "any existing lease made by said company or assignment thereof," means only "the transfer of the interest of the tenant, and not an assignment of a claim for rent by the landlord." Potts v. Trenton Water Power Co., 9 N. J. Eq. (1 Stockt.) 592, 618.

Of patent.

The "assignment of a patent" is not a public document, but is merely a private writing. City of New York v. American Cable R. Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 1016, 9 C. C. A. 336.

Of rents and profits.

In Ex parte Willis, 1 Ves. Jr. 162, Lord Thurlow said "that an assignment of rents and profits is an odd way of conveying, but it amounts to an equitable lien, and would entitle the assignee to come into equity and insist upon a mortgage." Allen v. Gates, 50 Atl. 1092, 1094, 73 Vt. 222.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

See "Common-Law Assignment"; "General Assignment"; "Partial Assignment"; "Voluntary Assignment."

An assignment "is the transfer of property to a trustee, to be converted into money, and the proceeds thus realized to be appropriated to the payment of debts." Van Patten v. Burr, 3 N. W. 524, 528, 52 Iowa, 518.

An "assignment for the benefit of creditors" is an absolute, unconditional, and irrevocable conveyance of the legal title to the real estate of the insolvent to the assignee in trust for the benefit of the creditors. Prouty v. Clark, 34 N. W. 614, 615, 73 Iowa, 55.

An "assignment" is a transfer by a debtor, without compulsion of law, of some or all of his property to an assignee or assignees, in trust, to apply the same or the proceeds thereof to the payment of some or all of his debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Blackford, 51 S. W. 978, 980, 2 Ind. T. 370 (citing Turner v. Watkins, 31 Ark. 437).

"Assignment for the benefit of creditors," according to the common acceptance of the term, is a transfer, without compulsion of law, by a debtor of his property to an assignee, in trust, to apply the same or the proceeds thereof to the payment of his debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. As to the form and contents of it, it has always been understood in this state to be a written deed of conveyance executed by the assignor as party of the first part to the assignee as the party of the second part, reciting the grantor's indebtedness and inability to pay, and conveying his property, real and personal, by apt words of sale and transfer, to the assignee, in trust, to take possession of and sell the same and to collect the outstanding debts, and out of the proceeds to pay the creditors. Farwell v. Nilsson, 24 N. E. 74, 75, 133 Ill. 45 (citing Farwell v. Cohen, 21 Chl. Leg. N. 359, 28 N. E. 35, 33, 138 Ill. 216, 19 L. R. A. 281).

"Assignment," as used in the act of 1836 relating to assignments for benefit of creditors, includes any transfer of a man's property in trust for the payment of his debts, without regard to the particular form of the conveyance. Appeal of Johnson, 103 Pa. 373, 377.

If a conveyance or mortgage is given to secure others than the particular creditor to whom the property was conveyed or mortgaged, and was made in contemplation of insolvency, it becomes in law an "assignment," and inures to the benefit of all of the creditors of the grantor. First Nat. Bank v. F. C. Trebein Co., 52 N. E. 834, 838, 59 Ohio St. 316 (citing Pendery v. Allen, 50 Ohio St. 121, 33 N. E. 716, 19 L. R. A. 367; Gashe v. Young, 51 Ohio St. 376, 38 N. E. 20).

Any transfer by a trader or merchant of all his stock and business, when it covers substantially all his property, may be an "assignment," within the meaning of a policy of insurance against loss on sales sustained by the insolvency of debtors who have assigned for the benefit of creditors, in spite of its form or the name given to it. Thus, where a debtor conveyed all his property to pay or secure his debts, and at once ceased to do business, and the property was delivered, it constituted an "assignment" within the meaning of the policy. People v. Mercantile Credit Guarantee Co., 60 N. E. 24, 26, 166 N. Y. 416 (citing Brown v. Guthrie, 110 N. Y. 435, 441, 18 N. E. 254; Britton v. Lorenz, 45 N. Y. 51; Dana v. Lull, 17 Vt. 390; Kendall v. Bishop, 76 Mich. 634, 43 N. W. 645; White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 9 Sup. Ct. 309, 32 L. Ed. 677).

"Assignments," as used in Act 1884, amending Gen. St., regulating assignments by insolvent debtors by providing that in all assignments made in pursuance of this act wages and salaries owing to employees shall be preferred, is to be construed as being used in the proper sense of the transfer and trust which the written instrument makes effectual, and not as simply meaning the written instrument, or the instrument necessary to effect such assignment. Richardson v. Thurber, 11 N. E. 133, 134, 104 N. Y. 606.

Assignments for the benefit of creditors are substantially like wills, unilateral arrangements in all their essential particulars, the assignor himself declaring the extent and conditions of the grant so far as the law allows, an assignee having no part in the matter, except the simple acceptance of the trust as created. Appeal of Fallon, 42 Pa. (6 Wright) 235, 256.

The word "assignment," as used in Act March 5, 1859, relating to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, is used in its ordinary sense as meaning the transfer of property by the owner, and the statute, therefore, does not prevent a debtor from making a contract with his creditors by which his property is conveyed to trustees to be disposed of for his own benefit as well as that of his creditors. Robbins v. Magee, 76 Ind. 381, 385.

Attachment distinguished.

Assignment in insolvency is a sequestration of all the debtor's property to pay all his creditors pro rata, as distinguished from attachment, which is a sequestration to pay a single debt. Maltbie v. Hotchkiss, 38 Conn. 80, 85, 9 Am. Rep. 364.

Bill of sale distinguished.

See "Bill of Sale."

Conditional transfer.

A voluntary assignment is an instrument in writing, executed by a failing debtor, by which he assigns to a third person as assignee the whole or the bulk of his property, to be by him distributed among the assignor's creditors in satisfaction of their demands. In order to constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the property must be conveyed to an assignee authorized to sell it, absolutely, and not on a contingency, to distribute the proceeds among creditors. The conveyance or assignment must pass both the legal and the equitable title, with no right of redemption in the debtor. A conveyance direct to several creditors whose debts it secures, as well as trustees named, providing that the trustee is not to sell it absolutely, but only on a contingency, is not an assignment for the benefit of creditors, but is in effect a mere mortgage. Blackman v. Metropolitan Dairy Co., 77 Ill. App. 609, 610.

As a conveyance.

See "Conveyance."

Deed of trust or mortgage distinguished.

The distinction between a "mortgage" and an "assignment" exists principally in the interest which the mortgagor retains in the property, namely, his equity of redemption. An assignment is intended as a payment, and a mortgage as security; but the equity of redemption in the mortgage, and the absence of it in the assignment, is their distinguished feature of difference. Stites v. Champion, 24 Atl. 403, 406, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 446; Farmers' & Traders' Bank v.

Martin, 33 S. W. 565, 566, 96 Tenn. (12 Pickle) 1; Warner v. Littlefield, 50 N. W. 721, 724, 89 Mich. 329.

As distinguished from "deeds of trust," an "assignment" is more than a security for the payment of debts. It is an absolute appropriation of property to their payment. The distinction is that an assignment is a conveyance to the trustee for the purpose of raising funds to pay a debt, while a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage is a conveyance in trust for the purpose of securing a debt, subject to a condition of defeasance. Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 10 Sup. Ct. 1013, 1016, 136 U. S. 223, 34 L. Ed. 341; Sandusky v. Faris, 38 S. E. 563, 573, 49 W. Va. 150; Crow v. Beardsley, 68 Mo. 435, 437.

In discussing the difference between a "mortgage" and a "deed of trust," the court said: "A mortgage being merely intended as security for a debt, gives, under our system at least, merely a lien upon the property, with or without power of sale, leaving an equity of redemption in the mortgagor, and the surplus, if any, after the payment of the debt, within the reach of his creditors by due process of law. An assignment, on the other hand, conveys to the assignee the entire estate of the assignor in the property, to be disposed of by the trustee in such manner as the assignor may have lawfully directed. The mortgagor may vacate the mortgage at any time by the payment of a debt, but by an assignment the property passes beyond the control of the assignor in any event. It is true that, should a surplus remain after paying the debt, a trust would result in favor of the assignor, and the assignee would hold for his benefit." Schneider v. Bagley, 24 S. W. 1116, 1117, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 226; Adams v. Bateman (Tex.) 29 S. W. 1124, 1126; Lochte v. Blum, 30 S. W. 925, 927, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 385. Thus a conveyance by an insolvent partner to a trustee of all his property to convert into cash and to pay certain preferred debts, and then to distribute the remainder pro rata among other creditors, and with no claim or defeasance therein, is an assignment, and not a mortgage. Schneider v. Bagley, 24 S. W. 1116, 1117, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 226. An instrument conveying all the property of an insolvent to another, and giving him power to sell the property and pay the debts, and return the balance to the grantor, is a statutory assignment, and not a mortgage. Lochte v. Blum, 30 S. W. 925, 927, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 385. An instrument conveying all of insolvent's property for the purpose of securing all his debts, and providing that after the debts are paid the property remaining in the hands of the grantee shall be returned to the grantor, is a mortgage, and not an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Adams v. Bateman (Tex.) 29 S. W. 1124, 1126.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors is more than a security for the payment of debts; it is an absolute appropriation of property for their payment. It does not create a lien in favor of the creditors upon the property, which in equity is still regarded as the assignor's, but it passes both the legal and equitable title absolutely beyond the control of the assignor, and the trust which results to the assignor in the unemployed balance does not indicate such an equity. An assignment for the benefit of creditors implies an actual transfer of the property to an assignee or trustees, so that the assignor is divested of all control over it. Sandusky v. Faris, 38 S. E. 563, 573, 49 W. Va. 150; Sandmeyer v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 50 N. W. 353, 355, 2 S. D. 346; Martin v. Hausman (U. S.) 14 Fed. 160, 165; Stiles v. Champion, 24 Atl. 403, 406, 49 N. J. Eq. 446. Hence a deed of trust of a debtor's property to a trustee, to have and hold the same to secure the payment of an indebtedness to one of his creditors, the trustee to proceed at once to realize from such property at either public or private sale for cash, keeping an accurate account of all goods so sold and the amount realized therefrom, as well as all expenses, and apply the proceeds of such sales to pay, first, the cost and expenses, and the balance pro rata upon the indebtedness as it matured until the whole should be paid, and when fully paid the deed of trust to be released, is an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors, whether named in the instrument or not, and the property cannot be applied exclusively to the debt of the beneficiary in the so-called "trust deed." Martin v. Hausman (U. S.) 14 Fed. 160, 165.

In Hembree v. Blackburn, 16 Or. 153, 19 Pac. 73, the court, in holding that a mortgage upon all of the property of a firm was not an assignment, said: "The distinction, however, is clearly defined. A mortgage, or deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, is a security for a deed. An assignment is more than that. It is an absolute appropriation of property to the payment of debts. A mortgage creates a lien upon property in favor of the creditor, leaving the equity of redemption still the property of the debtor, and liable to sale or incumbrance by him, so that a mortgage containing a defeasance clause and a reservation to the insolvent over the mortgaged property under default in paying the debt is not an assignment for the benefit of creditors." Beall v. Cowan (U. S.) 75 Fed. 139, 144, 21 C. C. A. 267.

An assignment is a transfer by a debtor, without compulsion of law, of some or all of his property to an assignee or assignees in trust, to apply the same, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of some or all of his debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. "A mortgage is a security against the default of a debtor in the payment of his debts. We do not hold that the giving of one or more mortgages, the confession of judgments, or other means adopted to give security or preference, constitute necessarily, or even ordinarily, an assignment. But what we do hold is that where one or more instruments are executed by a debtor, in whatsoever form or by whatsoever name, with the intention of having them operate as an assignment, and with the intention of granting the property conveyed absolutely to the trustee to raise a fund to pay debts, the transaction constitutes an assignment." Mr. Justice Walker, in Turner v. Watkins, 31 Ark. 429, 437 (cited in Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Blackford, 51 S. W. 978, 980, 2 Ind. T. 370).

The general distinction between a "mortgage" and an "assignment" is well understood. The one is intended to secure, the other to satisfy, a debt. A mortgage contemplates a personal effort to pay the debt, or at least reserves the right, by doing so, to restore the mortgagor's title. An assignment, on the other hand, implies a surrender of his property to his creditors, without the hope of redeeming it. The form of the two instruments is quite similar. If the instrument on its face is ambiguous, it may be read in the light of surrounding circumstances, to see whether it is really a mortgage or an assignment. Where a deed of trust was made payable on demand, and the grantor was unable to continue business, and the trustee was authorized to take immediate possession, such facts do not of themselves convert a mortgage into an assignment. The controlling guide is the intention of the parties at the time the instrument was executed. Marquese v. Felsenthal, 24 S. W. 493, 494, 55 Ark. 293.

The essential elements of an assignment are that there shall be an actual transfer of the property of the debtor to another in trust for the payment of creditors, with either an express or an implied provision that the surplus, if any, shall be returned to the assignor. A mortgage is the transfer of the property of a debtor as security for the payment of one or more obligations, with a condition, expressed or implied, that on payment of the debt the title reverts to the mortgagor. A sale is an absolute transfer of the property to the vendee. Much of the language used in an instrument belonging to one of these classes will be found in the others, and the court must determine in each instance the real intent of the party, in order to determine which is intended. Smith-McCord Dry Goods Co. v. Carson, 52 Pac. 880, 882, 59 Kan. 295.

An instrument purported to be entered into between a certain person of the first part, and a certain person of the second part, and the several persons, creditors of the party of the first part, who have executed, or shall hereafter execute or accede to, these presents.

It then recited that the party of the first part was indebted to certain persons, which indebtedness he was unable to pay, and was desirous of conveying his property for the benefit of his creditors, and then proceeded to convey to a party of the second part all of his property of every description, except exempt property, to have and to hold the same, in trust and confidence, to sell and dispose of the property and collect said choses in action, using reasonable discretion, and from the proceeds to pay expenses, to distribute and pay the remainder thereof to and among the parties of the third part ratably in proportion to their respective debts, and pay over the surplus, after paying all parties of the third part in full, to the party of the first part, his executors, administrators, and assigns. It was held that this instrument was a mortgage or deed of trust, as distinguished from a statutory assignment. Prouty v. Musquiz (Tex.) 59 S. W. 568, 569.

An "assignment" is a making over or transfer of property, and hence, where a debtor made a deed conveying his property in trust to a third person for the benefit of his creditors, such transaction was an assignment of his property, and the third person to whom it was transferred is the assignee thereof, though the instrument was called a "trust deed," and conveyed the property as trust property, in trust. Schee v. La Grange, 42 N. W. 616, 618, 78 Iowa, 101.

A conveyance which passes the legal title to a trustee, to be immediately sold, and directs that the proceeds shall be applied to the payment of a debt, is generally held by other courts to be an assignment. An instrument which is intended merely to secure a debt is, on the other hand, usually held to be a mortgage, and this distinction has become the recognized rule. Hence an instrument conveying all of an insolvent's property to secure all his debts, and providing that after the debts are paid the remaining property shall be returned to the grantor, is a mortgage, and not an assignment for creditors. Adams v. Bateman, 30 S. W. 855, 88 Tex. 130.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors is a transfer of a debtor's property for the purpose of having the same applied as far as the same will go in satisfaction of the debts of the assignor. It need not necessarily be an assignment in name for the benefit of creditors, nor need it be by any one instrument. Thus, a mortgage, or several mortgages taken together, with or without an assignment proper, given as a part of one transaction, may constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors, if it was thereby intended by the debtor to transfer all of his property for the payment of his debts. Burrows v. Lehdorff, 8 Iowa (8 Clarke) 96.

"Assignment," as the term is used to denote a conveyance for the benefit of the grantor's creditors, is any conveyance by which a grantor parts with the title to his property in order that the same might be administered by the grantee for the payment of the grantor's debts; and hence a chattel mortgage with power of sale, together with a stipulation that the mortgagee shall pay certain debts of the mortgagor, constituted an assignment. Kiser v. Dannenberg, 15 S. E. 17, 20, 88 Ga. 541.

Dissolution of corporation distinguished.

A petition for a voluntary dissolution of a corporation is not an assignment for the benefit of creditors. One important difference between the two proceedings is that a general assignment usually implies insolvency; a voluntary dissolution does not. The latter course is frequently resorted to where a solvent corporation desires to go out of business. In re Empire Metallic Redstead Co. (U. S.) 95 Fed. 957, 965.

As judicial proceeding.

See "Judicial Proceeding."

Levy of execution equivalent.

An assignment for the benefit of creditors of an insolvent debtor is the equivalent for the protection of their rights against prior mortgages to the levy, of execution on the property at the suit of each of the creditors, and operates as the seizure of the property by legal process in behalf of each and all of the creditors from the date of the assignment. Besuden v. Besuden, 49 N. E. 1024, 1025, 57 Ohio St. 508.

Relation of debtor and creditor implied.

An "assignment" implies the relation of debtor and creditor between the assignor and those to be benefited by the assignment, and that the consideration is an existing debt or liability, and contemplates that the debtor thereby divests himself of his property for the benefit of one or more of his creditors; and hence a sale or mortgage for a present consideration, and not on account of a pre-existing debt or obligation, is not an assignment, technically speaking, nor within the meaning of Rev. St. § 3466 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2314], providing that whenever any person indebted to the United States is insolvent the debt to the United States shall be first satisfied, and that the priority shall extend to cases in which a debtor who has not sufficient property to pay his debts makes a voluntary assignment of it. United States v. Griswold (U. S.) 8 Fed. 496, 501.

Sale distinguished.

See "Sale."

Solvency of grantor, effect of.

When any person makes a transfer of property, money, rights, or credits to a trust-tee in trust for the benefit of creditors, such transfer constitutes an assignment under Rev. St. c. 4, tit. 2, pt. 3. Even though the maker of such transfer should be fully solvent, still the transfer will be held to be an assignment, if it is made to a trustee in trust for the benefit of creditors. Any instrument which by a transfer of property creates a trust in a trustee for the benefit of creditors is an assignment, and its form in other respects is not material. A deed conveying real property to a trustee in trust for the benefit of creditors constitutes an assignment, and such deed, or a copy thereof, should be filed in the probate court at the time of making such deed. Wambaugh v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 52 N. E. 339, 841, 59 Ohio St. 228.

As a transfer in general.

See "Transfer."

Transfer to creditor.

An assignment made directly to the creditors, either as collateral security or in satisfaction of the assignor's debt, is not an assignment in trust within the meaning of Act March 24, 1818, relating to voluntary assignments to any person in trust for the use of his creditors. Chaffees v. Risk, 24 Pa. (12 Harris) 432, 433.

As a transfer of entire estate of debtor.

An instrument which shows that it was not the intention of the maker to convey all of his property subject to execution, nor for the benefit of all his creditors, is not an assignment for the benefit of creditors within the assignment law of the state. Martin-Brown Co. v. Siebe, 26 S. W. 327, 329, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 232.

An assignment, whether statutory or common-law, conveys to the assignee the entire estate of the assignor. It vests the title in the assignee, which cannot be divested by mere payment of the debts. If the debts be satisfied, the assignee would hold the balance of the applied estate in trust for the assignor. If the instrument on its face, when construed according to the settled rules of construction in this state, does not pass the title of the assignor to the assignee, it cannot be held to be an assignment, but must be held to be a mortgage. Tittle v. Vanleer, 29 S. W. 1065, 1066, 89 Tex. 174, 37 L. R. A. 337 (citing Watterman v. Silberberg, 67 Tex. 100, 101, 2 S. W. 578).

An assignment for the benefit of creditors, since the act of 1843, may be defined to be a transfer by a debtor of the whole or part of his effects to some person in trust to pay all his creditors in like proportions, and return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. Wiener v. Davis, 18 Pa. (6 Harris) 331, 333.

Transfer of specific fund.

The assignment to a trustee or agent of a specific fund to pay a particular debt is not such an assignment for the benefit of creditors as the statute requires shall be acknowledged and lodged for record. Bottoms v. McFerran (Ky.) 43 S. W. 236, 237.

The assignment of a specified fund to one creditor to secure his debt due is not a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. Deane v. John A. Tolman Co., 83 Ill. App. 486.

Trust implied.

To constitute an assignment in trust for the benefit of creditors within the meaning of Act March 24, 1818, there must be a transfer of the property assigned to another—more than mere transmission of its custody or management. The form is not material, but there must be a trust created for the creditor which is enforceable. Beans v. Bullett, 57 Pa. (7 P. F. Smith) 221, 229.

Code, § 977, provides that no "general assignment" of property by an insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, for the benefit of creditors of the assignor, shall be valid unless it be made for the benefit of all his creditors, etc. Held, that the word "assignment" as here used has acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning, which means a transfer to another of the property of an insolvent, to be administered for the benefit of his creditors. It is a technical word, and implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. Cowles v. Ricketts, 1 Iowa (1 Clarke) 582, 585.

"Voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors or otherwise are transfers without compulsion of law by debtors of some or all of their property to an assignee or assignees in trust to apply the same, or the proceeds thereof, to the payment of some or all of their debts, and to return the surplus, if any, to the debtor. There must be a trust, a trustee, creditors, and cestui que trust, who can compel an enforcement of the trust in order to constitute an assignment for the benefit of creditors. It implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. Assignments directly to creditors, and not upon trusts, are not voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors." Maxwell v. Simonton, 51 N. W. 869, 871, 81 Wis. 635.

A voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. Assignments directly to creditors, and not upon trust, are not voluntary assignments for the benefit of the creditors. Unless a trust is thereby created by the assignor in favor of creditors, such conveyances are not within the class of instruments known as "assignments for creditors," and hence a mortgage of a debtor's property to separate parties for the security of good-faith indebtedness, in which there was no express or implied agreement or arrangement for trustee, and no trust created in favor of creditors, and did not convey all the debtor's property, is not an assignment for the benefit of the creditors. Sheldon v. Mann, 48 N. W. 573, 577, 85 Mich. 265.

ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER.

The assignment of dower is not a conveyance, but the dowress, by intendment of law, is in by her husband. The only object to be accomplished by the assignment is to give the widow a right of entry and to define the boundaries of her possessions, the allotment conferring upon her no new right to the land, and, after the dower is assigned, her seizure relates back to the date of the death of her husband, and the antecedent seizure of the heir, which took effect on the death of the husband, is considered as never having had an existence, and she is, in contemplation of law, the immediate successor in title to the husband. Bettis v. McNider, 34 South. 813, 814, 137 Ala. 588.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

See "Specific Assignment of Error."

An assignment of errors is a specification of the errors on which the appellant relies for a reversal of the case with such fullness as may be necessary to give aid to the court in the examination of the transcript. Squires v. Foorman, 10 Cal. 298, 299.

An assignment of error is a pleading upon which an issue is made in an appellate court or in an appellate proceeding upon which an issue is made by demurrer, joinder, or plea. Wells v. Martin, 1 Ohio St. 386, 388.

An assignment of error actually means the marking or pointing out of the error. Franz Falk Brewing Co. v. Mielenz, 37 N. W. 728, 5 Dak. 136, 138; State v. Chapman, 47 N. W. 411, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432. Assignments of error should be so framed as to enable the court to readily discern without aid of argument what particular errors are relied on. Hedlun v. Holy Terror Min. Co. (S. D.) 92 N. W. 31, 36.

The purpose of an assignment of errors is to apprise the opposite counsel and the court of the particular legal points relied upon for a reversal of the judgment of the trial court. Hence an attempt to make the assignment of errors more particular in the brief is not proper. Lloyd v. Chapman (U. S.) 93 Fed. 599, 600, 35 C. C. A. 474 (citing Doe v. Waterloo Min. Co. [U. S.] 17 C. C. A. 190, 196, 70 Fed. 455, 456).

The office of an assignment of error is to notify the opposite party of the particular action of the court below complained of, and, if the assignment does not specify the alleged error, it will be insufficient; and therefore an assignment as follows, "as shown in the bill of exceptions," is void for uncertainty, and will not be noticed by the Supreme Court. Smith v. Williams, 36 Miss. 545, 547.

The assignment of errors is a pleading filed by the party complaining of the errors of the judge, and each assignment should be single, and not multifarious, for that reason. A general objection to evidence stating no reason is insufficient. A general objection to a charge is of no value. The bill must show that the precise point of which a review is sought was made by the counsel, presented to the mind of the court, and decided before bail was sealed. If it do that, it is sufficient. Associates of Jersey Co. v. Davison, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 415, 418.

The object of an assignment of errors is to point to the specific error claimed to have been committed by the court below for which the judgment should be reversed, so as to obviate the necessity of the discussion by the opposite party, and the examination by the court, of all the questions which may have been raised on the trial of the case in the lower court. Clements v. Hearne, 45 Tex. 415, 416.

An assignment of error is in the nature of a declaration or complaint, and to permit a party to assign one class of errors and to argue another would be to countenance connivance and unfair practice. Hollingsworth v. State, 8 Ind. 257, 258.

An assignment of error constitutes the appellant's complaint or cause of action in the Supreme Court. In the absence of such an assignment, it is not informed in any legal manner of what supposed errors the appellant complains, or upon what grounds the judgment below is sought to be reversed. Pruitt v. Edinburg, F. R. & N. Turnpike Co. 71 Ind. 244; Deputy v. Hill, 85 Ind. 75, 76; Williams v. Riley, 88 Ind. 290, 293.

An assignment of errors on appeal is appellant's pleading tendering an issue of law. It might be said to be the very foundation upon which he rests his right to require the court to examine and review the errors imputed to the trial court. Rubey v. Hough (Ind.) 67 N. E. 257.

An assignment of error in the Appellate Court performs the same office as a declaration in the lower court. Lang v. Max, 50 Ill. App. 465, 466.

An assignment of error in the Supreme Court performs the same office as a declaration in a court of original jurisdiction. It would be just as regular and proper for the circuit court to render a judgment in a cause where there is no declaration as for this court to affirm or reverse a judgment where there is no assignment of errors. Ditch v. Sennott, 5 N. E. 395, 396, 116 Ill. 288.

An assignment of errors is in the nature of a declaration. Error in law and error in fact cannot be regularly assigned together in an assignment of errors. If it be attempted, the assignment will be bad for duplicity, and subject to a special demurrer. Several errors of the same class may be assigned, but error in law and error in fact cannot be assigned in the same cause, for they are distinct matters and require different trials. Acker v. Ledyard (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 677.

In practice an assignment of error is the statement of the case of the plaintiff setting forth the error complained of. It corresponds with the declaration in an ordinary action. All the errors of which the plaintiff complains should be set forth and assigned in distinct terms, so that the defendant may plead to them. An assignment of error is in the nature of a declaration, and is either of errors in fact or in law. A brief cannot be treated as an assignment of error, for a brief is an abridged statement of the party's case—a summary of the points or questions in issue. In general legal usage, a brief is in no sense a pleading. It contains a statement of the facts shown by the record, and the points, authorities, and arguments relied upon to sustain the contention presented for consideration. Lamy v. Lamy, 12 Pac. 650 4 N. M. (Johns.) 43.

ASSIGNOR

"In its popular sense an assignor is one who transfers a right of action not transferable at common law." Clement v. Adams (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 163, 164.

Whoever may transfer the whole of a particular estate is an assignor, whether the estate be personal or real property, or the assignment be by deed or parol. Glasford v. Baker, 1 Wash. T. 224, 227 (citing Whart. Law Dict. 69; Bouv. Law Dict. pp. 133, 134).

In law, he who pays or lends a bank note or transfers anything in action, negotiable at common law, is an assignor. It is in this sense that the word "assignor" is used in Code, § 399, relating to the examination of parties to actions or special proceedings, and providing that the assignor of a thing in action shall not be examined in respect to any transaction, etc. Potter v. Bushnell (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 94, 96.

Indorser of note.

An indorser of a note is not an assignor of a thing in action, within the meaning of Code, § 399, relating to the examination of parties to actions, and providing that the assignor of a thing in action shall not be examined, etc. Hicks v. Wirth (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 555, 558; Porter v. Potter, 18 N. Y. 52, 53; Jagoe v. Alleyn (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 580, 582.

1 Wds. & P.—37

Under a statute declaring that, when an assignor of a thing in action or contract is examined as a witness on the behalf of any person deriving title through or from him, the adverse party may offer himself as a witness to the same matter in his own behalf, it is held that a person transferring by delivery a promissory note payable to bearer is an "assignor," within the meaning of the statute. It is true, says the court, the usual term applied to the parties transferring negotiable paper is not "assignor," nor is the usual term applied to the act of transfer assignment, but the words "indorser," "bearer," "transfer," and "negotiate," are the proper mercantile terms. But assignor of a thing in action or contract comprehends a much larger class of contracts than mercantile paper, and must also include them. So the word "assignment" means the conveyance of the interest a man has in an estate or chose in action, and is more comprehensive than the term "indorse and negotiate," or the like mercantile words, applied to negotiable paper. Bump v. Van Orsdale (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 634, 638.

As the term is used in Rev. St. c. 137, § 51, prohibiting the "assignor" of a thing in action from testifying in an action brought thereon, it applies only to the assignors of such things in action as were made assignable at law by the Code, and were not so previously, and which the assignee, contrary to former rules, was authorized to prosecute in his own name, and hence does not include one who transfers a promissory note or bill by indorsement or delivery. McConnell v. McCracken, 14 Wis. 83, 85, 86; McHose v. Cain, 22 Wis. 486, 487.

Where an indebtedness evidenced by a note is barred by a discharge in bankruptcy, but the debtor renews the claim by a new promise to pay it, and the holder afterwards indorses and delivers the note to another, the transfer of the right to bring action on the note, accompanying its indorsement and delivery, constitutes the person so transferring the note an assignor, so that when the debtor is sued on the note by the subsequent holder, and the prior holder is introduced to prove the new promise to pay, the defendant, under section 397 of the Code, becomes a competent witness as to the same matter. Clark v. Atkinson, 2 El. D. Smith, 112, 116.

ASSIGNS.

See "Heirs and Assigns."

"Assigns" is a word comprehending all those who take either immediately or remotely from or under the assignor, whether by conveyance, devise, descent, or act of law. Baily v. De Crespigny, 10 Best & S. 1, 12; Brown v. Crookston Agricultural Ass'n, 28 N. W. 907, 908, 34 Minn. 545.

The word "assigns," as used in How. St. Mich. § 7545, providing that in a suit in which the heirs, assigns, or personal representatives of a decedent are parties, the opposite party, if examined as a witness in his own behalf, shall not be permitted to testify, etc., means "a person to whom any property or right is transferred by a deceased person in his lifetime." Ripley v. Seligman, 50 N. W. 143, 145, 88 Mich. 177.

The term "assigns" means those who are assigned, deputed, or appointed, by the act of the party or the operation of law, to do any act or enjoy a benefit on their own account or risk. Smith v. Baxter, 49 Atl. 1130, 62 N. J. Eq. 209.

"Assigns" means those to whom rights have been transmitted by particular title, such as sale, donations, legacy, transfer, or cession. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 5.

The word "assigns," when used in an agreement to pay to H. or his assigns a certain sum of money, in consideration that he shall give a lease of certain rooms for the use of a post office at a lower rate of rent than an adequate compensation for such premises, means any person or persons to whom the property might be transferred before the execution of the lease, and cannot refer to persons who might succeed to the title afterwards, because no lease from them would be necessary. Sanborn v. First Nat. Bank, 47 Pac. 660, 661, 9 Colo. App. 245.

The word "assigns" in a deed by a land agent to the heirs and assigns of a certain person, executed in pursuance of a legislative resolve, that a certain amount of land be granted to each revolutionary soldier, indicates that the purpose of the deed is to affirm a prior title, to whomsoever the owner of that title might have assigned it. Banton v. Crosby, 50 Atl. 86, 87, 95 Me. 429.

"Assigns," as used in a mortgage authorizing the mortgagee, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to sell the premises therein conveyed in case of default, does not authorize the trustee to assign the estate to a stranger, nor, if assigned, does it authorize the stranger to execute the power of sale. Bitter v. Calhoun (Tex.) 8 S. W. 523, 525.

"Assigns," as used in Act 1870, providing that the act should be held to constitute an irrevocable contract between the railroad company, whose property it exempted from taxation, and its successors and assigns, was probably used to designate such persons or corporations as might acquire land certificates before location, or the lands afterwards. International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Smith County, 65 Tex. 21, 25.

The term "assigns," as used in a will providing that, when the homestead should be no longer used or occupied by either or any of testator's daughters, the same was devised to such child or children at that time living, and their heirs and assigns forever, was used merely to indicate the absolute character of the estate—a fee which the remaindermen were to take. It has no significance beyond that, and was entirely unnecessary. Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 160, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 93.

"Assigns," as used in a deed conveying land to a railroad corporation, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of running, erecting, and establishing a railroad, cannot be construed as extending to any assigns except one who should be the assignee of its franchise to establish and run a railroad. East Alabama Ry. Co. v. Doe, 5 Sup. Ct. 869, 874, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. Ed. 136.

"Assigns," as used in Laws 1874, c. 154, § 4, as amended by Laws 1876, c. 263, authorizing the erection and maintenance of dams across a certain river, and giving the person constructing the dam, his heirs and assigns, a lien for the toll on logs sluiced through such dams, to be enforced in the same manner as a laborer's lien on logs, should be construed as meaning assigns of the franchise to erect and maintain the dam, and not of the lien for tolls. It does not give the owner of such franchise the right to assign his right to a lien on the logs for tolls to which he was entitled for sluicing them through the dam. Tewksbury v. Bronson, 4 N. W. 749, 750, 48 Wis. 581.

As affecting alienability.

The word "assigns" need not be used in a lease if made to the lessee, his executors or administrators, since the lessee's assigns, or persons holding through or under him, are included in himself; his right to assign being an incident to his estate in the land under the lease. Church v. Brown, 15 Ves. 258, 263.

The word "assigns" in the limitation of a fee is not requisite to give the estate devised the quality of alienability, and, where an estate is given by technical words, this alienability cannot be restricted, since such a restriction would be inconsistent with the nature of the estate. Grant v. Carpenter, 8 R. I. 36, 38.

The first clause of a will devised to a daughter certain lands for life, and, after her death, "to her heirs or their assigns." The second and third clauses devised to other daughters other lands on like conditions, except that the devise was not to the heirs of each "or their assigns," but to the heirs of each "and assigns." The residuary clause devised a life estate to the wife, and from and after her death devised the same to the three daughters and to their heirs "and assigns." Held, that the word "assigns," as used in the second and third clauses, meant that there was a grant of power to dispose of the remainder, notwithstanding the words of apparent limitation. Goetz v. Ballou, 19 N. Y. Supp. 433, 434, 64 Hun, 490.

Where a deed conveyed property to certain named grantees during their natural life, and after their death to their heirs and assigns, the use of the word "assigns" evidenced an intention on the part of the grantors to give the grantee power to sell and dispose of the property, and was held to be inconsistent with an intention on the part of the grantors that the grantee should take only a life estate. Johnson v. Morton, 67 S. W. 790, 791, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 296.

As used in a will devising the testator's realty to each of his three sons, their heirs and assigns, forever, the word "assigns" cannot be construed as enlarging or in any manner affecting the interest devised. Every interest recognized by law may be the object of an assignment. It belongs essentially to every species of interest or property, and the introduction of the term, therefore, in a will, was superfluous and inoperative. Wortendyk v. Wortendyk, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 363, 378.

Assignability or negotiability implied.

The words "assigns," in an insurance policy providing that the company will pay the amount of the insurance to the executor or administrator of the assured, and also to his assigns, was presumably used in its ordinary acceptation, meaning assignees, and such word, together with a paragraph which provides that the company will not notice any assignment of this policy until the original or duplicate thereof shall be filed in the home office, clearly indicates the sense of the parties that the insured has an assignable interest in the policy which he might transfer in his lifetime to a third party, and that such contract did not create an absolute trust fund not capable of diversion in the lifetime of the assured. Ladd v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 116 Fed. 878, 884.

The use of the word "assigns" in a bill of lading is an authority to dispose of it; thus indicating that the bill of lading is a negotiable instrument. Pollard v. Reardon (U. S.) 65 Fed. 848, 850, 13 C. C. A. 171.

Assignee by operation of law.

"Assigns," or, as the word is more commonly spelled, "assignees," are of two classes, depending upon the manner of their creation: First, the voluntary assignees, who are created by the act of the parties; and, second, assignees created by operation of law. Whether, in a given case, an assignee belongs to the first or second class, depends upon the purpose for which he was created, the object to be obtained by his creation, and the language of the statute or other instrument from which he derives his power. A voluntary assignee is ordinarily invested with all the rights which his assignor possessed with respect to the property, while the rights of an assignee by operation of law are such only as are necessarily incident to the complete possession and enjoyment of the things assigned. The voluntary assignee takes the property with all the rights thereto possessed by his assignor, and, if he has paid a valuable consideration, may claim all the rights of a bona fide purchaser with respect thereto. Upon the other hand, an assignee by operation of law—as, for instance, a purchaser at a judicial sale—takes only such title as the execution debtor possessed at the time of the sale, and a purchaser of original rights to entryman on public lands at an execution sale against his or his grantee is not an assignee, within the meaning of the act of June 16, 1880, c. 244, § 2, 21 Stat. 287 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1416], providing that when, for any cause, an entry on public lands has been erroneously allowed and cannot be confirmed, repayment should be made of the consideration to the entryman or to his heirs or assigns. Hoffeld v. United States, 22 Sup. Ct. 927, 928, 186 U. S. 273, 46 L. Ed. 1160.

"Assigns," in its legal significance, includes an assign by an operation of law as well as assign by contract. The term is used in this broad sense in Code 1892, § 4461, providing that forcible entry and detainer may be maintained by the legal representatives or assigns of any person against whom the possession of land is withheld by a tenant after the expiration of his right. Glenn v. Caldwell, 20 South. 152, 153, 74 Miss. 49.

As assignee in writing.

"Assigns," as used in Rev. Code, § 930, providing that an action against a county treasurer for a claim against the county can only be maintained by the party to whom it is payable, his legal representatives or assigns, means a transfer in writing, and not by delivery only. When commercial paper payable to bearer is transferred by delivery, both the right of property and the right to issue pass thereby to the transferee; and this is frequently called an "assignment" of such chose in action. But this has gone by under the usage of commerce, and is scarcely a correct use of the term. Assignment proper is a transfer by writing, as distinguished from one by delivery. Enloe v. Reike, 56 Ala. 500, 504.

As assignee of whole interest.

"Assigns" as used in the forcible detainer act of 1865, § 4, providing that such action shall lie wherever any person shall hold over against the lessor, his heirs or assigns, includes assignees of that portion of the reversion which follows immediately on the termination of the term of the tenant wrongfully holding over. Bouvier defines the word "assigns" as those to whom rights have been transmitted by particular title, such as sales, gift, legacy, transfer, or cession. Of the word "assignment" he says: "In common parlance this word signifies the transfer of all kinds of property, real, personal, and mixed, and, whether the same be in possession or in action, is a general assignment. In a more technical sense it is usually applied to the transfer of a term of years; but it is more particularly used to signify a transfer of some particular estate or interest in lands, and will embrace a lease for years. It is not necessary that the grantee be the holder of the entire reversion. Ball v. Chadwick, 46 Ill. 28, 31.

"Assigns," as used in a grant to the licensee of a patent and his assigns, must be construed as the right to assign the license as an entirety, and not in parts. Brush Electric Co. v. California Electric Light Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 945, 964, 3 C. C. A. 368.

Contractor.

The word "assigns," as used in Act Nov. 24, 1790, § 22, providing that the bridges to be built by virtue of this act shall continue the property of the persons therein named—that is, the commissioners, their executors, administrators, or assigns—for the term of 99 years from the passing of this act, and no longer, does not mean the persons who should contract to build the bridges, for the persons intended by the proviso are to hold the property in the bridges for the whole term of 99 years under all circumstances, and without regard to the question how many years' toll might be agreed upon as sufficient to compensate for the building of the bridges; it being also provided in the act that the bridges should be erected in consideration of the toll for a certain number of years that could be earned to the builders. Proprietors of Bridges over Passaic and Hackensack Rivers v. State, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 593, 594.

Estate in fee implied.

The word "assigns," as used in a will bequeathing land to a certain person and his assigns, is not a sufficient word of purchase to pass a fee-simple estate in and of itself. It has been held that the expression "to one and his assigns forever" will pass a fee, but this is probably more from the force of the word "forever" than from the use of the word "assigns." "Assigns" will never be construed as sufficient to enlarge or in any manner affect a certain interest given by will. Weart v. Cruser, 13 Atl. 36, 38, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 475.

Executor or administrator.

The word "assigns," as used in a bond which recited that D. was indebted to defendant, that F. was indebted to D., that D.

had conveyed certain lands to defendant, and that defendant had agreed, on payment of the indebtedness of D. to him and of F. to D., to convey the lands to E. F. or her assigns, might be construed to include an administrator. Douglas v. Hennessy, 3 Atl. 213, 215, 15 R. I. 272.

Although the words "assign" and "assignee" frequently designate and include executors and administrators, the assignee of an assignee in perpetuum, the heir of an assignee, the assignee of an heir, the assignee of an assignee's executor, and a devisee, yet, in a statute where the words "personal representative" are also used in the same connection, the term "assignee" cannot have such enlarged sense. Page v. Johnston, 23 Wis. 295, 296.

Grantee or purchaser.

As used in a bond for a deed providing that if said grantor, his heirs or assigns, make a good and sufficient deed, then this obligation to be null and void, the word "assigns" must be construed to mean grantee. Shelly v. Mikkelson, 63 N. W. 210, 214, 5 N. D. 22.

The word "assigns," in a contract made between one who has conveyed land to another supposing it to contain a less number of acres than it did contain, executed, after the discovery of the mistake, in which the purchaser agreed to reconvey a portion of the land, the contract being expressly made binding on the assigns of both of said parties, cannot be limited in its signification to assignees of the contract, but includes grantees of the land. Torrence v. Shedd, 41 N. E. 95, 100, 156 Ill. 194.

The word "assigns," as used in a bond which recited that D. was indebted to defendant, that F. was indebted to D., that D. had conveyed certain lands to defendant, and that defendant had agreed, on payment of the indebtedness of D. to him and of F. to D., to convey the lands to E. F. or her assigns, meant, not assignees of the land, but assignees of the bond itself. Douglas v. Hennessy, 3 Atl. 213, 215, 15 R. I. 272.

The word "assigns," within Pol. Code, § 3477, requiring the county treasurer to pay amounts due on reclamation of swamp land to the original purchaser or his assigns, is used to designate an assignee of the indebtedness, and not to a succession in interest of the original purchaser by virtue of the purchase of the land merely. Miller v. Batz (Cal.) 61 Pac. 935, 936.

"The term 'assigns' is as comprehensive as that of purchaser, as one taking by purchase. It means those to whom rights have been transferred by particular title, such as sale, gift, legacy, transfer, or cession." Watson v. Donnelly (N. Y.) 28 Barb. 653, 658 (citing Booth's Case, 5 Co. Rep. 77b).

The term "assigns," as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 6041, providing that the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, and administrators, or assigns, may redeem within 12 months after a mortgage foreclosure sale, should be construed to include a purchaser at an abortive mortgage foreclosure sale, who has gone into the possession of the mortgaged premises by consent, express or implied, by the mortgagor or his successor in interest, in the belief that the foreclosure was regular and valid, and has remained in such possession until the redemption period has expired. Law v. Citizens' Bank, 89 N. W. 320, 85 Minn. 411, 89 Am. St. Rep. 566.

The word "assigns," as used in the statute providing that where a suit is defended by the assigns of a deceased person the opposite party shall not be permitted to testify as to matters which must have been equally within the knowledge of the deceased person, is used in its legal sense, and signifies a person to whom any property or right is transferred by a deceased in his lifetime, and is broad enough to cover successive transfers. Ripley v. Seligman, 50 N. W. 145, 88 Mich. 177. It thus includes a grantee in a deed from a deceased grantor. Bailey v. Holden, 71 N. W. 841, 113 Mich. 402.

We know of no instance, either in our statutes or in the decisions of our courts, where the word "assigns" has been applied to a purchaser at execution sale. Evans v. Kroutinger (Idaho) 72 Pac. 882, 884.

Heirs and devisees.

As used in the act of 1798 authorizing an alien grantee to hold lands granted to him in pursuance of the act, to his heirs and assigns forever, the term "assigns" includes devisees and the heirs of assignees and assignees of heirs. Duke of Cumberland v. Graves, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 305, 312.

"Assigns," as used in a deed of trust to secure a debt conveying land to the trustees named therein and the survivor of them, and to the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of said survivor in trust, and giving them power to sell the property, does not mean persons who may be made assigns by the spontaneous act of the surviving trustee to take effect during his life, but it means persons who may be made such by devises and bequests; and hence the surviving trustee could not, while living, without an express authority for that purpose, delegate this power to another. Whittelsey v. Hughes, 39 Mo. 13, 20.

Junior mortgagee.

The word "assigns" has been deemed to comprehend all those who take either immediately or remotely from or under the assignment, whether by conveyance, devise, descent, or act of law. Baily v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180, 186. Under Gen.

St. 1878, c. 81, § 18, providing that all surplus of a foreclosure sale shall be paid "to the mortgagor, his legal representative or assigns," the word "assigns" is broad enough to include a second mortgagee. Brown v. Crookston Agricultural Ass'n, 34 Minn. 545, 546, 547, 26 N. W. 907, 908.

Within the provisions of Rev. Codes, § 5424, providing that, on the sale of premises on a mortgage foreclosure, the payment of the surplus, after satisfying the mortgage, shall be paid to the mortgagor, his legal representatives or assigns," the word "assigns" is of sufficiently broad meaning to include a second mortgagee, so that the surplus does not necessarily have to be paid to the mortgagor in place of the junior mortgagee. Nichols v. Tingstad, 86 N. W. 694, 696, 10 N. D. 172. So, also, under a like statute. Brown v. Crookston Agricultural Ass'n, 26 N. W. 907, 908, 34 Minn. 545.

"Assigns," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 81, § 13, providing that the mortgagor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, may redeem from a mortgage sale within 12 months thereafter, means grantees of a mortgagor, and those acquiring his title otherwise than by descent, which would not include a junior mortgagee. Cullerier v. Brunelle, 33 N. W. 123, 37 Minn. 71.

Licensee.

"Assigns" is ordinarily construed as only indicating the nature of the estate, and its ordinary effect is only to the extent of declaring that whatever is obtained is of an assignable nature. Strictly an authority to assign or an assignment relates to what already exists, and has no pertinency to a creation of a right out of another right. As used in Act March 3, 1891, c. 565, § 1, 26 Stat. 1106 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3406], providing that the author or proprietor of any painting, and the assigns of any such person, shall have the liberty of publishing the same on compliance with the copyright provisions, one to whom a German artist gives the exclusive right of reproduction and publication is an assign. Werckmeister v. Pierce & Bushnell Mfg Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 445, 450.

Remaindermen.

"Assigns," as used in a lease reserving rents to the lessor, his heirs and assigns, which is executed by one seized in fee, who has settled the lands on himself for life with remainders to other persons, but reserved a leasing power therein, includes such remaindermen. Greenaway v. Hart, 14 C. B. 340.

Subsequent assignee or grantee.

Laws 1859, c. 22, § 35, gives a right of action to the grantee named in any deed of conveyance made by the clerk of the board of supervisors of any county, etc., his heirs, executors, or assigns, to bar the interest of the original owners, and those claiming under them, any lands sold for taxes. Held, that an "assign," as there used, was a subsequent holder in privity with the prior holder or owner of the land, and thus a grantee of the grantee in a tax deed was his "assign," within the meaning of the section, and was therefore entitled to sue. Finney v. Ford, 22 Wis. 173, 174.

Under the word "assigns" at common law, in all cases where the legal title or estate belongs to the assignee, is included the assignee of an assignee in perpetuum. Bennington Iron Co. v. Rutherford, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 158, 164.

ASSIGNATION HOUSE.

An "assignment house" is a house resorted to for the purposes of prostitution, and is synonymous with "bawdy house" or "brothel." McAlister v. Clark, 33 Conn. 91, 92.

ASSIST.

Consent distinguished, see "Consent."

"Assist the court," as used in St. 1889, p. 13, providing that the Supreme Court shall appoint five persons of legal learning "to assist" in the performance of the court's duties and in the disposition of the numerous causes now pending, means merely to facilitate the court, to lessen its labors, and cannot be construed as giving the commissioners the right to appropriate the functions of the court or to decide causes, or that they shall take part in the decisions of causes as members of the court, and the assistance referred to does not mean supersession. People v. Hayne, 23 Pac. 1, 3, 83 Cal. 111, 7 L. R. A. 348, 17 Am. St. Rep. 211.

"Assisting" a debtor to remove may be restricted in a narrow sense to the person of the debtor, and it may be asked how one can assist in moving a debtor out of the country in which he resides if he is already out of it. This would be so if the statute meant to carry the body of the debtor in a carriage, etc., but it has never been doubted that the statute extends to his property. If the debtor rides his own horse or walks, the person who carries his property for him thus assists in removing the debtor; or if the party wait until the debtor crosses over the line, and then carries his property over to him, it will be assisting the debtor. It would be a fraud on the law to allow it to be evaded by furnishing a debtor, who happens to be over the line, with money to enable him to run away, and then send his property to him. Moore v. Rogers, 48 N. C. 90, 94.

A person is assisting an absconding debtor where he goes with him to the depot and brings back his horse. To "aid" or "assist" is the doing of such an act whereby the party is enabled, or it is made easier for him, to do the principal act, or effect some primary purpose. Moss v. Peoples, 51 N. C. 140, 142.

A person is guilty of assisting a debtor in getting out of the county, though he carries the debtor only to the county line. Godsey v. Bason, 30 N. C. 260, 264.

In criminal law.

"There are no words in the law that have acquired a more definite and specific meaning than 'procure, advise, and assist,' as contradistinguished from the actual commission of the crime. The latter is the principal offense, but the former only accessory. If a person does no more than procure, advise, or assist, he is only an accessory; but if he is present, consenting, aiding, procuring, advising, and assisting, he is a principal, and must be indicted as such." United States v. Wilson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 699, 710.

By technical legal construction, a person may "assist" or "aid" in the commission of a crime and still be possessed of no criminal intent, and therefore in no sense an accessory to the crime; but, to the ordinary mind, one who aids or assists in the commission of the crime of forgery is guilty, and this is true because to such a mind criminality is included as an element in the act of the party aiding or assisting. To the ordinary understanding it would seem that a person could not commit the crime of forgery without knowing that it was a crime, neither could he "aid" or "assist" in its commission without being aware of the criminality of his acts, and the use of such terms in an instruction would not tend to mislead the jury. People v. Dole (Cal.) 51 Pac. 945, 946.

"Assists," as used in Civ. Code La. art. 2324, providing that one who causes another to do an unlawful act, or "assists or encourages" in the commission, is responsible in solido with that person for the damages caused by such act, includes officials or authorities who passively permit a wrongful act, though a strict meaning of the words "causes," "assists," or "encourages" might not under other circumstances include such failure to prevent. Comitez v. Parkerson (U. S.) 50 Fed. 170, 171.

The words "encourage," "aid or abet," "counsel," "advise," or "assist," are words in appropriate use to describe the offense of a person who, not actually doing the felonious act, by his will contributes to or procures it to be done, and thereby becomes a principal or accessory. True v. Commonwealth, 14 S. W. 684, 685, 90 Ky. 651; Omer v. Same, 25 S. W. 504, 506, 95 Ky. 353.

The words "assists such person to escape," in Code 1876, § 4130, providing a punishment for any one who furnishes any disguise, etc., to aid any person to escape, or in any way "assists such person to escape," whether such escape be attempted or effected or not, though it means in its ordinary purport that the prisoner does effect his escape, and that he has assistance in accomplishing it, when construed with the latter clause, "whether such escape be attempted or effected or not," applies to cases where the prisoner either does not escape or does not attempt to escape. Hurst v. State, 79 Ala. 55, 57.

ASSISTANCE.

See "Clerical Assistance"; "Writ of Assistance."

Under a statute giving the wife authority to administer her paraphernalia without the assistance of her husband, the term "without assistance" means without his control, without the necessity of being thereunto authorized by him, as is the case with many of her acts. It is not incompatible with her personal administration that she should avail herself of the assistance of her husband if he is willing to render it, provided he acts under her authority and as her proclaimed agent. Miller v. Handy, 33 La. Ann. 160, 163.

The phrase, "charitable assistance and benefit," as used in a will bequeathing a permanent fund to be used for the charitable assistance and benefit of indigent, unmarried, Protestant females over the age of 18 years, has the same meaning as the words "charitable assistance and charitable benefit." The words "assistance" and "benefit" as used are synonymous. They are applied to an indigent class of unmarried females, and it is impossible to see how they could be assisted by a bequest without being benefited, or benefited without being assisted. Appeal of Tappan, 52 Conn. 412, 416.

ASSISTANT.

Under Rev. St. c. 31, § 46, providing that "if any clerk, by himself or his assistant in office, shall issue any writ," etc., an "assistant" is one who is called in by the clerk, without any regular appointment, to aid him, either in conducting the business of the office generally, or to aid him in some particular. Wright v. Wheeler, 30 N. C. 184, 187.

"Assistants," as used in a by-law of a corporation providing that the directors "shall elect from their number a president, vice president and such other assistants as are necessary, who may be removed at the pleasure of the directory," means assistants who might be employed to assist the president and vice president in carrying on the business, and does not apply to the president. Archer v. Whiting, 7 South. 53, 55, 88 Ala. 249.

In 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 101, § 118, empowering the corporation of Gravesend to appoint clerks, treasurers, collectors, and such other officers and assistants as they may think necessary for the purposes of the act, but that it shall not be lawful for the corporation to appoint the person who may be appointed clerk in the execution of the act as treasurer for the purposes of the act, the words "officers" and "assistants" were synonymous, and applied to officers who were to assist in the execution of the purposes of the act, and did not give authority to appoint the clerk as an assistant treasurer. Hawkings v. Newman, 4 Mees. & W. 613, 620.

An "assistant" is defined to be one who stands by and aids or helps another. Thus an inspector of buildings, being an assistant of the commissioner of public buildings, was not an officer. State ex rel. Bartraw v. Longfellow, 69 S. W. 596, 598, 95 Mo. App. 660.

As a deputy.

St. 1885, c. 352, providing that milk inspectors or their "assistants" may enter all places where milk is stored or kept for sale, and all carriages used for conveyance of milk, and take samples for analysis, does not authorize the inspector to appoint an agent who shall have the right, in the absence of the inspector, and without his immediate direction and control, to take by force, and against the will of the owner, samples of milk from carriages used for its conveyance. The general rule is that the performance of public duties cannot be delegated by a public officer, and, unless there is a clear expression in the statute to the contrary, it will be presumed that the Legislature intended that public duties which require the exercise of discretion should be performed by public officers. Commonwealth v. Smith, 6 N. E. 89, 91, 141 Mass. 135.

"Assistant," as used in Act March 14, 1864 (13 Stat. 26), providing for the appointment of an additional "Assistant" Secretary of the Treasury, means one who stands by and helps or aids another. He is not a deputy, and cannot therefore act in the name of and for the person he assists, and under his direction, unless otherwise expressly provided by law. United States v. Adams (U. S.) 24 Fed. 348, 351.

An "assistant" does not mean a "deputy." Clerks and other public officers have assistants who are not deputies. Though a deputy is an assistant, the word "assistant" is more comprehensive than the word "deputy," including those who aid, whether sworn or not sworn, while "deputy" embraces only the sworn class. Ellison v. Stevenson, 22 Ky. (6 T. B. Mon.) 271, 276, 279.

ASSISTANT CLERK.

As clerk, see "Clerk."

ASSISTANT PRINCIPAL.

The term "assistant principal" in school work implies a position subordinate to that of the principalship of the school. Morrow v. Board of Education of City of Chamberlain, 64 N. W. 1126, 1128, 7 S. D. 553.

ASSIZE.

See "Writ of Assize."

An "assize" is a real action which proves the title of the demandant, merely by showing his or his ancestor's possession. Sherman v. Dilley, 3 Nev. 21, 26 (citing 5 Chit. Bl. 184).

ASSIZE OF NUISANCE.

An "assize of nuisance" was an old common-law remedy by action, in which the sheriff was commanded to summon a jury to view the premises, and if they found for the plaintiff he had judgment to have the nuisance abated, and for damages. The assize of nuisance lay only against the wrongdoer himself, but not against the alienee of the tenement wherein the nuisance was situated. Powell v. Bentley & Gerwig Furniture Co., 34 W. Va. 804, 808, 12 S. E. 1085, 1086, 12 L. R. A. 53.

ASSOCIATE.

Abide synonymous, see "Abide."

ASSOCIATES.

Associates are persons united and acting together by mutual consent or compact in the promotion of some common object. Lechmere Bank v. Boynton, 65 Mass. (11 Cush.) 369, 382.

As used in Laws 1849, c. 44, incorporating certain persons named and their associates under the name of the "Minnesota Historical Society," "associates" meant such persons, other than those specifically named, as might thereafter become members of the association. State v. Sibley, 25 Minn. 387, 399.

As assigns.

A deed granting land to "L. and his associates" is not void for uncertainty as to the grantee. The conveyance being to L., and the word "associates" bearing a strong analogy and common parlance to the word "assigns," the grant would be construed to vest the legal title in L., with authority to him to regrant or convey any part thereof to such persons as would associate with him in the undertaking to settle the land. Duncan v. Beard, 2 Nott & McC. 400, 404.

ASSOCIATION.

See "Beneficial Associations"; "Benevolent Association"; "Building and Loan Association"; "Co-operative Association"; "Fraternal Association."

The word "association" "is said to signify confederacy or union for particular purposes, good or ill. Johnson's Dict. In that sense it is a generic term, and may indifferently comprehend a voluntary confederacy, which is a partnership dissoluble by the persons who formed it, or a corporate confederacy, deriving its existence from a confederacy, and dissoluble only by the law." Thomas v. Dakin (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 9, 104.

The word "association" has various significations, one of which is the interests of persons in a company. People v. Commissioners of Taxes (N. Y.) 1 Thomp. & C. 630, 631.

Association is "confederacy or union for particular purpose, good or ill. This term is used throughout the United States to signify a body of persons united without a charter, but upon the methods and forms used by incorporated bodies, for the prosecution of some common enterprise. It also enters into the names bestowed by the legislatures upon many corporations. In this connection it is used without any very uniform discrimination as to its precise meaning, but seems to be on the whole preferred for bodies which are not vested with full and perfect corporate rights and powers." Allen v. Stevens, 54 N. Y. Supp. 8, 23, 33 App. Div. 485.

"Association," as used in St. 1893, c. 443, providing that no person, association, or union that has adopted a trade-mark may file therewith a certificate specifying the name or names of the person, association, or union so filing, includes an association without as well as with officers. Commonwealth v. Rozen, 57 N. E. 223, 224, 176 Mass. 129.

"The term 'association' usually means an unincorporated organization composed of a body of men, partaking in its general form and mode of procedure of the characteristics of a corporation. Such an association cannot be the donee of a bequest, even for a charitable purpose." Pratt v. Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, 46 N. Y. Supp. 1035, 20 App. Div. 352. "The term 'association,' in Laws 1896, c. 908, § 4, subd. 7, exempting charitable corporations or associations from taxation, does not include a bequest to persons taking property by a will, as trustees for the purpose of founding a home for the aged." Knight v. Stevens, 72 N. Y. Supp. 815, 818, 66 App. Div. 267.

The word "association," in a constitutional provision authorizing municipalities to subscribe to the stock of any company, "association," or corporation, may well apply to an unincorporated company. Rubey v. Shain, 54 Mo. 207, 209.

Under Laws 1849, c. 437, the term "association" includes every individual doing business alone for some purpose, under the banking law. Bank of Havana v. Wickham (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. 134, 138.

The word "association," when used in reference to a corporation, shall be deemed to embrace the words "successors and assigns of such company or association," in like manner as if these last-named words, or words of similar import, were expressed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 4.

Club.

Though a club is an association, it is not an "association" within St. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 108, the latter aiming at associations established for profit. In re St. James Club, 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 589.

As company.

"Association," as used in an indictment charging that a certain fire insurance company exercised the privilege of a fire insurance company or association without obtaining a license, is synonymous with the word "company" as there used. Lee Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. State, 60 Miss. 395, 396.

Corporation.

Act March 28, 1867, provides that no suit shall be maintained against any stockholder or director in any corporation or association to charge him with any claim for moneys for which the corporation or association could be sued, except within six years after the loaning to or deposit of the money with the corporation or association. Held, that "association" must be held to be used as a synonym for "corporation," and that the association whose stockholders are protected are such as can be sued without joinder of other parties, and that the subjects of the suits barred are claims for which the association is primarily and the stockholders secondarily liable, but an unincorporated association has no capacity to be sued as an entity distinct from its members. Campbell v. Floyd, 25 Atl. 1033, 1036, 153 Pa. 84.

In Laws 1885, c. 184, § 11, authorizing the reincorporation of "any existing corporation, association, or society," the words "association" and "society" are not employed as synonyms with or to characterize the word "corporation," but refer to bodies other than legally created corporations. State v. Steele, 34 N. W. 903, 904, 37 Minn. 428.

Associations formed under the banking act are moneyed corporations, within the meaning of the statute subjecting such corporations to taxation on their capital. Niagara County Sup'rs v. People (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 504.

Act Feb. 27, 1855, § 1, providing that all persons and associations doing business as merchants, bankers, etc., shall be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in said business as though they were residents of the state, is to be construed as including corporations. People v. Commissioners of Taxes of City of New York, 23 N. Y. 242, 243.

The term "associations," in Act 1855, subjecting to taxation all nonresident persons and associations doing business in the state, is comprehensive enough to embrace foreign corporations, such as insurance companies. British Commercial Life Ins. Co. v. Commissioners of Taxes and Assessments, *40 N. Y. (1 Keyes) 303, 305.

"Association of persons," as used in Rev. St. § 2347 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1440], providing that "any association of persons" shall have the right to enter by legal subdivisions any quantity of vacant coal lands not otherwise appropriated, and not exceeding 320 acres to each association, includes incorporated as well as unincorporated associations, since it is unreasonable to suppose that Congress intended to limit the right of entering coal lands to 320 acres in the case of unincorporated associations, and to allow incorporated associations to acquire such lands without restriction. United States v. Trinidad Coal & Coking Co., 11 Sup. Ct. 57, 61, 137 U. S. 160, 34 L. Ed. 640.

Joint-stock company.

Act July 9, 1851, authorizing any company or association composed of not less than seven persons to sue or to be sued in the name of its president or treasurer, relates only to those associations or companies which are authorized by acts of the Legislature for the various purposes of banking, insurance, railroads, etc., and have no application to private voluntary associations or copartnerships which are not organized in pursuance of any statute. Austin v. Searing, 16 N. Y. 112, 117, 69 Am. Dec. 665.

The business of insurance carried on in the manner of the ancient Lloyds may be included within the scope of the term "association," where each underwriter is individually liable for a fixed amount, but not for the whole or any part of another underwriter's liability, yet all act together to effect the contract of insurance. Hoadley v. Purifoy, 18 South. 220, 223, 107 Ala. 276, 30 L. R. A. 351.

The word "associations" is used as synonymous with "companies" in the statute providing that the Attorney General shall institute suits against companies or associations violating certain provisions of the law. Speaking of joint-stock companies, Mr. McCullough, in his Commercial Dictionary, says that the word "company" is usually applied to large associations like the East India Company, the Bank of England, etc., who conduct their operations by means of agents acting under the orders of a board of directors. In speaking of the English & East India Company, Mr. McCullough describes it as "a famous association originally established for prosecuting the trade between England and the East Indies." Mills v. State, 23 Tex. 295, 303.

As a partnership.

An "association," as defined by Webster, is an organization of persons, without a charter, for business, humanity, charity, culture, or other purposes; unincorporated society or body. It is neither a partnership nor a quasi partnership. Thus, an unincorporated association having charitable features is not a partnership within the rule that a partner cannot be guilty of embezzlement in appropriating the funds of the firm. Laycock v. State, 36 N. E. 137, 140, 136 Ind. 217.

Society synonyms.

"Association and society are convertible terms, and therefore Laws 1895, c. 398, § 153, providing that any incorporated medical society instituting proceedings against physicians for practicing medicine without lawful registration shall receive the fines imposed and collected in such prosecution, applies to any incorporated medical society, whether it be designated a 'society' or an 'association.'" New York County Medical Ass'n v. City of New York, 65 N. Y. Supp. 531, 32 Misc. Rep. 116.

State.

The word "association" means a body of persons invested with some, yet not full, corporate rights and powers, but will not include the state. State v. Taylor, 64 N. W. 548, 550, 7 S. D. 533.

Trade union.

"Associations," as used in Act May 8, 1891, entitled "An act to protect associations, unions of workmen and persons in their labels, trade-marks and forms of advertising," should not be construed as limited in its meaning to associations of workmen. The term "unions" having come to have a well-known meaning, it is to be presumed that "associations" was used in a broader sense. Cohn v. People, 37 N. E. 60, 62, 149 Ill. 486, 23 L. R. A. 821, 41 Am. St. Rep. 304.

St. 1895, c. 462, § 3, entitled "An act to protect manufacturers from the use of counterfeit labels and stamps," authorizing suits to prevent fraudulent use and counterfeiting of labels by any person, "association, or union," includes a voluntary trade union. Tracy v. Banker, 49 N. E. 308, 170 Mass. 266, 39 L. R. A. 508.

ASSOCIATION OF LEARNING.

Act May 14, 1874, exempting from taxation all universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, "associations and institutions of learning," should be construed to include a convent used exclusively for the residence of the teachers in a school free to all classes and creeds, erected and maintained by a Catholic church, in which convent teachers are allowed to reside as part consideration for their services. A school for children preliminary to the academy or college is an "institution of learning." Its purposes and methods place it within the general term. White v. Smith, 42 Atl. 125, 128, 189 Pa. 222, 43 L. R. A. 498. It will also be held to include a library company. Philadelphia Library Co. v. Donohugh (Pa.) 12 Phila. 284, 285.

ASSORTED.

A clause in a charter party which stipulated that the ship should carry 700 tons measurement of "assorted cargo" imports the idea of a miscellaneous character, or freight distributed into various sorts, kinds, or classes; in short, whatever the defendant should reasonably select as the kind or sort of goods with reference to his own interests. Roberts v. Opdyke, 40 N. Y. 259, 262.

ASSUME.

The definition of the word "assume," in matters of law, is "to take upon one's self." Springer v. De Wolf, 62 N. E. 542, 543, 194 Ill. 218, 56 L. R. A. 465, 88 Am. St. Rep. 155.

A bill of exceptions reciting that the court, "assuming the plaintiff was a credible witness," found on the evidence for defendants and directed judgment to be entered for them, "is not, we think, to be taken to mean that every scintilla in his testimony is true." Simmons v. Brooks, 34 N. E. 175, 177, 159 Mass. 219.

The word "assumed," as used in an instruction to the effect that circumstantial evidence is a species of presumptive evidence, and consists in this: that, where there is no satisfactory evidence of the direct fact, certain facts which are "assumed" to have stood around or been attendant on the direct fact are proved, from the existence of which the direct fact may be inferred—is employed in the sense of "claimed," and the plain meaning of the passage is that the assumed or claimed facts therein mentioned must be proved before the main fact can be inferred. Jenkins v. State, 62 Wis. 49, 64, 21 N. W. 232.

"Assume," as used in Pub. St. c. 76, § 6, forbidding any person to assume or continue to use in his business the name of a person formerly connected with him in partnership, or the name of any other person without written consent, means "use for the first time." In the same way that is contemplated in the other branch, "continue to use in his business," and does not prohibit a person from describing himself as successor to another. Martin v. Bowker, 40 N. E. 766, 163 Mass. 461.

As agree to pay.

The word "assume," in a deed which recites that the premises are subject to a certain mortgage which the grantee assumes, means the same as the word "assumes to pay," and amounts to a personal covenant by the grantee to pay the mortgage. Eggleston v. Morrison, 84 Ill. App. 625, 631; Sparkman v. Gove, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 252, 254; Vreeland v. Van Blarcom, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 530, 532; Green v. Stone, 34 Atl. 1009, 1100, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577; Miles v. Miles, 6 Or. 266, 269, 25 Am. Rep. 522; Drury v. Tremont Imp. Co., 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 168, 171; Reed v. Paul, 131 Mass. 129, 132; Lappen v. Gill, 129 Mass. 349, 350; Locke v. Homer, 131 Mass. 93, 109, 41 Am. Rep. 199; Wayman v. Jones, 58 Mo. App. 313, 317; Schley v. Fryer, 2 N. E. 280, 100 N. Y. 71; Jehle v. Brooks, 70 N. W. 440, 441, 112 Mich. 131.

"Assumes," as used in a contract which provides that one of the parties "assumes a lease," means that the party so assuming a lease "takes to himself the obligations, contracts, and agreements and benefits to which the other contracting party was entitled under the terms of the lease." Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Indiana, B. & W. Ry. Co., 7 N. E. 139, 152, 44 Ohio St. 287.

It is no longer an open question that where the purchaser accepts and holds a conveyance of real estate, wherein it is recited that such person assumes and agrees to pay an incumbrance thereon, he thereby subjects himself to liability to the holder thereof, which may be enforced by a personal action. Saunders v. McClintock, 46 Mo. App. 216, 223.

A stipulation, in a deed conveying real estate, that the grantee assumes a mortgage thereon, and agrees to hold the grantor harmless from such mortgage, shows an agreement not merely to indemnify the grantor, but to pay the mortgage debt. Locke v. Homer, 131 Mass. 93, 41 Am. Rep. 199.

"Assume" means to undertake, engage, or promise, so that a complaint alleging that defendant purchased certain property subsequent to the execution of a mortgage set forth in the complaint, and assumed payment of the note and mortgage, states a cause of action. Petteys v. Comer, 54 Pac. 813, 814, 34 Or. 36.

Where a person by an agreement assumes a debt of the seller, he undertakes to substitute himself in the place and instead of such person; hence the obligation to pay resting upon him becomes the obligation of the purchaser. Stout v. Folger, 34 Iowa, 71, 75, 11 Am. Rep. 138.

There is only one proposition contained in the words "assumed" and "agreed" to pay. The assumption to pay the debt is the same thing as agreeing or undertaking to pay it, and the use of both words "assume" and "agree" is no more the statement of two distinct propositions than if it had been stated that they "agreed and agreed" to pay the debt. Jones v. Eddy, 27 Pac. 190, 191, 90 Cal. 147.

"The difference between the purchaser assuming the payment of a mortgage and simply buying subject to the mortgage is simply that in the one case he makes himself personally liable for the payment of the debt, and in the other case he does not assume such liability. In both cases he takes the land charged to the payment of the debt, and is not allowed to set up any defense to its validity." Hancock v. Fleming, 3 N. E. 254, 255, 103 Ind. 533.

A deed poll reciting that the premises were subject to a mortgage for a certain amount which the grantee was to assume, it being a part of the consideration, should be construed as an undertaking to pay the mortgage debt out of the fund furnished for the grantor for that purpose. "The legal obligation undertaken was that if the note secured by the mortgage was not then due, to pay it at maturity and save any forfeiture of the land mortgaged; if the note was then due, the contract was to pay it forthwith, or within reasonable time, so as to avoid any entry by the mortgagee for breach of condition." Braman v. Dowse, 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 227, 228.

ASSUMED RISK.

See "Assumption of Risk."

ASSUMPSIT.

See "Implied Assumpsit."

"The action of assumpsit may be defined to be, at common law, an action for the recovery of damages for the nonperformance of a parol or simple contract, or, in other words, a contract not under seal nor of record—circumstances which distinguish this remedy from others; for the action of a debt is in legal consideration for the recovery eo nomine and in numero, and is most frequently brought on a deed; and the action of covenant, though in form for the recovery of damages, can only be supported upon a contract under seal. Assumpsit, however, is not sustainable unless there has been an expressed contract, or unless the law will imply a contract. State v. Harmon, 15 W. Va. 115, 124. See, also, Force v. Haines, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 385, 386.

"Assumpsit is a form of action which lies for the recovery of damages for the non-performance of a parol or simple contract, and will not lie where there has been an express contract under seal or of record, but the party must proceed in debt or covenant where the contract is under seal, and in debt if it be of contract, even though the debtor, after such contract was made, expressly promised to perform it." Andrews v. Montgomery (N. Y.) 19 Johns. 162, 164, 10 Am. Dec. 213; North v. Nichols, 37 Conn. 375, 377; Hill's Adm'r v. Nichols, 50 Ala. 336, 338; Westmoreland v. Davis, 1 Ala. 299, 300; Morgan v. Patrick, 7 Ala. 185, 187; Wass v. Bucknam, 40 Me. 289, 290.

Chitty says assumpsit will lie for the breach of all parol or simple contracts, whether verbal or written, express or implied, or for the payment of money, or for the performance or omission of any other act. Assumpsit will lie against an attorney for a breach of duty. Ellis v. Henry's Adm'r, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 247, 248.

An action of assumpsit is founded on an undertaking of defendant, not under seal, and the averment always is that he undertook and promised to pay the money sued for or to do the act mentioned. Hurlock v. Murphy (Del.) 2 Houst. 550, 555.

The action of "assumpsit," so called, is an action on the case, and is properly entitled a plea of trespass on the case in a declaration, the counts of which are in assumpsit. Carter v. White, 32 Ill. 509, 510.

The term "assumpsit" presupposes a contract. Whatever excludes all idea of a contract excludes at the same time the remedy of assumpsit, which can spring from contract only, which affirms it and seeks its enforcement. Hence it is held that, to maintain an action of assumpsit for the unlawful occupation of land, the relation of landlord and tenant must be established, and that the action will not lie where the possession has been acquired and maintained under a different or adverse title, or where it was tortious and makes the holder a trespasser. Lloyd v. Hough, 42 U. S. (1 How.) 153, 159, 11 L. Ed. 83.

"Assumpsit is an action for sums due on implied contracts, though no price for articles sold or labor performed may have been agreed upon." Mershon v. Bank of Commonwealth, 29 Ky. (6 J. J. Marsh.) 438, 440.

Assumpsit is that form of action which is brought whenever the foundation of the action is a contract, and the action is assumpsit, no matter in what way the declaration is framed. Legge v. Tucker, 1 Hurl. & N. 500, 501.

Assumpsit is founded upon what the law terms an implied promise on the part of the defendant to pay what in good conscience he is bound to pay to the plaintiff. Where the case shows that it is the duty of the defendant to pay, the law imputes a promise to fulfill that obligation, but the law never implies a promise to pay unless some duty creates an obligation, and, more especially, it never implies a promise to do an act contrary to law. Bailey v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 604, 638, 639, 22 L. Ed. 840.

Assumpsit is an action at law for the recovery of damages for a breach or a non-performance of a contract, express or implied. It may be maintained not only where a contract has existed in fact, but where the wrong done was originally a tort, which the plaintiff is entitled to waive, and sue on a quasi contract by an action of assumpsit. Hill v. Davis, 3 N. H. 384; Chauncy v. Yeaton, 1 N. H. 151.

The action of assumpsit lies to recover damages for consequential wrongs or torts, which, though they are ex delicto, are quasi ex contractu, and they arise from malfeasance, or doing what the defendant ought not to do, nonfeasance, or not doing what he ought to do, and misfeasance, or doing what he ought to do improperly. Wood v. Downing's Adm'r, 62 S. W. 487, 489, 110 Ky. 656.

The action of debt is founded on contract, while the action of assumpsit is founded on a promise, and in this exists the principal distinction between the two actions. Metcalf v. Robinson (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 177, 178.

ASSUMPSIT FOR MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

The action of assumpsit for money had and received in its spirit and purpose has been likened to a bill in equity, and is an exceedingly liberal action, and will always lie where a defendant has in his hands money which ex æquo et bono he ought to refund to the plaintiff. Rushton v. Davis, 28 South. 476, 479, 127 Ala. 279 (citing King v. Martin, 67 Ala. 177).

Assumpsit for money had and received is an equitable action to recover back money which the defendant in justice ought not to retain. And it may be said that it lies in most, if not all, cases where the defendant has moneys of the plaintiff which ex æquo et bono he ought to refund. Prichard v. Budd (U. S.) 76 Fed. 710, 714, 22 C. C. A. 504 (citing Nash v. Towne, 72 U. S. [5 Wall.] 689, 18 L. Ed. 527).

ASSUMPTION.

See, also, "Assume."

"Assumption," as used in an instruction that "if the whole evidence in the case is just as consistent with the assumption of defendant's innocence as with the assumption of his guilt," etc., "your duty is to acquit him," was used as synonymous with "hypothesis," and means "what is not known to be true or not proved," so that the instruction is not erroneous. State v. Harras, 65 Pac. 774, 775, 25 Wash. 416.

Of debt or mortgage.

The word "assumption," in speaking of the assumption by one of the obligations and liabilities of another, as defined in the Century Dictionary, means the agreement of the transferee of property to pay obligations of the transferor which are chargeable on it. Springer v. De Wolf, 62 N. E. 542, 543, 194 Ill. 218, 56 L. R. A. 465, 88 Am. St. Rep. 155.

A verbal promise to pay an existing mortgage debt as part of the purchase money of mortgaged premises is an "assumption of the mortgage debt," and may be enforced by the grantor or the holder of the mortgage. Lang. v. Dietz, 60 N. E. 841, 842, 191 Ill. 161.

"Assumption," as used in conveyance reciting that in consideration of assumption of certain debts, etc., includes the promise of payment of such debts, since "assumed" means to take upon one's self, to undertake, or to adopt; or, in other words, to take upon one's self, or to adopt, the obligation or the liability of another, is to put one's self in place of that other as to such obligation or liability—to become bound as such other is bound. It is a broader word than "agrees to pay," and includes the latter. Lenz v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 86 N. W. 607, 608, 111 Wis. 198.

Of marital rights.

Civ. Code, § 55, provides that consent alone will not constitute marriage, but it must be followed by a solemnization or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. Held, that "assumption" means the "act of assuming or taking to or upon one's self. It is sometimes used to express the pretension of having or possessing, the taking on in appearance, and not in reality. But when used in the last sense it does not necessarily mean a pretense presented to the eyes of the community, though it may include such general pretense. To adopt the illustrations of counsel, one may assume, by words, manner, or bearing, in the presence of one person alone, a virtue though he have it not. To deceive a single soul, the devil hath power to assume a pleasing shape." Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. 345, 359, 75 Cal. 1.

ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

"Assumption of risk" is a term in a contract of employment, express or implied from the circumstances of the employment, by which the servant agrees that dangers of injury obviously incident to the discharge of the servant's duty shall be at the servant's risk. Bauer v. American Car & Foundry Co. (Mich.) 94 N. W. 9, 10 (citing Narramore v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. [U. S.] 96 Fed. 301, 37 C. C. A. 501, 48 L. R. A. 68); Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Bancord, 71 Pac. 253, 255, 66 Kan. 81; Green v. Western American Co., 70 Pac. 310, 317, 30 Wash. 87.

The saying that assumption of risk is a form of the contract of employment is not strictly true. It is more accurate to say that the services of one are engaged by the other, and from the relationship the law implies certain duties and obligations. Martin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 91 N. W. 1034, 1035, 118 Iowa, 148, 59 L. R. A. 698, 96 Am. St. Rep. 371.

Assumption of risk rests in the law of contract, and involves an implied agreement by an employé to assume the risks ordinarily incident to his employment, or a waiver, after a full knowledge of an extraordinary risk, of his right to hold the employer for a breach of duty in this regard. Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 39 S. E. 715, 718, 61 S. C. 468.

Where an employé entered into the service of a railroad company using defective machinery, knowing of such defects, or where he continued in the employment after such knowledge without notifying his superiors and protesting against its continuance, such employé would have been held to have waived such objection, and to have assumed the risk rising from the use of such defective machinery, but under Priv. Laws 1897, c. 65, §§ 1, 2, providing that any employé of a railroad company who shall suffer injury in the course of his employment by any defect in the machinery, etc., shall maintain an action against the company, there is no such thing as assumption of risk. Coley v. North Carolina R. Co., 39 S. E. 43, 45, 128 N. C. 534, 57 L. R. A. 817.

The term "assumed risk" includes generally any form of assumed risks; that is to say, risks ordinarily incident to the work, as well as risks not so incident, but arising from the circumstance that the danger was a known one. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Moynahan (Tex.) 76 S. W. 803, 804.

The assumption of a risk appears to involve the fact of comprehension that a peril is to be encountered and a willingness to encounter it; that is to say, a positive exercise of volition in the form of an assent to the risk. Adolf v. Columbia Pretzel & Baking Co., 73 S. W. 321, 324, 100 Mo. App. 199.

The doctrine of assumed risks may be thus epitomized, viz.: "Where one voluntarily enters into a contract of hiring with a railroad company, he assumes all the risks and hazards ordinarily and usually incident to such employment, and will be presumed to have contracted with reference to such risks and hazards. But while an employé assumes all the risks incident to the service he enters, he does not assume a risk created by the negligent act of the master, and only such risks as he knows to exist, or may know by ordinary care." St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Tuohey, 54 S. W. 577, 579, 67 Ark. 209, 77 Am. St. Rep. 109.

The doctrine of assumption of risk is that if a particular machine has become injured or dangerous, and an employé seeing the danger does not report its condition, but goes on with his work in disregard of it, he assumes the risk. There is a distinction between knowledge of danger, which is a knowledge of the absence of safety appliances which should be in use, and an assumption of risk by working without protest at a machine which has become defective and dangerous. Lloyd v. Hanes, 35 S. E. 611, 612, 126 N. C. 359.

The word "risk," as used in the term "assumption of risk," includes more than a knowledge of conditions. It also includes a knowledge or opportunity for knowledge of the peril to the employé arising from the condition. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Bancord, 71 Pac. 253, 255, 66 Kan. 81.

A servant's implied assumption of risk does not extend to more hazardous work outside of his contract of hiring, and where he is required to do the more hazardous work, and is injured while using defective tools furnished by the master, he will be entitled to recover. Indiana Natural & Illuminating Gas Co. v. Marshall, 52 N. E. 232, 233, 22 Ind. App. 121.

The doctrine of assumption of risk and volenti non fit injuria does not apply to a case of a breach of the specific statutory duty imposed upon the employer, and the fact that a servant continues in his employ with knowledge of the breach of the duty imposed by statute will not prevent his recovery. Boyd v. Brazil Block Coal Co. (Ind.) 50 N. E. 368, 371.

Assumed risk is a contract, and may be implied as well as expressed. When a servant enters upon or continues in a service with full knowledge that it is dangerous, and is fully aware of the extent of the danger to which he is exposed, there is an implied contract of assumed risk, by which the servant waives his right to recover for injuries received by him in such service. Faulkner v. Mammoth Min. Co., 66 Pac. 799, 801, 23 Utah, 437.

Contributory negligence distinguished.

Contributory negligence is a breach of the legal duty imposed by law upon the servant, however unwilling or protesting he may be; and it differs in this respect from assumption of risk, which is not a duty, but purely voluntary on the part of the servant. Dempsey v. Sawyer, 49 Atl. 1035, 1036, 95 Me. 295.

The doctrine of "assumption of risk" by a servant, is that it is a term of the contract of employment, expressed or implied. Assumption of risk in such cases is the acquiescence of an ordinarily prudent man in a known danger; the risk which he assumes by contract. It is distinguished from contributory negligence, which is that action or nonaction in regard to personal safety by one who, treating the known as a condition, acts with respect to it without due care of its consequences. Thus in Hesse v. Columbus S. & H. R. Co., 58 Ohio St. 167, 169, 50 N. E. 354, 355, it is said that "acquiescence with knowledge" is not synonymous with "contributory negligence." One having full knowledge of defects in machinery with which he is employed may yet use the utmost care to avert the danger which they threaten. Assumption of risk and contributory negligence approximate where danger is so obvious and imminent that no ordinarily prudent man would assume the risk of injury therefrom, but where the danger, though present and appreciated, is one which many men are in the habit of assuming, and which prudent men who must earn a living are willing to assume for extra compensation. One who assumes the risk cannot be said to be guilty of contributory negligence, if, having in view the risk of danger assumed, he uses care, reasonably commensurate with the risk, to avoid injurious consequences. One who does not use such care, and who by reason thereof suffers such injury, is guilty of contributory negligence. Narramore v. Cleveland, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 298, 304, 37 C. C. A. 499. 48 L. R. A. 68.

Contributory negligence and assumption of risk are entirely different, although the two questions may arise under the facts of the same case. Every person suing for a personal injury must show that he was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution for his own safety, so that the question of contributory negligence may arise in every case. But an employé may have assumed a risk by virtue of his employment, or by continuing in such employment with knowledge of the defect and danger; and if he is injured thereby, although in the exercise of the highest degree of care and caution, and without any negligence, yet he cannot recover. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Heerey, 68 N. E. 74, 77, 203 Ill. 492.

The doctrine of assumption of risk is distinct from the doctrine of contributory negligence, though there may arise a certain condition of facts capable of supporting either inference. When, therefore, a case arises to which it is shown that the employé has assumed the risk in which the injury arose, or, what is the same thing, in effect, has waived his right to hold the employer responsible for the risk, the employé is defeated because of his agreement, and not because of his negligence. Barksdale v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co., 44 S. E. 743, 745, 86 S. C. 204 (citing Bodie v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co., 61 S. C. 478, 39 S. E. 715).

The doctrine of voluntary assumption of risk, as distinguished from contributory negligence, is generally applied in cases arising between employer and employé, where an employé, without any excuse for so doing, voluntarily undertakes to work with a tool or appliance which is known to be defective, and by so doing assumes the risk of getting hurt, and thereby releases his employer from liability. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Prescott (U. S.) 59 Fed. 237, 239, 8 C. C. A. 109, 23 L. R. A. 654.

Assumption of risk is a matter of contract. Contributory negligence is a question of conduct. If a servant would be defeated of a right of recovery for an injury, by the rule of assumed risk it would be because he agreed, long before the accident happened, that he would assume the very risk from which his injury arose. If he were to be defeated by the rule of contributory negligence, it would be because his conduct at the time of the accident, and under all the attendant circumstances, fell short of ordinary care. If the one circumstance of the employé's knowledge of the employer's failure to provide the statutory safeguards were held, as a matter of law, always to overcome the other circumstances characterizing the employé's conduct at the time of the accident, assumption of risk would be successfully masquerading in the guise of contributory negligence. If assumption of risk is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions and acquiescence therein are fatal. If contributory negligence is the issue, knowledge of defective conditions and acquiescence therein may be fatal, may be not, depending upon whether a person of ordinary prudence under all the circumstances would have done what the injured person did. If the risk is so great and immediately threatening that a person of ordinary prudence under all the circumstances would not take it, contributory negligence is established. D. H. Davis Coal Co. v. Polland, 62 N. E. 492, 497, 158 Ind. 607, 92 Am. St. Rep. 319.

Contributory negligence implies the existence of negligence of an injured servant, co-operating with that of the master, and thus aiding in producing the injury. It is distinguished from the doctrine of assumed risk, which is that if the servant, with knowledge of the defect in the master's premises and the danger and risk incident thereto, continues in the service of the master without proper notice to the latter, he assumes the risk incident to the service and growing out of the existence of the defect, and thus without regard to the degree of care which he may exercise in the performance of his labor. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Bryant, 27 S. W. 825, 826, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 134.

ASSURANCE.

See "Covenant for Further Assurance"; "Solid Assurance."

"Assurance," as used in a complaint that plaintiff signed certain papers on the assurance that she was signing a chattel mortgage, means representation, declaration, or persuasion, and that such declaration was made by the person presenting the paper, and hence is a sufficient allegation of fraud. Fieseler v. Stege, 33 N. Y. Supp. 749, 750, 86 Hun, 595.

In technical phraseology, the evidence of a contract to deliver at a future date the subject of such contract is never denominated "an assurance." Jacob defines an assurance of land to be where they had conveyed by deed. Blackstone says, a translation or transfer of property being admitted by law, it becomes necessary that this transfer should be properly evidenced. The legal evidences of this translation of property are called the "common assurances of the kingdom," whereby every man's estate is assured to him, and all controversies are either prevented or removed. The terms "conveyance" and "assurance" are convertible and synonymous, in the opinion of the soundest and most accurate writers and judges. State v. Farrand, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 333, 335.

ASSURED.

It is laid down in Reynolds on Life Insurance that the "assured" is the person who is to receive the benefit of the insurance. Hogle v. Guardian Life Ins. Co., 29 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Rob.) 567, 570.

In Brockaway v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. 766, it is held that the term "assured" referred to the one on whose application the policy was issued, who was the beneficiary and paid the premiums. In Ferdon v. Canfield, 104 N. Y. 143, 10 N. E. 146, it is said, although the life of Canfield is the life "insured" by the policy, he was not the party "assured" thereto. His life was the subject of insurance, but the contract does not on its face purport to have been made either with him or for his benefit. Thus, where a wife insures her husband's life for her own benefit, and her husband has no interest in the policy, the wife is the person "assured," within statutes providing for service of notice on person for whom life is assured. Rowe v. Brooklyn Life Ins. Co., 38 N. Y. Supp. 621, 623, 16 Misc. Rep. 323.

The word "assured," as used in an insurance policy providing that the policy should be void if the risk was increased by the act of the assured, means the person who owns the property, and who applied for the insurance and paid the premium and signed the deposit note, and not one to whom the money was payable in case of loss, though such person had a lease of the premises. Sanford v. Mechanics' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 541, 548.

As used in a fire insurance policy providing that in case of loss the assured should give immediate notice, stating the number of the policy and the name of the agent, the word "assured" does not mean the person to whom the policy was issued only, but a mortgagee to whom the policy was made payable in case of loss, as his interest should appear, was one of the parties assured within the meaning of the policy, and a notice given by him would inure to the benefit of all other interested parties. Watertown Fire Ins. Co. v. Grover & Baker Sewing Mach. Co., 1 N. W. 961, 962, 41 Mich. 131, 32 Am. Rep. 146.

Insured distinguished.

As used in a life insurance policy providing that it was accepted by the assured upon the express conditions that in case said person whose life is hereby insured shall pass beyond the settled limits of the United States the policy shall be void, or in case the said assured shall not pay the annual premiums the policy shall cease, the term "assured" must be held as applicable to him for whose benefit the policy was effected. The terms "assured" and "insured" are generally applicable either to the party for whose benefit the insurance is effected or to the party whose life is insured, and the construction of such terms must depend on their collocation and context in the policy, and there are instances where the word "assured" applies only to the person for whose benefit the policy was effected, and not to the party whose life was insured, and other cases in which the word "insured" is applied only to the party whose life was insured, and not to the person for whose benefit the policy was effected. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 2 Sup. Ct. 949, 951, 108 U. S. 498, 27 L. Ed. 800.

ASTRACHAN.

Astrachans, being a woven material consisting of a cotton foundation and a rough and more or less curled pile warp composed of goat hair, in some samples of which loops of the pile were cut and in others remained uncut, the goat hair being the material of chief value, it was dutiable as a manufacture, in whole or in part, of goat hair, and not as pile fabrics, as there was no rule of construction requiring the words used in the tariff act to be interpreted according to the technical understanding of manufacturers. In re Herrman (U. S.) 52 Fed. 941, 944.

The meaning of the word "astrachan"—that is, whether it applies to fabrics composed in whole or in part of goat hair, and therefore dutiable under Act Oct. 1, 1890, § 392, or whether it is a "pile fabric," and thus dutiable under section 396—has been held to depend upon the evidence. Where the evidence indicated that according to the understanding of weavers the goods under consideration—that is, astrachans—were known as "pile fabrics," but the weight of the evidence was that, according to the understanding of commercial men, they were not so classed, it was held that they would be classed according to the weight of the evidence. This decision was reached under the rule that a descriptive term found in a tariff act may have a commercial meaning which differs from the ordinary meaning, notwithstanding it is used in trade as a specific designation by which any article or product is bought and sold. In re Herrman (U. S.) 56 Fed. 477, 481, 3 C. C. A. 582.

ASTRACHAN TRIMMINGS.

What is known commercially as "Astrachan trimmings" are articles woven on a loom, and consisting of a foundation of cotton and a long curled pile, composed of goat hair, the material being woven in strips, which are afterwards cut apart and the sides stitched under, suitable to be made up into dress trimmings. Lowenthal v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 420.

ASYLUM.

See "Orphan Asylum."

As charity, see "Charity."

"Asylum" signifies a refuge and sanctuary, or charitable institution. Cromie's Heirs v. Institution of Mercy of New York, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 365, 391.

An asylum is a sanctuary, or place of refuge and protection, where criminals and debtors found shelter, and from which they could not be taken without sacrilege; an institution for the protection and relief of unfortunates, as asylums for the poor, for the deaf and dumb, or for the insane. State v. Bacon, 6 Neb. 286, 291.

An asylum is an institution for the protection and relief of the unfortunate. Lawrence v. Leidigh, 50 Pac. 600, 601, 58 Kan. 594, 62 Am. St. Rep. 631.

In the chapter relating to insane persons other than paupers and indigents, the word "asylum" means any public or private hospital, retreat, institution, house, or place in which any insane person is received or detained as a patient for compensation, but shall not include any state prison, county jail, or poorhouse, nor any public reformatory or penal institution of the state. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2735.

In extradition treaties.

"Asylum," as used in extradition treaties, means a place where the matter of which a person is accused may not be tried. In re Stupp (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 281, 291.

"Asylum," as used in the treaty of March 23, 1865, between the United States and Italy, providing for the extradition of any person charged with murder committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties and who seeks an asylum in the other, includes not only place, but also shelter, security, and protection, and a fugitive seeks such an asylum at all times when he claims the use of the territories of the United States as an asylum. In re De Giacomo (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 366, 367.

School for blind.

An institution for the education of the blind is an educational institution, and not an asylum, the purpose being to give the blind such education and training as shall fit them for the discharge of the duties of life, and not to furnish them a home. Curtis v. Allen, 61 N. W. 568, 570, 43 Neb. 184; State v. Bacon, 6 Neb. 286, 291.

School for orphans.

An institution organized for the maintenance and tuition of orphan children, particularly children of soldiers who have lost their lives in the service of the United States, is clearly an asylum, and not a school or institution of learning, within the meaning of the constitutional provision (article 8, § 14) permitting payment of moneys for the education of children kept in asylums. Sargent v. Board of Education of City of Rochester, 79 N. Y. Supp. 127, 128, 76 App. Div. 588.

Soldiers' home.

A soldiers' home which is established for the relief of old soldiers is an asylum, within the meaning of Const. Kan. art. 5, § 3, providing that no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence, for the purpose of voting, while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense. Lawrence v. Leldigh, 50 Pac. 600, 601, 58 Kan. 594, 62 Am. St. Rep. 631.

An inmate of the soldiers' home, an institution supported out of annual appropriations by the Legislature, is at an asylum at the public expense, within the Constitution, providing that no person shall by such a residence gain a vote in the place where the asylum is located. Silvey v. Lindsay, 13 N. E. 444, 446, 107 N. Y. 55.

The word "asylum," as used in Const. art. 7, § 5, providing that no elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense, includes a soldiers' home, and therefore a person who becomes an inmate of a soldiers' home gains no residence in the municipality where the home is located. Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 364, 56 N. W. 837, 23 L. R. A. 215.

A soldiers' home, the inmates of which are maintained at public expense, is an "asylum" within the meaning of Const. Idaho, art. 6, § 5, providing that for the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense. Powell v. Spackman, 65 Pac. 503, 504, 7 Idaho, 692, 54 L. R. A. 378.

AT.

Where, after the word "at" in a promissory note, a blank is left for the place of payment, the word "at" implies that the blank space may be filled, before the note is delivered, with the designated place of payment. Redlich v. Doll, 54 N. Y. 234, 239, 13 Am. Rep. 573; Kitchen v. Place (N. Y.) 41 Barb. 465, 466.

The fact that a note was payable "at a bank" merely designates the place where the holder may find the maker and ascertain whether the maker is ready, able, and willing to pay the same, and does not mean that the note was payable by or through the bank. Grissom v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 10 S. W. 774, 777, 87 Tenn. (3 Pickle) 350, 3 L. R. A. 273, 10 Am. St. Rep. 669.

St. 57 Geo. III, c. 99, § 40, requires that a notice of intended action against a clergyman to recover penalties for nonresidence shall be delivered to the bishop of the diocese by leaving the same "at the registry" of his diocese. Held, that the delivery of a notice in writing of such a suit to the bishop's deputy registrar at the registrar's house, which was carried the next morning to the registry office and there left, was not a leaving at the registry required by the statute, and was invalid. Vaux v. Vollans, 4 Barn. & Adol. 525.

As after.

The phrase "at the expiration of" defines a limit of time. It marks the close of a period, not its beginning. A contract authorizing its cancellation at the expiration of three months cannot be construed to authorize a cancellation after such time. Ferree v. Moquin-Offerman-Hessenbuttel Coal Co., 61 N. Y. Supp. 120, 121, 29 Misc. Rep. 624.

"At," as used in a contract of subscription for stock, giving the subscriber the right, "at the expiration of three years" from the time stated, to elect whether he would keep the stock or turn it over to certain named parties, is equivalent in meaning to "after," and the subscriber was not required to give the notice of his election immediately on the expiration of the three years, but could do so within a reasonable time thereafter. Rogers v. Burr, 25 S. E. 339, 341, 97 Ga. 10.

Where a lease provided that the lessee should have the right to remove personal property "at the end of this term," it was evident that the clause was not inserted to limit the lessee's right to remove, but to protect him, and, if any force is to be given to this provision, it means that after the expiration of the term the lessee should be permitted ingress and egress for a reasonable time to remove the property. Davidson v. Crump Mfg. Co., 58 N. W. 475, 476, 99 Mich. 501.

Comp. Laws, c. 49, § 17, providing that "at the end of one year" from the tax sale the collector shall execute to the purchaser a deed of the lands so sold and not redeemed, is to be construed as meaning "after the expiration of the year." Annan v. Baker, 49 N. H. 161, 171.

A contract for the sale of realty, agreeing that a certain sum should be paid on the purchase price "at the expiration of three months," means precisely on the day on which the three months expire, and not at any time after such expiration. Hollmann v. Conlon, 45 S. W. 275, 278, 143 Mo. 369.

In boundaries.

A conveyance of land describing its boundaries as beginning "at" a certain tree does not necessarily fix the point at the center of the tree. That may be, in the absence of other circumstances to qualify the description, the legal effect of it. "But with proof of an actual division and occupation upon a line beginning at the outer surface or near the tree, the deed may be interpreted in conformity with the practical effect given it by the parties. The description, in connection with the visible occupation, was sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes, and the line located at the outer surface of the tree is not inconsistent with the terms of the deed. The corner is substantially 'at' the tree." Stewart v. Patrick, 68 N. Y. 450, 454.

It is a well-settled rule that where a boundary of land is described as beginning "at" a road, or "on" a road, or as "bounded by" a road, without qualifying words, the boundary is the center of the road, and not the side thereof; and so, where land is conveyed and described by a lot number as indicated on a map, and the land fronts on a road or highway, the boundary will be the center and not the side of the road. Lee v. Lee (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 1, 4.

Contingency created.

"At," as used in a will giving a legatee a legacy when he arrives at a certain age, means that the legacy is contingent. Colt v. Hubbard, 33 Conn. 281, 286.

In a bequest to a person at a given age or marriage, the word "at" makes the bequest prima facie contingent. Post v. Herbert's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 540, 543.

As during.

"At the term," as used in Attachment Act, § 25, requiring that the declaration shall be filed on the return of the attachment, or at the term of court when the same is returnable, means "during the term." Lawver v. Langhans, 85 Ill. 138, 141.

In Rev. St. § 7356, providing that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to review errors of law occurring at the trial or appearing in the pleadings or judgment, the word "at" may signify more than "in" the trial or "on" the trial, and means during the progress of the trial from its inception to its end, and therefore includes within its meaning errors of law prejudicial to the defendant occurring while the court is impaneling a jury for the trial. Hartnett v. State, 42 Ohio St. 568, 572.

"At the trial," as used in 22 & 23 Car. II, requiring the certificate of the judge to give a plaintiff full costs "at the trial of a cause" when the damages found by the jury are less than 40 shillings, means at any time before verdict and final judgment, and the final judgment is the latest time at which the certificate can be made. Simonds v. Barton, 76 Pa. (26 P. F. Smith) 434, 436.

A statutory requirement that a party shall be an inhabitant or resident of the state "at the time" of the desertion in order to entitle him to sue for a divorce on the ground of desertion, refers to the whole period of three years during which the desertion must have continued, not to the mere commencement or act of desertion. Coddington v. Coddington, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 263, 265; Sanders v. Sanders, 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 410.

The preposition "at" primarily signifies near to, about, coextensive with, etc. It is very commonly used, however, in the sense of "during," as in Cr. Code, § 120 (3 Gav. & H. St. p. 420), providing that a bill of exceptions in a criminal prosecution must be made out and presented to the judge "at" the time of trial. The section means that such exception must be made out during the time of trial. Jenks v. State, 39 Ind. 1, 9.

As even at, or as early as.

In Civ. Code, § 1011, regulating the manner of proceeding on failure to perfect appeal, and providing that if the appellant shall fail to deliver the transcript and other papers, if any, to the clerk, and have his appeal docketed, on or before the second day of the term next after such appeal, the appellee may "at the same term of such court" file a transcript of the proceedings, etc., such phrase should be construed as words of enlargement, permission, and privilege, meaning "even at" or "as early as" the same term of court, and should not be regarded as a restriction to the same term of court and to that term only. Wilson v. Wilson, 36 N. W. 661, 664, 23 Neb. 455.

As exclusive.

In an agreement for a conveyance of land on payment of the purchase money, a certain amount of which was to be paid annually, "the time commencing 'at' the date of the agreement," "at" meant that the day of the date was to be excluded in the computation. Farwell v. Rogers, 58 Mass. (4 Cush.) 460, 464.

In ordinary speech "at" more generally means within than without. Thus "at a town" or "at a county" means at some place within the town or within the county, rather than a place without, or even at the utmost verge of, but not in, the town or county. So, in indictments, the fact is generally stated to have been done "at" the place; and, if it were not done in the place, the venue would be wrong. Thus a charter granting a right to construct a canal beginning "at" the District of Columbia does exclude such district. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Key (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 563, 565.

"At" is used, according to lexicographers, to denote near, approach, nearness, or proximity. Its primary idea may be conceded to be nearness. We may admit that it more generally means "within" than "without," but it is sometimes used to denote exclusion rather than inclusion. It may be used so ambiguously as to require explanation. One, for instance, may be "at" a place and not "in" it, and yet the preposition would serve in either event. The provision for the construction of a road "at the back of the garden," in the absence of anything else, might imply that it was to be constructed within the garden. It may mean within and at the back line, or without and back of, according to circumstances. And where a man insisted that the words "at the back of the garden" should be inserted before he would sign a deed, the clear meaning would be that the road should not run within the garden, but back of the garden and without the garden altogether. Knoxville, C. G. & L. Ry. Co. v. Beeler, 18 S. W. 391, 392, 90 Tenn. (6 Pickle) 548.

As immediately before.

"At the time of," in 53 Geo. III, c. 159, limiting the liability of a shipowner for damages done by the collision of his ship with another to the value of his ship "at the time of" the collision, meant the value immediately before such accident. Brown v. Wilkinson, 15 Mees. & W. 391, 397.

Testator devised lands to his daughter C. during the term of her life, and immediately after her death unto and among every such child and children as the said C. shall have lawfully begotten "at the time of her death," in fee simple, equally to be divided between them. Held, that the phrase "at the time of her death" signified in her lifetime. Barnes v. Provost (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 61, 64, 4 Am. Dec. 249.

As in or within.

A covenant to deliver tobacco "at" a warehouse does not require the obligor to deliver it "in" the warehouse. Duckham v. Smith, 21 Ky. (5 T. B. Mon.) 372, 374.

The word "at," in a declaration alleging that a certain act was committed at a certain shop, is not uncertain on the theory that it may imply either that the act was done in the shop or outside of it, but expresses the idea that the act was done inside the shop. Kaler v. Tufts, 81 Me. 63, 65, 16 Atl. 336, 337.

In holding that the words "at the courthouse," in a statute requiring the board of supervisors to meet at the courthouse, required them to meet in the courthouse, and not at the chancery clerk's office, which was held within a quarter of a mile of the courthouse, which was authorized by the statute, because no office was provided in the courthouse, the court says that the preposition "at," when it precedes the name of the place and denotes situation, frequently means the same as "in" or "within." Harris v. State, 18 South. 387, 388, 72 Miss. 960, 33 L. R. A. 85.

The word "at," in common parlance, is frequently used as denoting the situation or place where a person or thing is, or something transpired. Thus, in speaking of a place where a person resides, it is commonly said he resides "at" Washington City, "at" New Orleans, or "at" Little Rock, conveying distinctly, in each instance, that the person resides in the place named. Such was the use by the Legislature when it says that court should be holden "at Little Rock." Thus the words "at" and "in" are often used as synonymous, as well in the laws as in the ordinary language in common use in the country. Graham v. State, 1 Ark. (1 Pike) 171, 180, 181.

The word "at," when used to denote local position, may mean "in," "on," or "near by," according to the context, denoting usually as the names of towns. If the city is of great size, however, "in" is commonly used, unless the city is conceived of as a mere geographical point, when "at" is used, as, for instance, "our financial interests center 'at' New York." With the names of cities and towns, the use of "at" or "in" depends not so much upon the size of the place, as upon the point of view. When we think merely of the local or geographical point, we use "at"; when we think of inclusive space, we employ "in." Primarily the word "at" expresses the relation of nearness, the relation of presence, nearness in place. It is less definite than "in" or "on." "At the house" may be "in" or "near" the house. To determine the sense in which the word is used, the subject-matter with reference to which it is used must be taken into consideration. The word, in a subscription to a college conditioned to be located "at" a certain town, was construed to have been used only as denoting a place conceived of as a mere geographical point, and not as fixing a condition that the college should be located within the corporate limits of such town. Rogers v. Galloway Female College, 44 S. W. 454, 455, 64 Ark. 627, 39 L. R. A. 638.

A statute providing that, if the premises in an action of ejectment are actually occupied, the declaration shall be served by delivering a copy thereof to the defendant named therein, or by leaving the same with some white person of the family, of the age of 10 years or upwards, "at the dwelling house" of said defendant, if he be absent, does not require that the paper shall be delivered to a person who is in the house at the time of such delivery, but it may be delivered to one who is at or near the dwelling house, but it must be delivered on the step or on a portico or in some outhouse adjoining to or immediately connected with the family mansion, and the delivery at a distance of 125 feet, and in a corner of the yard, is not a compliance with the statute. Kibbe v. Benson, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 624, 629, 21 L. Ed. 741.

Under a statute requiring the posting of notices "in" certain public places, an affidavit stating that they were posted "at" such places is insufficient. The Legislature had seen fit to use the word "in" for good reasons, and certain it is that the words "in" and "at" are not synonymous, and may have a very different meaning, depending on their connection, and to give them the same meaning by construction might, by forcing them out of their natural meaning, lead at best to uncertainty. Hilgers v. Quinney, 51 Wis. 62, 63, 8 N. W. 17.

The term "at and between," in a mortgage of a railroad between certain termini, operates to prevent the mortgage from being construed to include part of the railroad lying outside such termini. Chapman v. Pittsburg & S. R. Co., 26 W. Va. 299, 309.

Same—In criminal law.

In an indictment, charging an assault "at" a certain schoolhouse, "at" will be construed to mean "in." The word "at" has been construed as equivalent to "in," or "within" to "in," or "near" to "into." Mr. Bishop says it is immaterial whether "in" or "at" be used in the allegation of place in an indictment. Blackwell v. State, 17 S. W. 1061, 30 Tex. App. 416 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 378).

"At," as used in an indictment charging that the offense was committed at the parish of C., is synonymous with and equivalent to the word "in," and "at" the parish and "in" the parish conveys the same idea and means the same thing. State v. Nolan (La.) 8 Rob. 513, 517.

Same—In railroad charters.

The words "from," "to," and "at" are taken inclusively, according to the subject-matter. Thus authority to construct a railroad or turnpike from A. to B., or beginning at A. and running to B., is held to confer authority to commence the road at some point within A., and to end it at some point within B. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 346, 23 L. Ed. 428.

"At," as used in the articles of association of a railroad company, organized to construct a railroad to commence in the city of Brooklyn, at some convenient point, and to terminate "at" Newtown, Queens county, does not mean "at the limit or boundary of Newtown," thus locating one terminus of the road at the boundary of such town, which is also the boundary of the city of Brooklyn, and would restrict the road wholly to that city. The words "to" and "at," when preceding the name of a place and denoting situation, may mean "in" or "within." Mason v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. (N. Y.) 35 Barb. 373, 377.

A railroad was authorized to commence at or near the city of Schenectady, and run thence on the north side of the Mohawk river. The city of Schenectady was located on the south bank of Mohawk river, the north bounds of the city being the middle of the channel of the river. Held, that the word "at" or "near," as used in the charter of the company, was used in an inclusive sense, and authorized the railroad company to build a bridge over the Mohawk, and commence their railroad "at or within" the city. Mohawk Bridge Co. v. Utica & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 6 Paige, 554, 561.

As used in the charter of a railroad company by which the terminus was "at or near Atlantic avenue," the terminus was not necessarily to the side of the avenue, but might be adopted at a point within it. People v. Brooklyn, F. & C. I. Ry. Co., 89 N. Y. 75, 87.

As near as to place.

"At," as used in a statute providing that to be fellow servants the servants must be working together "at" the same time and place, indicates nearness in time and place. It does not demand an exact coincidence as to either, but only that it shall be sufficiently so to afford the employes a reasonable opportunity of observing the conduct of each other with a view of guarding themselves against injury therefrom. Thus a switchman injured by a car pushed by a locomotive was a fellow servant with the engineer. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Warner, 35 S. W. 364, 366, 89 Tex. 475; Dryburg v. Mercur Gold Min. & Mill. Co., 55 P. 367, 371, 18 Utah, 410. Thus it was held that where two crews of men were employed in unloading ties, the day crew performing the actual work of unloading, while the night crew removed and piled the ties, the day crew and night crew were not working together at the same time and place. Texas & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Echols, 41 S. W. 488, 491, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 677. But miners separated by a wall of rock 12 feet thick were not working at the same place. Dryburg v. Mercur Gold Min. & Mill. Co., 55 Pac. 367, 371, 18 Utah, 410.

The word "at," in a notice to a city of a personal injury stated to have been received "at" the crossing of two streets is to be construed as meaning "at or near," or other equivalent phrase. Such a description is a sufficient compliance with Acts 1895, c. 172, requiring the notice of the injury to the city to state the place of action. Wood v. Borough of Stafford Springs, 51 Atl. 129, 130, 74 Conn. 437.

A statute providing that notice of sale under a trust deed shall be posted "at the courthouse door" does not mean that notices should be posted on or in the door, and the statute was sufficiently complied with where such notices were posted in the corridor of the courthouse, about 40 feet from the front door, at the side of the stairway leading to the courtroom. Howard v. Fulton, 14 S. W. 1061, 1062, 79 Tex. 231.

The words "at" and "near," as used in a provision that certain offices should be kept "at or near" a courthouse, are synonymous. Harris v. State, 18 South. 387, 388, 72 Miss. 960, 33 L. R. A. 85.

The words "at" and "near," as used in an order directing a militia captain to parade his company "at or near" a certain house, are synonymous. The word "at" is used to denote near approach, nearness, or proximity. Annan v. Baker, 49 N. H. 161, 171.

The preposition "at" denotes primarily nearness, presence, or direction towards. Webst. Dict. Thus a mortgage on property "known as the town property of said Attalla Iron & Steel Co. at Attalla" is not necessarily limited to property in such town, but may also include property nearby. O'Conner v. Nadel, 23 South. 532, 533, 117 Ala. 595.

"In general 'at' denotes nearness or presence, as at the ninth hour, at the house. 'At' the house may be in or near the house." Thus, where an order directed militia to appear at or near a house, and the proof showed that defendant was not near, it was proof that he was not at the house. Bartlett v. Jenkins, 22 N. H. (2 Post.) 53, 63.

The word "at," as used in a declaration describing the place where an event occurred, means a relation of proximity to or nearness to, and failure to prove the exact spot alleged does not therefore constitute a variance. West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Manning, 70 Ill. App. 239, 242.

Same-In criminal law.

The words "at and near," in a statute prohibiting the disturbance of a religious assembly by acts "at or near" the place of worship, are for the purpose of providing for a punishment of cases of disturbance by the offender who may be near the scene of the disturbance, as well as those committed in the very presence of the assembled worshippers. In what precise locality the offender may be is not an essential element of the offense, and it may be shown by proof, and need not be averred after presentment. Warren v. State, 50 Tenn. (3 Helsk.) 269, 271.

"At" is an indefinite word, and may mean "in" or "within," or it may mean "near." Its primary idea is nearness, and it is less definite than "in" or "on." "At" the house may be "in" or "near" the house. It is a relative term, and its signification depends largely upon the subject-matter in relation to which it is used, and the circumstances under which it becomes necessary to apply it to surrounding objects. "At" and "near" may be considered synonymous, and a charge in an indictment that the accused disturbed a congregation of persons lawfully assembled for divine service "at" a named church, is sustained by proof that he disturbed a congregation so assembled for such purpose at a bush arbor "near" such church, both places being within the jurisdiction of the court. Minter v. State, 30 S. E. 989, 992, 104 Ga. 743.

"At," as used in an indictment charging an assault to have been committed "at" M., meant "in" or "near"; and treating the allegation as laying the venue, and not as descriptive of the place, proof that assault was committed five miles away did not constitute a variance. Hurley v. Marsh, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 329, 330.

As used in Rev. Code, § 3622, providing for the punishment of any person betting at a game of cards played "at a storehouse," the word "at" should be construed to mean "near to" and "in front of" the storehouse. Napier v. State, 50 Ala. 163, 170. So, also, playing cards within 10 feet of a storehouse within which liquors were sold, constituted a violation of Code, § 3622, forbidding the playing of any game with cards, etc., at any tavern, inn, or storehouse for retailing liquors. Ray v. State, 50 Ala. 172, 173.

The words "at or near," in an indictment for card playing at or near a certain public place, renders the indictment bad for uncertainty, as playing near a public place would not necessarily be a violation of the statute, unless it appears so near that it, too, was rendered a public place by reason of its proximity. Bishop v. Commonwealth (Va.) 13 Gratt. 785, 787.

Same—In railroad charters.

That the places from and to which a railroad is to be constructed must be specified, is sufficiently complied with by designating one terminus as "at" or "near" Bergen Cut, though the cut is more than a mile long. Central R. Co. of New Jersey v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 475, 486.

A contract by a railroad company to establish its depot "at" a specified town, is complied with by locating it at a convenient distance from the business portion of the town. Frey v. Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co., 24 S. W. 950, 951, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 29.

"At" is defined by Webster to express "primarily," "nearness in place or time." "At" the house may be "in" or "near" the house, and authority to connect with the railroad at the most practicable point "at" a certain city is not transgressed when the most practicable point is half a mile from the city limits. Purifoy v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 12 S. E. 741, 742, 108 N. C. 100.

The construction of a railroad from a point a mile and a half from P. was held a sufficient compliance with its act of incorporation requiring it to construct the road from a point "at or near" P. Appeal of Parke, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 137, 141.

The signification of the word "at" depends largely on the subject-matter in relation to which it is used, and the circumstances under which it becomes necessary to apply it to surrounding objects, and, when used in the new charter of a bridge corporation requiring it to build a bridge "at" the Old Town Falls, will not be held to be synonymous with "at or near," as used in a former charter, but meant a new place, so that rebuilding the bridge 2,000 feet from the falls did not constitute a compliance with the charter. State v. Old Town Bridge Corp., 26 Atl. 947, 950, 85 Me. 17.

When used in reference to place, "at" frequently means "in" or "within," but sometimes denotes nearness or proximity, which is its primary signification, and it is less definite than "in" or "on." Its signification is generally controlled by the context and attending circumstances, and, when used in a contract requiring a railroad company to construct its road so as to intersect another line "at" a certain city, means an intersection near the city, and not necessarily within the corporate limits. Ft. Worth & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 18 S. W. 206, 208, 82 Tex. 553.

Act March 15, 1864 (P. L. p. 283), authorized a railroad to purchase and hold at the termini of its road, and at any intermediate station on the line thereof, lands not exceeding 15 acres for station purposes. Held, that the expression "at the termini," as so used, meant "near," and therefore the tract it was authorized to purchase need not include the point where the rails end nor join the roadway, but that a reasonable discretion was intrusted to the company to purchase and hold land at or near the terminus, wherever convenience might dictate. West Jersey R. Co. v. Receiver of Taxes of City of Camden, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 299, 302.

As near as to time.

"At," as used in Pol. Code, § 2520, providing that the Governor shall appoint three harbor commissioners, and shall "at" the expiration of their respective terms appoint and commission their successors, means, not the exact moment, but near it, and may mean a few moments before or a few moments after. People v. Blanding, 63 Cal. 333, 339.

"At the time," as used in the statute of frauds requiring some payment "at the time" of the transaction, did not mean rigorously eo instante. It did not contemplate that the contract and the payment should be at the same time, in the sense that they are considered parts of one and the same continuous transaction. A payment by check which was not cashed until afterwards was within the statute. Hunter v. Wetsell, 84 N. Y. 549, 554, 38 Am. Rep. 544.

Rev. St. § 3324, requiring a retail dealer of distilled spirits to deface and obliterate the stamp on the cask "at the time of emptying such cask," and providing a punishment for failure to do so, should not be construed as requiring the effacing and obliterating of the stamp to be done eo instante that the cask is empty, but the act should be done in a convenient time, considering the surrounding circumstances affording evidence of reasonable excuse for delay; and hence, if a cask had been emptied as far as could be done by the faucet, and if it had been removed from the place where it had been used in the course of business, and the stamp had not been effaced and obliterated because the dealer regarded the cask as still containing spirits of value, which she desired to save when she could procure the necessary assistance to pour it out of the bunghole, and a day had not elapsed from its removal until its discovery by revenue officers, there was a reasonable cause for the delay, and the dealer was not guilty of a violation of the statute. United States v. Buchanan (U. S.) 9 Fed. 689, 690.

A contract for the shipping of cattle on a railway, providing that no claim would be allowed the shipper unless made in writing "before or at the time" the stock was unloaded, does not mean that such claim must be made at the identical moment of unloading, but so immediately that the object sought by the notice can be attained. "The apparent object of the provision was to enable the company to inspect the stock and ascertain the amount of the alleged damages, and if the claim is made before the stock is mixed with other cattle or slaughtered, or the ascertainment of damages otherwise rendered impracticable, the condition is complied with." Rice v. Kansas Pac. Ry., 63 Mo. 314, 323 (citing Goggin v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 12 Kan. 416).

In a prosecution for bastardy, a judgment allowing expenses incurred "at the birth" of the child cannot be construed as extending beyond lying-in expenses. Comstock v. Weed, 2 Conn. 155, 157.

The word "at," in a contract requiring the vendee therein to purchase certain property "at the expiration of three years" from date, meant the day on which the period of three years from date expired. While the word "at" is not invariably used to denote a fixed and definite time or place, and is sometimes so used as to mean "about" or "near to" the time or place stated, as "at the house" may and often does mean about or near the house, yet, in the case of a note or bill payable at a bank at the expiration of 60 days from date, it would hardly be argued, on the authority of Webster or Worcester, that the legal requirements of a contract would be satisfied by a demand of payment anywhere about or near the bank, or near to or within a reasonable time after the expiration of the period of 60 days. In the construction of a will giving a legatee the right of election, to be exercised "at" the death of the testator, it would undoubtedly be held that the right might be exercised within a reasonable time after the event, because the more rigid interpretation of the word would be obviously inconsistent with the intention of the testator, and would necessarily and inevitably defeat the exercise of such right. There is no such reason for applying the same rule of construction to the present case. Magoffin v. Holt, 62 Ky. (1 Duv.) 95, 96.

As until or up to.

In a will giving a certain sum of money to the children of testator's daughter that she might or should have at the time of her death, "at" should be construed in the sense of the word "until." Haggerty v. Hockenberry, 30 Atl. 88, 89, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 354.

In a receipt "received of M. in various payments at this date, on account of," etc., "the sum of," etc., the words "at this date" cannot by themselves be held to mean up to this date, since each phrase of the receipt had a distinctive import, but referred directly to the date of the receipt, and plainly meant that there was more than one payment included in the receipt on the day on which it was given. Moore v. Korty, 11 Ind. 341, 343.

In its customary acceptance the word "at" is generally understood to mean "at the time of," not "before" or "after," but expresses the relation of presence and nearness in either place or time, and, as used in referring to rights and duties "at the date of an assignment," means the rights and duties as they existed when the assignment was made; that is, prior to or up to the date of the assignment becoming operative. Howe v. Warren, 40 N. E. 472, 473, 478, 154 Ill. 227.

AT AND FROM.

"At and from," as used in a policy of marine insurance on a vessel "at and from" an island, means something more than an insurance at and from a port, and means that the vessel may use the different ports of the island for the purpose of obtaining the return cargo. "The word 'at' comprises the whole island, and under that word the ship is protected in going from port to port around the coast of the island." Dickey v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 11 U. S. (7 Cranch) 327, 328, 3 L. Ed. 360.

"At and from Boston to St. Thomas and a market," as used in a marine policy, meant that so long as the vessel was seeking a market in the West Indies, no matter how frequently she went from port to port, she was within the protection of the policy. Deblois v. Ocean Ins. Co., 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 303, 309, 28 Am. Dec. 245.

As on arrival at port.

A marine policy "at and from" a port must be construed according to circumstances. If a vessel be in a foreign port in the course of a voyage, the risk attaches from her first arrival there. Seamens v. Loring (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 920, 924.

According to the general import of the words "at and from," a policy of insurance "at and from" any port or ports in Newfoundland would ordinarily attach on the ship's first mooring in the harbor or coast; but it appearing that, according to the usage of the Newfoundland trade, when ships arrive they are either employed for some time in fishing, or they make an intermediate voyage in the American seas before beginning to take in their homeward cargo, during which they are protected by separate policy, the risk of the underwriter only commences from the time when the banking or intermediate voyage ends. Vallance v. Dewar, 1 Camp. 503, 508.

When a vessel is insured for a voyage "at and from" a certain place, and the ship is not then in port, the policy commences to run at the time it safely arrives at the specified point, and continues during its stay, while preparing for the voyage insured against. Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 95 N. Y. 196, 201, 47 Am. Rep. 29.

A marine policy insuring a vessel "at and from" Bengal to England means the first arrival of the ship at Bengal. Motteux v. London Assur. Co., 1 Atk. 545, 548.

As at commencement of ownership.

If assured becomes owner while the vessel is lying in port, the policy "at and from" the port does not attach until after his ownership commences. Seamens v. Loring (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 920, 924.

As at commencement of preparations for voyage.

"At and from," as used in a marine policy providing that the policy shall cover the vessel "at and from" a certain port, means that the liability of the insurer attaches at the time of the commencement of preparations for the voyage. Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 95 N. Y. 196, 201, 47 Am. Rep. 29; Seamens v. Loring (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 920, 924; Kemble v. Bowne (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 75, 79.

Under a policy of insurance on goods to be carried from Bristol to New York, the policy attached on the goods while preparations were being made for sailing. Hendricks v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 1, 7.

A policy of marine insurance insuring a vessel "at and from" a certain port will be construed to allow the vessel a reasonable time while there engaged in the business of preparing for her voyage. Thebaud v. Great Western Ins. Co., 50 N. E. 284, 286, 155 N. Y. 518.

A policy of marine insurance on goods on board a certain schooner "at and from" S. to F., beginning the adventure from the loading of the goods on board at S., means from the loading on board; the policy cannot attach until they leave the shore to be laden on board. "'At and from,' when applied to a ship, includes the period of her stay in the port from the time of her arrival there, and when applied to goods means from the time the goods are put on the vessel." Patrick v. Ludlow (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Cas. 10, 12, 2 Am. Dec. 130.

As at date of policy.

"At and from," as used in a marine policy stating that the insurance is on a vessel "at and from" a certain port, means that the policy is operative "from the time it is placed on the vessel in preparation for the voyage contemplated." Snyder v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 95 N. Y. 196, 201, 47 Am. Rep. 29.

Under a policy on a ship "at and from" Bristol to London, where the vessel was lying in port, complete and ready for sea, the risk on the policy could only commence from its date; therefore, where the assured did not sail for three months after the execution of the policy, the delay was a material variation. Palmer v. Marshall, 8 Bing. 317, 318.

As covering deviations or returns.

In a policy on a cargo of a vessel assured for a voyage "at and from Baltimore to Boston," the risk commenced from the time the vessel was loaded, and a deviation thereafter would avoid the policy, whether it occurred before or after the vessel actually left the port of departure; and where the cargo was on board by the 19th of November, and the vessel did not sail until the 22d of December, the delay being unexcused, there was a deviation, and the underwriter was discharged. Augusta Ins. & Banking Co. v. Abbott, 12 Md. 348, 378.

The words "at and from Plymouth to the banks and thence back to Plymouth" is a definite and distinct description of a contemplated voyage between two fixed termini, and the vessel cannot make a third port for the purpose of obtaining bait for the fishing voyage in which she is engaged, in the absence of a custom of so doing. Burgess v. Equitable Marine Ins. Co., 126 Mass. 70, 77, 30 Am. Rep. 654.

"At and from," as used in a marine policy insuring a vessel "at and from" a certain port, means that there is a certain continuous and indivisible risk, and a voluntary and unnecessary departure from port, except on the voyage insured, discharges the underwriter from liability on the policy. Fernandez v. New York Mut. Ins. Co., 48 N. Y. 571, 575.

Insurance of a vessel at and from New York to Havana contemplates the risk of a single voyage limited to the points named. Fernandez v. Great Western Ins. Co., 48 N. Y. 571, 575, 8 Am. Rep. 571.

A marine insurance policy insuring a ship, her cargo, and freight, "at and from" a certain port to the port of discharge, rendered the company liable after the return of the vessel to the port from which she started for repairs, and also on the subsequent journey to the port of discharge. Taylor v. Lowell, 3 Mass. 331, 344, 3 Am. Dec. 141.

As covering initial freight.

Where a policy of marine insurance insured the goods and ship "at and from" all and every port on the coast of Brazil, and after the 17th of September to the Cape of Good Hope, beginning the adventure on the goods from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at all and every port on the coast of Brazil and from the 17th of September, and upon the ship in the same manner, the policy only attached on the homeward-bound cargo laden on board at the coast of Brazil, and did not cover the cargo originally taken in at the Cape of Good Hope, though such cargo was commissioned on board after the 17th of September, while the ship was on the coast of Brazil, and after she left it on her return to the Cape. Robertson v. French, 4 East, 180, 140.

As limited to initial freight.

As used in a contract of insurance on the freight of a steamer and barge against the total loss of the steamer's or barge's freight "at and from" St. Louis to New Orleans, "at and from" cannot be construed as limiting the insurance to the freight list for goods on board at St. Louis when the voyage was begun, but, in view of the well-known usage of boats in the Mississippi trade to touch at intermediate ports, it covered additions to the cargo received in the usual manner at such ports. Stillwell v. Holmes Ins. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 92.

A marine policy on a vessel on a voyage "at and from" Alexandria to St. Thomas and to other ports on the West Indies, and back to her port of discharge in the United States, "upon all goods or merchandise" laden or to be laden on board, covers the very excessive cargo taken on board in the course of the voyage out and at home. Columbian Insurance Co. v. Catlett, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 383, 395, 6 L. Ed. 664.

Where insurance was taken out on freight "at and from St. Louis to New Orleans," the insurance attached not only on the freight at St. Louis, but as to any part of the cargo on the way. Stillwell v. Commercial Ins. Co., 2 Mo. App. 22, 31.

As requiring presence at port.

A marine policy insuring a ship "at and from" a certain place means, either that the ship is at the port at the time the insurance is effected, or will shortly be there. Hull v. Cooper, 14 East, 479, 480.

A policy attached to a vessel insured "at and from" Calais, Me., on the 16th day of July at noon, to "at and from all ports to which she may proceed for six months," though there was no evidence that the vessel was at or prosecuting her voyage from Calais on the day named, it appearing that when the policy was made neither party knew when the vessel sailed from Calais, and that it was their intent to insure on time, without regard to the place where the vessel might be. Martin v. Fishing Ins. Co., 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 389, 395, 32 Am. Dec. 220.

A marine policy on a vessel "at and from" a certain point attaches, although the vessel at the time has left the port, if neither party in the policy has knowledge of the latter fact, and the intention is to insure on time, without regard to the place where the vessel may be. Martin v. Fish- ing Ins. Co., 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 389, 395, 32 Am. Dec. 220.

AT OR ABOUT.

A call in a description for "at or about" the head of a certain stream was sufficiently accurate though it might extend a few rods either way from the place originally intended. State v. Coleman, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 98, 103.

AT OR BEFORE.

A promise to pay a person "at or before" a day named is a promise to pay on the day named, the promisor having the option to pay before that time. Wilson v. Bicknell, 49 N. E. 113, 170 Mass. 259.

Within a certain period "on or before" a day named and "at or before" a certain day are equivalent terms, and the rules of construction apply to each alike. Leader v. Plante, 50 Atl. 54, 95 Me. 339, 85 Am. St. Rep. 415.

AT OR NEAR.

See, also, "Near."

An allegation in a petition that plaintiff's intestate was killed "at or near" a private crossing should be construed to mean that she was killed at a place on the track other than the crossing. Davis' Adm'r v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 75 S. W. 275, 277, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 342.

AT ALL TIMES.

14 Stat. 529, § 26, providing that the court "may at all times" require a bankrupt to attend and submit to an examination, means at all times until his discharge, but does not confer on the court authority, after his discharge, to require the bankrupt to submit to an examination. In re Dole (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 828, 831.

A collector's bond, after reciting that a principal had been appointed collector under Act 43 Geo. III, c. 99, was conditioned for the due collection by such collector of the rates and duties "at all times thereafter." Held, that though the words "at all times thereafter" in the condition of the bond, when taken by themselves, would extend the liability of the surety beyond the officer's term of office, which was but for a year, the office of collector being an annual office, the words must nevertheless be construed with reference to the recital and to the nature of the appointment, under the act, and therefore only rendered the sureties liable for the collector's acts during the term of office. Pepin v. Cooper, 2 Barn. & Ald. 431, 439.

A parol license to enter upon land at any and all times, and cut and carry away growing timber, cannot be construed as giving an indefinite time to cut and remove the timber, but means at any and all times within a reasonable time. Thus it was held that if not acted on within three years such license could be revoked. Hill v. Hill, 113 Mass. 103, 104, 18 Am. Rep. 455.

Section 3, subd. 5, of the act relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, provides that the debtor should make an inventory of his property within a certain time after making the assignment, and, in case he shall fail to do so within such time, that the assignee shall then make a schedule, and that if he should fail to do so he shall be removed by the judge, and then further provides that "the books and papers of such delinquent debtor shall 'at all times' be subject to the inspection and examination of any creditor, the county judge is authorized by order to require such debtor or assignor to allow such inspection or examination." Held that, by providing that the books and papers should "at all times be subject to inspection," an intention was expressed that the words "debtor" and "delinquent debtor" should be taken as synonymous with "assignor," and that such inspection might be made by a creditor prior to the refusal of the debtor to make the inventory, as well as after such refusal. In re H. Herrmann Lumber Co., 48 N. Y. Supp. 509, 510, 21 App. Div. 514.

As continuously.

A contract between the agent of a towing company and the master of a canal boat by which the master agreed to keep a competent man at the helm of his boat "at all times" while the tow was in motion, and guaranteeing that the boat should be seaworthy and reasonably fit for the trip, required the keeping of a man at the helm continuously during the towage of the vessel, and hence, where there was no one at the helm for some 15 or 20 minutes prior to and at the time of the collision, the contract was broken by the owner of the tow, and no recovery could be had against the tug or its owner. Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing & Transp. Co., 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 180, 197.

AT ANCHOR.

See "Lying at Anchor."

AT ANY TIME.

Where a warrant of attorney authorizes judgment "at any time thereafter," it may be entered up before the note which it secures becomes due. Cohen v. Burgess, 44 Ill. App. 206, 207.

A warrant of attorney, authorizing a confession of judgment "at any time," authorized it to be done at any time after the delivery of the note. Elkins v. Wolfe, 44 Ill. App. 376, 380.

"At any time," as used in Rev. St. 1894, § 399 (Rev. St. 1881, § 396), giving a trial court discretion to allow an amendment at any time, should be broadly construed, and so as to permit an amendment to be made upon a proper showing after verdict, but before final judgment. Raymond v. Wathen, 41 N. E. 815, 816, 142 Ind. 367.

In Act April 2, 1869, directing that proceedings on which tax sales and conveyances are founded shall not be questioned collaterally, but may be at any time reviewed by certiorari, "at any time" means that the time should be extended to at least the period limited for an action of ejectment, otherwise the statute might in effect shorten the limitation of time for the recovery of possession of lands within the statutory period of 20 years, and certiorari is intended to be in aid of the ejectment, and not to defeat it. Alden v. City of Newark, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 92, 95.

The words "at any time" in a clause in a will devising property to testator's grandson, and directing that, in case the grandson shall "at any time" die without issue, then the property shall go to another, are to be construed to mean at "whatever time" and import a definite failure of issue. Appeal of Snyder, 95 Pa. 174, 182; In re Miller's Estate (Pa.) 22 Atl. 1044.

The words "at any time shall have the right of pre-emption of the premises," in a covenant in a deed that the grantor shall have at any time the right of pre-emption of the premises at a stated price, cannot be construed to give the grantor the right to repurchase the property at any other time except when the grantee wishes to sell. Garcia v. Callender, 5 N. Y. Supp. 934, 935, 53 Hun, 12.

As at all times.

"At any time," as used in a village ordinance providing that no rubbish shall be set on fire or burned in any street at any time, forbids fires in the streets at all times. Village of New Rochelle v. Clark, 19 N. Y. Supp. 989, 990, 65 Hun, 140.

"Any time," as used in a covenant giving the lessees the privilege of buying certain premises "at any time they may wish to do so," means that they could at any time purchase when the lessor gave them the first privilege, which he was bound to do before selling to others, and that, until such notice was given, the lessees could, at any time during the existence of the lease, purchase the property at the price agreed. Schroeder v. Gemeiner, 10 Nev. 355, 361.

As more than once.

"At any time," as used in Lunatic Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, § 58, authorizing the justices to inquire into and adjudicate on the settlement of a lunatic "at any time," relates merely to the time at which the inquiry may take place, and therefore, on appeal from an order of maintenance, a prior order of sessions adjudicating on the settlement between the same parties against an ordinary order of removal is conclusive as to the settlement at the time of such prior order. Overseers of Poor of Parish of Heston v. Overseers of Poor of Parish of St. Bride, 1 El. & Bl. 583, 587.

As immediately or within a reasonable time.

A bond which by its terms is payable "at any time called for" is payable immediately. Bowman v. McChesney (Va.) 22 Grat. 609, 612.

"At any time," as used in an offer to buy stock at any time after January 1st, "does not import perpetuity, but only a reasonable time in which to purchase such stock." Park v. Whitney, 19 N. E. 161, 148 Mass. 278.

The phrase "at any time," within the meaning of a deed from the city reserving a right to construct a street across the land conveyed at any time, means within a reasonable time. Raynor v. Syracuse University, 71 N. Y. Supp. 293, 302, 35 Misc. Rep. 83.

A lease of oil lands for a term of three years, or as much longer as gas or oil should be found in paying quantities, if found before the expiration of the term, giving the lessee the right to remove "at any time" any or all machinery, does not make the lessee's right to remove such machinery unlimited as to time. The right to enter at any time and to remove the machinery at any time was predicated of that part of the term that was uncertain; that is, after three years the lessee had the right at any time to enter and drill additional wells if oil or gas was being produced in paying quantities, and had the right, although three years had passed, to remove machinery and fixtures after or when the well would cease to produce oil or gas in paying quantities. The removal must be made within a reasonable time; or, in other words, the law in such cases allows the tenant a reasonable time for the removal of fixtures. Shellar v. Shivers, 33 Atl. 95, 96, 171 Pa. 569.

As from time to time.

"At any time," as used in a statute giving a township committee power at any time to set off and divide the township into districts, do not of necessity and in all contexts mean that the division should affect every portion of the township at one and the same time, but the phrase may mean "from time to time" when required by the context. Smith v. Howell, 38 Atl. 180, 181, 60 N. J. Law, 384.

AT CHAMBERS.

"At chambers," as used in Const. art. 4, § 18, providing that judges of the several courts shall have such power and jurisdiction "at chambers" as may be directed by law, is to be understood in its ordinary sense. The phrase "at chambers" is a technical one. The term "chambers" is thus defined by Burrill: "The office or private room of a judge, where parties are heard and orders made in matters not requiring to be brought before the full court, and where costs are taxed, and similar business transacted." Bouvier says: "When a judge decides some interlocutory matter, which has arisen in the course of the cause, out of court, he is said to make such decision at his chambers." Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hurd, 17 Ohio St. 144, 146.

Where a certain room was appropriated for use by the court for the transaction of business not requiring the presence of a jury, an averment in an indictment that the motion for a new trial was heard by the court "at his chambers" means that it was heard in such room, and not at the private lodgings of the judge. Commonwealth v. McLaughlin, 122 Mass. 449, 454.

The phrase "at chambers" in Const. art. 4, § 23, providing that court commissioners may be appointed in each county, who shall have authority to perform like duties as a judge of the superior court "at chambers," refers to the powers exercised by the judges at chambers at the adoption of the Constitution, which were to entertain, try, hear, and determine all actions, causes, motions, demurrers, and other matters not requiring a trial by jury. Peterson v. Dillon, 67 Pac. 397, 399, 27 Wash. 78.

"A judge at chambers is simply a judge of a court of record acting out of court." Frawley v. Cosgrove, 53 N. W. 689, 690, 83 Wis. 441.

The phrase "at chambers," in the statute authorizing an appointment of receivers at chambers, means "at the court." Chicago & S. E. Ry. Co. v. St. Clair, 42 N. E. 225, 226, 144 Ind. 371.

When a circuit judge, within his circuit, grants an order to show cause why an order of injunction should not be made, returnable before himself, and concludes the order with the words "done in chambers," and makes an order of injunction reciting that "the judge of said court, having considered the return," etc., concluding with the words, "done at chambers," such an order will be considered a judge's, and not a court's, order. Black Hills Flume & Min. Co. v. Grand Island & W. C. R. Co., 51 N. W. 342, 345, 2 S. D. 546.

The words "at chambers," as used in relation to the action of a judge, means that the judge is acting out of court, so that Code Civ. Proc. § 345, providing for an appeal from the judgment rendered at chambers, will be held to include all judgments rendered out of term time. Appleby v. South Carolina & G. R. Co., 36 S. E. 109, 111, 58 S. C. 33.

AT COMMAND.

A will providing that the testator did not wish certain hospital buildings, for which he had devised money, to be commenced until the funds "at command" were sufficient to erect and endow them, does not mean that the money must be in hand, but it is sufficient if the requisite amounts have been subscribed in a manner similar to the method used in making church subscriptions. Appeal of Seagrave, 17 Atl. 412, 417, 125 Pa. 362.

AT COMPLAINANT'S COSTS.

See "Complainant's Costs."

AT DEATH OR DECEASE.

The words "at his decease," in a devise of property to A., with a direction that, if A. should die without issue "at his decease," the real estate should be equally divided among the heirs of another, was held to make the bequest good as an executory devise, as the language does not import an indefinite failure of issue, but only a failure at the death of the first taker. Such a limitation is not within the rule against perpetuities. Heard v. Horton (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 165, 167, 43 Am. Dec. 659.

The insertion of the words "at her death," in a bequest to testator's wife of all his personal estate, with power to dispose of it "at her death" in any manner she thinks proper, does not operate to limit the interest of the wife in the estate to that of a trustee, but she is entitled to the absolute and unqualified property in the personal estate, which at her death, without making a will, vested in the distributees. David v. Bridgman, 10 Tenn. (2 Yerg.) 557, 561.

In a will bequeathing to the testator's son certain land willed to the testator's wife during her lifetime, to go to the son "at her death," on condition that he takes care of his mother as long as she should live, the words "at her death" cannot be held in and of themselves to postpone the vesting of the estate in fee simple, or to convert the estate devised to the son into a contingent remainder, the devise being subject to a condition, the violation of which would forfeit the estate. Gingrich v. Gingrich, 45 N. E. 101, 102, 146 Ind. 227.

AT ISSUE.

In construing a rule of chancery requiring a demand for a jury to be made at the next term after the cause was "at issue," it was held that a cause was "at issue" at the time when the issue was joined, and not when the pleadings reached their final state of completion, so that the allowance of an amendment at the term following that at which the issue is joined did not make the cause at issue only at the date of the amendment and not prior thereto. Hamilton v. Ritchie (Tenn.) 53 S. W. 198, 204.

Parties are "at issue" in ejectment after the action is brought and the declaration filed. Wimberly v. Mansfield, 70 Ga. 783, 784.

AT LARGE.

See "Appraisers at Large"; "Corporation at Large"; "Creditor at Large."

"At large" is defined as not limited to any particular place, district, person, matter, or question, and as used in Comp. St. art. 4, c. 18, providing for the election of two supervisors from certain towns to be elected at large, means that said town is not to be divided for the purpose of election. State v. Welsh, 87 N. W. 529, 531, 62 Neb. 721.

As animals not under control of owner.

"Running at large," as used in a statute making a railroad company liable for the killing of stock running at large, means stock not under the control of the owner, or under the immediate care of any shepherd or herdsman; animals that are left to roam wherever they may go. Hinman v. Chicago, R. L. & P. R. Co., 28 Iowa, 491, 497; Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 15 N. W. 286, 287, 60 Iowa, 469; Hammond v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 43 Iowa, 168, 171.

"Running at large," as used in Gen. St. c. 100, § 29, declaring that any person who shall suffer any cattle to run at large in a public highway shall forfeit a certain sum, means "strolling without restraint or confinement, wandering, rambling at will." Russell v. Cone, 46 Vt. 600, 601, 604 (cited and approved in Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 134, 28 Am. Rep. 496).

Where a herd of cattle being herded by a boy were left by him while he returned to his father's house, about a half a mile distant, when another boy went to take charge of them, and during his absence one of the cattle strayed away from the others, the cattle were "at large" during the interval between the time the first boy left them and the return of the second. Valleau v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 73 Iowa, 723, 36 N. W. 760.

To "run at large," as used in Consol. St. § 193, providing that a person permitting a dog to run at large without a collar shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, should be construed to mean "running on a public road or off from the owner's premises, without any person claiming an interest in the dog being near at hand." Nehr v. State, 53 N. W. 589, 590, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 771.

The term "running at large," as used in a statute providing that any person suffering certain animals to run at large shall be liable to a fine, means strolling without restraint or confinement, as wandering, or roving or rambling at will unrestrained. Russell v. Cone, 46 Vt. 600, 604.

A. animals within control of owner.

"Running at large," as used in statutes imposing a penalty on one who suffers animals to run at large in public places, is used in the sense of strolling without restraint or confinement, as wandering, roving, or rambling at will; free from restraint. Probably no abstract rule can be laid down applicable to every case as to the nature, character, and amount of restraint necessary to be exercised over a domestic animal when suffered to be on the highway, incident to its use. But the restraint need not be entirely physical; it may depend much upon the training, habits, and instincts of the animal in the particular case; and the sufficiency of the restraint is to be determined more from its effects upon, and controlling and restraining influence over, the animal, than from its nature or kind. Elliott v. Kitchens (Ala.) 20 South. 366, 368, 33 L. R. A. 364, 56 Am. St. Rep. 69.

Hill's Laws, §§ 40, 48, providing that the allowing of stock to run at large upon common unfenced or upon inclosed land, owned or in the possession of the owner of such stock, shall not be deemed or held to be contributory negligence, so as to exclude that defense in an action against a railroad for the killing of the stock, means such animals that roam and feed at will, and are not under the immediate direction and control of any one. They may be in an inclosure, which may restrain the limits in which they shall wander and feed, or they may be on an unfenced range, relatively without limit, where they may roam and feed at will, but in either case they are not subject to the direction and control of any one; so to speak, they are masters of their own movements, going whither they will, without personal direction or control; but the term "stock running at large" is not meant to include stock in charge of a herder, and subject to his control, whether in an inclosed field or on an unfenced range. Keeney v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co., 24 Pac. 233, 234, 19 Or. 291.

Cattle which are in a public highway in charge of a person directing or controlling their movements are not "running at large" within the meaning of a statute making it the duty of the overseer of highways to take into his custody any animal forbidden to run at large which may be running at large, etc. Bertwhistle v. Goodrich, 19 N. W. 143, 144, 53 Mich. 457; Beeson v. Tice, 45 N. E. 612, 613, 46 N. E. 154, 17 Ind. App. 78.

"Running at large," as applied to animals, means strolling about without restraint or confinement; rambling at will. Thus, where cattle were in the highway, eating, in plain view of the owner's family, and watched by them, they were not running at large. Eklund v. Toner, 80 N. W. 791, 121 Mich. 687.

The fact that a herder in charge of cattle driven along a road fell asleep, or that they in passing casually ate of the grass growing on the roadside, does not cause them to be "running at large," within the meaning of Act March 18, 1874, declaring that the roadmasters shall deal with all animals found pasturing upon the public highway as provided in an act concerning animals found running at large, etc. Thompson v. Corpstein, 52 Cal. 653, 654.

Sheep which are being herded by a competent person and are under his control are not "running at large" within the meaning of an ordinance authorizing a marshal to seize sheep found running at large. Spect v. Arnold, 52 Cal. 455, 457.

Rev. St. c. 58, § 10, requiring the licensing of dogs going "at large," and providing a penalty for violation of such requirement, includes one following his master, or the clerk of his master, through the streets loose, and at such a distance as that such control could not be exercised as would prevent the dog doing mischief. "If a dog going through the streets by the side of his owner or a servant having special charge of him, or so near to him that he might be controlled and prevented from doing mischief, although he was not tied, he was not at large." Commonwealth v. Dow, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 382, 385.

A hound near a companion of its master in a chase, although its master is out of sight and hearing, is not "running at large," within the meaning of Acts 1862, No. 10, § 3, relating to the killing of dogs running at large. Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 134, 28 Am. Rep. 496.

The term "running at large," in a statute relating to the liability of a railroad company for killing stock running at large, does not include a horse being driven by its owner. Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 39 N. W. 242, 75 Iowa, 157.

The term "running at large," in statutes relative to the liability of railroad companies for the killing of stock running at large, does not apply to a team of horses attached to a sleigh, and wandering on a prairie at night, driven by a man in an unconscious, drunken stupor. Grove v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry. Co., 39 N. W. 248, 75 Iowa, 163.

Animals escaping from control of owner.

A horse, which while being driven becomes frightened and escapes from the control of the driver without his fault, and runs away, is not "running at large" within the meaning of ordinances of a city prohibiting animals from running at large. Presnall v. Raley (Tex.) 27 S. W. 200, 201.

A colt that escapes from its owner, while being conducted across depot grounds, and strays upon the track, is regarded as "live stock running at large," within the meaning of Code, § 1289, requiring railroad companies to fence against live stock running at large. Smith v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 12 N. W. 619, 620, 58 Iowa, 622.

"Running at large," as used in Code, § 1289, providing that any corporation operating a railway, and failing to fence the same against live stock "running at large" at all points where such right to fence exists, shall be liable to the owner for any such stock injured or killed by reason of the want of such fence, imports that the stock are not under control of the owners, that they are not confined by inclosures to a certain field or place, nor under the immediate care of a shepherd or herdsman, and that they are left to roam wherever they may go. Where an animal escapes from the control of the owner and cannot be caught by him, such animal is "running at large" within the meaning of the statute; and hence, where a team had broken loose from where it was tied, and ran away, not being driven or under the attempted control of anybody, and came upon a railroad track, they were "running at large" within the meaning of the statute. Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 15 N. W. 286, 287, 60 Iowa, 459.

Animals escaping from inclosures.

Animals which escape from an inclosure in which they have been placed for the purpose of confining them, and which the owner, when he learns of their escape, endeavors to recover, cannot be regarded as animals "running at large" within the meaning of the statutes. Stephenson v. Ferguson, 30 N. E.

714, 4 Ind. App. 230; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fenn, 29 N. E. 790, 791, 3 Ind. App. 250; Jones v. Clouser, 16 N. E. 797, 114 Ind. 387; Wolf v. Nicholson, 27 N. E. 505, 506, 1 Ind. App. 222; McBride v. Hicklin, 24 N. E. 755, 756, 124 Ind. 499; Nelson v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 53 N. W. 1129, 52 Minn. 276; Julienne v. City of Jackson, 10 South. 43, 69 Miss. 34, 30 Am. St. Rep. 526.

The words "at large," as used in Laws 1870, c. 93, imposing penalties on the owners of animals who shall permit or suffer the same to run at large, does not include a case where an animal escapes from the owner's inclosure, inasmuch as the words imply a choice or design on the part of the owner to allow the animal to go at large when he might restrain it. Montgomery v. Breed, 34 Wis. 649, 652.

Laws 1862, c. 549, as amended by Laws 1867, c. 841, making it unlawful for any animals to run at large in any public highway, etc., implies permission or assent, or, at least, some fault or neglect, on the part of the owner of the animals. Where animals escaped from their owner's premises after due precautions to secure them have been taken, and without any default or neglect on his part, and he thereafter makes immediate and suitable efforts to secure and recover them, they are not "running at large" within the meaning of the statute. Coles v. Burns (N. Y.) 21 Hun, 246, 249.

The words "running at large," as used in Acts 9th Gen. Assem. c. 169, § 6, making a railroad company failing to fence its road against live stock running at large liable to the owner of any such stock killed or injured, import that the stock are not under the control of the owner; that they are not confined by inclosures to a certain field or place, nor under the immediate care of a shepherd or herdsman; that they are left to roam wherever they may go. If such stock are left in an inclosure which is insufficient to restrain them, they are evidently running at large, for they are not under the control of the owner. If placed in such an inclosure, and they escape from it and go upon the track of an unfenced railroad, they will be considered as running at large. Hinman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 28 Iowa, 491, 494.

The fact that hogs are found at large in a township where they are prohibited by law from running at large, is not conclusive evidence that they are trespassers; it depends upon how they came to be at large. If by the deliberate or negligent acts of the owner, then they are to be considered as running at large; but if by accident, without fault of the owner, then they are not running at large, as contemplated by the law. Leavenworth, T. & S. W. Ry. Co. v. Forbes, 37 Kan. 445-448, 15 Pac. 595-597.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. § 4202, authorizing the taking up of horses found running at large, a horse which passed from the owner's inclosure over or through a line fence into the inclosure of an adjoining proprietor, and thence through a gap in a fence into the inclosure of another proprietor, is not "running at large." To constitute running at large, the horse should be at liberty through the fault or with the knowledge of the owner. Rutter v. Henry, 20 N. E. 334, 335, 46 Ohio St. 272.

Under a statute authorizing the taking up of any animal which shall be found running at large or pasturing upon any uninclosed lands or public commons, hogs which broke out of the owner's yard and entered into a pasture belonging to another were not running at large, and the owner of such pasture was not authorized to impound them as animals at large. Nafe v. Leiter, 2 N. E. 317, 319, 103 Ind. 133.

Animals on owner's land.

In an order by town selectmen to the constable to kill all dogs running at large which were not licensed and collared as required by statute, "at large" cannot be construed to include a dog at play with his owner's son upon his owner's land. McAneany v. Jewett, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 151, 152.

Laws 1873, c. 20, § 1, providing that the owner of any ram who shall suffer the same to run at large shall forfeit to the town in which the animal shall be so at large a certain sum for each day such animal is at large, means without constraint or confinement. Hence, if such ram is suffered to go about without restraint or confinement, either by keeping it in an inclosure, or by tying it, or by watching or otherwise, even though it be on land belonging to its owner, it is running "at large" within the meaning of the statute. Goener v. Woll, 2 N. W. 163, 26 Minn. 154.

To "run at large," as used in Comp. Laws 1879, c. 105, p. 926, providing for the punishment of any owner of a bull who permits it to run at large, does not mean to keep it confined, where such animal was kept within the owner's pasture, which was inclosed with a good and lawful fence; and it did not run at large when it passed upon a railroad track, running through the owner's pasture, because of the neglect and wrong on the part of the railroad company in not inclosing its road with a lawful fence. Gooding v. Atchinson, T. & S. F. R. Co., 4 Pac. 136, 137, 32 Kan. 150.

"Stock running at large" are animals which roam and feed at will, and which are not under the immediate direction and control of any one. They may be in an inclosure which may restrain the limits in which they shall wander and feed, or they may be on an unfenced range relatively without limit, but in either case they are not subject to the direction or control of any one, but are masters of their own movements, going whither they will, without personal direction or control. Keeney v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co., 24 Pac. 233, 234, 19 Or. 291.

AT LAW.

See "Attorney at Law"; "Case at Law"; "Charge at Law."

In the act of 1829 providing that no mortgage or deed of trust shall be valid at law but from the registration of it, the words "at law" do not mean in a court of law only, but in all courts. "At law" is an expression in a statute which does not mean merely a legal tribunal, as distinguished from an equitable jurisdiction, but the general system of jurisprudence, whether legal or equitable. Hooker v. Nichols (N. C.) 21 S. E. 207, 208; Fleming v. Burgin, 37 N. C. 584, 588.

Provisions of an act in relation to corporations, requiring certain things to be done in regard to the canvassing of votes at an election, the administration of an oath to the elector by the judges, and the form of the oath to be taken by a person voting stock owned by a corporation, and the mode of voting by proxy, are not a full and adequate remedy at law for any alleged fraud at the election. Webb v. Ridgely, 38 Md. 364, 365, 372.

AT LEAST.

In an action for work, labor, goods, wares, merchandise, done, performed, sold, and delivered to defendant at his request in which he counterclaimed a similar indebtedness against the plaintiff which conceded a part of plaintiff's claim, an instruction that if the jury believed the plaintiff stated truly then he ought to recover the amount admitted as a set-off by the defendant "at least," and their verdict should be for the plaintiff for "at least" that sum, should be construed as intimating that, although an alleged statement between the parties was conclusive upon the defendant, yet it was not binding upon the plaintiff. Duffy v. Hickey, 23 N. W. 707, 63 Wis. 312.

"At the least," as used in a statute requiring the affidavit in attachment to state that a certain amount was due "at the least," qualifies the amount stated, and not the mode of statement, and were added to purge the conscience of the affiant with giving all credits and allowing all proper discounts, and not making loose and random statements as to the amount of damage he has suffered, as is often done in the writ and declaration. Altmeyer v. Caulfield, 37 W. Va. 847, 851, 17 S. E. 409, 410.

"At least," as used in an affidavit for an attachment, is synonymous with and equivalent to the phrase "at the least," as used in West Virginia statutes relating to such affidavit. Courson v. Parker, 20 S. E. 583, 584, 39 W. Va. 521.

As clearly.

"At least," as used in an instruction by the court in a trial for murder, the court stating that if the facts were such as supposed, then the prisoner would be "at least" guilty of manslaughter, means "clearly," and did not imply any view of the court unfavorable to the prisoner. State v. Kennedy, 91 N. C. 572, 580.

As not less than.

In Rev. St. § 1170, declaring that the county clerk shall, at least 6 months before the expiration of the time limited for redeeming lands sold for taxes, cause to be published once a week, for 12 successive weeks, a list of the unredeemed lands, "at least" means that such publication shall be made during a period not less than 6 weeks before the expiration of the time, the time of such period being discretionary with the clerk. Hoffman v. Clark County, 20 N. W. 376, 377, 61 Wis. 5.

Under an act requiring fences to be at least five feet high, the fence must be of that height throughout. The words "at least" are emphatic, and expressive of its minimum, and are applied to it as a whole, and to every part. Polk v. Lane, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 36, 38.

"At least," as used in a grant of a cartway of eight feet wide at least, should be construed as implying that the width of the passage may be more than the measure given; that more may be taken if more should be indispensable. Roberts v. Wilcock (Pa.) 8 Watts & S. 464, 470; In re Hoffman (Pa.) 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 563, 565.

As not more than.

"At least once a week for four successive weeks," as used in Act April 27, 1863, relating to the publication of notice to creditors, means in effect that there shall be four publications not more than seven days apart from each other. Hernandez v. His Creditors, 57 Cal. 333, 334.

A lease conveyed so much land as at the time was covered by water of the Gunpowder Falls backed up by the dam then erected, and as might be or should be requisite or necessary to be covered by the backing or damming of such stream according to the terms employed, "so as to make the fall thereof 'at least' 12 feet at common water mark" at the point designated. Held, that the words "at least," as there used, should be read with the context, and as so read should be construed to mean the same thing as "at most" or "not to exceed" 12 feet. Warren Mfg. Co. v. Hoffman, 62 Md. 165, 170.

Exclusion and inclusion of days.

Rev. St. § 1130, declaring that the treasurer shall, "at least four weeks previous to" the day of tax sale, cause notice of the sale to be posted, means that the day on which the notices are to be posted must be excluded from the computation of time. Ward v. Walters, 22 N. W. 844, 846, 63 Wis. 39 (citing Pitt v. Shew, 4 Barn. & Ald. 208; Mitchell v. Foster, 12 Adol. & E. 472; Zouch v. Empey, 4 Barn. & Ald. 522; Hardy v. Ryle, 9 Barn. & C. 603; Judd v. Fulton [N. Y.] 4 How. Prac. 298; Commercial Bank of Oswego v. Ives [N. Y.] 2 Hill, 355; Columbia Turnpike Road Co. v. Haywood [N. Y.] 10 Wend. 422; Small v. Edrick [N. Y.] 5 Wend. 137; Rankin v. Woodworth [Pa.] 3 Pen. & W. 48).

A statute incorporating a canal company, and declaring that no meeting of commissioners to settle differences between the company and landowners should be held unless notice of the time of such meeting should be given in the county newspaper "at least" 16 days before such meeting, meant 16 days exclusive of the day of the meeting. In other words, the 16 days were to be computed as 16 clear days, excluding both the day of the meeting and the day on which the notice was first given. Reg. v. Aberdare Canal Co., 14 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 854, 868.

"At least," as used in St. 485, Wm. IV., c. 76, § 81, requiring notice of the grounds of appeal 14 days "at least" before the first day of the session at which the appeal is intended to be tried, means that 14 days must elapse between the day of service and the first day of the session at which the appeal is to be tried. Where an act is required by statute to be done so many days at least before a given event, the time must be reckoned excluding both the day of the act and that of the event. Queen v. Justices of Shropshire, 8 Adol. & E. 173, 174.

Rev. 1860, § 2815, requiring that an original notice shall be served "at least ten days between the day of service and the first day of the next term," means that both the day on which the service is made and the first day of the term are to be excluded from the computation. Robinson v. Foster, 12 Iowa, 186, 190.

An ordinance requiring a certain oath to be filed in the office of the county clerk, "at least five days before the day of election," meant that the day when the oath was filed should be included in the computation of time. State ex rel. Reitemyer v. Gasconade County Court, 33 Mo. 102.

The city charter of Milwaukee, providing that certain resolutions of the city council shall lie over at least four weeks after their introduction, means from the day on which the resolution was introduced until the same day of the week in the fourth week succeeding, and not the next day of the week in the fourth week succeeding. A resolution introduced on Monday has lain over four weeks after its introduction on the fourth Monday thereafter. Wright v. Forrestal, 27 N. W. 52, 54, 65 Wis. 341.

Act March 21, 1772, provides that no writ shall be sued out for any process served on any justice of the peace for anything done by him in the execution of his office until notice in writing of such intended writ or process shall have been served on him at least 30 days before the suing out or serving the same. Held, that the phrase "at least thirty days before suing out or serving" the same meant that the first day should be included, and the last excluded, in the computation of time. Thomas v. Afflick, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 14, 15.

Code Civ. Proc. § 5220, directs that a summons from a surrogate's court must be served, if in the same or adjoining county, "at least eight days before the return day thereof." Held, that "at least eight days before the return day thereof" meant that the day of service should be excluded, and the return day should be counted, in estimating eight days. In re Carhart (N. Y.) 2 Dem. Sur. 627, 629.

Full or entire days.

Chancery Act, § 8 (Rev. St. 1868, c. 23), providing that notice of the pendency of a divorce action by publication should be made for four successive weeks, the first publication to be "at least" 30 days before the return day of the summons, does not have the effect to require full clear days. Stebbins v. Anthony, 5 Colo. 348, 354.

"At least," as used in a statute directing that notices of election should be given for "at least" six days, does not change the requirement of a certain number of days' notice into a requirement that the days shall be entire. Stroud v. Consumers' Water Co., 28 Atl. 578, 579, 56 N. J. Law. (27 Vroom) 422.

Rev. St. c. 120, § 188, requiring the delinquent tax list to be completed "at least five days" before the commencement of the term of court at which the application for judgment is to be made, cannot be construed to require five full days at the shortest, but only requires five days computed by excluding the day of filing and including the day of the commencement of the term. Prior v. People, 107 Ill. 628, 630.

6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, §§ 62, 64, declare that no appeal shall be heard by the Court of Common Pleas in any case where the respondent does not appear, unless the appellant proves that notice of his intention to prosecute the appeal was given or sent to the respondent "ten days at least" before the day appointed for the hearing of such appeal. Held, that the phrase "ten days at least" meant ten clear, full, and complete days, and not nine days and the fractions of two other days. Adey v. Hill, 4 C. B. 38, 39; Norton v. Salisbury Town Clerk, 4 Man. G. & S. 32, 33, 37.

Where a statute provided that summons must be served 10 days at the least before the time appointed for hearing, the phrase "ten days at the least" meant 10 clear days between the service and the date of hearing, which excludes both the day of service and the date of hearing. Mitchell v. Foster, 12 Adol. & E. 472. See, also, Reg. v. Aberdare Canal Co., 14 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 854, 868.

The words "at least," in a statute requiring that plaintiff shall cause a notice to be published at least once a week for three consecutive weeks, cannot be construed to make the statute require a publication for 21 days, but the statute is complied with by a publication once a week for 3 consecutive weeks, though less than 21 days elapse between the first and last publication. Decker v. Myles, 4 Colo. 558, 560.

As indicating successive days' notice.

Swan's St. 474, providing that land taken in execution should not be sold except on publication of notice "for at least 30 days before the day of sale by advertisement in some newspaper," does not mean that there shall be successive insertions of the notice during the period of 30 days, but its words will be answered by one publication inserted in a newspaper 30 days before the day of sale. Graig's Adm'r v. Fox, 16 Ohio, 563, 567.

Laws 1857, c. 446, § 7, enacting that resolutions and reports of committees recommending any improvement involving the appropriation of public money shall be "published at least two days," means that two days shall elapse between the publication of the notice and the passage of the resolution, and not that the notice shall be twice published. In re Douglass (N. Y.) 58 Barb. 174, 176.

The street law of Baltimore county, Acts 1886, c. 339, which provides that the examiner for the opening of a thoroughfare shall "give at least 10 days' notice," by publication in two or more newspapers, that application has been made to open the street, and that he shall give 15 days' notice in two or more newspapers that the statement of benefits and damages and an explanatory plat of the work are ready for examination, and that he will hear objections at a designated time and place, requires in terms but one publication of each notice in each of the newspapers. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Shipley, 19 Atl. 1, 2, 72 Md. 88.

AT LIBERTY.

An instruction, in an action for slander, that in awarding damages the jury were "at liberty" to take into consideration any disgrace, shame, humiliation, mortification, or anguish of mind suffered by plaintiff by reason of the speaking of the actionable words, was not equivalent to an instruction that the jury "should" take into consideration elements of damages mentioned, but was an erroneous departure from the rule. Nicholson v. Merritt, 67 S. W. 5, 6, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2281.

AT MATURITY.

The phrase "at maturity" has the same meaning as "according to their tenor and effect," as used in relation to promissory notes. Third Nat. Bank v. Humphreys (U. S.) 66 Fed. 872, 876.

"At maturity," as used in Act July 1, 1862, § 6, providing that the grants aforesaid are made on condition that said company shall pay such bonds at maturity, refers to the time fixed for their payment, which is the termination of the period they have to run; and, while the words imply an obligation to pay both the principal and interest when the bond shall become due, it does not imply an obligation to pay the interest as it semiannually accrues. United States v. Union Pac. R. R. Co., 91 U. S. 72, 85, 23 L. Ed. 224.

AT ONCE.

See "Come at Once."

Like the terms "forthwith" and "immediately," "at once" does not mean instantaneously, but requires action to be taken within a reasonable time under the circumstances of the case. Cohen v. Silverman, 40 N. Y. Supp. 8, 10, 4 App. Div. 503 (citing Bennett v. Locomotive County Mut. Ins. Co., 67 N. Y. 274; Bamforth v. Raddin, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 66; Roberts v. Brett, 11 H. L. Cas. 337; Oldershaw v. King, 2 Hurl. & N. 399, 517).

"At once," as used in a contract for the sale of a machine, that, when not found to work well, it must be returned at once, means as soon as, under the circumstances, it could reasonably have been done, and is synonymous with "immediately," "forthwith" and "as soon as possible," which are usually construed to mean within such reasonable time as shall be required, under all the circumstances, for doing the particular thing. Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Co. v. Horne, 81 N. W. 591, 592, 110 Iowa, 285 (citing Reg. v. Rogers, 3 Q. B. Div. 33; Tufts v. McClure, 40 Iowa, 317, 318; Reg. v. Justices, 4 Q. B. Div. 469; Scammon v. Germania Ins. Co., 101 Ill. 621; Adams v. Fos- ter, 59 Mass. [5 Cush.] 156; Gaddis v. Howell, 31 N. J. Law [2 Vroom] 313; Richardson v. End, 43 Wis. 316). In a contract of warranty in the sale of machines requiring the purchaser, on discovering that the machine is not working satisfactorily, to return it at once to the agent of the seller, "at once" means simply that he shall return it within a reasonable time, and what is a reasonable time is a question of fact, and not of law. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Warfield, 53 N. Y. Supp. 737, 738, 33 App. Div. 513. A contract to make three or four models of a machine "at once, and without delay," means that the work shall be done as soon as it can reasonably be performed. Sharpe v. Johnson (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 400; Sharp v. Johnston (N. Y.) 3 Lans. 520.

"At once," in a notice to require payment on a contract, means within a reasonable time. Kraner v. Chambers, 61 N. W. 373, 375, 92 Iowa, 681.

An order for goods to be sent "at once" is not complied with by delivery 30 days later. Hirsch v. Annin, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1019, 1020, 28 Misc. Rep. 228.

In a contract for the purchase of flour to be shipped "at once," such term cannot be construed in its strictly literal sense. Performance according to the literal meaning must have been instantaneous, which would be impossible. J. C. Smith & Wallace Co. v. Lunger (N. J.) 46 Atl. 623.

In a contract for the sale of goods to be shipped at once, where the goods were not yet manufactured at the time of the contract, the words "at once" cannot be taken literally, as that would be unreasonable, but indicates a prompt making and sending of the goods. Ford v. Friedman, 20 S. E. 930, 932, 40 W. Va. 177.

On an order to ship goods "at once," it is doubtless true that some appreciable time must elapse, and such necessarily elapsing time would be a reasonable time in a sense referable to the urgent words of the order, within the doctrine that, when no time is specified for shipment or delivery, the shipment and delivery are well made in such time as would be reasonable under the circumstances, but such reasonable time would not admit of an investigation as to defendant's solvency, etc., when the shipment is thereby delayed a period of three weeks. Oklahoma Vinegar Co. v. Hamilton (Ala.) 32 South. 306, 307.

"At once," as used in a contract of guaranty authorizing one person to furnish another with such building materials as he might wish, not exceeding the value of $2,000, at once, means at one and the same time. Platter v. Green, 26 Kan. 252, 268.

A contract to ship cigars "at once" on acceptance of a draft did not mean that they would be shipped within a reasonable time, but that the shipment would be made with greater celerity than is ordinarily comprehended by a reasonable time. "At once" is convertible with "prompt," "forthwith." These terms in their ordinary acceptation mean "at the same point of time, immediately, without delay, at one and the same time, simultaneously, directly," and implied a shipment simultaneously with the acceptance, or, at least, with receipt of advice of the acceptance. Lewis v. Hojer, 16 N. Y. Supp. 534, 536.

AT OWNER'S RISK.

Where a warehouse receipt read "bought," etc., "at owner's risk of fire" the phrase "at owner's risk of fire" imported that the transaction was a bailment, rather than a sale to the warehouseman. Irons v. Kentner, 50 N. W. 73, 51 Iowa, 88, 33 Am. Rep. 119.

As affecting liability of carrier.

The words "at owner's risk," in a bill of lading, did not excuse a common carrier for a loss by reason of their own negligence, but merely subjects the owner to liability for losses occasioned, without negligence, which occurred in the ordinary course of transportation. Kiff v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 4 Pac. 401, 402, 32 Kan. 263.

"At owner's risk," as used in a receipt issued by a carrier, means to carry the goods at the risk of the owner. Unless the carrier was prohibited from entering into such agreement with the owner of the goods, he incurred only the responsibility of an ordinary bailee for hire, and became answerable only for misconduct or negligence. Moore v. Evans (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 524, 525.

The phrase "at owner's risk," as used in a bill of lading providing for the delivery of the property on deck at the owner's risk, could not be regarded as intended by the parties to cover risks from all causes, and including negligent or willful acts of the master and crew. Compania de Navigacion La Flecha v. Brauer, 18 Sup. Ct. 12, 17, 168 U. S. 104, 42 L. Ed. 398.

Where a contract between a carrier and a shipper of goods provided that the carriage was "at the risk of the master and owners," such phrase should not be construed as exempting the carrier from liability for unlawful misconduct, gross negligence, or the want of ordinary care. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 47 U. S. (6 How.) 344, 383, 12 L. Ed. 465.

A stipulation, in a contract for the carriage of cattle at sea, that the shipment shall be at the owner's risk, does not operate to relieve the shipowner from liability for the act of the officers and crew in driving the cattle overboard when not necessary to the safety of the ship. Such a provision, as affecting the carrier's liability for negligence, is against public policy and void. The Hugo (U. S.) 57 Fed. 403, 411.

"At consignee's risk," within a contract of affreightment providing that the goods shall be at the consignee's risk and expense after they leave the ship's deck, cannot be construed to mean that they could be landed instantly, and without regard to circumstances, at a place and time when they would be more exposed than when on the ship's deck, and such a construction is incompatible with the obligation to deliver in good order and condition, and does not relieve the carrier from the duty of protecting the goods from injury, under the circumstances, until their actual delivery, and until the consignee has had a reasonable opportunity to remove them after their discharge from the ship. The St. Georg (U. S.) 95 Fed. 172, 177.

"At his own risk," as used in a contract for the carriage of live stock which provides that the shipper shall load and unload at his own risk, means that all the responsibility arising from the loading and unloading is to be at the risk of the shipper, though he be assisted by the carrier's agents. In respect to those acts the contract devolves all responsibility on the shipper, as principal, in performing them, treating the laborers furnished by defendant as his assistants. The risk of personal injury from the animals themselves, or from his manner of loading or unloading them, or from any negligence of his assistants in doing those acts, is thrown upon him by the contract, but by no sound construction can this clause of the contract be held to include personal injuries which the party may sustain from external causes produced by the negligence of defendant. An injury caused by negligently running a train of cars upon him, over which he has no control, while he is carefully performing the labor he is authorized to do, is not at all within the scope or meaning of this clause of the contract. Stinson v. New York Cent. R. Co., 32 N. Y. 333, 335, 337.

"At owner's risk," as used in a notice in the usual form, posted up by a common carrier of passengers, reading "all baggage at the risk of owners," cannot be construed as meaning that the carrier shall be exempt from loss arising from actual negligence, or from the insufficiency of his machinery or vehicles, or from such losses as arise from his acts or the acts of his servants, but only that he is exempt from losses happening by theft or robbery, and losses happening by means of the conduct of others, in addition to the exemptions of responsibility as common carriers. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Burke (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 611, 629, 28 Am. Dec. 488.

"At owner's risk," as used in a carrier's advertisement stating the route, fare, etc., and "all baggage at owner's risk," such phrase was intended to limit the liability of the carrier as to the baggage of passengers only, and did not constitute a limitation of the carrier's liability for loss of parcels delivered to and accepted by it to carry for hire. Dwight v. Brewster, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 50, 54, 11 Am. Dec. 133.

"At owner's risk," as used in a contract for the transportation of goods, stating that the same were at owner's risk, imports that the owner assumes the risks, arising from the ordinary dangers of transportation by the means employed, which the reasonable and ordinary care of the common carrier might be insufficient to prevent, and that the latter is liable only for those dangers which with ordinary prudence might be avoided. French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 108, 112, 113.

"At owner's risk," as used in a contract of the transportation of goods, stating that the same were shipped at the owner's risk, covers only the ordinary and known risks of transportation in reasonable time, but not delays or neglect of proper care in such transportation on the part of the railroad. Nashville & C. R. R. Co. v. Jackson, 53 Tenn. (6 Heisk.) 271, 277.

AT PAR.

See "Par."

AT PORT OR SAILED.

The provision in a charter party that the vessel to be chartered is "at Santos or sailed" means that she will soon sail or has sailed therefrom, so that delay in order to unload is a breach of the contract. Olsen v. Hunter-Benn & Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 530, 531.

AT PRESENT.

The words "at present organized," in Act June 15, 1895, requiring all companies at present organized and doing business under the laws of the state, that may hereafter increase their capital stock, to pay a specific fee, does not operate to prevent the statute from including corporations subsequently organized. The term was used as applying to both present and future organized corporations, since the object of the act was to raise revenue, and Rev. St. c. 131, § 1, provides that statutes shall be liberally construed to carry out their intent, and that words in the present tense shall include the future. People v. Hinrichsen, 43 N. E. 973, 974, 161 Ill. 223.

AT SEA.

The phrases "at sea" or "on a voyage" or "on a passage" are equivalent in meaning, and, when either of them is used in a marine policy to describe the time during which the liability of the insurer continues, it operates to continue the risk until the arrival of the vessel at the port of destination. Wales v. China Mut. Ins. Co., 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 380, 383.

The words "at sea" in a marine policy on a vessel for 12 calendar months, with liberty of the globe, and if "at sea" at the expiration of 12 months the risk to continue at the same rate of premium until the arrival of the vessel at her port of destination in the United States, did not operate, when construed in connection with the remainder of the clause, to continue the insurance during the time the vessel was at sea on any voyage, but only while at sea on her return voyage. Eyre v. Marine Ins. Co. (Pa.) 6 Whart. 247, 255.

A seaman who went on shore on leave and died by an accident will be deemed to have been "at sea," so that his will could be probated as that of a mariner at sea. In Re Lay, 7 Eng. Ecc. R. 144.

While in arm of sea.

A vessel lying at anchor in an arm of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows is "at sea," within the meaning of that term as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 60, § 22, providing that no unwritten will bequeathing personal estate shall be valid unless made by a mariner while at sea. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 196, 199.

While in harbor or port.

A policy of marine insurance for one year from a certain date, providing that if the ship was "at sea" at the end of the year the policy should continue at pro rata premium until the vessel arrives at her port of destination, should be construed as meaning that if the vessel, at the expiration of the year, was in any port, or, if then at sea, whenever she should return into port, though it was an intermediate port to which she had resorted for the purpose of the voyage, she was not "at sea" within the meaning of the policy, and the additional extension of the time beyond one year ceased to have any further effect. The vessel cannot be considered at sea at all times until her return to her home port. Gookin v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 501, 509, 74 Am. Dec. 609.

"It is sometimes difficult to determine when the mariner is to be considered at sea. For example, Lord Seymour, the admiral of a station at Jamaica, made a codicil by nuncupation while staying at the house on shore appropriated to the admiral of the station. The codicil was rejected on the ground that he only visited the ship occasionally, while his family, establishment, and place of abode were on the land at the official residence. But where a mariner belonging to a vessel lying in the harbor of Buenos Ayres met with an accident while on shore by leave, and made a nuncupative will and died there, probate was granted for the reason that he was only casually absent from his ship. In the Goods of Lay, 2 Curtels, 375. In the present instance the decedent made a nuncupation when the vessel to which he was attached was lying at the wharf in Bremen. He was at the time in actual service on shipboard. I think he was entitled to the privilege." Ex parte Thompson (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 154, 158.

A vessel which was chartered to one point, there to receive orders which would indicate to her within 24 hours whether to discharge there or to go to another port, and to be kept at the first port as long and sent to such other port as those from whom she was to take her orders might elect, and which did not, within 24 hours after notice of her arrival at the first port, receive orders to come to another port, had arrived at her port of destination, and was not "at sea" within the meaning of her continuation clause. Wales v. China Mut. Ins. Co., 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 380, 383.

A vessel which, at the expiration of the year of her insurance policy, was actually in the port in which she had been carried by overwhelming force, by proceeding on her voyage in the high seas was "at sea" within the meaning of such a clause. Wood v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 14 Mass. 31, 35, 7 Am. Dec. 182.

The words "at sea" and "on her voyage" are synonymous. Where a ship was insured for a year, the risk to continue if she was "at sea" at the expiration of the term, and she had been delayed by adverse weather, and had been detained in port to be repaired, and was in such port at the time of the termination of the policy, and was making her arrangements to go to sea, but had not yet unmoored or begun to unmoor, she was not sailing, or not even ready to sail, and she was not "at sea" within the meaning of the policy. "At sea" was so used in opposition to being "in port." American Ins. Co. v. Hutton (N. Y.) 24 Wend. 329, 330, 331; Hutton v. American Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 321, 325. But it was also held that if the vessel was driven by stress of weather from her voyage into a port of necessity, or is captured and carried there by superior force, she is still "at sea" within the meaning of such a policy. Hutton v. American Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 321, 325.

While outside harbor or port.

A vessel is "at sea," within the meaning of the United States acts of 1813 and 1819, relating to the bounty on all vessels and boats employed in the banks and cod fisheries as shall be employed at sea for a term of a certain duration, when she is without the limits of any port or harbor on the seacoast. The Harriet (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 588, 592.

While in river or canal.

A statute permitting nuncupative wills by mariners while "at sea" means while on waters within the ebb and flow of the tides. A will made on the Mississippi river opposite Vicksburg was not made "at sea." In re Gwin's Will (N. Y.) 1 Tuck. 44, 45.

"At sea," as used in a marine policy containing a clause that should the vessel be at sea at the expiration of the year the risk should continue until she arrives at her port of destination, includes a river or canal communicating with the ocean, and hence, if the vessel is lying in such a river or canal at the time of the expiration of the policy, she is "at sea," she having quit her moorings and being ready for the voyage, with intent to prosecute it, and this though she be immediately stopped by head winds. Union Ins. Co. v. Tysen (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 118, 123.

While in roadstead or strait.

A vessel anchored in the open roadstead at the Chincha Islands for the purpose of taking in cargo was not at sea within the meaning of a continuation clause in her policy. Cole v. Union Mut. Ins. Co., 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 501, 503, 74 Am. Dec. 609.

A vessel was "at sea" which had left her port of lading fully prepared to proceed to her port of destination and with a real intent to do so and had dropped down the straits seven or eight miles, and then had been obliged by head winds to come to anchor, but without relinquishing the intention of proceeding on her voyage as soon as the weather would permit. Bowen v. Hope Ins. Co., 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 275, 276, 32 Am. Dec. 213.

As relating to sea service.

An officer of the navy is at sea and entitled to sea pay when performing services, under order of the navy department, in a vessel employed with authority of law in active service in bays, inlets, roadsteads, or other arms of the sea, under the general restrictions and requirements incident or peculiar to service on the high seas, and it is of no consequence that the vessel was not, during the period in question, in such condition that she could be safely taken out to sea beyond the mainland. United States v. Symonds, 7 Sup. Ct. 411, 412, 120 U. S. 46, 30 L. Ed. 557; United States v. Bishop, 7 Sup. Ct. 413, 120 U. S. 51, 30 L. Ed. 558; Symonds v. United States, 22 Ct. Cl. 481; Strong v. United States, 23 Ct. Cl. 10, 17; Symonds v. United States, 21 Ct. Cl. 148, 152.

"At sea," within the meaning of the statute entitling officers of the navy to additional compensation when at sea, is to be construed not to depend on the location of the ship, but on its condition with reference to the sea, qualified by the further condition of its officers being subject to such restrictions, regulations, or requirements as are required at sea. Corwine v. United States, 24 Ct. Cl. 104, 112.

The phrase "at sea," as used in Rev. St. § 1571, providing that no service shall be regarded as sea service except such as shall be performed at sea, etc., embraces a vessel, although she is used as a training ship, anchored in a bay, and not in a condition to be taken out to sea beyond the mainland, or is used as a receiving ship at anchor in port in a navy yard, communicating with the shore by a rope, and having a roof built over her deck, and not technically in commission for sea service. The claimant, while a vessel was not on a cruise, but anchored at and tied to a wharf in the harbor of New York, who lived on board of her, wore his uniform, and was subjected to the same regulations as while she was upon the high seas, was "at sea" within the meaning of this section. United States v. Barnette, 17 S. Ct. 286, 288, 165 U. S. 174, 41 L. Ed. 675.

A ship afloat, officered, manned, equipped, and capable of proceeding to sea, on which seagoing service, discipline, and duty are required, though in a harbor, is, within the intent of Rev. St. § 1571, a ship "at sea." Barnette v. United States, 30 Ct. Cl. 197, 202.

AT THE WALL.

If an assailant violates the sanctity of another's dwelling by following him thereto and presses on him, the assailed, being in his own house, is regarded as "at the wall," and is justified in using such force as is necessary to repel the assailant and to defend himself and family, even to the taking of life. Christian v. State (Ala.) 11 South. 338.

AT WHICH TIME.

In Const. § 152, providing that vacancies in elective offices shall be filled by appointment until the next annual election at which either city, town, county, or state officers are to be elected, and then filled by election until the remainder of the term, the words "at which" mean not only "when," but "where," so that a vacancy in the office of circuit judge cannot be filled at an election at which no city, town, county, or state officer is to be elected in the judicial district in question, though a judge of the Court of Appeals is to be elected in another part of the state. Eversole v. Brown (Ky.) 53 S. W. 527.

Where a contract for the sale of real estate provided that a payment of a certain sum should be made on a certain day, at which time the vendor should execute and deliver a deed, the phrase "at which time" implied that the payment was a condition precedent. Biddle v. Coryell, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 377, 379, 38 Am. Dec. 521.

ATHEIST.

An atheist is one who does not believe in the existence of a God. Gibson v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 37 N. Y. 580, 584.

An atheist is "one who disbelieves in the existence of a God, who is the rewarder of truth and an avenger of falsehood." Such a person is incompetent as a witness. Thurston v. Whitney, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 104, 110; Commonwealth v. Hills, 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 530, 532.

Atheists differ from all other people in owning no religion. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 154, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

ATLANTIC COAST.

A marine policy on a vessel to be employed in the coasting trade on the United States Atlantic coast, and which permits the use of Gulf ports not west of New Orleans, will be construed to mean the coast of the Atlantic Ocean, and not the Gulf of Mexico. New Haven Steam Saw Mill Co. v. Security Ins. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. 847, 849.

ATLANTIC OCEAN.

"Geographically the Atlantic Ocean is that branch of the general ocean which separates the continents of Europe and Africa from America;" and, as used in a marine insurance policy providing that the ship should navigate the Atlantic Ocean between Europe and America, includes the Gulf of Mexico. The Orient (U. S.) 16 Fed. 916, 919.

A contract to insure a vessel "to navigate the Atlantic Ocean" between Europe and America, and to be covered in port and at sea, is not to be construed as strictly limiting the insurance to the Atlantic Ocean, where the insurer knew the home port of the vessel was New Orleans, but the words would include the Gulf. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 7 Sup. Ct. 821, 822, 121 U. S. 67, 30 L. Ed. 858.

ATRAVESADOS.

"Atravesados" is a Spanish word, used at times as a nautical phrase meaning "lying to." In ordinary use the word would mean at right angles or abeam. The Hugo (U. S.) 57 Fed. 403, 410.

ATTACH.

In actions.

See "Property Attached."

Gen. St. tit. 1, § 327, authorizing the replevin of goods and chattels "attached in any suit," is to be construed as meaning "goods held on mesne process only." Howard v. Crandall, 39 Conn. 213, 216.

The word "attach," derived remotely from the Latin form "attingo," and more immediately from the French "attacher," signifies to take or touch, and was adopted as a precise expression of the thing. The only object of attachment is to take out of the defendant's possession and to transfer into the custody of the law, acting through its legal officers, the goods attached, that they may, if necessary, be seized in execution, and be disposed of and delivered to the purchaser; hence the legal doctrine that, to constitute an attachment of goods, the officers must take actual possession or custody. Buckeye Pipe Line Co. v. Fee, 57 N. E. 446, 448, 62 Ohio St. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 743; Hollister v. Goodale, 8 Conn. 332, 334, 21 Am. Dec. 674.

In holding that a condition in a fire policy on real property, that it shall become void if the property be levied on, attached, or change takes place in title or possession, was not applicable to real estate, but was confined exclusively to personal property, the court say that they are unable to find any similar case containing the word "attached," but find several cases using the words "levied on" or "taken into possession or custody." They held that these words were meant to have special, if not exclusive, reference to personal property, the policies containing the clause being adapted to insurance of both real and personal property; that as, when personal property is levied upon, there is usually an actual seizure of it by the officer in whose custody it remains until the sale, the phrase was designed to guard against any supposed increase of risk resulting from a change of possession, and therefore that it has no application to a technical levy of execution on real estate. We do not think that the word "attached" adds anything to the meaning of the phrase, or serves any purpose except to clear up a doubt which might possibly arise of its application to the case of an attachment of personal property on a writ, the word "levy" being more commonly used to designate the seizure of property on execution than on a writ of attachment. Tefft v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 32 Atl. 914, 19 R. I. 185, 61 Am. St. Rep. 761.

The word "attached" in a sheriff's deed, which recited the execution levy, and conveys all the interest of the judgment debtor at the time the premises were attached as aforesaid, shall be construed to refer to the execution levy. Frazee v. Nelson, 61 N. E. 40, 41, 179 Mass. 456, 88 Am. St. Rep. 391.

As to buildings.

The words "additions attached" in a fire policy on furniture contained in a certain brick building and "additions attached" was construed to include furniture in a frame building on the next lot, extending over and against the rear of the brick building two inches, and used in connection with the brick building. The court in so ruling says: "It is a fact not to be overlooked that the only building to which the term 'additions attached' can relate is this frame building. The language is therefore surplusage, unless it embraces that building, and we must give effect to every part of the policy, if we can do so without obvious violence to the intentions of the parties to it. The structure impinged against the rear of the brick building. It extended onto lot 967 sufficiently to do this; hence it was not wholly on the lot adjoining. The fact that it was upon the lots is not of sufficient moment to relieve the insurer from liability. Nor was it detached. It was connected as closely to the brick building as the nature of the structure would permit. It is a familiar rule in the interpretation of insurance policies that where any uncertainty exists in the language it will be resolved in favor of the insured. The two buildings were occupied by plaintiff, and we are not required to distort the phraseology of the policy in reaching the conclusion that it covered the furniture in the wooden structure." Maisel v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 69 N. Y. Supp. 181, 183, 59 App. Div. 461.

"The word 'attached,' in a statute exempting from taxation all houses used exclusively for public worship, and the grounds attached to such buildings, is used as an equivalent of the word 'annexed,' which has received legal construction as meaning physically joined to. A lot separated from a lot on which a cathedral stands by another lot is not 'attached' thereto, within the meaning of the latter term as used in the statute." Hamilton County Com'rs v. Mannix, 9 Ohio Dec. 189, 191.

As to crops.

"Attached," as used in Laws Ex. Sess. 1870, Act No. 8, § 2, providing for the punishment of any one who shall fraudulently sever from the soil of another any produce or any fruit from a crop growing thereon or "attached thereto," etc., means attached to the soil by roots; a growing or standing or ungathered crop of some kind. If the crop be already severed or detached from the soil by the owner, and be left on the ground, and there be a taking and carrying away of the same, such act, though probably larceny, is not an offense under the section cited. State v. Green, 30 South. 898, 106 La. 440.

As to districts or territory.

Property is attached to an independent school district for school purposes where it is connected with it, and territory is included which forms a part of the district when organized, or is attached thereto afterwards. Albin v. Directors of West Branch, 58 Iowa, 77, 80, 12 N. W. 134.

Const. art. 5, § 5, declares that whenever a county shall contain 40,000 inhabitants it shall constitute a separate judicial district, and shall select one judge; but counties containing a population less than is sufficient to constitute separate districts may be attached to contiguous districts. Held, that "attached" is employed in its usual sense, as meaning to tie or fasten, to bind, to fasten one thing to another; and hence a county containing less than 40,000 inhabitants attached to a contiguous district does not become a part thereof. Commonwealth v. Dumbauld, 97 Pa. 293, 303.

As to homestead or exemption rights.

In act of Congress granting certain lands in aid of railroads, but excepting those to which the right of pre-emption or homestead settlement has attached, the word "attached" did not mean settlement, residence, or cultivation of the land, but it meant a proceeding in the proper land office by which the inchoate right to the land was initiated. It meant by such a proceeding a right of homestead had fastened to that land which could ripen into a perfect title by future residence and cultivation. Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 10 Sup. Ct. 112, 114, 132 U. S. 357, 33 L. Ed. 363; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Dunmeyer, 5 Sup. Ct. 566, 573, 113 U. S. 629, 28 L. Ed. 1122; Sioux City & I. F. Town Lot & Land Co. v. Griffey, 143 U. S. 32, 12 Sup. Ct. 362, 364, 36 L. Ed. 64; Weeks v. Bridgman, 43 N. W. 81, 83, 41 Minn. 352; United States v. Union Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 143, 145.

"Attached," as used in 12 Stat. 492, granting land to a railroad, but exempting lands to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may have attached, means the filing of an entry in regular form by a settler, and the company acquires no right to the land, though such homestead or pre-emption entry is afterwards set aside. McIntyre v. Roeschlaud (U. S.) 37 Fed. 556.

ATTACH SUFT.

The words, "Mr. Officer, attach suft," when indorsed on a writ of attachment, are a sufficient direction to the officer to attach property, though such indorsement is not signed. Abbott v. Jacobs, 49 Me. 319.

The words, "Mr. Officer, attach suff." when written on the back of a writ of attachment, are sufficient notice to apprise the officer that the plaintiff desires an attachment to be made, and hence the former is responsible for failing to attach. Kimball v. Davis, 19 Me. (1 App.) 310.

ATTACHING CREDITOR.

The term "attaching creditor," as used in a provision authorizing a subsequent attaching creditor to contest the validity of the debt or claim on which a previous attachment is founded, shall include creditors claiming to hold by trustee process personal property or funds in the hands of any person against such previous attachment. V. S. 1894, 1399.

ATTACHIAMENTA DE FLACITUS CROONÆ.

"Attachiamenta de flacitus croonæ" means attachment as well of pleas of the crown, and was used in Duke of Lancaster, charter (23 Edw. III), which among other things declared that the Duke of Lancaster might have the return of all writs of the King and his heirs, and summons of the exchequer, and "the attachment as well of pleas of the crown" as of other pleas, in all lands or fees, so that no sheriff or other bailiff or minister of the King, or his heirs, might enter those lands or fees to execute the same writs and summons, or to make attachment of pleas of the crown, or to do any other office there, unless in default of the same or under his bailiff, etc. Held, that such words authorized the Duke of Lancaster to appoint coroners within the duchy, which was exclusive, and that, notwithstanding a modern usage to the contrary, the coroner of the county had no authority to exercise the office within the duchy possessions, concurrently with the duchy coroners. Jewison v. Dyson, 9 Mees. & W. 540, 544.

ATTACHMENT.

See "Ancillary Attachment"; "Foreign Attachment"; "Warrant of Attachment."

"Attachment" is a statutory proceeding, and is defined as a provisional remedy, whereby a debtor's property, real and personal, or any interest therein capable of being taken under a levy and execution, is placed in the custody of the law, to secure the interests of the creditor pending the determination of the cause. United States Cap-sule Co. v. Isaacs, 55 N. E. 832, 833, 23 Ind. App. 533 (citing Drake, Attachm. § 5); Ferguson v. Glidewell, 2 S. W. 711, 712, 48 Ark. 195.

Bouvier defines "attachment" as "taking into the custody of the law the person or property of one already before the court, or of one whom it is sought to bring before it. A writ issued at the institution or during the progress of an action, commanding the sheriff or other proper officer to attach the property, rights, credits, or effects of the defendant to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff. The original design of this writ was to secure the appearance of one who had disregarded the original summons by taking possession of the property as a pledge. 3 Bl. Comm. 280. By an extension of this principal in the New England states, property attached remains in the custody of the law after the appearance and until final judgment." Beardsley v. Beecher, 47 Conn. 408, 414.

"Our proceedings by attachment against absent and absconding debtors are borrowed from what is called a foreign attachment under the custom of London." Welsh v. Blackwell, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 344, 346.

"The remedy by attachment is in derogation of the common law, and exists only by virtue of the statute; and being summary in its effects, and liable to be abused and used oppressively, its application must be carefully guarded, and confined strictly within the limits prescribed by the statute. An order of attachment is an execution by anticipation. It empowers the officer to seize and hold the estate of the alleged debtor for the satisfaction of a claim or demand to be established in the future, and for which a judgment may never be obtained. The proceeding is to some extent the reverse of the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. The latter subjects the demand of the plaintiff to judicial investigation, and permits the seizure of the debtor's property only after judgment obtained; while the former commences with the seizure of the debtor's property, and afterwards subjects the plaintiff's claim to such investigation." Delaplain v. Armstrong, 21 W. Va. 211, 213.

The purpose and essence of the remedy of attachment, as created and regulated by the statutes, is to establish by judgment a claim or debt against the defendant, and to subject to the satisfaction of the judgment property or effects within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. Process by attachment was unknown to the common-law, and is wholly of statutory creation. Exchange Nat. Bank of Spokane v. Clement, 19 South. 814, 815, 817, 109 Ala. 270.

Attachment is a factor of that system of law which charges the property of a debtor with the payment of his debts. Its purpose is to give to the creditor from the very commencement of his suit a lien on the estate of his debtor. It is an anterior process, the purpose of which is to make the jurisdiction of the court in ulterior proceedings more effectual, and to afford the plaintiff security for the satisfaction of the judgment which he may obtain. It is an effort to create a lien upon the debtor's property. The attachment levy from its date operates as such a lien; that is to say, it charges the property levied upon with the payment of the judgment to be rendered in priority of any subsequent incumbrances he may create. Campbell v. Keys, 89 N. W. 720, 721, 130 Mich. 127.

"Attachment of property is a method prescribed by statute for creating a lien on the debtor's property without his consent to satisfy any judgment that may be obtained against him." To constitute a valid lien, all the requirements of the statute must be strictly followed, and it is a general principle that any failure to comply with the statute is fatal to any lien attempted to be acquired thereby. Clark v. Patterson, 5 Atl. 564, 565, 58 Vt. 676.

"At common law as well as under our statute attachment is a proceeding to create and enforce a lien. It is a remedy for the collection of an ordinary debt by a preliminary levy upon the property of a debtor, to conserve it for eventual execution after the lien shall have been perfected by judgment." Crisman v. Dorsey, 21 Pac. 920, 922, 12 Colo. 567, 4 L. R. A. 664.

An attachment is an equitable assignment of the thing attached; a substitution of the creditor for the debtor, and to the latter's right against the garnishee, and places a judgment creditor in the shoes of his debtor, with all his rights and privileges, just as the debtor stood at the day of the service of the attachment. Kuhn v. Warren Sav. Bank (Pa.) 11 Atl. 440, 442.

An attachment is an anticipated execution to take and hold property subject to a judgment in an action. Patterson v. Perry (N. Y.) 10 Abb. Prac. 82, 96 (citing Thayer v. Willet, 18 N. Y. Super. Ct. [5 Bosw.] 344).

An attachment is an extraordinary writ; to use it when the debtor is within the reach of ordinary process is inconsistent with the spirit and designs of this mode of procedure, and it is only when the creditor cannot employ the latter that he is permitted to resort to the former. New York City Bank v. Merrit, 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 131, 134.

The writ of attachment is an exceptional and extraordinary remedy, whereby the property of the defendant is first seized, and afterwards publication of notice made that he may appear and plead to the action. Leonard v. Stout, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 370, 371.

The writ of attachment or garnishment is in the nature of an execution in advance, and the office and purpose of such writ is to hold and bind the property seized until final judgment in the attachment proceeding, and, if on final hearing judgment is rendered for plaintiff, the effect is to give the plaintiff the right to enforce any lien he shall have acquired by his attachment or the garnishment against whatever interest the defendant may have in the property attached or garnished, subject to be applied to the payment of plaintiff's claim. Rempe & Son v. Ravens, 67 N. E. 282, 286, 68 Ohio St. 113.

The writ of attachment based on no privilege, no claim of ownership or possession, no mortgage, no judgment, is merely a right given a creditor, under certain circumstances, to hold his debtor's property in statu quo until his claim can be ripened into judgment. The interest of the attaching creditor in and to the property seized is more remote than is the interest of creditors whose claims warrant the seizure of property under the writs of sequestration, seizure of sale, and fieri facias. Under the writ of attachment the sheriff's possession imposes no duty of administration, and he is under no legal obligation to cultivate land attached. American Nat. Bank v. Childs, 22 South. 384, 385, 49 La. Ann. 1359.

A writ of attachment is nothing more than a remedy afforded by law for the collection of a debt. It is like a capias ad respondendum, and a remedy of that nature may be abolished by the Legislature which created it. Evans-Snyder-Buel Co. v. McFadden, 105 Fed. 293, 298, 44 C. C. A. 494, 58 L. R. A. 900.

"A writ of attachment was a very ancient judicial process, designed to coerce an appearance on pain of eventual outlawry. Normally it followed the summons in default of appearance, but in some cases might be issued without previous resort to that writ." Watson v. Noblett, 47 Atl. 438, 65 N. J. Law, 506.

The process of attachment is a creature of statute, and is a remedy only given in case of indebtedness arising on contract. Griswold v. Sharpe, 2 Cal. 17, 24.

The writ of attachment issued at the beginning of a suit is really a preliminary execution dependent for its ultimate efficacy upon the rendering of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff. It has all the characteristics of an execution in its first stage. Herman Goepper & Co. v. Phoenix Brewing Co., 74 S. W. 726, 729, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 84.

As an action, cause, or suit.

See "Cause"; "Suit."

An attachment is a special proceeding ancillary to the action, but so independent of it that an order in the attachment proceeding may, when final, be subject of a petition in error during the pendency of the action. Harrison v. King, 9 Ohio St. 388. But such is not the rule in New Mexico. Schofield v. American Val. Co., 54 Pac. 753, 754, 9 N. M. 485.

An attachment is not an ordinary proceeding in the action, but an extraordinary and collateral proceeding, within the meaning of a statute requiring notice of all orinary proceedings in the action. Schundt v. Cahn, 3 Alb. Law J. 389.

As action in rem or in personam.

Attachment is a proceeding in rem to enforce a debt from a nonresident, fraudulent, or absconding debtor. Myers v. Farrell, 47 Miss. 281, 283.

Attachment suits partake of the nature of suits in rem, and are distinctly such when they proceed without jurisdiction having been required of the person of the debtor in the attachment suit. Blanc v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 37 N. Y. Supp. 906, 907, 2 App. Div. 248.

Attachment is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. There is an actual seizure of property except where it is in the form of garnishment. In the case of garnishment it retains its character as one in the nature of a proceeding in rem, though there is no actual seizure of property under the order of attachment; for by service of the order upon the garnishee it arrests the debt in his hands and holds it through him, subject to the judgment of the court. The claim subjected by garnishment is the estate of the principal debtor in the hands of the garnishee, and the proceeding is against it as a res, a thing, and not against the garnishee personally, except to compel him to turn it over to the creditor of the principal defendant in satisfaction of his claim. In every practical sense it amounts to a seizure of the thing. Without such seizure no jurisdiction over the res is acquired, and no judgment against it can be rendered, though the court may have jurisdiction of the parties. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Rogers, 44 S. E. 300, 302, 52 W. Va. 450, 62 L. R. A. 178.

The attachment act is a remedial process allowed to a creditor against the property of a debtor when he is absent from the state and beyond the reach of the ordinary process of law. It is nevertheless a proceeding in personam, and its object is to make the defendant a party in the court. Robinson v. Crowder, 1 Bailey, 185, 186.

Proceedings by attachment partake ordinarily of the nature and character of a proceeding in personam, and not a proceeding in rem. Exchange Nat. Bank v. Clement, 19 South. 814, 815, 817, 109 Ala. 270.

Actual possession implied.

"Attachment" imports the taking of property into the custody of an officer of the law by virtue of a mandatory precept issued by the authority and in the name of the state. Bryant v. Warren, 51 N. H. 213, 215.

An attachment is the taking or seizing of a person or property by virtue of a legal process. Barr v. Warner, 62 Pac. 899, 900, 38 Or. 109.

"Attachment of property" is the taking out of the defendant's possession and transferring into the custody of the law the goods attached. They may, if necessary, be seized in execution, and be disposed of and delivered to the purchaser. "To attach is to take actual possession of the property." To constitute an attachment of goods, the officer must have actual possession of the property. The word "attach" is derived from the Latin "attingo," and more directly from the French "attacher," and signifies to touch. Hence goods neither seized nor reduced to possession by an officer are not attached. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Pennock, 51 Pa. (1 P. F. Smith) 244, 253.

As an ancillary remedy.

An attachment is auxiliary to the action in which it issues. Bowen v. Port Huron Engine & Thresher Co., 80 N. W. 345, 109 Iowa, 255, 47 L. R. A. 131, 77 Am. St. Rep. 539; Reed v. Maben, 33 N. W. 252, 253, 21 Neb. 696; Bishop v. Smith, 72 Pac. 220, 221, 66 Kan. 621.

"Attachment is a proceeding ancillary to an action at law, by which a party is enabled to acquire a lien for the security of his demand by a levy made before instead of after the entry of a judgment. This ancillary proceeding may be taken at the time of the commencement of the action or at any time afterwards. Neither the action nor the judgment in any manner depend upon the attachment, although the attachment depends upon the action, and the judgment in the action is precisely the same whether the attachment is dissolved or not." Sheppard v. Yocum, 3 Pac. 824, 825, 11 Or. 234; Windt v. Banniza, 26 Pac. 189, 190, 2 Wash. 147. And such is its nature. Quebec Bank v. Carroll, 44 N. W. 723, 1 S. D. 1.

An attachment is not an original proceeding, but is a mere proceeding in an action. Its office is not to give justice, but to obtain possession of and hold the debtor's property until recovery of judgment. Finn v. Mehrbach, 65 N. Y. Supp. 250, 256.

An attachment is an ancillary remedy provided by statute by means of which a contingent lien is obtained and impressed upon property of the defendant, which becomes vested and perfected on entry of judgment and levy of execution. McFadden v. Blocker, 48 S. W. 1043, 1049, 2 Ind. T. 260, 58 L. R. A. 878.

An attachment has no bearing whatever upon the merits of a suit. It is only ancillary to secure the fruits of any judgment to be obtained. It brings under control of the court, not of the plaintiff, property to be held for the purpose. The ownership is not changed. The plaintiff has no right to it in any case as property, and to remove and sell it with or without the consent of the sheriff is a contempt of court.

If the plaintiff fails in his action the defendant is entitled to its return. Simmons Clothing Co. v. Davis, 58 S. W. 655, 656, 3 Ind. T. 379 (citing Atkins v. Swope, 38 Ark. 528).

In New York an attachment is not an original process commencing a suit, but a provisional remedy adopted in a suit already commenced; while on the contrary, in South Carolina, a writ of attachment is an original process, and, although a proceeding in rem, its purpose and effect is to make the absent debtor a party to the cause in court, and through it to subject the property attached to the payment of the debt demanded. Clawson v. Sutton Gold Min. Co., 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 419, 422.

As an assignment.

"An attachment operates as an involuntary assignment in bankruptcy or insolvency, and places the whole estate of a debtor in the custody of the court." Iauch v. De Socarras, 39 Atl. 381, 385, 56 N. J. Eq. 524.

An attachment is a sequestration of the debtor's property to pay a single debt. An assignment in insolvency is a sequestration of all his property to pay all his creditors pro rata. The one may work a preference, the other cannot. Maltbie v. Hotchkiss, 38 Conn. 80, 85, 9 Am. Rep. 364.

As species of distress.

An attachment, as a part of the service of process in a civil suit at common law, was a species of distress, under which the effects attached were the ancient vadii or pledges. Bond v. Ward, 7 Mass. 123, 128, 5 Am. Dec. 28.

Garnishment distinguished.

The difference between an attachment of personal property and a garnishment is very great. In the former the property attached is actually taken into the possession of the officer holding the writ, and is under his custody and control, while in garnishment proceedings the property is left in the hand of the garnishee. Santa Fé Pac. R. Co. v. Bossut, 62 Pac. 977, 978, 10 N. M. 322.

As incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

Injunction distinguished.

The personal jurisdiction exercised by a court of equity, however it may affect property, as by an injunction to restrain the disposition thereof, is not an "attachment" of property, and does not constitute a lien upon property, within the meaning of the statute authorizing, in certain cases, the lien created by the attachment of property of an insolvent debtor to continue after his assignment for the benefit of the assignee. Squire v. Lincoln, 137 Mass. 399, 403.

As a lien.

See "Lien."

As process.

See "Mesne Process"; "Process."

Of person.

Attachment is a process of civil execution, which is sometimes issued against a party to a civil action for disobeying rules or orders of court made in progress of a cause for the benefit of the party injured, and when so used the writ is a mere execution in a civil suit. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303, 328.

"An 'attachment' may very well be defined to be a process issued from a court of record to punish any person concerned in or attendant on the administration of justice for misconduct, malpractice, or neglect of duty, and to compel a performance of its orders, judgments, or decrees, interlocutory or final." Ex parte Thurmond (S. C.) 1 Bailey, 605, 606.

"Attachment" is defined as a writ issued by a court of record commanding the sheriff to bring before it a person who has been guilty of contempt of court, either in neglect or abuse of process, or of subordinate powers. Burbach v. Milwaukee Electric Ry. & Light Co., 96 N. W. 829, 831, 119 Wis. 384.

Attachment is a criminal process in form, though in fact civil. It issues in the name of the people against the supposed offender. It is in theory granted on account of some supposed contempt. It is merely intended to bring the party into court. The officer to whom an attachment is issued is bound only to have the person in court on the return day. Morrison v. Lester, 15 Hun, 538, 541.

An attachment is a writ issued by the clerk of a court, or by any magistrate, or by the foreman of a grand jury, in any criminal action or proceeding authorized by law, commanding some peace officer to take the body of a witness and bring him before such court, magistrate, or grand jury on a day named, or forthwith, to testify in behalf of the state or of the defendant, as the case may be. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 523.

ATTACHMENT EXECUTION.

An attachment execution is of a twofold nature. As to the defendant in the judgment on which it is issued, it is a species of execution process; but as to the garnishee, who becomes a party defendant therein, it is an original process—a summons commanding him to appear and show cause, if any he has, why the judgment in favor of the plaintiff should not be levied on the goods and effects of defendant in his hands. Kennedy v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 30 Atl. 724, 725, 165 Pa. 179.

"An attachment in execution is simply a species of execution, the purpose of which is to obtain satisfaction of the judgment upon which it is founded. It is not an original proceeding instituted to enforce a real or supposed or equitable liability by the procurement of a judicial decree as its result. In other words, it is not a remedial process, and can scarcely be spoken of as a remedy in the sense in which that term is used in considering the subject of an adequate legal remedy, which excludes a bill in equity." Appeal of Lane, 105 Pa. 49, 61, 51 Am. Rep. 166.

ATTACHMENT ON MESNE PROCESS.

An attachment of property on mesne process is a mode of obtaining security for the satisfaction of any judgment which the plaintiff may finally recover. Morgan v. New York Nat. Building & Loan Ass'n, 46 Atl. 877, 73 Conn. 151.

An attachment by mesne process is an actual seizure of the goods of a debtor in order that they may be held to satisfy the judgment which the plaintiff may recover in the future. If the goods are so situated that they cannot be actually seized and taken into the possession of the officer, they cannot be attached. Dunklee v. Fales, 5 N. H. 527, 528.

ATTACHMENTS.

"Attachments," as used in a contract of the agent of a sewing machine company to purchase from the company all parts and "attachments," means mechanisms belonging to the original machine. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Lyon (U. S.) 71 Fed. 374, 378.

ATTACK.

See "Collateral Attack"; "Direct Attack"; "Indirect Attack."

Webster defines an "attack" to mean to fall upon with force, to assault, as with force of arms, and in common understanding such is the meaning of the term. The word does not include an immediate preparation for an attack, and therefore an instruction in a homicide case that defendant had a right to act in self-defense if deceased had made an attack on him was erroneous, the only evidence of an attack being that deceased was preparing to make an attack. Phipps v. State, 31 S. W. 397, 400, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 560.

ATTAINDER—ATTAIN.

See "Bill of Attainder."

Conviction distinguished, see "Convicted—Conviction."

"Attainder" is described in English criminal law to be that extinction of civil rights and capacities which takes place wherever a person who has committed treason or felony receives sentence of death for his crime. Green v. Shumway, 39 N. Y. 418, 431; Shepherd v. Grimmer, 31 Pac. 793, 798, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 403. The person so sentenced is called attaint or an attainer, and is no longer of any credit or reputation, and cannot be a witness in any court. Shepherd v. Grimmer, 31 Pac. 793, 798, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 403.

The word "attainder" is defined to be the corruption of the blood of the criminal capitally condemned, which takes place by the common law on sentence of death. The party attainted lost all power to receive or give by inheritance. This attaint or corruption of blood continued to be the law of England at the time our Constitution was formed, and may be the law on condemnation of treason to this day. The second section of the Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the party attainted. In re Garland (N. Y.) 32 How. Prac. 241, 251.

"Attainder" is defined to be a stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned. Green v. Shumway, 39 N. Y. 418, 431.

"Attainder at the common law is the consequence of a judgment in treason or felony, and that whether the judgment be of death on conviction or an outlawry on a quinto exactus return." Hence, where the owner of an estate had not been condemned to death on conviction, and was neither indicted nor tried nor convicted, and there was no judgment of outlawry on a quinto exactus return, but there had only been a forfeiture of his property under revolutionary confiscation act because the person had joined the army of the King of Great Britain and had otherwise connived against the form of his allegiance, there was no attainder of treason upon an outlawry, and the forfeiture was not consequent thereupon, and hence there was no attainer of such person so as to affect his wife's right of dower in his lands. Cozens v. Long, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 764, 766.

Attainder is the extinction of civil rights and capacities—a mark of infamy by means of which the offender becomes "attinctus" or blackened. While technical attainder, working a corruption of the blood, does not exist in the United States, yet a sentence of disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, profit, or trust, which is provided by the Constitution in case of conviction by impeachment, is within the primary definition of the term. State v. Hastings, 55 N. W. 774, 781, 37 Neb. 96.

In the statutory provision "that he that shall be attainted of waste shall lose the thing that he hath wasted, and moreover shall recompense thrice so much as the waste shall be taxed," the word "attaint" is used in the law to denote the conviction of crime, the forfeiture of the place wasted, and the treble damages show that it is a highly penal statute. Browne v. Blick, 7 N. C. 511, 518.

ATTEMPT.

Any attempt, see "Any."

To attempt is to make an effort to effect some object; to make a trial or experiment; to endeavor; to use exertion for some purpose. Commonwealth v. McDonald, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 365, 367.

An "attempt" is defined as follows: To make trial or experiment of; to try; to endeavor; an act tending towards the accomplishment of a purpose which exceeds a mere intent or design, but falls short of an execution of it. Atkinson v. State, 30 S. W. 1064, 1065, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 424; Lovett v. State, 19 Tex. 174, 177.

An insurance policy providing that all fraud or "attempted fraud," by false swearing or otherwise, should cause a forfeiture of all claim under the policy, does not mean that a willful false oath to a material fact would work a forfeiture of the claim, but that there must be an attempt to deceive the company to its injury, as well as a false statement, in order to work a forfeiture. Shaw v. Scottish Commercial Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 761, 763.

On a prosecution for murder, where the accused adduced evidence tending to prove an alibi, an instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence that the accused had "attempted" to prove an alibi the burden was on him, etc., was not objectionable as calculating to impress upon the jury that the court was of the opinion that the accused "attempted" but failed to prove an alibi. Allen v. State, 68 S. W. 28, 30, 70 Ark. 337.

"Attempt but too successful," as used in the alleged libelous statement of an attempt by plaintiff to destroy religious institutions which was but too successful, is to be construed as meaning "an act or design or endeavor that has at least been partially accomplished, and conduct which merely conduces to such end will not be held to be an attempt." Stow v. Converse, 4 Conn. 17, 37.

"Attempted to prove" means introduced testimony tending to prove. Hogan v. Town of Northfield, 56 Vt. 721.

To suffer an attachment by a debtor with a fraudulent intent to give a preferment is an attempt to fraudulently transfer the attached property, within the meaning of the Code providing for a creditors' bill to reach property which has been attempted to be fraudulently disposed of by the debtor. Cartwright v. Bamberger, 8 South. 264, 265, 90 Ala. 405.

ATTEMPT TO COMMIT ARSON.

An attempt to commit arson was an indictable misdemeanor at common law, and the statutes of Iowa, declaring that if any person set fire to any building or any material, with intent to cause such building to be burned, he shall be punished, was intended to punish a like attempt, though the fire be put out or go out itself before consuming any part of the building, nor can it make any difference that the material used was a candle instead of hay, shavings, straw, or anything else. If the intention existed, and the candle was placed and left lighted in a position to consummate that intent, the offense is complete. State v. Johnson, 19 Iowa, 230, 232.

Under 3 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) p. 583, § 3 (2 Rev. St. 698, § 3), on the trial of an indictment for an attempt to commit arson, where it appeared that the prisoner, having prepared camphene and other combustibles, and placed them in his room, solicited another to use them in burning the barn of a third person, and promised to give him a deed of land if he would do so, the proof was sufficient to warrant a conviction for an attempt to commit arson. The intent to do the wrongful act, coupled with the overt acts toward its commission, constitutes the attempt spoken of by the statute. McDermott v. People, 5 Parker, Cr. R. 102, 104, 105.

ATTEMPT TO COMMIT CRIME.

An act done with intent to commit a crime, and tending, but failing, to effect its commission, is an attempt to commit that crime. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7693; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 34; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4495; People v. Spolascio, 15 N. Y. Cr. R. 184, 185, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1114; People v. Moran, 7 N. Y. Supp. 582, 584, 54 Hun, 279, 7 N. Y. Cr. R. 329; People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254, 256, 257, 25 N. E. 412, 10 L. R. A. 109, 20 Am. St. Rep. 732; People v. Gardner, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1072, 1078, 73 Hun, 66 (quoting 1 Bish. Cr. Law [8th Ed.] § 728).

The word "attempt" may be defined as an intent to do a thing, coupled with an act which falls short of the thing intended. Gandy v. State, 13 Neb. 445, 449, 14 N. W. 143 (citing State v. Marshall, 14 Ala. 411); Scott v. People, 141 Ill. 195, 201, 30 N. E. 329 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 728).

An attempt is to endeavor; to make an effort to effect some object; to make trial; to use exertion for any purpose. Commonwealth v. Harris (Pa.) 1 Leg. Gaz. R. 455, 460.

The word "attempt," as used in an indictment for an "attempt" to assault, signifies both the act and the intent with which the act is done. United States v. Barnaby (U. S.) 51 Fed. 20.

An attempt is an inchoate effort towards action. An attempt to commit a crime is, in many cases, of itself a misdemeanor. Willis v. Jolliffe, 11 Rich. Eq. 447, 489.

The word "attempt" itself implies an intent formed, and also an endeavor to commit the offense. State v. Evans (Utah) 73 Pac. 1047, 1048.

An attempt to commit crime is composed of two elements—First, the intent to commit; second, a direct, ineffectual attempt towards its commission. Johnson v. State, 43 N. W. 425, 27 Neb. 687.

"Attempt" is a term peculiarly indefinite, and consequently the facts which develop the attempt should be set out in an indictment charging the accused with an "attempt" to commit a crime, so as to show that the attempt is itself criminal. State v. Hefner, 40 S. E. 2, 3, 129 N. C. 548.

The authorities describe an "attempt to commit a crime" as consisting of three elements, to wit, the intent to commit the crime, the performance of some act toward the commission of the crime, and the failure to consummate its commission. In Scott v. People, 141 Ill. 195, 30 N. E. 329, it was said: "An attempt is an intent to do a particular thing, with an act toward it falling short of the thing intended. When we say that a man attempted to do a thing, we mean that he intended to do specifically it, and proceeded a certain way in the doing." Graham v. People, 55 N. E. 179, 182, 181 Ill. 477, 47 L. R. A. 731 (citing Thompson v. People, 96 Ill. 158).

An attempt to commit larceny is an act intending to effect a commission of larceny, and if the act merely tends to show a guilty purpose, and does not tend to effect the commission of the crime, as where there is in fact no subject of larceny, there is no attempt. People v. Moran, 7 N. Y. Supp. 582, 585, 54 Hun, 279.

An attempt is committed only when there is a specific intent to do a particular criminal thing, which intent imparts a special culpability to the act performed towards the doing. It cannot be founded on mere general malevolence. When we say a man attempted to do a thing, we mean that he intended to do specifically it, and proceeded a certain way in the doing. The intent in the mind covers the thing in full; the act covers it only in part. Brown v. State, 11 S. W. 412, 413, 27 Tex. App. 330.

The word "attempt" is generally used in the law in describing the offense of an unsuccessful effort to commit a crime, but it has no technical meaning importing sufficient legal certainty as to the manner, the means used, and the intention of the wrongdoer. Its force and effect in an indictment was dependent upon a statement of the facts and circumstances that accompanied and constituted the illegal effort alleged. In an attempt to commit a crime, the acts and words of a wrongdoer are essential ingredients to constitute an offense, and show the purpose he had in view. An attempt imports something done towards the accomplishment of a concealed purpose without success. An attempt to commit a crime is an incomplete effort made by some act intermediate to a criminal intention and a consummated crime. United States v. Ford (U. S.) 34 Fed. 26, 27.

The failure to consummate the crime is as much an element of an attempt to commit it as the intent and the performance of an overt act towards its commission. The act must fall short of the completed crime. Graham v. People, 55 N. E. 179, 182, 181 Ill. 477, 47 L. R. A. 731.

An "attempt to perpetrate a robbery" means the wrongful doing of an act or acts towards the commission of a robbery for that purpose, and with that intent, but a failure in the perpetration thereof. State v. McGinnis, 59 S. W. 83, 87, 158 Mo. 105.

A man may make an attempt or an effort to steal by breaking open a trunk, and be disappointed in not finding the object of pursuit, and so not steal in fact. Commonwealth v. Bonner, 97 Mass. 587. So a man may make an attempt to pick a pocket by thrusting his hand into it, and not succeed because there is nothing in the pocket. The attempt to steal from a person by thrusting the hand into the pocket is complete. State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 500.

The only safe rule is that the attempt is complete and punishable when an act is done with intent to commit the crime which is adapted to the perpetration of it, whether the purpose fails by reason of interruption or for other extrinsic cause, or because there was nothing in the pocket. State v. Mitchell, 71 S. W. 175, 177, 170 Mo. 633, 94 Am. St. Rep. 763.

As assault with intent.

As used in Code, § 3207, declaring that every slave or free negro who commits or attempts to commit a rape on any white female must on conviction suffer death, the word "attempt" is not synonymous with "assault with intent," but the attempt contemplated may be committed without an actual assault. Lewis v. State, 35 Ala. 380, 388.

Declarations alone insufficient.

An attempt to commit a felony is a criminal act punishable under the law, but to constitute such offense there must be some act done towards the accomplishment of the crime. Mere declarations of purpose on the part of a person to kill another, but where there is no proof of any attempt to carry that purpose into effect, do not constitute an attempt to commit a felony. State v. McCarty, 36 Pac. 338, 340, 54 Kan. 52.

Intent distinguished.

"Attempt" means to make an effort or endeavor, or an attack. An attempt implies more than an intention formed. Some step towards consummation must be taken before the intention becomes an attempt. Attempt to strike in striking distance, or to shoot in shooting distance, includes the intention, present ability, and some effort or endeavor to carry that intention into execution. An effort to strike within striking distance is assault. An attempt to shoot within shooting distance imports that the assailant had in his possession some description of firearm, that he made an effort to use it, and the person on whom he attempted to use it was within the distance the firearm would effectively project or discharge its ball. Less than this would not be an attempt to shoot in shooting distance." Gray v. State, 63 Ala. 66, 73.

The only distinction between an "intent" and an "attempt" to do a thing is that the former implies the purpose only, while the latter both the purpose and the natural effort to carry that purpose into execution. Therefore a mere "intent" to commit a particular offense does not involve an "attempt" to do it. Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367, 369; Witherby v. State, 39 Ala. 702, 703; State v. Bullock, 13 Ala. 413, 416; Atkinson v. State, 30 S. W. 1064, 1065, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 424; Hart v. State, 38 Tex. 382, 383. The intent in the mind covers the thing in full, the act covers it only in part. Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367, 369. See, also, Hollister v. State, 59 N. E. 847, 848, 156 Ind. 255.

The word "attempt" ordinarily implies an act, an effort, but in Pen. Code, div. 15, § 2, making it criminal for any person to attempt to commit an offense prohibited by law, and in such an attempt to do any act toward the commission of such offense, it is used as synonymous with "intend"; and thus taking an impression of the key which unlocks the door of a storehouse, for the purpose of making or procuring a false key with the intent of entering the house and stealing therefrom, is an intent to commit larceny by taking the impression of the key, whether he intends to enter and steal, himself, or procure another to do it. Griffin v. State, 26 Ga. 493, 497; State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 307, 317.

Where a statute makes it a capital felony for any person of color to make an assault on a white woman with an "intent" to commit rape, it is not sufficient to allege that the defendant feloniously "attempted" to commit such crime, "attempt" not being synonymous with "intent." "Intent" refers to an act, denotes a state of the mind with which the act is done. "Attempt" is expressive rather of a moving towards doing the thing than of the purpose itself. An "attempt" is an overt act itself. An assault is an "attempt" to strike, and is very different from a mere "intent" to strike. State v. Martin, 14 N. C. 329, 330.

Intent alone insufficient.

A statute prohibiting any person from "attempting" to contract an incestuous marriage contemplates an attempt manifested by acts which would end in the consummation of the particular offense but for the intervention of circumstances independent of the will of the party, and therefore an "intention" merely on the part of the defendant to commit the offense is not sufficient, but requires in addition a direct movement toward the commission of the offense after the preparations therefor are made. People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159.

"A mere intention to commit a specific crime does not itself amount to an 'attempt,' as that word is employed in the criminal law. There must be, in addition to the remote intention, the mens rea, some act done toward the accomplishment of the proposed crime." People v. Stits, 17 Pac. 693, 696, 75 Cal. 570.

In an attempt to commit an offense, an intent to commit it must be present; but the presence of intent alone is not sufficient, there must be some concomitant act or movement toward the execution of that purpose. Thus an attempt to commit rape is not an offense unless the intent to commit it is accompanied with some act or movement toward its accomplishment which constitutes an assault. Fox v. State, 34 Ohio St. 377, 379.

In order to constitute an attempt to commit a crime, there must appear to have been more than the mere design or intention to commit the offense. There must have been some ineffectual act or acts towards its accomplishment. An attempt may be immediate; for instance, an assault. But it is very commonly a remote effort or indirect measure taken with intent to effect an object. People v. Lawton, 56 Barb. 126, 135; People v. Kane, 55 N. E. 946, 949, 161 N. Y. 380.

An "attempt," says Mr. Bishop, in 1 Cr. Law (5th Ed.) § 729, "always implies a specific intent, not merely a general mental culpability. When we say that a man attempted to do a thing, we mean that he intended to do specifically it, and proceeded a certain way in the doing. The intent in the mind covers the thing in full. The act covers it only in part." An attempt, therefore, embodies both the intent to do a thing, and a direct ineffectual act done towards its execution. Hence the charge of an attempt necessarily includes and is equivalent to the charge of an attempt to accomplish what was intended. State v. Daly, 70 Pac. 706, 707, 41 Or. 515.

Intent required.

"When we say a man 'attempted' to do a thing, we mean that he intended to do specifically it, and proceeded a certain way in the doing." Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367, 369.

An "attempt" "is defined to be a deliberate crime, which is begun, but, through circumstances independent of the will of the actor, left unfinished. More strictly, it is such an intentional preparatory act as will apparently result, if not extrinsically hindered, in the crime which it was designed to effect. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 173. With reference to attempt, it has also been said that if all which the accused person intended would, had it been done, constitute no crime, it cannot be a crime under the name 'attempt' to do with the same purpose a part of this thing. One reason is that the specific intent, which we have seen is always necessary in a criminal intent, is wanting. Another reason relates to the act, namely, if a series of acts together will not constitute an offense, one of the series alone will not." In re Schurman, 20 Pac. 277, 282, 40 Kan. 533 (quoting 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 747).

"An indictable attempt is committed only when the intent is specific, namely, to do the particular thing which constitutes the substantive crime. If, therefore, one is too drunk to entertain such specific intent, he cannot become guilty of the offense of attempt, however culpable, in a general way, he may be for his drunkenness." Hence, in a trial for conspiring with the intent and for the purpose of committing murder, it was error to charge that the fact that accused was intoxicated must not be considered by the jury. Booher v. State, 60 N. E. 156, 160, 156 Ind. 435, 54 L. R. A. 391.

Offer synonymous.

Webster defines the word "offer" as (1) a proposal, to be accepted or rejected; (2) first advance; (3) the act of bidding a price, or sum bid; (4) attempt; endeavor. "Attempt" is defined to make an effort to effect some object; to make a trial or experiment; to direct; to endeavor; to use exertion for any purpose. Accordingly the words "offer" and "attempt" are convertible terms. Consequently an indictment for bribery which alleged that the accused did "offer" to do a certain act was sufficient, as the "offer" to bribe was an "attempt" to do so within the meaning of the statute. Commonwealth v. Harris (Pa.) 1 Leg. Gaz. R. 455, 457.

As sufficient charge of intent.

An indictment charging that a person made an assault upon one, and by putting him in fear of life did "attempt" to fraudulently take property from his person, sufficiently charges the intent within Pen. Code, art. 720, which defines "robbery" as a fraudulent taking of property from another's person or possession, with intent to appropriate it by means of an assault. Atkinson v. State (Tex.) 30 S. W. 1064, 1065.

An indictment charging that A., "with force and arms," etc., unlawfully "did attempt to pick the pocket of one B.," etc., is too indefinite. The courts cannot say what it is that the defendant was charged with doing, and without knowing this they cannot determine whether what he did was an indictable offense or not. If he committed an assault with intent to commit a felony, it should have been so stated. Randolph v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 398.

The word "attempt" is equivalent to "intent," so that an indictment charging an intent to commit rape is sufficient as an assault with intent to commit rape. Taylor v. State (Tex.) 69 S. W. 149.

An indictment for murder, charging the defendant with assaulting the prosecutor with an "attempt" him, etc., to kill and murder, instead of charging that the assault was made upon the prosecutor with "intent" him, etc., to kill and murder, was insufficient, since the word "attempt" is not synonymous nor substantially the same as "intent." State v. Marshall, 14 Ala. 411, 415.

In charging an assault with intent to commit a crime, the use of the word "intention," instead of the word "intent," is not fatal, but it is otherwise as to the use of "attempt." State v. Hearsey, 23 South. 372, 373, 50 La. Ann. 373.

Where a statute makes it a capital felony for any person of color to make an assault on a white woman with intent to commit rape, it is not sufficient to allege that the defendant feloniously "attempted" to commit the crime, since "attempt" is not synonymous with "intent." "Intent," referred to an act, denotes a state of the mind with which the act is done. "Attempt" is expressive rather of a moving towards doing a thing, than of the purpose itself. An "attempt" is an overt act itself. An "assault" is an attempt to strike, and is very different from a mere "intent" to strike. State v. Martin, 14 N. C. 329, 330.

Overt act required.

An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and tending to be fully shown by its commission. The two essential elements of the offense are: (1) The act must be such as would be proximately connected with the completed crime. (2) There must be an apparent possibility to commit the crime in the manner proposed. To constitute an attempt, there must be an act done in pursuance of the attempt, and more or less directly tending to the commission of the crime; but mere preparatory acts for the commission of a crime, and not proximately leading to its consummation, do not constitute an attempt. Groves v. States, 42 S. E. 755, 756, 116 Ga. 516, 59 L. R. A. 598.

An attempt, in general, is an overt act done in pursuance of an intent to do a specific thing, tending to the end, but falling short of complete accomplishment of it. In law the definition must have this further significance: that the overt act must be sufficiently proximate to the intended crime to form one of the natural series of acts which the intent requires for its full execution. So long as the acts are confined to preparation only, and can be abandoned before any transgression of the law, they are within the sphere of "intent," and do not amount to "attempts," and hence, where one went to another's place and watched the house, and prepared a rope to tie the owner of the house in order to prevent his interference while he burglarized the house, such acts do not go beyond mere preparation, and did not rise to the dignity of an "attempt." But when on the appearance of the owner of the house he changed his mind and attacked him, and then proceeded toward the house, but abandoned his purpose on being frightened by an approaching team, such conduct justified the submission to the jury of the question as to an attempt at robbery or burglary, or both. Commonwealth v. Eagan, 42 Atl. 374, 377, 190 Pa. 10.

"Attempt" is expressive rather of a moving towards doing the thing, than of the purpose itself. An attempt is an overt act itself. State v. Martin, 14 N. C. 329, 330 (cited and approved Lewis v. State, 35 Ala. 380, 388).

Acts are necessary to constitute an attempt. Kelly v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 484, 488.

"Attempt to cause," mentioned in Comp. Laws, § 7557, providing that every person who shall set fire to any building mentioned in the preceding sections, or to any other material, with intent to cause any such building to be burned, or shall by any other means "attempt to cause" any building to be burned, shall be punished, etc., "must be by some act of the same general nature as the acts before mentioned; that is, some physical act sufficiently proximate to the result to be caused as to stand either as the first or some subsequent step in the actual endeavor to really bring about or accomplish such result. It must amount to something more than a preparation for an attempt to cause. The specific provisions in the fore part of the sections require a physical act of causation very near to the effect, and I can discover no ground in this subject, or in the arrangement or phraseology, for exempting the general clause from the rule of law before stated by which generals are subordinated by the sense of preceding and connected particulars." McDade v. People, 29 Mich. 50, 55.

An attempt is an intent to do a particular thing which the law, either common or statutory, has declared to be a crime, coupled with an act towards the doing, sufficient, both in magnitude and proximity to the fact intended, to be taken cognizance of by the law, that does not concern itself with things trivial and small. State v. Smith, 24 S. W. 1000, 1001, 119 Mo. 439.

"Attempt," as used in connection with the crime of perjury, includes and requires not only an intent to pervert the course of justice, but also some act done which is in some degree adapted to accomplish the thing intended, but a perfect adaptedness in the act performed to accomplish the intent is not requisite. State v. Whittemore, 50 N. H. 245, 249, 9 Am. Rep. 196.

Preparation alone insufficient.

An attempt is an endeavor to accomplish a crime, carried beyond mere preparation, but falling short of the ultimate design or any part of it. Franklin v. State, 29 S. W. 1088, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 203; Patrick v. People, 24 N. E. 619, 620, 132 Ill. 529; People v. Mason, 45 Pac. 182, 183, 113 Cal. 76; United States v. Reeves (U. S.) 38 Fed. 404, 408; State v. McCarty, 36 Pac. 338, 340, 54 Kan. 52.

In Reg. v. Cheeseman, Leigh & C. 140, it is said: "There is, no doubt, a difference between the preparation incident to the offense, and the actual attempt. But if the actual transaction has commenced which would have ended in the crime, if not interrupted, there is clearly an attempt to commit a crime." Thus, where persons had proceeded so far in the attempt to defraud a man of his money, by playing a confidence game, that they would have secured it had it not been for the presence of his wife, they were guilty of an attempt to commit crime. People v. Mason, 45 Pac. 182, 183, 113 Cal. 76.

In Hicks v. Commonwealth, 9 S. E. 1024, 86 Va. 223, 19 Am. St. Rep. 891, Lewis, P., said: "An 'attempt' to commit a crime is compounded of two elements: (1) The intent to commit it, and (2) a direct ineffectual act done towards its commission. Wharton defines it, 'An attempt is an intended, apparent, unfinished crime.' Therefore the act must reach far enough toward the accomplishment of the desired results to amount to the commencement of the consummation. It must not be merely preparatory. In other words, while it need not be the last proximate act to the consummation of the offense attempted to be perpetrated, it must approach sufficiently near to it to stand either as the first or some subsequent step in a direct movement toward the commission of the offense after the preparations are made." "So purchasing liquor in San Francisco by a party in Alaska would not be an 'attempt' to introduce this liquor into Alaska, it being merely an attempt to purchase, an act harmless and indifferent in itself, whatever the purpose for which it was done." State v. Fraker, 49 S. W. 1017, 1021, 148 Mo. 143 (citing United States v. Stephens [U. S.] 12 Fed. 52); Johnson v. State, 43 N. W. 425, 27 Neb. 687.

To constitute an attempt at common law, something more than an intention or purpose to commit crime is necessary. Between preparation for the attempt and the attempt itself, there is a wide difference. The preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offense; the attempt is the direct movement towards the commission after the preparations are made. People v. Youngs, 81 N. W. 114, 115, 122 Mich. 292, 47 L. R. A. 108.

Acts done toward the accomplishment of the purpose intended do not always of themselves amount to an attempt, or to an offense of human laws take cognizance for if they be but acts of preparation, however elaborate, our municipal law would not assume to deal with them. In considering whether a particular act done amounts to an "attempt," in the criminal sense, the proximity or remoteness of the person or thing intended to be injured is generally an important element. People v. Stits, 17 Pac. 693, 696, 75 Cal. 570.

"Attempt" implies the exercise of physical force directed to some definite end, the actual entering upon the execution of a purpose which, if not prevented or diverted, will result in the injury indicated. There is a marked distinction between "attempt" and "intent." The former conveys the idea of physical effort to accomplish the act, the latter the state of mind with which the act is done or contemplated. Neither mere words or threats, nor preparation to commit a crime, are sufficient to constitute an attempt. It is essential that there shall be some overt act which will apparently result in the crime unless interrupted by circumstances independent of the doer's will, and such is its meaning in the rule that, to make out the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, there must be, first, an attempt, and, second, intent to accomplish sexual intercourse, forcibly and against the will of the woman. Hollister v. State, 59 N. E. 847, 848, 156 Ind. 255.

Solicitation alone insufficient.

An "attempt" to commit a misdemeanor includes something more than mere solicitation, and requires some overt act. In a high moral sense it may be true that solicitation is an attempt, but in the legal sense it is not until something has been done which may be called an "overt act" that it can be said that an attempt has been made to commit a misdemeanor. Smith v. Commonwealth, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 209, 212.

Act March 31, 1860 (Purd. Dig. 340), making it a felony to "attempt to administer poison" to any one with intent to commit the crime of murder, means an attempt which is the approximate attempt, or an attempt to do a thing which, if done, would be the immediate cause of death; and hence, where one solicited another to place poison in a certain spring, and such person refused so to do, and subsequently during the conversation the accused placed the package containing the poison in the pocket of the one solicited, it was held that there was no attempt under the statute. Stabler v. Commonwealth, 95 Pa. 318, 321, 40 Am. Rep. 653.

"Attempt," as used in Rev. St. 1874, p. 393, § 273, providing that whoever attempts to commit any offense prohibited by law, and does any act towards it, but fails or is interrupted or prevented in its execution, shall be punished, must be construed as meaning a physical act, as contradistinguished from a verbal declaration; that is, it must be a step taken towards the actual commission of the offense, and a mere effort by persuasion to produce the condition of mind essential to the commission of the offense is not an attempt to commit it. Cox v. People, 82 Ill. 191, 192, 193.

ATTEMPT TO COMMIT RAPE.

For a man to be guilty of an attempt to commit rape, he must have intended to use the force necessary to accomplish his purpose notwithstanding the woman's resistance, or, in the case of constructive force, to either destroy her power to resist by the administration of liquors or drugs, or to take advantage of the fact that she was already in a condition in which either the mental or physical ability to resist is wanting. In addition to this, there must have been some act done which, in connection with this intent, constitutes the attempt. State v. Lung, 28 Pac. 235, 236, 21 Nev. 209, 37 Am. St. Rep. 505.

The words "attempt to commit rape," in their ordinary meaning, are not equivalent to the words "assault with intent to commit rape," since the former phrase may describe a state of facts which does not constitute an assault with intent to ravish. If it were otherwise, the exact definition of "assault" would be "an attempt to commit a battery," and an indictment charging the defendant with an attempt to ravish would be good under a statute making an assault with intent to rape a crime. Fox v. State, 34 Ohio St. 377, 379.

An attempt to commit a rape is an ineffectual offer, by force, with intent to have carnal connection. Acts are necessary to constitute an attempt, and, if such acts with such intent are not proved, there can be no conviction. Kelly v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 1 Grant, Cas. 484, 488.

ATTEND.

Authority "to attend to" the business of the principal generally does not authorize the agent to sell and convey real estate, nor allow him to dispose of the personality of his principal, unless necessary to conduct the business. Coquillard's Adm'rs v. French, 19 Ind. 274, 287.

In a subcontract by which a contractor assigned the main contract, with an agreement that the assignee should furnish all materials, and that the original contractor should "attend to and build the house" and receive the profit on the contract after the bills were paid, the clause "attend to and build" merely means to superintend the work. McPhee v. Young, 21 Pac. 1014, 1016, 18 Colo. 80.

ATTENDANCE.

See "Medical Attendance"; "Nonattendance."

Under a statute allowing members of the Legislature certain compensation for each day's "attendance," it could not have been intended that the members should receive pay for those days only on which they were actually engaged in the business of legislation. A member may be engaged in attendance during the periods of temporary cessation of legislative functions by the respective bodies. It was never intended that the members of the Legislature should not receive pay for Sundays, or pending temporary adjournments on holidays, or on the occasion of the death of a member. Ex parte Pickett, 24 Ala. 91, 95; State v. Hastings, 16 Wis. 337, 339.

In Laws 1889, c. 93, § 4, providing that trustees of the penitentiary shall be entitled to receive a certain sum for each day employed in attendance on the sessions of the board, the word "attendance" will be construed to mean the actual period during which the member is traveling to and from his place of residence to the place of the session, as well as while at the place of the session. State v. Briggs, 63 N. W. 206, 207, 5 N. D. 69.

By physician.

The mere calling into a doctor's office for some medicine to relieve a temporary indisposition, or the calling at the home of the insured by the doctor for the same purpose, cannot be considered an "attendance by a physician," within the meaning of the question in an application for life insurance as to the attendance by a physician upon the applicant. Billings v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 516, 518, 70 Vt. 477.

A denial by an applicant for insurance that she had been "attended by a physician" within a certain period prior to her application meant the attendance of physicians for some sickness or disease of more seriousness than a mere temporary ailment. Brown v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 32 N. W. 610, 612, 65 Mich. 313, 8 Am. St. Rep. 894.

Merely calling a physician to prescribe for a temporary indisposition, not serious in its nature, and not affecting the person's sound bodily health, is not being "attended" by a physician, within the meaning of such word in an application for insurance, in response to the printed question, "How long since you were attended by a physician, or professionally consulted one?" Plumb v. Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co., 65 N. W. 611, 614, 108 Mich. 103.

Where the applicant for an insurance policy had been to the office of a physician and told him that he coughed and spat blood, and submitted to a physical examination, and paid for the services of the physician, and called again and paid him a fee, it shows that he was as really "attended" by the physician as if the latter had seen him at his home. White v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 39 N. E. 771, 773, 163 Mass. 108, 27 L. R. A. 398.

A policy of life insurance contained a condition requiring, among other things, that the proofs of death should contain the name of the physician or physicians in attendance, and the place and date of burial, and the affidavit of medical attendance. Held, that a physician not engaged in practice, who was present as a friend and neighbor when the wounded man was brought to his own house, and who at the request of another neighbor examined the wounds and administered an opiate, was not necessarily an "attending physician" within the policy, so that the proofs of death would be insufficient by reason of their failure to contain such physician's affidavit and certificate. Gibson v. American Mut. Life Ins. Co., 37 N. Y. 580, 581.

ATTENDANCE ON COURT.

"Attendance on court," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the arrest of a person on civil process while in attendance on court, includes the time a defendant from a foreign state remains at the place where the court is held, although his case is passed from day to day, without any new assignment, on account of the illness of the other party. Ellis v. Degarmo, 24 Atl. 579, 580, 17 R. I. 715, 19 L. R. A. 560.

A juror may be in attendance on court without being impaneled to try any cause. After he has been drawn he may be excused for a definite period, and after a jury has been impaneled the remaining jurors may be excused until some future day. In such cases they are not in "attendance" upon the court during any period that they are excused therefrom with the opportunity to be engaged in ordinary vocations. Mason v. Culbert, 41 Pac. 464, 108 Cal. 247.

ATTENDANT.

See "Medical Attendant"; "Stated Attendant."
His attendants, see "His."

"Attendant," as used in Rev. St. c. 137, § 17, declaring that the officer taking a deposition shall annex thereto a statement that the opposite party or his attorney was attendant at the taking of the deposition, or that a certain notice was served on him on a day named, means something more than a mere personal presence, and signifies that the party was present and participated in the examination of witnesses. Miller v. McDonald, 13 Wis. 673, 675.

ATTENTION.

"Attention" signifies the act or state of attending or heeding. A letter by a wholesale dealer, in response to an order of goods by a retailer, stating that the former would give the order prompt attention, is not sufficient to constitute an acceptance, but was no more than a courteous promise to give it consideration. Manier v. Appling, 20 South. 978, 980, 112 Ala. 663.

ATTEST—ATTESTATION.

Webster defines the word "attest" as follows: "To bear witness to; to certify; to affirm to be true or genuine; * * * appropriately used for the affirmation of persons in their official capacity to test the truth of a writing; to attest the copy of a record." McGuire v. Church, 49 Conn. 248, 249.

Attestation is the act of witnessing the actual execution of the papers, and subscribing one's name as a witness to that fact. White v. Magarahan, 13 S. E. 509, 510, 87 Ga. 217.

"Attestation" means that the subscribing witness saw the writing executed or heard it acknowledged, and, at the request of the party, thereupon signed his name as witness. Luper v. Werts, 23 Pac. 850, 855, 19 Or. 122.

The word "attested" as used in an indictment charging the violation of a statute prohibiting the officers and directors of a national banking association from making any false entry in any book, by charging that such entries were attested, does not necessarily intend that, in any legal sense, they made the reports or any entries in them. United States v. Potter (U. S.) 56 Fed. 83, 94.

A note bearing an indorsement acknowledging it to be due, signed by the promisor, and attested by a witness, is not an attested promissory note, within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 120, §§ 4, 7, extending the limitation of actions upon such notes to 20 years. Gray v. Bowden, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 282, 283.

As authentication by officer.

"The word 'attested,' when used with reference to judicial writings or copies thereof, as copies of records or judicial process, seems to have a legal meaning which is an authentication by the clerk of the court so as to make them receivable in evidence." Thus, as used in Rev. St. 1874, §§ 52, 53, authorizing the taking of the interest of the stockholder in any corporation by execution, but providing that, if the property has not been attached in such suit, the officer shall leave an attested copy of the execution with the clerk, etc., means "authenticated." Goss & Phillips Mfg. Co. v. People, 4 Ill. App. (4 Bradw.) 510, 515.

Gen. St. c. 117, § 10, requiring an attested copy of the reasons of an appeal to be filed on the adverse party, requires it to be attested by the register, who is the legal custodian of the original paper, and whose official attestation is of itself a sufficient verification of the copy, and therefore the service of a copy attested by the attorney of the appellant did not constitute a compliance with the statute. Wait v. Demeritt, 119 Mass. 158.

As certify or verify.

The expression "attested account," as used in Acts 1830, p. 412, § 2, providing that the owner of the building shall furnish a copy of the attested account delivered to him to his contractor, and that, if there shall be any disagreement between such contractor and his creditor, they may, by amicable adjustment or by arbitration, ascertain the true sum, includes an account made out against the contractor, and verified by the claimant's oath that the balance of such account is justly due him from such contractor for labor done, and does not require the claimant to produce legal evidence of the correctness and justice of his claim in the first instance. Donaldson v. Wood (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 395, 400.

The word "attest," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 5211, requiring reports of national bank directors to be attested by the signatures of at least three directors, and attested by the oath of the president or cashier, means something more than to witness the execution of the report by the president of the cashier. It means to certify its correctness. Gerner v. Mosher, 78 N. W. 384, 388, 58 Neb. 135, 46 L. R. A. 244.

Copy included.

The word "attest" is defined as "to certify to the verity of a copy of a public document," and the word "attestation," therefore, as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1906, providing that the judicial record of a foreign country may be proved by the attestation of the clerk, with the seal of the court, etc., authorizes a copy of such record to be so proven, for, while the word "copy" is not expressly used, it is included in the word "attestation." Wickersham v. Johnston, 38 Pac. 89, 90, 104 Cal. 407, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118.

Presence required.

Code 1876, § 2707, providing that the property of a wife may be sold by the husband and wife, and conveyed by them jointly by instrument of writing attested by two witnesses, means that such witnesses shall sign the conveyance as witnesses to the signatures of the husband and wife, grantors, but the word "attested" does not require that the witnesses should sign their names to the conveyance in the presence of each other; it being sufficient that they attest, by signing their names to the document, that the husband and wife duly signed the paper for the purpose of executing it. Logwood v. Hussey, 60 Ala. 417, 424.

"Attest," as used with regard to deeds, implies that a witness shall be present to testify that the person who is to execute the deed has done the act required. Freshfield v. Reed, 9 Mees. & W. 404, 405.

"The word 'attestation' implies the presence of some person who stands by, but is not a party to the transaction" (Seal v. Claridge, 7 Q. B. Div. 516); and a statute requiring a mortgage of personal property to be signed by the mortgagor in the presence of two persons, who must sign the same as witness thereto, implies a common attestation of it, so that the mortgagee is disqualified from being one of the two witnesses. Donovan v. St. Anthony & D. Elevator Co., 80 N. W. 772, 774, 8 N. D. 585, 46 L. R. A. 721, 73 Am. St. Rep. 779.

Knowledge of nature of instrument.

The term "attested," in Gen. St. p. 369, § 2, requiring a will to be in writing, subscribed by the testator, and attested by three witnesses in his presence and the presence of each other, does not import that the attesting witness must know that the instrument is a will, but the object of the attestation is that the witness may be able to testify that the testator put his name upon the identical piece of paper upon which the witness put his own. Appeal of Canada, 47 Conn. 450, 460.

Under a statute providing that the will must be attested by three or more credible witnesses in the presence of the testator and each other, it is not necessary that the witnesses know at the time they sign that the instrument is a will; the word "attest" not including such knowledge in its meaning. In re Clafin's Will, 52 Atl. 1053, 1056, 75 Vt. 19.

Signature.

A proper attestation may be made by the mere signature of a witness. It is sufficient that the signature appears to be made for the purpose of attesting the execution of the conveyance. Arrington v. Arrington, 26 South. 152, 154, 122 Ala. 510 (citing Jones v. Hagler, 95 Ala. 529, 10 South. 345).

The word "attest," as used in the statute requiring that wills shall be attested and subscribed in the testator's presence, does not require the attesting witness to sign his own name or touch the pen while another signs, but the will is attested, within the meaning of the statute, if the witness is present and has another sign at his request. Lord v. Lord, 58 N. H. 7, 9, 42 Am. Rep. 565.

Where the law required an attestation, by the officer serving an original writ of foreign attachment, on the copy thereof, there was no attestation on the copy when the signature of the officer was not attached to the document by himself, but by the clerk. McGuire v. Church, 49 Conn. 248, 249.

Subscribe distinguished.

There is a very marked distinction between attesting and subscribing a will. Attesting is the act of the senses. Subscribing is the act of the hand. The one is mental, the other mechanical; and to attest a will is to know that it is published as such, and to certify the facts required to constitute an actual and legal publication, but to subscribe a paper published as a will is only to write on the same paper the names of the witnesses for the sole purpose of identification. There may be a perfect attestation in fact without subscription, and there may be a subscription in fact without attestation. Tobin v. Haack, 81 N. W. 758, 761, 79 Minn. 101; Swift v. Wiley, 40 Ky. (1 B. Mon.) 114, 115; In re Downie's Will, 42 Wis. 66, 76. Nevertheless Rev. St. Ill. c. 148, § 2, providing that a will shall be attested in the presence of the testator by two or more credible witnesses, requires the subscription of the names of the witnesses to the attestation clause, as a declaration that the signature was made or acknowledged in their presence. Sloan v. Sloan (Ill.) 56 N. E. 952, 953, 184 Ill. 579 (citing Drury v. Connell, 177 Ill. 43, 52 N. E. 368; Gibson v. Nelson, 181 Ill. 122, 54 N. E. 901, 72 Am. St. Rep. 254).

ATTESTING WITNESS.

"Attesting witness," as used in Gen. St. c. 125, § 4, providing that a promissory note, in order to be taken out of the general statute of limitations, must be signed in the presence of an attesting witness, must be one who at the time of the attestation would be competent to testify in court to the matter which he attested, and not one who might be or might not be competent to testify on a trial at some future time. Jenkins v. Dawes, 115 Mass. 599, 601.

The Century Dictionary defines an "attesting witness" to be a person who signs his name to an instrument to prove it, and for the purpose of identifying the maker or makers. The Standard Dictionary defines "attestation" to be the subscription by a person of his name to a written instrument to signify that the same was executed in his presence, or that it is correct. Since it is well settled in this state that it is not necessary to the validity of a will that the witnesses, at the time that they attest it, shall know the nature of the instrument they are attesting (Allen v. Griffin, 69 Wis. 529, 35 N. W. 21), it is not clear what, if anything, attestation is intended to add to the mere fact of subscription. However that may be, it is settled that an instrument in writing, signed by the testator, and subscribed in his presence and at his request, which may be implied from circumstances, by two competent witnesses, is prima facie, and so far as formality of execution goes, a valid will. Skinner v. American Bible Soc., 65 N. W. 1037, 1039, 92 Wis. 209.

ATTITUDE.

In an instruction that the question before the jury was whether or not the defendants were, at the bringing of a suit to quiet title to certain land, in an attitude of claiming an adverse interest in the real estate, the word "attitude" means the complex mental state or condition which an adverse claim is in or to the land of another, considered apart from the evidence by which its existence is usually manifested to others. In this sense a claim differs from any and all assertions of it, and these last are but evidence of its existence. Miles v. Strong, 36 Atl. 55, 59, 68 Conn. 273.

ATTORNEY.

See "Certain Attorney"; "Private Attorney."

"Attorney," in English law, signifies, in its widest sense, any substitute or agent appointed to act in the turn, stead, or place of another. In re Ricker, 29 Atl. 559, 565, 66 N. H. 207, 24 L. R. A. 740.

An attorney is one put in place of another. The expression "agents" or "attorneys" is not necessarily equivalent to attorneys in fact. The verb "attorn," among other meanings, signifies to transfer or to turn over to another. Eichelberger v. Sifford, 27 Md. 320, 329.

The United States pension law relating to the compensation of an "attorney, agent, or other person" procuring a pension, cannot be construed to include a guardian who procures a pension for his ward. Southwick v. Evans, 21 Atl. 104, 17 R. L. 198.

The provision of Comp. St. p. 274, § 10, that no "agent or attorney" shall write or draw up the deposition of any witness, includes an agent or attorney employed to attend to the taking of the deposition, although not otherwise employed in the case, but does not extend to one employed to assist the magistrate in drawing up the deposition, who has no other agency in the matter, although he is paid by the party. Moulton v. Hall, 27 Vt. 233.

"Attorney," as used in the act of 1839 prescribing the salary of attorneys of the State Bank and its branches, applies to the regular attorney who is elected by the directors as an officer in the respective banks, and does not restrain the directors from employing such other professional assistants as the interests of the bank may require. Bank of State v. Martin, 4 Ala. 615, 621.

"Attorney," as used in the statute creating assistant justice courts, and authorizing the appearance of a party in person or by his attorney, is to be construed in its enlarged sense, as including any person to whom a party chooses to delegate his appearance, and is not limited to licensed attorneys at law. Hughes v. Mulvey, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sandf.) 92, 95.

As attorney at law.

"Attorney," when used in connection with proceedings of courts, and the authority to conduct business in them, as well as when employed in a general sense with reference to transactions of business usually and almost necessarily confided to members of the legal profession, has a fixed and universal signification, on which a technical and popular sense unite, and is generally understood as having reference to a class of persons who are by license constituted officers of courts of justice, and who are empowered to appear and prosecute and defend, and on whom peculiar duties, responsibilities, and liabilities are devolved by law in consequence. People v. May, 3 Mich. 598, 605.

"The word 'attorney,' when used in connection with the proceedings of courts and the authority to conduct the business of men, as well as when employed in a general sense with reference to the transaction of business usually and almost necessarily confided to members of the legal profession, has a fixed and universal signification, in which the technical and popular senses unite. The Legislature and the judge, the lawyer and the layman, understand it alike, as having reference to a class of persons who are by license constituted officers of courts of justice, and who are empowered to appear and prosecute and defend, and upon whom peculiar duties and responsibilities and liabilities are devolved by law in consequence." People v. May, 3 Mich. 598, 605.

"Attorney," as used in a guaranty of a judgment, authorizing any attorney to enter judgment against the guarantor, is to be construed as meaning an attorney at law. Cooper v. Shaver, 101 Pa. 547, 549.

"Attorney," as used in Act May 25, 1887, requiring the declaration or statement of a claim to be filed by the plaintiff or his attorney, means an attorney at law, and not an attorney in fact. Kelly v. Herb, 23 Atl. 889, 147 Pa. 563.

"Attorney," as used in St. 1841, p. 125, providing that, when an execution defendant is in custody, it shall be lawful for the execution plaintiffs, or their agent or attorney, to direct the defendant to be discharged, means attorneys at law, and refers to and was intended to embrace the plaintiffs' attorney in the action at law. Neff v. Powell (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 420, 421.

"Attorney," as used in Code Prac. art. 177, authorizing an attorney to accept and acknowledge service of process, means an attorney at law, and not an attorney in fact. Ingram v. Richardson, 2 La. Ann. 839, 840.

"Attorney," as used in the act of 1828 amending the Code of Practice, and declaring that, in all cases where judgments are demurrable, the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, shall make an affidavit, means an attorney at law; the term "attorney" being distinguished from "agent" by the disjunctive conjunction. Dwight v. Weir, 6 La. Ann. 706.

The Code of Practice, providing that, when an oath is required of a party, it may be made by his agent or attorney, means an attorney at law, and not necessarily an attorney in fact, as the word "attorney," when not coupled with any qualifying expressions, is ordinarily understood to mean attorney at law, and has not infrequently been used in that sense in legislative enactment. Webster says that the word formerly signified any person who did business for another, but that its sense is chiefly or wholly restricted to persons who act as substitutes for the persons concerned in prosecuting and defending actions before courts of justice, etc. Clark v. Morse, 16 La. 575, 576.

As attorney of record.

"Attorney," as used in Rev. St. 1879, § 3506, providing that, if neither the adverse party nor his attorney reside in this state, a notice may be posted in the office of the clerk of the court where the suit is pending, means an attorney of record. Wilson v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., 18 S. W. 286, 292, 108 Mo. 588, 32 Am. St. Rep. 624.

"Attorney," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that a notice of appeal shall be served on the adverse party or his attorney, means attorney of record. Whittle v. Renner, 55 Cal. 395.

ATTORNEY AD HOC.

The words "attorney ad hoc," "curator ad hoc," and "advocate," when used with respect to an absent defendant, indicate the person named and appointed by the court to defend him in the suit in which the appointment is made. Bienvenu v. Factors' & Traders' Ins. Co., 33 La. Ann. 209, 212.

ATTORNEY AT LAW.

See "District Attorney"; "Practicing Attorney"; "Prosecuting Attorney."

An attorney at law is one who is put in the place, stead, or turn of another, to manage his matters of law. 3 Bl. Comm. 25, 26. "Attorney," in English law, signifies, in its widest sense, any substitute or agent appointed to act in the turn, stead, or place of another. The term is now commonly confined to a class of qualified agents who undertake the conduct of legal proceedings for their clients. In re Ricker, 29 Atl. 559, 565, 66 N. H. 207, 24 L. R. A. 740.

"An attorney is a man set apart by the law to expound to all persons who seek him the laws of the land relating to the high interests of property, liberty, and life. To this end he is licensed and permitted to charge for his services." Planters' Bank v. Hornberger, 44 Tenn. (4 Cold.) 531, 571.

"Persons acting professionally in legal formalities, negotiations, or proceedings by the warrant or authority of their clients may be regarded as attorneys at law, within the meaning of that designation as used in this country; and all such, when they undertake to conduct legal controversies or transactions, profess themselves to be reasonably well acquainted with the law and the rules and practice of the courts, and they are bound to exercise in such proceedings a reasonable degree of care, prudence, diligence, and skill. Authorities everywhere support that proposition, but attorneys do not profess to know all the law, or to be incapable of error or mistake in applying it to the facts of every case, as even the most skillful of the profession would hardly be able to come up to that standard. National Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 199, 25 L. Ed. 621.

Attorneys at the bar are properly termed the "court's constituency," to aid it in the due administration of justice. Dodge v. State, 39 N. E. 745, 746, 140 Ind. 284.

An attorney is a person duly admitted to practice law, and authorized to appear for and represent a party in the written proceedings in any action or proceeding in any stage thereof. An attorney other than the one who represents the party in the written proceedings may also appear for and represent a party in court or before a judicial officer, and then he is known in the particular action or proceeding as counsel only, and his authority is limited to the acts that are done in the court or before such officer at that time. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash., 1897, § 4758; B. & C. Comp. Or. § 1049.

As acting in fiduciary capacity.

See "Fiduciary Capacity or Character."

Authority of.

An attorney at law is merely an agent of the plaintiff, and a special agent at that, in the sense that his authority extends only to the particular matter in which he is employed. Douglass v. Folsom, 33 Pac. 660, 663, 21 Nev. 441.

"An attorney is an advocate counsel or official agent employed to take charge of cases at law. An attorney is invested with a large discretionary power in anything pertaining to the collection of a demand intrusted to him for that purpose, and his client must answer in damages if injury is occasioned by his conduct in the general scope of his employment. While he cannot discharge a debt or an execution without receiving satisfaction, he has control of the selection of legal remedies and processes which he may deem most effectual in accomplishing his object. The confidence reposed in him by his client, and the supposed ignorance of the latter as to the most appropriate remedies, require this." Shattuck v. Bill, 7 N. E. 39, 42, 142 Mass. 56.

An attorney at law is a special agent limited in duty and authority to the vigilant prosecution or defense of the rights of his client. His authority to enter into bargains or contracts binding on his client, unless expressly conferred, is confined within the limits of that professional action which may be necessary for the conduct of the proceedings in the course of pending suits, and of direction to ministerial officers in the issue, levy, and return of executions on judgments which he may have obtained. He has no authority by virtue of the general retainer to accept in satisfaction of his judgment which he has obtained a less sum than that actually due, or for such sum to transfer the judgment; and all persons who deal with an attorney must ascertain the extent of his authority, and, if they do not inquire, they act at their peril. Robinson v. Murphy, 69 Ala. 543, 547.

As agent or clerk.

See "Agent"; "Clerk."

As attorney in actual practice.

Gen. Prac. Rule 5, providing that in no case shall an attorney or counselor be surety on any undertaking or bond required by law, means an attorney and counselor in practice, or following the profession of law as a vocation; and hence, where an attorney had not practiced for a year, and was engaged in another vocation, the fact that he was an attorney did not preclude him from becoming a surety on a bond. Evans v. Harris, 47 N. Y. Super. Ct. (15 Jones & S.) 366, 367.

As constitutional officer.

Const. art. 16, § 30, provides that all terms of office not otherwise fixed by the Constitution are limited to two years. Held that, since the office of an attorney is one for life, he cannot be regarded as a constitutional officer. Ex parte Williams, 20 S. W. 580, 581, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 262. 21 L. R. A. 783.

As counselor or solicitor.

An attorney at law is an officer of the court whose duty it is to manage cases for the litigants. "In this country the distinction between an attorney or solicitor and counsel is practically abolished in nearly all the states. The lawyer in charge of a case acts both as solicitor and counsel. His services in the one capacity and the other cannot be well distinguished." In re Paschal, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 483, 493, 19 L. Ed. 992.

There is practically no distinction between the terms "attorney" and "counselor." The only distinction made is the purely arbitrary one between proceedings in equity and at common law. The practice of the bar generally is that, when a member signs a common-law pleading, it is as attorney; if an equity pleading, he signs it as solicitor. But this is a distinction arising merely from the two kinds or modes of proceeding. In this connection the court remarks: "I am somewhat at a loss to know what is the distinction in our practice between the terms 'solicitor' and 'counselor.' I should be very much inclined to think that, if there were the signature of counsel to the bill, whether he was described as 'counselor,' as 'solicitor,' or as 'attorney,' that the description might be rejected as surplusage, and that it would stand as a compliance with the rule." Stinson v. Hildrup (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 107, 108.

The word "attorney," as used in the civil procedure act, includes a counselor, and every other person authorized to appear and represent a party in an action or special proceeding in any stage thereof. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1801, § 1285.

As employé or servant.

See "Employé"; "Servant."

As federal officer.

"Attorneys are officers of the court, admitted as such by its order, and upon the evidence of their possessing sufficient legal learning and fair private character." They are not officers of the United States. Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 333, 378. 18 L. Ed. 366.

As officer of court.

An attorney at law is an attorney employed to appear for parties to actions or other judicial proceedings, and is an officer of the court. Treat v. Tolman (U. S.) 113 Fed. 892, 894, 51 C. C. A. 522; National Press Intelligence Co. v. Brooke, 41 N. Y. Supp. 658, 18 Misc. Rep. 373; In re Lawyers' Tax Cases, 55 Tenn. (8 Heisk.) 565, 651; Sanborn v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140, 145, 146; Baur v. Betz, 1 How. Prac. (N. S.) 344, 347.

An attorney at law is an officer of the court, and the latter may exercise its summary jurisdiction over him to the extent of depriving him of his office and striking his name from the rolls. In re Mains, 80 N. W. 714, 716, 121 Mich. 603; State v. Holding (S. C.) 1 McCord, 379, 380.

Attorneys are officers of the court, and answerable to it for the proper performance of their professional duties. They appear and participate in its proceedings only by the license of the court, and, if they undertake to appear without any authority from the party whom they profess to represent, the act is in opposition to the license of the court, which, upon the application of the supposed client, the court has power to inquire into and correct summarily. Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 534, 539.

Attorneys are officers of a court, on whom duties are imposed, among which are to uphold and maintain the dignity of the court, and to refrain from all offensive conduct that would have a tendency to bring it into disrepute, or weaken the confidence that the people have always reposed in the judiciary. These are obligations that attorneys must recognize and observe both in and out of court. Morrison v. Snow, 72 Pac. 924, 930, 26 Utah, 247.

An attorney at law is an officer in a court of justice, whose profession and business it is to prepare and try cases in the courts, and to give advice and counsel on legal matters to those employing him. There is no presumption that any one is a member of the bar of the commonwealth. Commonwealth v. Branthoover, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 353.

An attorney at law is an officer of the court. The terms of the oath exacted of him at his admission to the bar prove him to be so; the oath being, "You shall behave yourself in your office of attorney within the court with all due fidelity." It is also declared in Const. art. 1, § 18, that no member of Congress, or any other person holding any office, except an attorney at law, shall be a member of either house. In re Austin (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 191, 202, 23 Am. Dec. 657.

It is elementary law that an attorney is an officer of the court in which he is admitted to practice. His admission and license to practice raise a presumption, prima facie, in favor of his right to appear for any person whom he undertakes to represent. Danville, H. & W. B. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 36 Atl. 648, 649, 180 Pa. 157.

"An attorney at law, says Blackstone, answers to the procurator or proctor of the civilians and canonists, and he is one who is put in the place, stead, or turn of another, to manage his matters of law. These attorneys, he adds, are now formed into a regular corps. They are admitted to the execution of their office by the superior courts of Westminster Hall, and are in all points officers of the respective courts in which they are admitted." People v. Hallett, 1 Colo. 352, 355.

Attorneys at law are officers of the court—an inherent part of the machinery designed for the administration of justice—and are subjected to an oath of fidelity to the court as well as their clients. The position and practice of an attorney imply and require something higher than simply an endeavor to secure results favorable to his client. In re Murray's Estate, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 70, 72.

An attorney at law is a person employed to appear for parties to actions or judicial proceedings. He is an officer of the court, and the mere addition of the word "attorney" after the name of a principal does not of necessity carry with it the idea that the attorney is an officer of the court or an attorney at law. Hall v. Sawyer (N. Y.) 47 Barb. 116, 119.

As public officer.

See "Civil Officer"; "Officer."

As subject to license tax.

The manner of regulating the admission of persons to practice law is the subject of legislative action and control. At common law the courts had no power to admit attorneys or counselors. Their duties are of such character that, in order to secure proper qualification for their discharge, the Legislature imposes the duty of examination and determination upon the courts. The only difference between this pursuit and that of any other for which a license is not required is that a qualification looking to competency is required in one, and the right, independent of qualification, is in the other. Because the law prescribes certain methods by which the existence of the qualification to follow a pursuit is determined, and, after determining their existence, a general authority to follow such pursuit is granted, gives no greater right to follow that pursuit than exists in any citizen to follow any other legitimate calling or avocation, and the state has the same right to tax the business of an attorney by way of license fees than it has to tax any other business. Young v. Thomas, 17 Fla. 169, 173, 35 Am. Rep. 93.

In discussing the constitutionality of an act imposing a license tax upon attorneys at law, the court observes that in the technical sense of the word, which is the sense in which it is used in the statute, a person is not an attorney unless he has procured the required attorney's license, which confers that privilege upon him. The license creates his occupation, and one who does not engage in the practice is not an attorney, within the meaning of the act, and is not bound to pay the license. There is, says the court, nothing particularly sacred in the profession of a lawyer, which puts him above the legislative power to place on his shoulders his just share of the necessary burdens of the state. Cousins v. State, 50 Ala. 113, 115, 20 Am. Rep. 290.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The Attorney General is the principal law officer of the state. His duties are general. His authority is coextensive with the public legal affairs of the whole community. His advice often affects the rights of all persons within the state, and, excepting judgments and orders of court, his opinions control public interests more largely than do the acts of any other official of the state. State v. First Judicial District Court, 55 Pac. 916, 917, 22 Mont. 25.

"The Attorney General in England occupies a very different position than an Attorney General in a government like ours. He is appointed by patent authorizing him to hold office during the pleasure of the crown, and he is required, with the aid of others, to manage all legal affairs and suits in which the crown is interested. He is a necessary party to all proceedings affecting the crown, and has extensive powers of control in matters relating to charities, lunacies, estates, criminal prosecutions, etc. 3 Enc. Brit. 63. In all such matters he acts as the representative and agent of the crown, and, as its servant, he has for centuries enjoyed high prerogative rights." State v. Cunningham, 53 N. W. 35, 51, 83 Wis. 90, 17 L. R. A. 145, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27.

The Attorney General, at common law, is the chief legal representative of the sovereign in the courts, and it was his duty to appear for and prosecute in behalf of the crown any matters—criminal as well as civil. It was said by Blackstone (3 Bl. Comm. 27): "He represents the sovereign, in whose name all criminal process issue, and his power to prosecute all criminal offenses is unquestioned at common law." In People v. Miner, 2 Lans. 396, 397, it was said: "As the powers of the Attorney General were not conferred by statute, a grant by the statute of the same or other powers would not operate to deprive him of those belonging to the office at common law, unless the statute, either expressly or by reasonable intendment, forbade the exercise of powers not thus expressly conferred. He must be held, therefore, to have all the powers belonging to the office at common law, and such additional powers as the Legislature sees fit to confer on him." Under the colonial government, the Attorney General received his appointment from the Governor of the colony, and exercised his duties under the common law, but later he was commissioned by the crown. People v. Kramer, 68 N. Y. Supp. 383, 386, 33 Misc. Rep. 209.

ATTORNEY IN FACT.

An attorney in fact is one who is given authority by his principal to do a particular act not of a legal character. Treat v. Tolman (U. S.) 113 Fed. 892, 893, 51 C. C. A. 522.

An attorney in fact is one who is authorized by his principal either for some particular purpose, or to do a particular act not of a legal character. Hall v. Sawyer (N. Y.) 47 Barb. 116, 119.

In Porter v. Harmann, 8 Cal. 619, 620, it was held that by "attorneys in fact" are meant persons who are acting under a special power created by deed, and that all attorneys in fact are agents, so that the construction of the power of attorney is largely a question of agency. White v. Furgeson, 64 N. E. 49, 51, 29 Ind. App. 144.

ATTORNEY OF RECORD.

An attorney of record stands in a two-fold relation. He is the representative of his client, and he is an officer of the court. In the former relation he is to defend and enforce his client's rights, and is subject to his client's orders, but he should not in that relation use his position to prosecute his own claims which are adverse to his client. In his relation as an officer of the court there are certain rights belonging to him against his client which the court will permit him to secure by force of his position as attorney on the record; but the nature of these rights is defined by general rules, and is not to be enlarged by private contract. Thus an attorney of record cannot be removed without leave of the court, and such leave will not ordinarily be granted except on paying or securing to the attorney his proper fees and disbursements in the case. Delaney v. Husband, 45 Atl. 265, 266, 64 N. J. Law, 275.

ATTORNEY'S COSTS.

Attorney's costs are those fixed amounts which are allowed by law to an attorney for specified services rendered in the conduct of a cause, and authorized to be taxed up against a party thereto, and are distinguished from an attorney's disbursements, which are an expenditure or outlay of money which he is authorized by law to make, and which he does make, in the conduct of a cause—as, for instance, the expense of printing the papers for any hearing when required by rule of court. So that an act repealing all acts relating to attorney's costs does not apply to attorney's disbursements. Durham Fertilizer Co. v. Glenn, 26 S. E. 796, 797, 48 S. C. 494.

ATTORNEY'S FEES.

See "Reasonable Attorney's Fee."
As costs, see "Costs."

"Attorney's fees," as used in a note providing for attorney's fees in case the note is not paid at maturity, construed to include all attorney's services in collecting the note, and not to be limited to services performed in a suit instituted on the note. Moore v. Staser, 33 N. E. 665, 666, 6 Ind. App. 364.

The words "attorney's fee," as used in section 64 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, should not be construed in the narrowest and strictest sense, so as to exclude necessarily such services by counsel as were really required. But, for obvious reasons, claims on this ground should be admitted only most sparingly and with great caution; and they should be confined to services during the bankruptcy proceeding itself, excluding previous consultations or advice, as well as all unnecessary attendance as "counsel" in the course of the proceeding. In re Kross (U. S.) 96 Fed. 816, 819.

ATTORNEY'S LIEN.

An attorney's lien is the right of an attorney to apply part of the proceeds of a judgment recovered by him in his client's behalf for the payment of services rendered for such client, and is a lien on the judgment, and is properly denominated a lien, in the broad sense of the term, though it rests merely on the equity of the attorney to be paid his fees and disbursements out of the judgment which he has obtained. It is not a lien that attaches on possession, and in this it is distinguished from other liens, for an attorney's lien exists only in intestacy and by operation of law. The execution on a judgment does not represent the judgment, and the possession of the execution is not possession of the judgment. A lien, therefore, not arising from a right on the part of the attorney to retain something in his possession, but having a right to recover for his services in obtaining the judgment for his client, is called an "attorney's charging lien"; it being a right by the attorney to subject the proceeds of the judgment to the payment of his charge for services, and to recover the same, and pay himself therefor from the proceeds. Fowler v. Lewis' Adm'r, 14 S. E. 447, 457, 36 W. Va. 112.

An attorney has a lien of two kinds—one, a retaining lien, which is the right to retain possession of another's property until a debt to him has been satisfied; and the other is a charging lien, constituting a right to charge property in the possession of another with a debt due him. Butchers' Union Slaughterhouse & Live Stock Landing Co. v. Crescent City Live Stock Landing & Slaughterhouse Co. (La.) 6 South. 508, 511, 41 La. Ann. 355.

Two classes of liens are recognized at common law in favor of attorneys, namely, a retaining lien and a charging lien. A retaining lien gives to the attorney a right to retain all papers of his client which come to him by reason of his professional character for any balance due him for his employment; also the right to retain from funds of the client in his hands for his fees and disbursements in the case. This lien is not different from those accorded to all persons in respect to things on which they have bestowed labor. A charging lien is a special lien to which an attorney or solicitor is entitled upon funds in court recovered through his exertions. A lien attaches on the fruits of a judgment or decree. It attaches to the money payable to the client thereunder or by virtue of an award, and to money paid or payable into court in the course of an action or suit, or in any other way, if the proceeds of the labor and skill of an attorney. Jennings v. Bacon, 51 N. W. 15, 16, 84 Iowa, 403. A charging lien does not extend further than the services and expenses in the suit or other proceedings by which the judgment or fund was recovered. In re Wilson (U. S.) 12 Fed. 235, 238.

The lien of an attorney is merely an equitable right to be paid for his services out of the proceeds of the judgment or other proceedings, which has been obtained by his labor and skill, which the court will compel to the extent of its equitable power. It is distinguishable in this respect from the ordinary lien which a party has upon a thing in possession, which he is enabled himself to protect in refusal to deliver the property until his claim is satisfied. The attorney, unless the proceeds have come into his hands, must invoke the equitable aid of the court, and the court must be satisfied of the existence of the equitable right before any steps can be taken to enforce it. Ackerman v. Ackerman (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 229, 232.

An attorney is entitled to a lien on a judgment or decree that he may have obtained for his client, to the extent of reasonable compensation for the services rendered in and about obtaining such judgment or decree. This lien does not arise or attach until the rendition of the judgment or decree, and it is limited to compensation for services rendered or disbursements made for the client in and about obtaining the judgment or decree. It is not a general lien, operating as a security for any other claim or judgment, however meritorious it may be. For other debts, or for a balance due him, the attorney may have a lien on papers or documents coming to his possession in the course of his professional employment, but that lien is distinguishable from the particular lien he may have on a judgment or decree. Mosley v. Norman, 74 Ala. 422, 424.

"An attorney's lien resembles an assignment of a chose in action." Hobson v. Watson, 34 Me. 20, 23, 56 Am. Dec. 632.

The lien of an attorney, when it attaches to money in the hands of the adverse party, is in effect an equitable assignment by the client of so much as may be necessary to satisfy the attorney's demands. Stoddard v. Lord, 59 Pac. 710, 36 Or. 412.

The lien of an attorney is not measured by the taxable costs, but covers any portion of the demands which may have been stipulated for as compensation for the attorney's services. Rooney v. Second Ave. R. Co., 18 N. Y. 368, 372.

An attorney has a lien on a judgment obtained by him for the amount of his costs and agreed compensation, and to that extent the attorney may be regarded as an equitable assignee of the judgment. In the absence of notice of such lien, the judgment debtor may in good faith pay the judgment to the judgment creditor. Wright v. Wright, 70 N. Y. 98, 100.

An agreement between an attorney and his client that the attorney shall have a lien on a certain judgment to be recovered for, and specified the sum as compensation for his services, constitutes a valid, equitable assignment of the judgment, which attaches to the judgment as soon as it is rendered. Terney v. Wilson, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 282, 286.

ATTORNMEN

An attornment is the acknowledgment by a tenant of a new landlord on the alienation of land and an agreement to become tenant to the purchaser. Lindley v. Dakin, 13 Ind. 388, 389; Freeman v. Moffit (Mo.) 25 S. W. 87, 91; Wilson v. Lyons (Neb.) 94 N. W. 636, 637; Souders v. Vansickle, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 313, 317.

"Attornment" is the act of recognizing a new landlord. The word comes from a feudal law, where it signifies the transfer by act of the lord with the consent of the tenant of all service, and homage of the tenant to some new lord who had acquired the estate. Willis v. Moore, 59 Tex. 628, 636, 46 Am. Rep. 284.

Attornment is an acknowledgment or agreement by the tenant that the freehold is in another, or that such person is his landlord. Foster v. Morris, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 610, 611, 13 Am. Dec. 205.

AUCTION.

See "Dutch Auction."

An auction is a public sale of property to the highest bidder by one licensed and authorized for that purpose. Russell v. Miner (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 534, 539.

An auction is a sale by consecutive bidding, intended to reach the highest price of the article by exciting competition for it. By the usual practice the buyers successively bid more and more till the highest point is attained. The same result is obtained by the process in vogue in Holland by proposing the articles at prices successively lower till a purchaser is found at its outside value. Hibler v. Hoag (Pa.) 1 Watts & S. 552, 553.

An auction is a public competitive sale at which it is a part of the auctioneer's engagement to invite and excite competition of bidding and to dispose of the property to the highest bidder. This practice is said to have originated with the Romans, who gave it the descriptive name of "auctio," an increase, because the offered property was sold to him who would offer the most for it. This method of sale was established by the Romans for the disposal of military spoils, and was conducted sub hasta; that is, under the spear. On such occasions the spear was stuck in the ground. This practice has passed away as to the spear, but the method of sale by auction continues. At a later day another mode of sale by auction came into practice called "the sale by the candle," or "by the inch of candle." The origin of this expression arose from the use of candles as a means of measuring time. It was declared the goods would be continued to be offered to bidders for so long a time only as would suffice for the burning of one inch of candle. When the measure was wasted to that extent the highest bidder was then declared to be the purchaser. 3 P. Cyc. Still another method of auction sale is practiced in modern times. This one is called a "Dutch auction," indicating the local origin of the practice. This method consists in the public offer of the property at a price beyond its value and then gradually lowering the price until some one becomes the purchaser. 3 P. Cyc. At auction the bidders fix by competition the price at which the offered property is sold. This competition is an element of each offer and each bid. Into each of the methods named competition is a necessary element in the offer, the bid, and the act of selling the offered property. In the Dutch method the person wishing to buy can, at any time while the article is offered for sale, accept the auctioneer's offer, claim the property at that price, and close the sale thereof. Crandall v. State, 28 Ohio St. 479, 481.

In a notice of sale under a foreclosure the words "at public auction for cash to the highest bidder" are sufficient to convey the meaning that a sale will be had, without being preceded by the words "will be sold." Nau v. Brunette, 48 N. W. 649, 650, 79 Wis. 664.

Where a private bargain is made beforehand between the party who wishes to buy and the person authorized to sell, as to the price and other incidents of a contract that the forms of a public sale with competition are invoked to give effect to a private bargain does not constitute a public auction. Porter v. Graves, 104 U. S. 171, 174, 26 L. Ed. 691.

There can be no legal auction if no one is present but the auctioneer. Campbell v. Swan (N. Y.) 48 Barb. 109, 113.

A city ordinance provided that before "any person shall proceed to sell at public auction" merchandise of any class whatsoever he shall first obtain a license for an auction. Held, that such phrase was intended to refer to the person who has goods which he is seeking to have sold by auction, and did not apply to the auctioneer or person by whom such goods were to be sold at public vendue. Fretwell v. City of Troy, 18 Kan. 271, 276.

A "sale at auction" is a sale to the highest bidder, its object a fair price, and its means competition; and hence any agreement to stifle competition is a fraud, and not only vitiates the contract, so that the parties thereto can claim nothing from each other, but also any purchase made under it. Kine v. Turner, 41 Pac. 664, 665, 27 Or. 356.

"Auction sales" are within both private and public consideration. They are the means of converting things into money under urgent circumstances, of settling estates of deceased persons, and the like, so that the interest both of the individual and of the public requires them to be conducted with freedom and fairness, and agreements con-travelling these interests are void. Clark v. Stanhope, 59 S. W. 856, 858, 109 Ky. 521 (quoting Bish. Cont. § 528).

"Auction sale," as used in a statute requiring an assessor's certificate to state that lands were assessed at the cash value thereof and not at the price it would sell for at forced or auction sale, is not equivalent to "forced sale." A forced sale is not necessarily an auction sale, and an auction sale is not necessarily a forced sale. Dickison v. Reynolds, 12 N. W. 24, 25, 48 Mich. 158.

A sale by auction is a sale by public outcry to the highest bidder on the spot. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1792; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2410; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 3989, 3990; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 1341, 1342.

The sale by auction is that which takes place when the thing is offered publicly to be sold to whoever will give the highest price. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2601.

A sale by auction is complete when the auctioneer publicly announces by the fall of his hammer or in any other customary manner that the thing is sold. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 3989, 3990; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 1341, 1342.

Outcry synonymous.

The word "outcry," as used in Act April 2, 1830, imposing a penalty on hawkers and peddlers selling goods by outcry, is synonymous with "auction." Hibler v. Hoag (Pa.) 1 Watts & S. 552, 553.

AUCTION POOLS.

"Auction pools," is a term used to designate a method of gambling on horse races, which is conducted as follows: "A certain number of horses are entered to run at a certain race, to be held at a certain time and place. Any person desiring to invest money in a pool or race offers to the auctioneer a certain amount of money for the choice or selection of a horse which he supposes will be the winner of the race. A number of bids may be offered for the first choice. The person offering the highest amount obtains the first choice or selection of the horse which he supposes will be the winner, which horse he then and there names. The amount then and there offered for the first choice is then and there deposited in the hands of the parties conducting the pools. The amounts so deposited for each choice are added together, and each person so depositing his money on his choice receives a card or receipt for the same, showing the horse or horses selected, the amount so deposited, and the total amount in the pool. The money in the pool (less the commission of 5 per cent. to the person or persons conducting the pool) is paid to the person having selected the winning horse in the race, upon presentation of the card or receipt." James v. State, 63 Md. 242, 248.

AUCTIONEER.

The word "auctioneer" is sometimes used to designate the crier who simply calls for bids and strikes the bargain at an auction sale. His connection with the sale may begin with calling for bids and end with striking the bargain. White v. Dahlquist Mfg. Co., 60 N. E. 791, 792, 179 Mass. 427.

A city ordinance, providing that any person desiring to exercise the office or calling of an auctioneer shall first procure a license therefor, means any person by whom the outcry of the sale of goods at public vendue is made. Fretwell v. City of Troy, 18 Kan. 271, 276.

An auctioneer is a person who conducts a public competitive sale. He is supposed to adopt the occupation as a business and mode of acquiring pecuniary gain to himself, and the government demands a sum of money for the right to the exclusion of other persons from exercising the occupation. Crandall v. State, 28 Ohio St. 479, 481.

A person is an auctioneer, within a statute requiring a license, though he ask no compensation for his services in making the sale. State v. Rucker, 24 Mo. 557, 559.

The mere fact that defendant's name appeared in a catalogue of goods to be sold at auction as the auctioneer was not an indication of agency, so as to relieve him from personal responsibility for acts and conduct during the sale, his character as agent not being indicated to the purchaser in any other way; it being very old law that an auctioneer who sells without at the time of sale disclosing the name of his principal contracts in his own name. Franklyn v. La-mond, 4 C. B. 636, 644.

An auctioneer is one who sells goods at auction. "An auctioneer has a possession coupled with an interest in goods which he is employed to sell, not a bare custody like a servant or shopman. There is no difference whether the sale be on the premises of the owner of the goods, or in a public auction room, an actual possession is given to the auctioneer and his servants by the owner, and not merely an authority to sell. I have said possession coupled with an interest, but an auctioneer has also a special property in him, with a lien for the charges of the sale, the commission, and the auction duty which he is bound to pay." Williams v. Millington, 1 H. Bl. 81, 83.

The business of an auctioneer is to sell by public outcry the property of others on an agreement expressed or implied that he shall receive for his labor and skill a just compensation. City of Philadelphia v. Hunt (Pa.) 3 Phila. 440, 441.

An "auctioneer" is defined by Webster as "a person who sells at auction," and an "auction" as "a public sale of property to the highest bidder by one licensed and authorized for that purpose." The services, therefore, which an auctioneer, as such, performs, are selling property at public sale to the highest bidder. All else is beyond his mere calling as auctioneer, and it is only for services as auctioneer that the compensation is given by 1 Rev. St. (Edmonds' Ed.) 493, fixing the amount of an auctioneer's compensation for his services in the absence of an agreement. Russell v. Miner (N. Y.) 5 Lans. 537, 539.

As affected by ownership of goods.

Any one who sells goods at public auction is an auctioneer, and the question of the ownership of the goods has nothing to do with the occupation, so that a person who sells his own goods as well as one who sells the goods of another is an auctioneer. City of Goshen v. Kern, 63 Ind. 468, 469, 30 Am. Rep. 234.

As agent of both parties.

An auctioneer is an agent acting for both buyer and seller. Simon v. Motivos, 3 Burr. 1921; Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East. 558, 572.

An auctioneer may be considered as the agent and witness of both parties, and under Statute of Frauds, § 17, he cannot bind one of the parties by his signature, the statute requiring such signature to be by a third person, and not by the other contracting party. Farebrother v. Simmons, 5 Barn. & Ald. 333.

As agent of buyer or seller.

An auctioneer is the duly authorized agent of a buyer, so that his signing a contract for the purchase of real estate on behalf of the highest bidder is a sufficient compliance with the statute of frauds, as is also the entering the name of the buyer in the auctioneer's book. White v. Proctor, 4 Taunt. 209, 212.

An auctioneer is an agent of the seller of the goods, and for certain purposes he is deemed the agent of both the seller and buyer, as by knocking down the goods sold to the highest bidder, and inserting his name in a book as such, he is considered the agent of both parties. Thomas v. Kerr (Ky.) 3 Bush. 619, 621, 96 Am. Dec. 262.

"An actioneer is the agent of the seller in making the sale; when, however, the property is struck off, he becomes also the agent of the purchaser to the extent of binding both parties by his memorandum of sale. Up to this point his duty is to the vendor." Randall v. Lautenberger, 16 R. I. 159, 13 Atl. 100. The fact, undisclosed to bidders, that an auctioneer, officiating at a judicial sale, is a party to the action and interested in the property sold, renders the sale voidable at the option of the purchaser, though no actual fraud or bad faith is shown, and though the auctioneer's interest was only that of tenant by the curtesy. Smith v. Harrigan, 27 Abb. N. C. 322, 323, 15 N. Y. Supp. 852, 853.

An auctioneer is the agent of the person who employs him to sell. From the nature of his business he is the agent of the buyer for the single purpose of binding him by a memorandum in writing to satisfy the statute of frauds, but in all other respects he is the agent of the seller. Curtis v. Aspinwall, 114 Mass. 187, 195, 19 Am. Rep. 332.

An auctioneer in the ordinary discharge of his duties is only an agent to sell, and when selling for a marshal at a judicial sale he acts only as a special agent of the marshal, without any authority, express or implied, to go beyond the single act of selling the goods, and the marshal has no officer to execute the orders of the court has no authority in his official character to do any act that shall expressly or impliedly bind any one by warranty. The Monte Allegro, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat. 616) 616, 644, 645, 6 L. Ed. 174.

Broker or jobber distinguished.

An "auctioneer" differs from a "broker" in that the latter both buys and sells, while an auctioneer only sells. By a charter of Henry VII, the business of selling by auction was confined to an officer called an "out-roper," and all other persons were prohibited from selling goods or merchandise by public outcry. But long before, and at that time, brokers exercised their trade, so that the two characters were different at that time. Wilkes v. Ellis, 2 H. Bl. 555, 557.

An "auctioneer" does not purchase goods at all, but sells the goods of others for a commission. He differs from a "jobber," who is a merchant who purchases goods from importers and sells to retailers. Steward v. Winters (N. Y.) 4 Sandf. Ch. 587, 590.

As limited to selling.

An auctioneer is a person who sells at auction to the highest bidder, hence a statute fixing the compensation of auctioneers relates only to their services in selling the property; anything further will not come within the meaning of the term "auctioneer." Russell v. Miner (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 534, 539.

As trading person.

AUDIT.

"The word 'audit' means to examine and adjust." Maddox v. Randolph County, 65 Ga. 216, 218; People v. Orleans County Sup'rs, 38 N. Y. Supp. 890, 891; People v. Barnes (N. Y.) 44 Hun, 574, 576; In re Murphy (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 592, 594 (affirmed in 86 N. Y. 627); People v. Board of Sup'rs of Jef- erson County, 54 N. Y. Supp. 782, 784; Morris v. People (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 381, 391.

To audit is to examine an account, compare it with the vouchers, adjust the same, and to state the balance, by persons legally authorized for the purpose. It is not a judicial act. Machias River Co. v. Pope, 35 Me. 19, 22.

The word "audit" in its technical sense means to examine, to pass upon. It is in this sense that the word is used in Rev. Code, § 506, making it the duty of the ordinary to audit all claims against the respective counties. The party presenting the claim need not use the word "audit," it is sufficient if he presents it for that purpose, and the ordinary examines it and refuses to allow it; that is, refuses to audit it and approve it, but rejects and disallows it. If a party shows that this has been done, he has a right to sue in court on the claim. Cobb County v. Adams, 68 Ga. 51, 53.

To audit an account is to examine and digest it, or examine and verify it, or examine and adjust it. In actual practice to audit an account is to see that the accountant is charged with everything with which he is justly chargeable, and that nothing is placed on the credit side of the account for which he is not justly entitled to credit; and then, after the debit and credit are thus made up, to ascertain the balance remaining in his hands. In re Heath's Estate, 33 Atl. 46, 47, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 807.

In a statute requiring the necessary expenses of witnesses to be audited by the proper executive department, the word "audit" does not necessarily imply that these expenses must be audited in the first instance by an executive department or officer. The statute fixes the amount to be allowed for attendance and mileage to witnesses entitled to compensation; therefore the auditing contemplated must be done primarily in the court in which the case is pending. Sanborn v. United States, 10 Sup. Ct. 812, 816, 135 U. S. 271, 34 L. Ed. 112.

Defendant was convicted under a statute providing that a public officer holding or discharging the duties of any office, a part of whose duty it is to audit or take part in auditing, allowing, or paying claims or demands upon the state, who knowingly audits, allows, or pays, or directly or indirectly consents to the auditing, allowance, or payment of any claim which is false and fraudulent, or which contains charges or items which are false or fraudulent, is guilty of a felony. Defendant had manufactured the claim, and it was insisted that he was not guilty, because the manufacturer of a false claim could not be said to be auditing in any sense of the word. Defendant's contention was held to be fallacious, the court saying: "Upon a sensible view of the statute it must be held to include within its fair intent a case where an official charged with the duty to audit a valid claim intentionally makes unlawful use of his official signature and seal to give a deceptive value to any fraudulent demand upon the public funds." State v. Bourne, 90 N. W. 1105, 1106, 86 Minn. 426.

An audit is an examination in general; an examination of accounts, comparing the charges with the vouchers. To audit charges in bills rendered does not simply mean to determine their amount in the sense of binding the other party. Upon such auditing a bill will be approved or rejected, and on an auditing by municipal authorities a rejection would not preclude recovery, if the claimant had a meritorious cause of action. Clement v. City of Lewiston, 53 Atl. 984, 985, 97 Me. 95.

Claims ex contractu.

An audit is an examination and adjustment of bills and claims on contract. Cavan v. City of Brooklyn, 5 N. Y. Supp. 758, 759.

Municipal Corporation Act, § 864 (St. 1883, p. 266), declares that all demands against a city or town of the sixth class shall be presented and audited by the board of trustees, etc. Held, that the term "audit" was not applicable to demands arising from torts. Adams v. City of Modesto, 131 Cal. 501, 502, 63 Pac. 1083.

"Audit" applies only to claims ex contractu and not to claims for unliquidated damages for injuries, and was used with such meaning in Code, § 757, providing that no person shall sue any city unless the claim is first presented to be audited and allowed. Shields v. Town of Durham, 24 S. E. 794, 118 N. C. 450, 36 L. R. A. 293.

In Code, § 1733, providing that the board of directors of a district township shall audit and allow all just claims against the district, "audit" refers to claims arising on contract, and means, the comparison of the claim with the vouchers. A claim for personal injuries against a town is not one arising in the course of business, and is not the subject of county audit in the proper sense of the word. The examination of such a claim may, and usually would, require the aid of experts and other means of determination which would render the examination inconsistent with the idea of an audit of the claim. Green v. Incorporated Town of Spencer, 25 N. W. 681, 67 Iowa, 410.

Disallowance or reduction.

Laws 1873, c. 593, § 2, declaring that the expenses of the examination of any insurance company shall be borne by the company after being approved by the superintendent of the insurance and audited by the controller, means that the controller should make an examination for the purpose of seeing whether the preliminary steps had been taken, and he had no power arbitrarily either to increase, decrease, or reject the bill. In re Murphy (N. Y.) 60 How. Prac. 258, 259.

"Audit," as used in Laws 1863, c. 172, § 2, providing that the board of town auditors shall audit the accounts of the commissioners of highways for all moneys received and disbursed by them by virtue of their offices, means to hear or to examine an account, and in its broader sense includes adjustment, allowance, or disallowance or rejection; and hence, where bills for the expenditures of the commissioners of highways were presented to the board of town auditors, and examined by them, and decided to be not legal liabilities of the town, and rejected, such bills were audited by the auditors within the meaning of the statute. People v. Barnes, 20 N. E. 609, 610, 114 N. Y. 317.

In its broad sense "audit" means to hear, examine, and determine a claim, by its allowance or disallowance or rejection in toto or in part, so that the examination and consideration of all the items of a claim constitutes an audit, though some items may be allowed and others rejected. People v. Orleans County Sup'rs, 38 N. Y. Supp. 890, 891, 60 Misc. Rep. 213.

"Audit," as applied to the action of a board of town auditors, means to hear and examine. It includes both the adjustment or allowance or the disallowance or reduction of an account. People v. Town Board of Salina, 50 N. Y. Supp. 533, 535, 27 App. Div. 476.

Hearing imported.

The auditing of a claim signifies a hearing on examination, and includes its adjustment or disallowance or rejection. People v. Board of Town Auditors, 28 N. Y. Supp. 122, 124, 74 Hun, 83.

Laws 1874, c. 323, declared that, in all proceedings before the Governor for the removal of any county officer on charges preferred against him, all the costs and charges thereof shall be a county charge upon the county, which shall be audited by the board of supervisors. Held, that "audit" meant that the board of supervisors shall examine all accounts relative to the matter, comparing the charges with the vouchers, examine parties and witnesses, allow or reject charges, and state the balance. People v. Oneida County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 413, 419.

To audit implies to hear, and upon the hearing to adjust or to allow or to reject or otherwise decide according to the nature of the claim. Territory v. Grant, 21 Pac. 693, 3 Wyo. 241.

It is not an "audit" by a town board, where, without allowing or disallowing any specific item charged in the account, and without deciding that any definite or particular days were not spent in the services of the town, they arbitrarily cut down the bill to suit their own notions. The auditors must perform their duties by passing specifically upon the specified charges; their correction must be, not an arbitrary guess at the gross sum, but an actual audit of the amount presented. People v. Town Auditor of Elmira, 82 N. Y. 80, 83.

Judicial discretion implied.

As used in Laws 1892, conferring power on supervisors to annually audit all accounts and charges against the county, "audit" means simply to examine or to adjust, and clearly implies the exercise of judicial discretion. People v. Jefferson County Sup'rs, 54 N. Y. Supp. 782, 784, 35 App. Div. 239 (citing In re Murphy [N. Y.] 24 Hun, 592, which is affirmed in 86 N. Y. 627).

"Audit," as used in St. 1841, p. 267, § 4, providing that the supervisors shall audit and allow the account of associate judges for the arrears of salary, etc., means to hear, examine, adjust, pass upon, and settle the account. It matters not whether the duty was difficult or easy; in its nature it required the exercise of judgment. Morris v. People (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 381, 391. "Audit" means "to hear, examine, adjust, pass upon, and settle the account; * * * in its nature it requires the exercise of judgment." In re Clark (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 853, 854 (citing Morris v. People [N. Y.] 3 Denio, 391).

In a statute providing that claims against a town should be presented to the board of town auditors for audit and to be certified by the board of supervisors, "audit" means to examine and pass upon the claim, and imports the exercise of judgment, thus vesting a discretion in the board of auditors. People v. Barnes (N. Y.) 44 Hun, 574, 576.

To audit a claim ex vi termini embraces the exercise of judgment. People v. Board of Apportionment and Audit, 52 N. Y. 224, 227.

Reasonable time for examination authorized.

"Audit" implies an examination and consideration, so that a reasonable time must be allowed after the presentation of a claim to the county commissioners in which they will audit the claim before an action can be brought for refusing to allow the claim. Board of Com'rs of Rio Grande County v. Bloom, 59 Pac. 417, 419, 14 Colo. App. 187.

As verify.

"Audit" means to make an audit of, examine, and verify by reference to vouchers, as an account or accounts, as to audit the accounts of a treasurer; and as used in a contract providing that certain estimates of work done, furnished by the engineers, shall be audited by the company, does not mean to examine, measure, and compute the work, but to examine and compare the estimates and vouchers with previous estimates, vouchers, and payments made thereof. Ford v. Springer Land Ass'n, 41 Pac. 541, 550, 8 N. M. 37.

"Audit" means to examine, settle, and adjust accounts; to verify the accuracy of the statements submitted to the auditing officer or body. The term is confined to the investigation of "accounts," the examination and allowance of which is termed "auditing." People v. Green (N. Y.) 5 Daly, 194, 200.

To audit an account is to examine and ascertain whether it is accurate, and such is its use in Laws 1893, c. 568, as amended by Laws 1891, c. 291, providing that the board of estimate and apportionment was authorized to audit and allow claims for advertising notices, etc. People v. Gilroy, 31 N. Y. Supp. 776, 780, 82 Hun, 500.

AUDITA QUERELA.

"Audita querela" is a writ to be delivered against an unjust judgment or execution by setting it aside for some injustice of the party that obtained it, which could not be pleaded in bar to the action. Longworth v. Screven (S. C.) 2 Hill, 298, 299, 27 Am. Dec. 381; Hopkins v. Hayward, 34 Vt. 474, 477; Scott v. Larkin, 13 Vt. 112, 114; Griswold v. Town of Rutland, 23 Vt. 324, 326; Town of Poultney v. State Treasurer, 25 Vt. 168, 170; Wardell v. Eden (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 258, 261; McLean v. Bindley, 114 Pa. 559, 8 Atl. 1, 2; Fischer v. Johnson, 74 Mo. App. 64, 68.

"Audita querela" is a summary proceeding against a judgment of a court when it is clear that new matter arising after judgment is of such a nature that the judgment ought not to be executed. Wetmore v. Law, (N. Y.) 34 Barb. 515, 517.

The writ of audita querela is a commencement of a suit at common law, recognized also by statute, in which plaintiff asks to be relieved from a judgment or execution or both, by reason of some matter affecting their validity which he has not had an opportunity to plead. Foss v. Witham, 91 Mass. 572.

The writ of audita querela was anciently the mode of obtaining relief against judgments, either by a party to the record upon matter which he could not have pleaded, or by strangers. So late as 1824 it was said by Best, J., that it was neither an obsolete or difficult proceeding. 2 Bing. 41. But it has been superseded to a very great extent, if not entirely, in our state, by a motion to vacate the judgment, upon which, whenever the question offered is not clear, an issue may be directed. Kendall v. Hodgins, 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Bosw.) 659, 665.

The writ of audita querela in England was a form of action which lies for a defendant to recall or prevent an execution on account of some matter occurring after judgment, amounting to a discharge. One of the characters of the suit was that its venue was of the court issuing the execution, its province was to deal with its own judgment, and the Legislature of Georgia, in adopting the illegality proceeding, seems to confine the office of illegality to executions and judgments issuing out of and returnable to the courts, and by express provision of law requires the illegality to be returned by the levying officer to the court from which it was issued. Manning v. Phillips, 65 Ga. 548, 550.

"An audita querela is an equitable action which lies for a person who either is in execution or in danger of being so on a judgment, when he has matter to show that such execution ought not to have issued or should not issue against him, and is of a most remedial nature, and seems to have been invented lest in any case there should be an oppressive defect of justice when the party has a good defense, but had not, nor has any, other means to take advantage of it." Stanford v. Barry (Vt.) 1 Aik. 321, 323, 15 Am. Dec. 692.

The writ of audita querela is a common-law writ which is recognized by statute as an existing remedy. Pub. St. c. 186, §§ 1-6. By section 3 the cause is to be heard by the court on any issue of law or fact, and such judgment is to be rendered as law and justice shall require. As was said of the earliest statute on this subject in this commonwealth (St. 1780, c. 47), the present statute "has left the cases in which it is a suitable remedy to be determined by rules and precedents at common law." Lovejoy v. Webber, 10 Mass. 101. In the case above cited the writ was held to be a suitable remedy where the debtor, after service of an original writ upon him, and before its return, satisfied the demand, and the creditor afterwards entered the action, recovered judgment, and caused his execution to be levied on the debtor's property. See, also, Thatcher v. Gammon, 12 Mass. 268, 270. So, where one of two judgment debtors pays the judgment, and the execution, instead of being returned satisfied, is returned unsatisfied, and an alias execution is taken out on which the other debtor is arrested. Brackett v. Winslow, 17 Mass. 153. So, where the execution calls for a larger sum than is authorized by the judgment. Stone v. Chamberlain, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 206. So, if the judgment debtor resides out of the commonwealth, and the creditor, having obtained judgment by default, takes out execution within one year thereafter, without first giving bond, as required by law. Radelyffe v. Barton, 161 Mass. 327, 330, 37 N. E. 373 (citing Dingman v. Myers, 79 Mass. [13 Gray] 1; Barker v. Walsh, 96 Mass. [14 Allen] 172; Barrett v. Vaughan, 6 Vt. 243; Avery v. United States, 79 U. S. [12 Wall.] 304, 20 L. Ed. 405; Com. Dig. "Audita Querela," C).

A writ of audita querela is of a remedial nature, and is said to have been invented principally to relieve a party who has a good defense, but is too late to make it in the ordinary form of proceeding. The practice of the courts in granting summary relief on motion has almost rendered it useless and unnecessary in modern times. In Massachusetts this form of proceeding still remains in practice, and has the direct sanction of legislative authority. Rev. St. c. 112. From the nature of the writ it indicates a proceeding in a case which has been the subject of a judicial decision or judgment in a court of law, and where defendant in the original suit will be unjustly deprived of his right if the judgment or execution is allowed to be treated as valid. Coffin v. Ewer, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 228, 230, 231.

"Audita querela" is a judicial writ. Formerly it was issued only in discretion, but afterwards was sued out of chancery; but it must always be to the court having the record. Its purpose is to set aside a judgment or execution, and consequently, like error, certiorari, and other judicial writs, it must be between the parties to the former proceeding. Gleason v. Peck, 12 Vt. 56, 59, 38 Am. Dec. 329.

"Audita querela" does not lie to set aside an execution issued in pursuance of a decree of the court of chancery. Garfield v. Vermont University, 10 Vt. 536.

"Audita querela" is not available where the injury of which the plaintiff complains is attributable to his own neglect, nor to correct an error of the court in rendering the judgment. Walter v. Foss, 32 Atl. 643, 67 Vt. 591.

"Audita querela" cannot be sustained for error in law or in fact. Sutton v. Tyrrell, 10 Vt. 87, 89.

The writ of audita querela, though authorized by statute, is derived from the common law, and is governed by the rules of the common law as to its proceedings, mode of trial, rendition, and effect of final judgment. Johnson v. Plimpton, 30 Vt. 420, 422.

AUDITOR.

An auditor is one authorized to examine accounts, compare charges with vouchers, examine parties and witnesses, allow and reject charges, and state a balance. People v. Oneida County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 413, 419.

An auditor is a person appointed and authorized to audit or examine an account or accounts, compare the charges with the vouchers, examine the parties and witnesses, allow or reject charges, and state the balance. Sawyer v. Mayhew, 71 N. W. 141, 142, 10 S. D. 18.

Comptroller synonymous.

The words "auditor" and "comptroller," as used in the Constitution and statutes of the states of the Union, are synonymous. State v. Doron, 5 Nev. 399, 413.

Const. 1872, art. 14, § 1, declares that county officers shall consist of sheriffs, coroners, prothonotaries, registers of wills, recorders of deeds, commissioners, treasurers, surveyors, auditors or controllers, clerks of the courts, district attorneys, and such others as may from time to time be established by law. Held that, by the fair import of the language, "auditors or controllers," in the connection in which it is used with other official titles, admits of but one construction, which is that it assumes that each substantially exercises the same powers and performs the same duties, and when those duties are coextensive with the county by whichever name the officer performing them may be designated, they shall be county officers. Taggart v. Commonwealth, 102 Pa. 354, 364.

Of county.

As judicial officer, see "Judicial Officer."

Of courts.

The term "Auditor" is often used to designate an officer whose duties are properly those of a master. Blain v. Patterson, 48 N. H. 151, 152.

A person appointed in an action at law in cases where a preliminary or tentative investigation becomes a necessity is ordinarily designated as an "auditor," while in proceedings in equity, the designation is that of "master." Fenno v. Primrose (U. S.) 119 Fed. 801, 804, 58 C. C. A. 313.

"An auditor is an officer either at law or in equity assigned to state the items of debit and credit between the parties and exhibit the balance." Whitwell v. Willard, 43 Mass. (1 Metc.) 216-218; Fisk v. Gray, 100 Mass. 191, 193.

"Auditor" is a term which designates an agent or officer of the court who examines and digests accounts for the decision of the court. He does not decree, but prepares materials on which a decree may be made. Field v. Holland, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 8, 21, 3 L. Ed. 136; Whitehead v. Perle, 15 Tex. 7, 11.

St. 1817, c. 96, § 25, provides that, whenever a cause is at issue, and it shall appear that the trial will require an investigation of accounts or an examination of vouchers by the jury, the court may appoint one or more auditors to hear the parties, and examine their vouchers and evidence, and state the account, and make report thereof to the court. Held, that such auditors "are not the same as auditors in an action of account at common law. They are the same only in name. The powers of the one are by no means the measure of the powers of the other. In the words of the statute, they are to hear the parties, in the most general terms. They are to hear them as to everything, without limit, and without restriction, bearing upon the matter which they have in charge, and the duty which they have to perform; that is, taking and stating an account. They are to hear them upon everything material in relation to the account; everything proper to be considered in deciding upon the merits of the claims of the respective parties. They are not only to examine vouchers, but evidence in relation to all questions arising in the investigation of accounts." Locke v. Bennett, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 445, 449.

A person or persons called in by the court to hear matters of detail which the court has not time to hear, and to inform the conscience of the court as to facts which are essential to be known before a particular judgment or decree can be pronounced. A peculiar example of the jurisdiction of an auditor is in the determination of an executor's accounts, for the executor, instead of paying the funds over at his own risk, may bring the assets into court for distribution, and then the court, instead of going into a minute settlement of his accounts and into all those questions which may affect distribution, refers the whole matter to auditors for hearing and determination in strict analogy to references of a chancellor to a master. Appeal of Miller, 30 Pa. (6 Casey) 478, 490.

"Auditors" are instruments of the court by which the law is administered. They are appointed without the consent of the party, and their decisions are subject to review by the court. Read v. Barlow (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 145, 147.

It is immaterial on a writ of inquiry by what name a person is designated to whom the question of damages is referred, whether it be by the name of auditor, which is not unusual, or assessor, as he is sometimes designated in some of the states, or master, as may perhaps be the more appropriate designation. The name is immaterial, the duties being the same, namely, to investigate the damages sustained by the plaintiff and the cause of action, and to report thereon for the information of the court. Price v. Dearborn, 34 N. H. 481, 486.

Of state.

"Auditor," as used in Const. art. 6, § 2, declaring that the Secretary of State shall, by virtue of his office, be auditor of public accounts, cannot be construed as conferring any judicial power on him, so that his determination of a claim would be as binding upon the parties as the judgment of a court.

Abbott defines the power of an auditor of public accounts as "an officer of government whose function it is to examine, verify, and approve or report accounts of persons who have had the disbursements of government moneys, or have furnished supplies for government use." Burrill's definition of the term "auditor" is this: "An officer or person whose business is to examine and verify accounts of persons entrusted with money. A person appointed to examine a particular account, and state or certify the result, in doing which he is said to audit the account." "The office of public auditor is to be found in the administrative department in every organization of government, and, even where he is empowered to act upon his official judgment, his functions are only quasi judicial." State v. Brown, 10 Or. 215, 220.

"Auditor," as used in Const. art. 6, § 2, describing the duties of the Secretary of State, and declaring that he shall be ex officio auditor, signifies an officer whose business is to examine and certify accounts and claims against the state, and to keep an account between the state and its treasurer. State v. Hastings, 10 Wis. 525, 530.

A state auditor is an officer of the state connected with its fiscal operations. The taxes, after the rate is prescribed by the Legislature, are to be levied by him. Auditor v. Treasurer, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 311, 312.

AUGMENTATION.

The term "augmentation" is defined to mean the act of increasing or making larger by addition, expansion, or dilation; the act of adding to or enlarging. Vejar v. Mound City Land & Water Ass'n, 97 Cal. 659, 663, 32 Pac. 713, 715.

AUNT.

Where a will provided that "my Aunt C. and my cousins [naming seven persons] shall take an equal share" in certain real estate, the word "aunt" and the word "cousins" will be regarded as merely descriptive of the persons named for the purpose of identification, and not as indicating a class. Moffett v. Elmendorf, 46 N. E. 845, 847, 152 N. Y. 475, 57 Am. St. Rep. 529.

AURA EPILEPTICA.

"Aura epileptica" is a term used to designate the sensation of a cold vapor frequently experienced by epileptics before the loss of consciousness occurs in an epileptic fit. Aurentz v. Anderson, 3 Pittsb. R. (Pa.) 310, 311.

AUTHENTIC.

"Authentic," as used in Rev. St. p. 208, c. 22, § 69, providing that every person who shall falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit any record or other authentic matter of a public nature, shall be deemed guilty of forgery, means vested with all due formality and legally attested; and hence a filing book, which was merely a probate judge's memorandum book, and not required by law to be kept, being merely a convenient book of reference in which entries were made generally by the probate judge, purporting to give the names of certain persons who had made applications for lots, was not an authentic matter of a public nature. Downing v. Brown, 3 Colo. 571, 590.

Under Spanish jurisprudence the "authentic interpretation of laws" is that given by the legislator himself, who alone has authority to resolve the doubts and fix the sense of words, and whose decision is obligatory on citizens and tribunals and must be obeyed, both within and without courts of justice. Houston v. Robertson's Adm'r, 2 Tex. 1, 28 (citing Diccionario de Legislacion, p. 316).

AUTHENTICATE—AUTHENTICATION.

See "Legally Authenticated"; "Properly Authenticated."

"Authenticate" is defined by Webster "to render authentic, to give authority to or proof, attestation or formality required by law as sufficient to entitle to credit"; in Bouvier's Dictionary as "the proper or legal attestation, or acts done with a view of executing an instrument to be known and identified"; and in Burrill's Dictionary as "the act or mode of giving legal authority to a statute, record, or other legal instrument or certified copy thereof, so as to render it legally admissible in evidence." There is no inherent meaning in the word which requires the authentication to be in writing. The words "properly and legally authenticated so as to entitle them to be received in evidence," in a statute requiring such authentication of certain papers, must be construed as if the expression were "so properly and legally authenticated as to entitle"; that is, "so properly and legally authenticated that they would be entitled to be," etc. In re Fowler (U. S.) 4 Fed. 303, 310.

In legal parlance "authenticate" means vested with all due formalities and legally attested, and cannot apply to a memorandum book kept by a probate judge which he is not required to keep. Downing v. Brown, 3 Colo. 571, 590.

The word "authenticate," as applied to the certification of a check, is not a definite signification as forming part of the certification. United States v. Potter (U. S.) 56 Fed. 83, 92.

"Authenticate" means to give verity, to impart to the instrument its validity and operative effect. Until an ordinary deed has been signed, sealed, and delivered, it is totally invalid as a deed, and all of these several acts must concur, or it cannot be said to have been executed and capable of authentication within a statute providing for the attesting and authentication of a deed of a husband and wife. Hartley v. Ferrell, 9 Fla. 374, 380.

"The authentication of a written instrument is such official attestation as will render it legally admissible in evidence." Mayfield v. Sears, 32 N. E. 816, 133 Ind. 86.

"Authentication" of any document is that which is certified concerning it by the proper certifying officer. Ordway v. Conroe, 4 Wis. 45, 50.

AUTHOR.

An "author" is defined to be one "who produces, creates, or brings into being; the beginner, former, or first mover of anything; hence the efficient cause of a thing." The term is especially applicable to one who composes or writes a book or writing, and, in a more general sense, to one who occupies his time composing or writing books or writings. Leidersdorf v. Flint (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 260, 261.

An author may be said to be the creator or inventor both of the ideas contained in his book, and the combination of words to represent them. Stowe v. Thomas (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 201, 206.

The term "author" is used in the copyright laws to designate the person who primarily develops a mental production by means of a series of written or printed words arranged for an intelligent purpose in an orderly succession of expressive combinations. Keene v. Wheatley (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 180, 192.

"Author," as used in a statute protecting the works of an author, includes originating, making, producing, as the inventor or master mind, the thing which is to be protected, whether it be a drawing, painting, or photograph. Nottage v. Jackson, 11 Q. B. Div. 627, 637; Foulk v. Donaldson (U. S.) 57 Fed. 32, 34; Courier Lithographing Co. v. Donaldson Lithographing Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 993, 995, 44 C. C. A. 296.

"Author," as used in the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to secure for a limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, includes photographers who contrive artistic posing, costuming, etc. Burrow-Giles Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 4 Sup. Ct. 279, 280, 111 U. S. 53, 28 L. Ed. 349.

As used in a statute conferring copyrights on authors, the person who forms the plan and scheme of the work and pays different artists of his own selection, who on certain conditions contribute to the work, is the author and proprietor of the work within the equitable meaning of the term. The words "author" and "inventor" are said to be synonymous. Shepherd v. Conquest, 17 C. B. 427, 443.

When a person submits himself or herself as a public character to a photographer for the taking of a negative and the making of photographs therefrom for the photographer, the negative and the right to make photographs from it belong to the photographer, and he is the author and proprietor of the photograph within the meaning of the copyright laws. Press Pub. Co. v. Falk (U. S.) 59 Fed. 324, 326.

Of book.

One who originates a new and original combination of materials, and produces a book which exhibits a substantial and original system of arranging material, is an author. Bullinger v. Mackey (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 649, 653.

The term "author" does not apply to a person who hires another to write a book and gives him the description and scope of the work, but applies to the literary man who writes the book and prepares it for publication. De Witt v. Brooks (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 575.

Of judicial headnotes and statements.

Rev. St. § 4952 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3406], providing that any citizen of the United States or resident therein, who shall be the "author or proprietor" of a book, shall have the sole liberty of printing, publishing, and copying the same, does not apply to a judge who in his judicial capacity prepared headnotes and statements of the case for his opinions, so as to confer on such judge the right to convey a title by assignment to such headnotes and statements to any other person sufficient to entitle such person to a copyright as the assignee of the author or proprietor. Banks v. Manchester, 9 Sup. Ct. 36, 40, 128 U. S. 244, 32 L. Ed. 425.

Of opera.

An author is one who by his own intellectual labor, applied to the materials of his composition, produces an arrangement or compilation new in itself, and includes one who made many alterations and additions to an original opera and arranged and adapted the music for publication. Atwill v. Ferrett (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 195, 197.

Of power.

The author of a power, as used in the chapter relating to powers, is the person by whom a power is created, whether by grant or devise. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4101; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3405; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 322.

AUTHORSHIP.

Generally speaking, authorship implies that there has been put into the production something meritorious from the author's own mind. But the product embodies the thought of the author as well as the thoughts of others, and would not have found existence in the form presented but for the distinctive individuality of mind from which it sprang. National Tel. News Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co. (U. S.) 119 Fed. 294, 297, 56 C. C. A. 198, 60 L. R. A. 805.

AUTHORITY—AUTHORIZE.

See "Actual Authority"; "Apparent Authority"; "Color of Authority"; "Competent Authority"; "Due Authority"; "Executive Authority"; "Lawful Authority"; "Legally Authorize"; "Legislative Authority"; "Ostensible Authority"; "Parental Authority"; "Specially Authorized"; "Under Authority of Law."

Authority to mortgage, see "Mortgage." Authority to purchase, see "Purchase." Authority to sell, see "Sell." Like authority, see "Like."

"Authority" is (1) legal or rightful power; (5) a precedent, a decision of a court, an official declaration (Webster). Thus where three parties are given joint authority to do an act under the statute providing that words giving joint authority to three or more public officers are considered as giving such an authority to a majority of them, two of such parties are legally and rightfully empowered to do the act. Blevins v. Morledge, 47 Pac. 1068, 1069, 5 Okl. 141.

A quitclaim deed conveyed to an incorporated village and its successors, forever, "to be under the authority and control of its proper council and municipal authority," in conformity with the act of the Legislature of Ohio in that behalf, all the grantor's right and title in certain lands used as burial grounds by the citizens of the village. Held, that the deed should be construed as if it read "grant," etc., "to the incorporated village and its successors [the burying ground described in fee], with the same power of control over it as conferred on the village and its council with respect to this land by the Act of April 3, 1867." Young v. Mahoning County Com'rs (U. S.) 51 Fed. 585, 587.

Rev. St. § 5336 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3624], providing for the punishment of those who conspire to overthrow, put down, or destroy by force the government of the United States, or to levy war against them; or to oppose by force the authority thereof, means the use of force against the government as a government. To constitute an offense, the authority of the government must be opposed; that is to say, force must be brought to resist some positive assertion of authority by the government. A mere violation of law is not enough, there must be an attempt to prevent the actual exercise of authority. Where force was exerted in opposition to a class of persons who had the right to look to the government for protection against such wrongs, and not in opposition to the government while actually engaged in an attempt to afford that protection, the party did not "oppose by force the authority of the United States." Baldwin v. Franks, 7 Sup. Ct. 656, 663, 120 U. S. 678, 82 L. Ed. 766.

"Authorized," in Act May 14, 1874, providing that the parties to a civil suit may submit it to any lawyer authorized to practice in the superior court whenever such case could be submitted to the court for trial, means a person who has been admitted to practice in such court. Campbell v. Fayette Co., 17 Atl. 882, 883, 127 Pa. 86.

The words "authorized, empowered, and directed," as used in an instruction that an agent is one authorized, empowered, and directed by another to transact business which the agent undertakes and agrees to do, do not require express words of authorization or agreement in order to constitute an agency. Crane Co. v. Columbus State Bank (Neb.) 91 N. W. 532.

Where a statute declared that a sheriff's deed should be taken as sufficient evidence of the authority under which the sale was made, the description of the land and the price at which it was purchased, the word "authority" means that, if at the moment of sale he has substantially taken all the steps which the statute prescribed as a condition precedent to the making of the sale, his authority is complete; otherwise not. Bonnell v. Roane, 20 Ark. 114, 121.

An authority is a clear and definite decision upon a question actually before the court for decision. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Furman, 52 Pac. 932, 935, 6 Okl. 649.

Discretion implied.

"Authorize and empower," as used in a will in which the testatrix did authorize and empower the trustee to improve the real estate, implies discretion. Seeds v. Burk, 37 Atl. 511, 513, 181 Pa. 281.

New York City Charter, § 1473 et seq., providing that the police department is "authorized and empowered" to grant theatrical licenses, is to be construed as vesting a discretionary power in the department to grant or withhold licenses, which may be controlled by mandamus. The "language is almost identical with that of section 1909 of the consolidation act, under which the authority to grant licenses was vested in the mayor, whereas by the provisions of the charter which we have quoted such power is now lodged with the police department. This very contention now made as to the intent and meaning of the words 'authorized and empowered,' which are to be found in both statutes, was involved in the case of People v. Grant, 58 Hun, 455, 12 N. Y. Supp. 879; and Justice Barrett, who wrote the opinion therein, thus disposes of it (page 457, 58 Hun, and page 880, 12 N. Y. Supp.): "The relator's contention is that these words 'authorized and empowered,' should be construed as imperative, and he cites authorities for the proposition that permissive words may sometimes be treated as mandatory.

* * * The rule undoubtedly is that where public bodies or officers are empowered to do that which the public interests require to be done, and adequate means are placed at their disposal, the proper execution of the power may be insisted on, though the statute conferring it be only permissive in its terms. Mayor, etc., v. Furze, 3 Hill, 612. The word "may" is thus construed at times to mean "must." But why, it may be asked, should this construction be given to the act under consideration? What public interest demands that the mayor should be required, under all circumstances, to accept the fee and grant the license? It seems to me that it is quite the other way. The public good clearly requires that the permissive words in question should be read in their natural and ordinary sense.'" Armstrong v. Murphy, 72 N. Y. Supp. 473, 474, 65 App. Div. 123.

As mandatory.

"Authorized and empowered," in Acts 1861, c. 63, § 6; providing that cities and towns shall be authorized and empowered to provide for the support of the families of any persons residing in such cities and towns who may enlist in the army, makes it the duty of cities and towns to provide for the support of such persons, and does not authorize them or their officers to inquire how or by whose fault the need for such support may have arisen, or that it was to be within the option of such towns and their officers to provide such relief. Inhabitants of Veazie v. Inhabitants of China, 50 Me. 518, 521.

A statute authorizing a board of supervisors at its next annual session to audit and pay as a county charge a certain claim was imperative, and it was the duty of the board to audit and pay such a claim. People v. Erie County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 1 Sheld. 517, 521.

Act May 17, 1867, giving relief against illegal taxation, and declaring that the board of supervisors are "authorized" and empowered on the application of any party aggrieved to determine any claim of assessment, is mandatory, and does not mean that they may hear and determine at their discretion. People v. Herkimer County Sup'rs (N. Y.) 56 Barb. 452, 454; People v. Otsego County Sup'rs, 51 N. Y. 401, 405.

Laws 1890, c. 393, authorizing and empowering the city of Buffalo to audit and adjust the amount of damage done to certain private property by the opening of a street, and that on the appraisal of such damage the city shall raise the same by assessment and pay it over to the owners of the property, is mandatory, and not merely permissive. People v. Common Council of City of Buffalo, 21 N. Y. Supp. 601, 603, 2 Misc. Rep. 7.

The words "authorize and empower and request," as used in a will in connection with the management of an estate, are imperative, and impose a duty on the executors. Landon v. Huitfeldt (N. J.) 3 Atl. 882, 885.

"When a statute confers upon a corporation a power to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of the power is not discretionary, but imperative, and the words 'power and authority' in such case may be construed 'duty and obligation.'" Commonwealth v. Marshall, 3 Wkly. Notes Cas. 182, 185 (quoting Anne Arundel County Com'rs v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 83 Am. Dec. 557).

A provision in a charter that the mayor and city council shall have full power and authority to enact and pass all laws and ordinances necessary to preserve the health of the city means that it shall be the duty and obligation of the city to enact such laws, and confers a power to be exercised for the public good; and the exercise of it is not merely discretionary, but imperative. Flynn v. Canton Co., 40 Md. 312, 319, 17 Am. Rep. 603.

"It was said in City of Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326, that it is a well-settled principle that when a statute confers a power upon a corporation to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of the power is not merely discretionary, but imperative; and the words 'power and authority' in such case may be construed 'duty and obligation.'" Magaha v. City of Hagerstown, 51 Atl. 832, 835, 95 Md. 62, 93 Am. St. Rep. 317.

"Authority," as used in the charter of a municipal corporation giving the board of trustees power and authority to repair streets, is not merely discretionary, but imperative, and the words "power and authority" in such case may be construed "duty and obligation." Rankin v. Buckman, 9 Or. 253, 262.

The term "authorized and empowered," as used in an act declaring that a city council "are hereby authorized and empowered to pay a certain amount of money, with interest, to certain persons," is mandatory. Bowen v. City of Minneapolis, 47 Minn. 115, 116, 49 N. W. 683, 28 Am. St. Rep. 333.

As power.

Rev. St. art. 363, after defining the powers of a marshal as to city matters, provides that in the prevention and suppression of crime and arrest of offenders he shall have, possess, and execute like power, authority, and jurisdiction as the sheriff of a county under the laws of a state. "Authority" as applied to executive officers seems to be a convertible term with "power," for the authority of such officers is their lawful power. Newburn v. Durham, 32 S. W. 112, 115, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 655.

AUTHORITY EXERCISED UNDER THE UNITED STATES.

Under the federal judiciary act, giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction to review a final judgment or decree of a state court of last resort in any suit where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, it is held that the term "authority exercised under the United States" must be something more than a bare assertion of such an authority, and must be an authority having a real existence derived from competent governmental power, and in this respect the word "authority" stands on the same footing with "treaty" or "statute." Hence, where a party claimed authority under an order of a federal court which, when rightfully viewed, did not purport to confer any authority upon him, a writ of error to the Supreme Court was dismissed. Millingar v. Hartuppec, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 258, 261, 18 L. Ed. 829.

Where, in a case in a state court, a right or immunity was set up under and by virtue of a judgment in a federal court, and the decision was against such right or immunity, a case for removal to the Supreme Court was presented as the judgment under which the right was claimed was an "authority exercised under the United States," within the meaning of the statute. Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 88 U. S. (21 Wall.) 130, 134, 22 L. Ed. 588.

AUTHORITY OF LAW.

See "Affirmatively Authorized by Law."

An allegation in a complaint that an arrest made by a policeman was without authority of law states but a legal conclusion. Connelly v. American Bonding & Trust Co. (Ky.) 69 S. W. 959, 961.

Rev. St. c. 132, § 1, providing that every person who shall set up or promote any lottery not authorized by law shall be liable to a fine, means any law having force in this commonwealth, either by a statute of its Legislature, or by a law of the United States, and to suppose that the Legislature intended to allow the sale of tickets in a lottery authorized by another state is such an impeachment of the discernment and foresight of the Legislature that it cannot be admitted. Such a supposition is not consistent with the manifest design of the statute, which was to suppress lotteries not authorized by law. Commonwealth v. Dana, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 329, 338.

"Authority of law," as used in Pen. Code, § 211, providing that a person who willfully seizes, confines, inveigles, or kidnaps another with the intent to cause him, without authority of law, to be secretly confined or imprisoned within the state, is guilty of kidnapping, has no reference whatever to "due process of law" and where the statute relating to the confinement of a person for insanity has been observed, and all its provisions complied with, the imprisonment or the detention of the person is not without authority of law. People v. Camp, 21 N. Y. Supp. 741, 743.

Pen. Code, § 94, provides that a person who willfully and unlawfully removes, mutilates, destroys, conceals, or obliterates a record, map, book, paper, document, or other thing filed or deposited in a public office, or with any public officer, by authority of law, is punishable, etc. Held, that papers filed and deposited in the office of the bureau of labor statistics of the state, at the headquarters thereof, which papers were circulars containing questions asking for information such as the bureau of labor statistics was authorized to collect, and the answers thereto of the persons to whom such circulars were addressed, and the issuance of the circulars by the commissioner was authorized, as he was also authorized to compel answers thereto, were received by the commissioner by "authority of law." People v. Peck, 22 N. Y. Supp. 576, 579, 67 Hun, 560.

Const. art. 12, § 2, declares that no city, county, town, or other subdivision of this state shall ever make donations to any railroad or other work or internal improvement, unless a proposition so to do shall have been first submitted to the qualified electors thereof at an election by "authority of law." The phrase quoted is held to mean an act of the Legislature, or law-making power under the Constitution, duly exercised and approved, and does not authorize the people to vote such aid, but necessitates the permission of the Legislature. Reineman v. Covington, C. & B. H. R. Co., 7 Neb. 310, 312.

The phrase "authority of statutes," as used in the bonds of a municipal corporation, reciting that such bonds were issued by authority of statutes, imports in favor of bona fide purchasers for value a full compliance with the statute, and precludes inquiry as to whether the precedent conditions were performed before the bonds were issued. Independent School Dist. of Steamboat Rock

v. Stone, 1 Sup. Ct. 84, 87, 106 U. S. 183, 27 L. Ed. 90.

The expression "authorized by law," as used in Gen. St. p. 71, § 72, providing that the state auditor shall give notice annually of the rates of taxes authorized by law to be levied for state purposes, includes rates fixed where the Legislature has furnished the data for making the computation, but has not itself fixed the rates. Morton v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 430, 477.

AUTHORITIES.

See "Corporate Authorities"; "County Authorities"; "Local Authorities"; "Municipal Authorities"; "Proper Authorities."

The word "authorities," in the constitutional provision that local officers shall be elected by the electors or appointed by such authorities thereof, means those upon whom the people have conferred authority, not their agents' agents. The words employed in the Constitution are taken in their natural and popular sense, unless they are terms of art, in which case they are to be taken in their technical signification. Black, Const. Law, 66 An "authority" means a person or persons or a body exercising power or command. Imperial Dict.; Cent. Dict. The body of persons exercising power or command. Rathbone v. Wirth, 40 N. Y. Supp. 535, 555, 6 App. Div. 277 (citing Murray's Eng. Dict.).

As used in the treaty between the United States and Spain, ceding Florida, article 8, stipulating that all the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic majesty, or by his "lawful authorities" in the territories ceded to the United States, should be ratified and confirmed to persons in possession, means those persons who exercise the granting power by authority of the crown, and is equivalent to the words "competent authorities," used in their place by the King of Spain in his ratification of the treaty. United States v. Clarke, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 436, 449, 8 L. Ed. 1001.

"Authorities thereof," as used in Const. art. 13, § 9, providing that all city, town, and village officers, whose election or appointment is not provided for by the Constitution, shall be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or of some division thereof, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the Legislature shall designate for that purpose, means some officers or board of officers of the village. Cole v. Village of Black River Falls, 14 N. W. 906, 908, 57 Wis. 110.

AUTOMATIC—AUTOMATICALLY.

In common parlance, "automatic" means self-acting. Cleveland Target Co. v. Empire

Target Co. (U. S.) 97 Fed. 44, 74; Tripp Giant Leveler Co. v. Rogers (U. S.) 61 Fed. 289, 290.

By "automatic" is meant self-acting, or the elimination of human agency or volition which results in the saving of labor and increased certainty and uniformity of operation. This is the sense in which the term is used in the mechanic arts and in the patent law, and does not include all contrivances, such as a wheelbarrow, which are operative for the purposes designed under any applied force, whether muscular or otherwise. Tripp Giant Leveler Co. v. Rogers (U. S.) 61 Fed. 289, 290.

The word "automatically" cannot be properly applied to describe a method of throwing out the books of a car coupler by means of a rod connecting therewith and running to the side of the car, and there turned by the application of physical force by a brakeman. Gould Coupler Co. v. Trojan Car Coupler Co. (U. S.) 74 Fed. 794, 796, 21 C. C. A. 97.

AUTOPSY.

"Autopsy" is defined to be an examination of a dead body by dissection, but is not synonymous with "examine," in an insurance policy authorizing the insurer to examine the body of assured to determine cause of death. Sudduth v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (U. S.) 106 Fed. 822, 823.

AUTREFOIS ACQUIT.

"The plea of autrefois acquit is based on the maxim that a man shall not be brought into danger of his life for one and the same offense more than once. Therefore, when a man is once found not guilty on an indictment before a court which hath jurisdiction of the cause, he may plead such acquittal in bar of any subsequent indictment for the same crime." United States v. Gibert (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1287, 1294.

"Autrefois acquit" is the name of a plea in bar in a criminal action that the defendant has been already indicted, tried, and acquitted. It is only available in cases where the transaction is the same, and the two indictments are susceptible of and must be sustained by the same proof. Simco v. State, 9 Tex. App. 338, 348.

The plea of autrefois acquit must be upon a prosecution for the same identical act and crime, and it must appear that the indictment depends upon facts so combined and charged as to constitute the same legal effect and crime. It is obvious that there may be a great similarity in the facts where there is a substantial legal difference in the nature of the crime, and, on the contrary, there may be a considerable diversity of circumstances where the legal character of the offense is the same. Commonwealth v. Vaughn, 42 S. W. 117, 101 Ky. 603, 45 L. R. A. 858.

AUTREFOIS CONVICT.

The plea of autrefois convict is a plea of a mixed nature, and consists partly of matter of record and partly of matter of fact, and it must set forth the record of the former acquittal and that the judgment is unreversed and in full force. United States v. Olsen (U. S.) 57 Fed. 579, 582.

"Autrefois convict" is the name given to designate a plea in criminal law that the defendant has formerly had a regular trial for the same offense and a verdict of guilty has been returned against him, or has confessed his guilt upon a sufficient indictment. Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 406, 420.

The plea of autrefois convict is a plea in bar that the defendant has been formerly convicted of the same identical crime. It only requires that the transaction or the facts constituting it be the same. It does not require a similarity in the indictments under which he was convicted and under which he is again charged. Simco v. State, 9 Tex. App. 338, 348.

AUXILIARY RECEIVER.

An auxiliary receiver is merely the custodian of the property within the state where in he is appointed for the purpose of preserving the assets belonging to the party or corporation proceeded against within the state in order that creditors may reach them without being compelled to go to a foreign jurisdiction to prove their claims. Therefore, as a general rule, the person so appointed is a mere common-law receiver to protect the property, and has only the powers conferred by the order appointing him. Buckley v. Harrison, 31 N. Y. Supp. 999, 1001, 10 Misc. Rep. 683.

AVAILABLE.

"Available," as used in a contract by which a party agreed to manufacture available phosphoric acid, means salable whether it be of inferior or superior quality. Clark v. Adams, 3 N. Y. Supp. 819, 820, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 500.

AVAILABLE ASSETS AND RESOURCES.

An account that depends for collection upon the will of the debtor and his hope of future advantage cannot be counted as an available asset in determining the solvency of a firm. Bally v. Hornthal, 49 N. E. 56, 60, 154 N. Y. 648, 61 Am. St. Rep. 645.

"Available assets and resources," as used in reference to a city, means tangible property in the treasury, legally available, properly applicable to the payment of debts, and readily convertible into money for that purpose. It does not include a street railway tax, or license of uncertain amount, depending on its earnings, and not then due. Rice v. City of Milwaukee, 76 N. W. 341, 342, 100 Wis. 516.

In considering a finding of the trial court, that at the time a transfer of property was made by a corporation the liabilities of the corporation, including its liabilities upon the stock of its stockholders, exceeded its available assets, the court said: "What does available assets mean? The phrase 'available assets' must have been inserted for some limiting or qualifying purpose. It must have been intended as including certain assets and excluding others; hence there was no reason for its use. The ordinary meaning of 'available' is 'usable, capable of being used to advantage.' And we suppose when the word qualifies assets, as here, it must mean property that can be sold or turned into cash with which to pay debts within a reasonable time. So the inevitable inference from the finding is that, if a corporation has not enough assets which can be used within a reasonable time to pay its creditors and its stockholders in full, it is insolvent. We find ourselves unable to subscribe to this idea." Hamilton v. Menominee Falls Quarry Co., 81 N. W. 876, 878, 106 Wis. 352.

AVAILABLE CAPITAL.

"Available capital," like 'available means,' is a term well understood to be any assets that can be readily converted into money." McFadden v. Leeka, 28 N. E. 874, 878, 48 Ohio St. 513.

AVAILABLE MEANS.

"Available means" is a term well understood to be any assets that can be readily converted into money." McFadden v. Leeka, 28 N. E. 874, 878, 48 Ohio St. 513.

"Available means" cannot in law be regarded as money or its equivalent. Creditors are not bound to accept available means in payment. Benedict v. Huntington, 32 N. Y. 219, 224.

"Available means," in its broadest signification, includes money as well as notes, bills of exchange, etc., but in its ordinary sense, especially when used as contradistinguished from money, it must be understood as meaning notes, bills of exchange, drafts, stocks, and other choses in action. Webster defines the noun "means" as "income, resources, or estate." Qualified by the adjective "available" it must be held to include all that numerous class of securities which are known in the mercantile world as representatives of value easily convertible into money, but not money. "Available means," among mercantile men, is a term well understood to be anything which can readily be converted into money, but it is not necessarily nor primarily money itself. Brigham v. Tillinghast, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 215, 218.

AVAILABLE STOCKS.

"Available stocks," as used in a will by which testatrix bequeathed one-tenth of all she possessed to charitable objects, and "the rest, or nine-tenths of my available stocks," to another person, means all of the testatrix's personal estate not otherwise specifically disposed of, to the extent of nine-tenths of the whole, excluding worthless mining stocks possessed by the testatrix. The words "the rest" have reference to what remains of the property in part previously given away, and the article "or," immediately following, is not the equivalent to "consisting of," but the sentence if written out in full would be "the rest of all I possess, or nine-tenths of my available stocks." The latter part of this sentence does not specify what articles of property are to be alone understood as embraced in the preceding words, and was not so intended. Its object was first to express the quantum or extent of the property given, and secondly to exclude mining stocks which were worthless; that is, producing no dividend. In re Sweitzer's Estate, 21 Atl. 885, 886, 142 Pa. 541.

AVAILS.

In a will by which the testator gave his real estate to his wife during life and ordered that at her decease the real estate should be sold, and after paying all debts the balance of the avails to be divided among certain persons named, "avails" meant only the proceeds of real estate which the widow took on the testator's death, and did not include proceeds of lands previously sold by the testator. McNaughton v. McNaughton, 34 N. Y. 201, 205.

As money or security.

"Avails," as used in a will providing that after the debts of a testator should have been paid the avails of the property should be equally divided, meant cash, or security, the representatives of money. Allen v. De Witt, 3 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 276, 279.

In an agreement between a mortgagee and the mortgagor, by which the mortgagor was given permission to cut timber from the mortgaged premises for sale, provided the avails of the timber were turned over to be applied on the mortgage note, "avails" means the money derived from such sales. Hall v. Appel, 85 Atl. 524, 526, 67 Conn. 585.

As net proceeds.

The "avails" of cotton seized and confiscated by the government are the amount received for the cotton after deducting the charges and expenses of their recovery. McCay v. Lamar (U. S.) 12 Fed. 367, 371.

Rents.

In an agreement whereby parties were stated to be equally interested in the avails in sales thereafter made of certain lands, the expression "avails" of any sale included all the proceeds of the property, including rents received. Watson v. King, 26 N. Y. Supp. 177, 179, 73 Hun, 340.

AVENUE.

The word "avenue," as used in deeds and upon the map of a city, will be construed to imply a public street. People v. Underhill, 39 N. E. 333, 335, 144 N. Y. 316.

AVER.

The word "aver," as used in Act Feb. 7, 1850, providing that, hereafter, on the trial of any person indicted for trading with a slave, it shall not be necessary, in order to convict, for the state to aver or prove who was the master, owner, or overseer of such slave, is not synonymous with the word "prove." The term "aver" must be understood to signify what it usually means in the connection in which it is here found, and as thus understood, it is clear that the Legislature endeavored to cut off the chance of escape of those violating the law against trading with slaves by rendering certain averments in the indictment, otherwise essential, unnecessary; and not being necessary to be averred, they need not be proved. Hirschfelder v. State, 19 Ala. 534, 539.

AVERMENT.

See "Immaterial Allegation or Averment."

An averment is a positive statement of facts in opposition to argument or inference. Starnes v. Erwin, 32 N. C. 226, 228 (citing 1 Arch. N. P. 320); Prigmore v. Thompson (Ala.) Minor, 420.

"The use, in pleading, of an averment, is to ascertain that to the court which is generally or doubtfully expressed, so that the court may not be perplexed of whom or of what it ought to be understood, and to add matter to the plea to make doubtful things clear." Van Vechten v. Hopkins (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 211, 220, 4 Am. Dec. 339; Bradley v. Cramer, 18 N. W. 263, 270, 59 Wis. 309, 48 Am. Rep. 511; Milligan v. Thorn (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 412, 413; Cooper v. Greeley (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 347, 359.

"Averment," as applied to the declaration, is a technical term, and means a direct and positive allegation of the fact, made in a manner capable of being traversed, and excludes the idea of an affirmation to be made out only by inference. Laughlin v. Flood (Va.) 3 Munf. 255, 262.

"Averments of facts," in a bill or answer, are such matters as a witness may be called on to prove, or the truth of which must be established by evidence, to enable the court to act. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. (Md.) 4 Gill & J. 1, 7.

The words "good, fair, and average," when used as description of cotton, are not precisely the same in their primary signification, as the quality indicated by the former is a shade above what the latter describes. Thus, changing a contract requiring the delivery of average cotton by inserting the words "good, fair," instead of the word "average," is a material change in the contract. Waddell v. Glassell, 18 Ala. 561, 565, 54 Am. Dec. 170.

A memorandum of sale that the bales were to average by invoice 440 pounds gross per bale, or no sale, did not constitute a warranty that the average weight was to be strictly and literally complied with, but was merely a warranty against deficiency in weight, and means that the bales shall at least average 440 pounds without any reasonable excess of that amount, and the average weight of 450 pounds was not a sufficient excess to avoid the contract. Whitney v. Thacher, 117 Mass. 523, 526.

Where a contract binds a gas company to furnish to a city such quantity of gas as may be required by the city council for public lamps at two-thirds of the "lowest averaged price" at which gas shall or may be furnished to private individuals in five certain specified cities named, averaged by adding together such lowest cash prices and dividing the amount by five, the words "lowest averaged price" entitle the city to the benefit of such discounts as are or may be allowed to individuals by the company in each city furnished gas at the lowest price. City of Cincinnati v. Cincinnati Gaslight & Coke Co., 41 N. E. 239, 242, 53 Ohio St. 278.

In marine insurance.

"Average" originally meant a contribution by the owners of the ship, cargo and freight, toward a loss sustained for the general benefit of all; but when understood in this sense it is now always called "general," to distinguish it from "particular" average, which means nothing more than a partial loss. So that from the time that the term "average" was used to express a partial loss, the word "average" has, in the common understanding with commercial men, so far altered its original meaning, when applied to original cases, as to import as well a general contribution as a particular loss, and is intended to be used in either of these ways; the adjuncts "general," "partial," or "particular" being affixed. Coster v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 611.

In policies of insurance "average" has a technical meaning, and signifies in substance the partial loss accruing to or on account of the insured goods by reason of some of the perils insured against, and denotes a loss less than total arising from an actual injury to the insured goods. Louisville Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Bland, 39 Ky (9 Dana) 143, 147.

Where the parties to a marine policy agree that the goods insured shall be free from average, it means that the liability of the insurer shall only rise when a total loss occurs. Bargett v. Orient Mut. Ins. Co., 16 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Bosw.) 385, 395.

Where a loss or damage occurs to a vessel or its cargo at sea, average is the adjustment and apportionment of such loss between the owners of the vessel, the freight, and the cargo, in proportion to their respective interests and losses, in order that one may not suffer the whole loss, but that each shall contribute ratably. In order to constitute a case of contribution or average, there must concur a contract by which distinct properties of several persons become exposed to a common peril, and a relief from that peril at the expense of one or more of the concerned parties, and such release must be intended as well as obtained at the hazard or by the destruction of the property lost, for which the contribution is claimed. Whitteridge v. Norris, 6 Mass. 125, 126.

"Average" is a contribution made by the owners of a ship, freight, and goods on board toward any particular loss or expense incurred for the general safety of the ship and cargo, and includes expenses incurred for seamen's wages, and for provisions during an embargo. Insurance Co. of North America v. Jones (Pa.) 2 Bin. 547, 552.

"Average," in marine insurance, only obtains where a deliberate act of loss is done for the preservation of the whole in a peril common, which alike affects not only the ship, but also the cargo; and hence, where the only deliberate act done was the separation of the mast and rigging from the hull, after they were carried overboard by the violence of the weather, no claim for average arose. Nickerson v. Tyson, 8 Mass. 467, 468.

AVERAGE CHARGES.

An act of the Assembly provided that rates for toll and transportation may be regulated in such manner as the company may deem most advisable, provided that the maximum charges for toll and transportation shall not exceed four cents per ton per mile for freight. A subsequent act amended the proviso so as to read, "and average charges for toll and transportation." Held, that the words "average charges," as so used, meant a mean rate, ascertained by dividing the entire receipts by the whole quantity of tonnage reduced to a common standard of tons moved one mile. Hersh v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 181, 189.

P. L. 1850, 298, provided that the D. & F. R. R. Co. might charge such rates for transportation as it should deem most advisable, provided that the average charges for toll and transportation should not exceed four cents per ton per mile. Held, that the phrase "average charges" meant that the company might impose more than four cents per mile on some charges so long as by making others less the general average should not exceed four cents per ton per mile. Hersh v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 74 Pa. (24 P. F. Smith) 181, 189.

AVERAGE MAN.

"Average man," as used in reference to whether the term "manufacturing industries" would strike the mind of the average man as including an electric light plant, means one of fair and ordinary intelligence, such as a legislature or town council might be composed of, but not one who looks at everything from a technical or scientific standpoint. Frederick Electric Light & Power Co. v. Frederick City, 36 Atl. 362, 363, 84 Md. 599, 36 L. R. A. 130.

AVERAGE NUMBER OF SCHOLARS.

The average number of scholars in the public schools means the average membership of the public schools as shown by the school register, and scholars whose names are on the register, and who are recognized as members of the school, are to be computed in ascertaining such number, though they may be occasionally absent from school. Needham v. Inhabitants of Wellesley, 81 N. E. 732, 139 Mass. 372.

AVERAGE OF PRICE.

The law, in regulating the measure of damages, contemplates a range of the entire market, and "the average of prices" thus found, running through a reasonable period of time. Neither a sudden and transient inflation nor depression should control the question or determine such average. Smith v. Griffith (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 333, 338, 38 Am. Dec. 639.

"Average of price" is intended as a rule to ascertain what the market price is, and exclude exceptional sales at extraordinary prices. In the case of Romaine v. Van Allen, 26 N. Y. 309, the cases upon the subject are said to be to the effect that, if the plaintiff, without unnecessary delay, prosecutes his suit, the fluctuation in the price should be exclusively at the hazard of the defendant, and the plaintiff was entitled to the highest price between the day when the delivery should have been made and the day of trial. Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 423, 2 Am. Rep. 462.

AVERAGE QUALITY WITH.

A contract by which a firm of lumber dealers contracted to sell 1,000,000 feet of strips now in their yard, to be of "average quality" with six cars theretofore shipped, meant that the strips should be so sorted or collected that those delivered should equal in quality those contained in the six carloads, without any reference to the proportionate quantity of each grade. Butterfield v. Herren, 49 N. W. 826, 828, 80 Wis. 240.

AVERT.

In an instruction that, if the jury believed from the evidence that at the time a defendant, on trial for murder, shot and killed the deceased, he believed, and had reasonable ground to believe, that the deceased was about to take his life or inflict on him great bodily harm, and there appeared to him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment no other safe means to avert a then real, or to him apparent, danger, if any, he was entitled to acquittal on the ground of self-defense, the word "avert" cannot be construed as equivalent to the word "escape," which has been frequently condemned in instructions. Utterback v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 59 S. W. 515, 516.

AVOCATION.

All other avocations, see "All Other."
Other avocation, see "Other."

The primary meaning of the word "avocation" is a calling away, a diversion. It is the opposite of "vocation" or "occupation"; and hence, as used in Rev. St. 1881, forbidding any person over 14 years of age to engage in his usual avocation on Sunday, will be construed to mean "usual vocation." Ross v. State, 36 N. E. 167, 168, 9 Ind. App. 35.

"Avocation" is not synonymous with 'vocation,' but the use of the word 'avocation' for 'vocation' in an indictment will not invalidate the indictment, for the misuse of the terms as interchangeable is by no means infrequent, and leaves no question as to the meaning of the pleader in using such word." Peters v. State (Tex.) 23 S. W. 683.

Acts 1855, p. 159, making it criminal to be engaged in one's usual avocation on Sunday, is to be construed as meaning "such acts of labor or business as may be performed, on days of the week usually devoted to secular business, in the pursuit of a lawful employment." State v. Conger, 14 Ind. 396, 397.

AVOID.

"Avoid," as used in Code, § 2865, providing that a reply is not permitted except when a counterclaim is set up, or some matter is pleaded in the answer to which plaintiff claims a defense by reason of facts which avoid the matter alleged in the answer, implies the admission of the defense sought to be avoided. "There cannot be an avoidance without a confession of the defense sought to be avoided." Meadows v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 17 N. W. 600, 601, 62 Iowa, 387.

AVOIDABLE ACCIDENT.

Anderson, in his law dictionary (page 13), defines "avoidable accident" as an act which was not called for by any duty or necessity, and the injury resulted from the want of that extraordinary care which the law reasonably requires of one doing such a lawful act, or because the accident was the result of actual negligence or folly, and might, with reasonable care adapted to the emergency, have been avoided. Dreyer v. People, 58 N. E. 620, 623, 188 Ill. 40, 58 L. R. A. 869.

AVOIDANCE.

See "Confession and Avoidance."

The term "avoidance," in pleading, implies some admission in effect of the existence, prima facie, of a cause of action in the complainant at some time, and some fact supervenient which avoids it in favor of the defendant. Uri v. Hirsch (U. S.) 123 Fed. 568, 570.

Const. 1854, p. 80, § 80, providing that under the plea of the general issue defendant may give his title in evidence or any matter of defense and justification, according to the nature of the action, excepting matter in avoidance or a defense inconsistent with the truth of the material allegations of the declaration, means the introduction of new matter which, admitting promises of the opposite party, avoids or repels his conclusions. "Matter of avoidance" is new matter which admits the declaration to be true, but shows, nevertheless, either that the defendant was never liable to the recovery claimed against him, or that he has been discharged from his original liability, or something supervenient; hence, in an action on a promissory note, charging that defendant indorsed a promissory note, and that he indorsed a paper which was a promissory note if anything, and that he indorsed a bill of exchange, an admission that the defendant indorsed an inchoate bill of exchange is not matter in avoidance, within the meaning of the statute. Mahaiwe Bank v. Douglass, 31 Conn. 170, 175.

Where the answer admits facts which charge the defendant, and sets up also matter which discharges him, the latter is not evidence for him unless the charge and discharge arise out of one transaction, in which case the defendant may state the whole transaction, and it is all held responsive and evidence in his favor, and perhaps the phrase "matter in avoidance," as applied to an answer, relates only to such matter as avoids a conceded liability, and not to such as avoids the effect of facts admitted, which if unexplained might show that the liability never existed at all. So that a defendant, when answering a bill charging a transaction to have been of a certain character, although compelled to admit facts which would alone go to show the charge true, may nevertheless state other facts which go to show that it really was of a different character, and be entitled to have the whole statement considered evidence for him. Cooper v. Tappan, 9 Wis. 361, 366.

AVOW.

At common law, when the defendant to an action of replevin admitted and justified the taking, he was said to "avow." Newell Universal Mill Co. v. Muxlow, 21 N. E. 1048, 1049, 115 N. Y. 170.

AVOWRY.

An avowry is the setting forth, as in a declaration, the nature and the merits of the defendant's case, showing that the distress taken by him was lawful; which must be done with such sufficient authority as will entitle him to a retorno habendo. Hill v. Stocking (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 277, 284 (citing Wood. Land. & Ten. 592; Hill v. Miller [Pa.] 5 Serg. & R. 355, 357); Newell Universal Mill Co. v. Muxlow, 21 N. E. 1048, 1049, 115 N. Y. 170. But the action is not now confined to a case of distress, but lies at common law whenever there has been a tortious taking, either originally, or, by construction of law, by some act which makes the party a trespasser ab initio. Brown v. Bissett, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 267, 274.

"An avowry in a court of record," says Coke, "which is in the nature of an action, is a determination of an election before any judgment given." Equitable Co-operative Foundry Co. v. Hersee (N. Y.) 33 Hun, 169, 177.

An avowry was in the nature of a declaration which required a reply from plaintiff, and in default of one defendant was entitled to judgment. Newell Universal Mill Co. v. Muxlow, 24 N. Y. St. Rep. 545, 547.

Cognizance distinguished.

An "avowry," as distinguished from a "cognizance," imports a taking in one's own right, while a cognizance imports a justification under the authority of another. Brown v. Bissett, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 46, 49.

AVULSION.

Alluvion distinguished, see "Alluvion."

"Avulsion" is the sudden change of the banks of a stream, such as occurs when a river forms a new course by going through a bend; and where the stream forms the boundary of land, the avulsion has no effect upon such boundary, but it still remains the center of the old channel, whether water flows in it or not. Rees v. McDaniel, 21 S. W. 913, 914, 115 Mo. 145.

"Avulsion" is the sudden and rapid change of a channel of a stream which is the boundary, whereby it abandons its old and seeks a new bed. Such change of channel works no change of boundary, and the boundary remains as it was, in the center of the old channel, although no water may flow therein. Nebraska v. Iowa, 12 Sup. Ct. 396, 397, 143 U. S. 359, 36 L. Ed. 186.

The term "avulsion" is used to express the sudden and rapid change of the channel of a boundary line stream. Thus, where a stream which is a boundary between land of different persons, or between states, from any cause suddenly abandons its old and seeks a new bed, such change of channel works no change of boundary, and the boundary remains as it was, in the center of the old channel, though no water may be flowing therein. This sudden and rapid change is termed in the law "avulsion." Such a change is rather uncommon, and when the violence of the stream separates a considerable part from one piece of land and joins it to another, but in such a manner that it can still be identified, the property in the soil so removed naturally continues vested in its former owner. Bouvier v. Stricklett, 59 N. W. 550, 552, 40 Neb. 792.

Where considerable quantities of soil are, by a sudden action of the water, taken from the land of one, this is called "avulsion"; but the ownership is not lost, though the surface earth is transported elsewhere, and it may be reclaimed and the ownership reasserted.

Thus, lands dedicated and accepted, subject to the trust impressed on them of remaining forever unoccupied by buildings, included all the land between the west line of Michigan avenue and the shore of Lake Michigan as it was when such lands were platted; and the title to such portion thereof as was subsequently carried away and submerged by the waters of the lake, and thereafter reclaimed by artificial means, was not lost, but by such reclamation thereof the city completely reasserted its title thereto as such title stood at the time of such dedication. City of Chicago v. Ward, 48 N. E. 927, 932, 169 Ill. 392, 38 L. R. A. 849, 61 Am. St. Rep. 185.

AWAIT.

A statute authorizing an appeal in a criminal cause required accused to execute a recognizance conditioned that he would abide the judgment of the court of appeals of the state of Texas. Held, that a recognizance in which the condition was that accused would "await the action of the court of appeals," etc., was not the same nor substantially synonymous with the phrase used by the statute, and was, therefore, insufficient. Wilson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 38, 39.

AWAITING DELIVERY.

The term "awaiting delivery," as used in a charter of a railroad company providing that the company should not be responsible for goods on deposit in any of their depots awaiting delivery, meant such goods as have reached their final destination and are waiting to be delivered over to the consignee on demand, and not property on its way to a distant point to be taken thence by a connecting carrier. In the former case it is "awaiting delivery," in the latter "awaiting transportation." Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Mineral Springs Mfg. Co., 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 318, 327, 21 L. Ed. 297.

"Awaiting delivery," as used in a bill of lading providing that the carrier would not be responsible for the goods while at any station awaiting delivery, does not include goods which were switched off on a side track, and which the plaintiffs, on inquiring for them, could not learn that they had arrived, and of the arrival of which the carrier had not given the customary notice. McKinney v. Jewett, 24 Hun, 19, 22 (affirmed 90 N. Y. 267, 271).

"Awaiting delivery," as used in a charter of a carrier providing that it shall be responsible for goods in its depots awaiting delivery as warehousemen, "presupposes the consummation of every preliminary requisition to delivery; therefore it presupposes notice to the consignee, and the elapsing of sufficient time preparatory to its reception. That time, at common law, is a reasonable time, * * * and during that time it may be said with great reason, we think, that the property is awaiting delivery." Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Mich. 538, 544.

AWAITING FURTHER CONVEYANCE.

Within a bill of lading relieving a carrier from liability other than as a warehouseman, while the said property awaits further conveyance, the term "awaits further conveyance" literally means awaiting the time when the next carrier shall take the property in hand. But cotton unloaded by a connecting carrier at its pier, without giving any notice of its arrival to the succeeding carrier, does not await further conveyance. Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Reiss, 22 Sup. Ct. 253, 256, 183 U. S. 621, 46 L. Ed. 358.

AWARD.

"To award is to judge, to give, or assign by sentence or judicial determination." Starkey v. City of Minneapolis, 19 Minn. 203, 206 (Gil. 166, 169).

An award is a judgment formed and pronounced. Hoff v. Taylor, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 829, 833.

An award is the judgment or decision of arbitrators or referees on the matter submitted to them. Henderson v. Beaton, 52 Tex. 29, 43; Halnon v. Halnon, 55 Vt. 321, 322.

An award is the decision or determination of arbitrators, commissioners, referees, or persons to whom a dispute or controversy between two or more persons has been submitted for a decision and determination out of court. It is also the written document embodying such decision. Peters v. Peirce, 8 Mass. 398.

"An award is an act of the parties performed through their agents and assented to in advance, and there is no reason why they may not as well establish by means of it what is called in common parlance a 'consentable line' as by their immediate act. A question of boundary is a subject of arbitration." Babb v. Stromberg, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 397, 399.

An award is sometimes considered as a contract and sometimes as a judgment. The submission implies mutual promises to perform the award. The award is a contract, and is considered as similar to an accord and satisfaction, and equal to a judgment of the court. Dixon's Lessee v. Morehead (Pa.) Add. 216, 222.

An award is an adjudication or determination between parties. Its character is more that of a judgment than of a contract. It is equally conclusive between the parties, but it requires to be enforced by action by reason of the lack of such domestic tribunals to enforce it by process of execution. Celley v. Gray, 37 Vt. 136, 138.

An award is the judgment of arbitrators chosen by the parties interested to settle a controversy. The arbitrators become the agents of both parties, and when the power to arbitrate is not derived from statute it is derived from the submission of the controversy by the mutual consent of the parties interested. A secretary of the treasury is not authorized to award the payment of an attorney's fees out of moneys remaining in the treasury due to the client of the attorney. Benjamin v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 417, 419.

There is no peculiar significance in the use of the word "award" instead of the word "recovered." in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1699, 1704, providing for a bond in replevin for the payment "of any sum which the judgment awards," and it is as effective in covering the costs of the action as the words used in the old Code, viz., "for the payment of such sum as may for any cause be recovered." John Church Co. v. Dorsey, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1065, 1067, 38 Misc. Rep. 542.

The term "award" is used to designate the decision of arbitrators in deciding a controversy submitted to them whereby the question is as fully determined, and the right transferred or settled, as it could have been by the agreement of the parties or the judgment of the court of justice. Thus, where plaintiff and defendant agree that defendant should assign his interest in a certain land contract, the value of the interest to be determined by arbitrators, and the arbitrators first determine the value of the land, and afterwards meet again and determine the value of the interest, the latter determination, and not the former, is their award. Fargo v. Reighard, 39 N. E. 888, 890, 13 Ind. App. 39.

Agreement required.

When there is a matter of difference between parties which they agree to refer, and thereupon an award is made, the award derives its force from, and really is to be considered, the agreement of the parties. A court called upon to enforce such an award is enforcing and carrying into effect the agreement of the parties, and for the reason that it is their agreement. If there was no agreement, there can be no award; and the same rule must apply if what purports to be an agreement is illegal and void. Jenifer v. Hamilton County Com'rs, 13 Ohio Dec. 116, 119, 2 Disn. 189.

Appraisement distinguished.

An award is the judgment of a tribunal selected by the parties to determine matters actually in variance between them, not merely to appraise and settle the price of property contracted for after the stipulation that this term of the contract was to be so ascertained. Had the parties made the contract, and afterwards, on a dispute arising, chosen arbitrators to determine what was due upon it, that might have been an award. The case is entirely different where the parties originally agreed to buy and sell at a sum to be fixed by an appraisement to be made by a third person or persons. When the original contract is established by competent and sufficient evidence, then indeed the assessment thus made by the authority of the parties, or by authority of law, as in the case of the justice of the peace, may be conclusive as to the price, but there is nothing in the transaction to conclude the parties as to anything else. They may call back—dispute the existence of any contract at all—or prove that it was attended with fraud or illegality. Here is the clear and palpable distinction between such an appraisement and an award. Green & C. St. Pass. R. Co. v. Moore, 64 Pa. (14 P. F. Smith) 79, 91.

Certainty and finality.

An award is in the nature of a judgment, and to be valid must be certain and decisive as to the matter submitted, so that it shall not be a cause of a new controversy. Colcord v. Fletcher, 50 Me. 395, 402 (citing Lincoln v. Whittenton Mills, 53 Mass. [12 Metc.] 31).

"Awards," though construed more favorably than formerly, must yet possess the fundamental properties of an award. Among other things they are required to be within the submission, certain—that is, certain to a common intent—and final. Archer v. Williamson (Md.) 2 Har. & G. 62, 67.

An award agreed upon by arbitrators, to be valid, must be consonant to the submission, must be certain, must be of things possible to be performed, and must be final. An award providing that defendant shall pay plaintiff $242.23 is sufficient and valid; but an award providing that defendant shall pay to plaintiff the value of certain potatoes, without pointing out upon the face of the award, or by reference to any rule or standard, any method of ascertaining such value, is bad; it being neither certain nor final. Whitcher v. Whitcher, 49 N. H. 176, 181, 6 Am. Rep. 486.

An award of arbitrators is in the nature of a judgment, and must be certain and intelligible. It should be in pursuance of the submission, and ought to be wholly decisive, inasmuch as if it does not determine the whole matter it becomes the cause of a new controversy. Alexander v. McNear (U. S.) 28 Fed. 403, 405.

Conformity to submission.

An award must embrace all the matters specifically included in the submission. Tudor v. Scovell, 20 N. H. 171, 173.

An award must be according to the submission, and must comprehend all matters therein contained. Richards v. Drinker, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 307, 319.

Judgment distinguished.

An award is regarded with great respect by the courts, but it can hardly be considered of equal dignity to a judgment rendered by a court. A court speaks by the force and power of the law, while an award speaks by consent and contract of the parties. A judgment that is a nullity may be assailed by the party whenever and wherever it confronts him, but he cannot assail it for mere errors or irregularities except by a direct attack. An award is no better than a judgment, and to be valid must be rendered after notice given to the parties who have submitted their rights to arbitration. Without notice the award is a nullity. Shively v. Knoblock, 35 N. E. 1028, 1029. 8 Ind. App. 433.

The words "adjudge, determine and award," as used by arbitrators in their award, do not necessarily carry with them the idea of a judgment according to law, so as to enable one of the parties to have the award set aside for errors of law. Patton v. Garrett, 21 S. E. 679, 682, 116 N. C. 847.

An award of arbitrators in the common pleas is to be considered as a judgment of that court from the time of its entry upon the docket, and as such subject to a writ of error. The statute expressly provides that from the time of the entry of the award in the docket it shall take rank as a judgment, and that execution may issue thereon provided that when judgment has been rendered for any sum or sums of money the like stay of execution shall be due, and under like regulations as in the case of other judgments. When the Legislature expressly and repeatedly says that the "award" is a "judgment," the court should do so. Ebersoll v. Krug, 3 Bin. (Pa.) 528, 529.

A board of arbitrators is not a "court" or "judicial tribunal" in any proper sense of those terms. It has none of the powers that appertain to courts to regulate their proceedings or enforce their decisions. An "award," when made, is more in the nature of a contract than of a "judgment." It is but the consummation of the contract of submission; its appropriate and legitimate result. Hence it is held that the fact that a judgment rendered on Sunday is void does not render an award made on Sunday illegal. Blood v. Bates, 31 Vt. 147, 150.

Writing required.

While a verbal submission to arbitration is valid at common law, yet where the law, as for instance, a suit of fraud, requires a contract in writing, both the submission and the award must be in writing. Donnell v. Lee, 58 Mo. App. 288, 295.

Parties may agree to settle by arbitration the division line between their lots of land, and an award made in pursuance of a submission for that purpose will bind the parties.

The arbitrators may make a parol award if the submission does not require the award to be in writing, and this will not be vitiated by a subsequent ineffectual attempt to reduce the same to writing. Jones v. Dewey, 17 N. H. 596, 599.

AWARDED.

A canon, promulgated by the Saxon kings A. D. 517, which became a part of the common law, declared that "process awarded" or a judgment rendered by a court on Sunday was void. Held, that process issued by a ministerial officer in the ordinary course of his official duty was not process awarded by a court, within the meaning of the above phrase. Clough v. Shepherd, 31 N. H. (11 Fost.) 490, 495; Hastings v. Columbus, 42 Ohio St. 585, 589.

AWARE.

See "Become Aware."

AWAY.

See, also, "Carry Away."

A statute prohibiting larceny provided that, if the defendant should take, steal, and carry away as aforesaid any property of another, he should be punished. Held, that an indictment omitting from the phrase "take, steal, and carry away" the word "away" did not state an offense under the statute, since without an allegation that the goods were carried "away" there was no allegation that the goods had been asported wrongfully beyond the premises of the possessor. Commonwealth v. Adam, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 43, 45.

AWNING.

In Webster's International Dictionary, the word "awning" is defined as follows: "A roof-like cover, usually of canvas, extended over or before any place as a shelter from the sun, rain, or wind." In the Century Dictionary, as follows: "A movable, roof-like covering of canvas or other cloth spread over in any place, or in front of a window, door, etc., as a protection from the sun's rays." As thus defined, "awning" means the covering which shelters or protects, as distinct from its frame or support, and this covering may extend over or hang in front of the protected place. It is in the sense of the covering, as distinct from its frame, that the word "awning" is used in a city ordinance prohibiting the erection or use of any awning, except the same be upon a suitable frame and attached entirely to the building. State v. Clarke, 37 Atl. 975, 976 69 Conn. 371, 39 L. R. A. 670, 67 Am. St. Rep. 30.

AX.

An ax is a mechanical tool, rather than a weapon to be used in combat, and the mere fact that one of three men carries an ax to a sawmill, which they enter, cannot be supposed to excite terror. Pike v. Witt, 104 Mass. 595, 597.

AXLE BOX.

"Axle boxes" are "bushings for hubs." Their duty is to take the wear incident to revolving on the spindle of the axle. Ivès v. Hartford Spring & Axle Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. 510, 511.

AYUNTAMIENTO.

"Ayuntamiento" was the name used in the Mexican law to designate a town or city council. Friedman v. Goodwin (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 818.

AZO.

Certain aniline colors derived from coal tar are known as "azo compounds." The word "azo" is derived from azote or nitrogen, being used to show that these compounds contain nitrogen in the form of nitrous acid. Matheson v. Campbell (U. S.) 69 Fed. 597, 600; Id., 78 Fed. 910, 912, 24 C. C. A. 384.

AZOTIZE.

Among the chemical processes used in the creation or development of coal tar colors is that of azotization. To "azotize" such a color is to treat it with nitrogen. Matheson v. Campbell (U. S.) 69 Fed. 597, 600; Id., 78 Fed. 910, 912, 24 C. C. A. 384.

B

B. & O.

In a case involving the ownership of a steam engine bearing the letters "B. & O.," it was said that the initials of railroad companies come to be as well known to the general public as the abbreviations which indicate the location of land under congressional surveys, and that from Lake Michigan to the Atlantic Ocean the letters "B. & O." on an engine mean "Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company," without regard to the track it is upon or the yard it is in. Ryan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 60 Ill. App. 612, 615.

BABY BONDS.

Bonds issued by the state of Louisiana to fund certain auditors' warrants issued and outstanding at the date of the adoption of the Constitution of 1884 were called "baby bonds." State ex rel. Luminais v. Houston, 38 La. Ann. 533, 534.

BACK.

"Back" is defined to be, in human beings, the hinder part of the body, extending from the neck to the end of the spine. Thus it is held that, although an allegation of injuries to the chest made evidence of the spitting of blood relevant as a possible natural result of a severe injury to the chest, a general allegation of an injury to the back was not sufficient to render evidence of injuries to the kidney and bladder admissible; that region, apparently, not being regarded as included in the term "back." Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Rogers, 53 S. W. 366, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 605.

A statute requiring the certificate of the oath administered to appraisers chosen to make a levy to be written on the "back" of the execution means on the execution itself, and there is no compliance with the statute where the certificate is on a separate piece of paper, one corner of which is affixed to the instrument. Hall v. Staples, 74 Me. 178, 180.

As advance money.

A statement to the employés of a fisherman that a canning company would "back" him and see him through is evidently nothing more than an agreement, in consideration of securing the salmon to be caught, to advance on account thereof a reasonable sum of money, and not as indicating employment of the fisherman by the company. Miles v. Columbia Packers' Ass'n, 69 Pac. 827, 829, 41 Or. 617.

BACK FROM.

In Jersey City Charter, § 41, authorizing commissioners, where the line of the improvement would bisect a building, to require the owner or owners thereof to remove it "back from" the line of improvement in case the owner or owners thereof have land enough left for that purpose, "back from" is equivalent to "off" and "away from," so that the protection of the act can be invoked by the city whenever the landowner has adjacent lands not built upon of sufficient area to move the building upon. Wirth v. Jersey City, 27 Atl. 1065, 1066, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 216.

BACK LAND.

"Back land," as used in a will providing that all of testator's back land should go to certain devisees, was insufficient of itself to designate any particular class of land owned by the testator, and might refer to different objects, or to none upon which any distinctive character could be fastened by extrinsic proof; but where the premises in question and other lands in the same vicinity were known as and called, by the testator during his lifetime and by his family and neighbors, "back lands," the term was sufficient to designate the devise. Ryerss v. Wheeler (N. Y.) 22 Wend. 148, 150.

BACK TAXES.

Taxes for the current year are not included in the term "back taxes," as used in Laws 1898, art. 170, § 12, providing that no "back taxes" for more than three years shall be assessed. Methodist Episcopal Church South v. City of New Orleans, 32 South. 101, 102, 107 La. 611.

"Back taxes," as used under Act March 29, 1883, authorizing the payment of back taxes in state certificates of indebtedness, is to be construed as not including taxes which a collector has collected and failed to pay over to the state, but only includes taxes due from the original taxpayer. Gaines v. Galbraeth, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 359, 363.

BACKER.

Though the nature of the obligation which an indorser of a note intended to contract was sufficiently manifested by putting his name on the back of the note, the addition of the word "backer" seems to have been for the purpose of declaring still more explicitly that he was to be regarded as an indorser. Seabury v. Hungerford (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 80, 81.

BACKGAMMON.

"Backgammon," which is defined as a game played with dice and 30 pieces, called "men," on a board or table peculiarly marked, is a game not dependent on chance, but largely on the skill of the player. The dice are employed as a convenient mode of determining who shall move first, and afterwards of designating the number of points in the table each player shall be entitled to move his men on their journey to the home table. The table and the pieces or men are indispensable agencies. The dice may be dispensed with. In backgammon the dice do not determine the result of the game. That is determined by the moves of the men by the opposing players. It is not, therefore, a "game played with dice," within the prohibition of Rev. Code, § 3620, against gaming. Wetmore v. State, 55 Ala. 198, 201.

BACK-UP SIGNAL.

There is a difference between a "back-up signal" and a "kick signal." A back-up signal means that the engineer shall back up the train. A kick signal means that the speed shall be sufficiently increased to throw the cut-off car into the side track by the force of the increased momentum, without following the car into the switch with the rest of the train. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hill, 70 S. W. 108, 105, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 12.

BACKWATER.

Backwater is the flow of a stream which is retarded and returned in an opposite direction from that in which the stream flows, caused by some natural or artificial obstruction from the channel, as a dam, etc. Hodges v. Raymond, 8 Mass. 316.

Backwater is, in the ordinary sense, water prevented from flowing by reason of an obstruction in its course. Chambers v. Kyle, 87 Ind. 88, 85.

BAD.

"Good" and "bad" are terms of comparison. The same article may be called, not inaccurately, good when compared with one of the same kind of a much inferior quality, and it may with equal correctness be characterized as bad when spoken of with reference to the most perfect article of the kind. Tobias v. Harland (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 537, 541, 8 Wheeler, Am. Com. Law, 115.

BAD BEHAVIOR.

"Bad behavior" is defined to be such conduct as the law punishes. A person who has committed perjury has been guilty of bad behavior, which will preclude his being naturalized as a citizen under the statute requiring such applicants to have behaved as men of good moral character. In re Spencer (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 921.

BAD CHARACTER.

"Bad character," as applied to man or woman, is used by very common acceptance to designate loose, immoral, or lascivious deportment. Carter v. Cavanaugh (Iowa) 1 G. Greene, 171, 175.

"Bad or loose character," when spoken of a woman, constitutes an assault on her character as a virtuous woman, though the words do not expressly charge fornication. Kedrolivansky v. Niebaum, 11 Pac. 641, 642, 70 Cal. 216.

The expressions "bad character" and "general reputation" are constantly used to signify character and reputation with regard to morals. O'Brien v. Frasier, 1 Atl. 465, 470, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 349, 54 Am. Rep. 170.

BAD DEBTS.

"Bad debts," as used in the provision that the security to be given by every administrator shall be one-fourth beyond the estimated value of the movables and immovables, and of the credits comprised in the inventory, exclusive of the bad debts, means those debts which have been prescribed against and those due by bankrupts who have surrendered no property to be divided among their creditors. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1048.

"Bad debts," as used in the chapter on banking corporations, prohibiting the making of dividends to an amount greater than the net profits on hand, deducting therefrom losses or bad debts, includes all debts due to the association, on which the interest is past due and unpaid for a period of six months, unless the same are well secured and in process of collection. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3240.

BAD DISEASE.

Whether to say of a married woman that she has a "bad disease" is equivalent to charging her with having a venereal disease is uncertain, and would appear to be a question for the jury. Upton v. Upton, 4 N. Y. Supp. 936, 938, 51 Hun, 184.

BAD EGG.

"Bad egg" is a well known and commonly understood colloquism in this country for a bad or worthless person, and is so defined in Cent. Dict. p. 1853. To call another person a "bad egg" is grossly libelous per se, even without innuendo to explain the meaning of such words, and no allegation of special damage is necessary. Pfzinger v. Dubs (U. S.) 64 Fed. 696, 702, 12 C. C. A. 389.

BAD FAITH.

Gross negligence as, see "Gross Negligence."

The term "in bad faith" is not a technical term, used only in actions for deceit. It is an ordinary expression, the meaning of which is not doubtful. It means "with actual intent to mislead or deceive another." It refers to a real and actual state of mind, capable of both direction and circumstantial proof. A statutory provision that no immaterial misrepresentation in the application shall avoid a policy of insurance, unless it is made in bad faith, means with an actual intent to mislead or deceive, and does not include a misstatement honestly made through inadvertence, or even gross forgetfulness or carelessness. Pen Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & Trust Co. (U. S.) 73 Fed. 653, 654, 19 C. C. A. 316, 38 L. R. A. 83, 70.

In an instruction in an action for damages for breach of a contract to convey land, that if the defendant had it in his power to comply with his contract, and did not do so, and if he acted in bad faith toward the plaintiff, the measure of damages would be the value of the land at the time he was evicted, "bad faith" is an indefinite term, and does not necessarily imply fraud, and does not indicate fraud in the contract. Harris v. Harris, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 170, 174 (cited in Rineer v. Collins, 27 Atl. 28, 29, 156 Pa. 342).

"Bad faith" and "fraud" are synonymous. Hilgenberg v. Northup, 83 N. E. 786, 787, 134 Ind. 92.

Code, § 2850, provides that, where an insurance company refuses to pay a loss on a life policy after having received notice thereof, it shall be liable for the amount in addition to the face of the policy and attorney's fees, unless it is made to appear that such refusal to pay was not in bad faith. Held, that "bad faith" is not synonymous with the term "actual fraud," but is merely descriptive "of some device or excuse resorted to by insurance companies to hinder and delay the insured in the collection of the loss." Cotton States Life Ins. Co. v. Edwards, 74 Ga. 220, 230.

Bad faith will not be imputed, unless there is something in the particular transaction which is equivalent to fraud, actual or constructive. Morton v. New Orleans & S. Ry. Co. & Immigration Ass'n, 79 Ala. 590, 617.

"The doctrine is that bad faith, as contradistinguished from good faith, in the limitation act, is not established by showing actual notice of existing claims or liens of other persons to the property, or by showing a knowledge on the part of the holder of the color of title of legal defects which prevent the color of title from being an absolute one. Where there is no actual fraud, and no proof showing that the color of title was acquired in bad faith, which means in or by fraud, this court will hold that it was acquired in good faith." Coleman v. Billings, 89 Ill. 183, 191.

Civ. Code, art. 1934, provides that, when a debtor has been guilty of no fraud or bad faith, he is liable only for such damages as were contemplated or may reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract, and further provides that by bad faith is not meant the mere breach of faith in not complying with the contract, but a designed breach of it for some motive of interest or ill will. Lewis v. Holmes, 34 South. 66, 67, 109 La. 1030, 61 L. R. A. 274.

BAD FEELING.

On trial for homicide, testimony of bad feeling between defendant and deceased is competent to show malice; bad feeling being a fact to which a witness may testify, and standing in the same category as health, sickness, good humor, anger, jest. Holmes v. State, 14 South. 864, 865, 100 Ala. 80.

BAD GIRL OR WOMAN.

The words, "She is a bad girl, a very bad girl, and unworthy to be employed by any company in L.," do not import that such person was a prostitute and had been guilty of fornication, unchaste conduct, lewdness, etc. Snell v. Snow, 54 Mass. (13 Metc.) 278, 282, 46 Am. Dec. 730.

"Bad woman," as used in an allegation of slander, was not of itself slanderous. The word "bad" imports no crime, and is not actionable; but the word "bad" may be made clear by its context and the connection in which it is used. Thus, if one speaks of a prostitute, and calls her such, and thereafter pronounces her a bad woman, or if he says she is a bad woman because she is a prostitute, there can be no doubt of the sense in which the word "bad" is used, any more than there can be a doubt of the sense in which it is used if a party says of another, "She is a bad woman; she does not go to church," or "She is a bad woman because she does not go to church." Therefore the meaning of the word "bad" under such circumstances is a question for the jury, and its meaning is to be determined from its context. Riddell v. Thayer, 127 Mass. 487, 490.

BAD HOUSE.

The words "bad house" do not necessarily imply a bawdy house, but may mean a disorderly house, or one that is dirty or comfortless, and therefore a charge that another keeps a bad house is not actionable per se. Peterson v. Sentman, 37 Md. 140, 153, 11 Am. Rep. 534.

To charge a woman with being a woman of bad character, keeping a bad house where men go at all times, is substantially equivalent to charging her with keeping a house of ill fame, resorted to for prostitution and lewdness, which is an indictable offense. In other words, the language, taken in its ordinary and obvious sense, imputes the keeping of a place where disreputable persons resort for illicit intercourse, and is actionable per se. Blake v. Smith, 34 Atl. 995, 996, 19 R. L. 476.

BAD ON THE FACE OF IT.

The term "bad on the face of it," when used to characterize a conviction, means one which shows a want of jurisdiction or directs the imprisonment of a party which the magistrate is not entitled to award. Griffith v. Harries, 2 Mees & W. 335, 344.

BAD TITLE.

A bad title is defined to be one which conveys no property to the purchaser of the estate. Heller v. Cohen, 38 N. Y. Supp. 668, 671, 15 Misc. Rep. 378.

BAD WEATHER.

In a charter party, excepting loss from act of God, restraint of princes and rulers, strikes of miners and workmen, bad weather, quarantine, riots, etc., "bad weather" must be held to include and mean weather not reasonably fit for safe loading, by reason of the state of the sea, as well as of the atmosphere. It means not merely weather during which cargo could not by any possibility have been loaded, but such weather as was not reasonably fit or proper. This would include days when it was not reasonably safe to attempt loading with appliances at hand, and when, under the practice of the port, loading was customarily suspended for that reason by competent men intrusted with the work, and acting on their judgment of the fitness and safety of loading. The Ocean Prince (U. S.) 50 Fed. 115.

BADGES OF FRAUD.

Badges of fraud are such circumstances as cast suspicion on a transaction. Gould v. Sanders, 37 N. W. 37, 39, 69 Mich. 5.

Badges of fraud are facts that are signs or marks of fraud, and which are not sufficient to constitute fraud in themselves. Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 415, 420.

A badge of fraud does not constitute fraud itself, but is simply evidence of fraud—a means of establishing a fraudulent intent. Goshorn's Ex'r v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717, 768 (citing Bump, Fraud. Conv. 78).

"Badges of fraud," as used in reference to a conveyance of land from a father to a son, means such circumstances as would induce the belief that the land had been conveyed to the son, not for his exclusive benefit, but for the benefit altogether or in part of the father, and that therefore the true motive in making the conveyance was fraud on the father's creditors, and not a bona fide advancement to the son. Doyle v. Sleeper, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 531, 539.

A "badge of fraud," as relating to evidence of a fraudulent sale, does not mean that the evidence must be conclusive, nor that it must require the jury to find fraud, but that it is only one of the marks of fraud and has a tendency to show it. There may be great difference in the weight to which different facts constituting badges of fraud are entitled as evidence. One may be almost conclusive, and another furnish merely a reasonable inference, of fraud. Yet both would be badges of fraud, and either might be so explained by other evidence as to destroy this fact. Pilling v. Otis, 13 Wis. 495, 496.

The term "badges of fraud" is used by the courts to designate the acts or conduct from which fraud may be inferred. It is for the court and judge to decide what is such a badge. Kirkley v. Lacey (Del.) 30 Atl. 994-996, 7 Houst. 213.

Matters which, if shown, are usually considered as tending to show fraud in relation to the purchase of goods, are sometimes termed "badges of fraud." Among these are unusual or extraordinary methods in conducting business. Any secrecy or concealment in the business, and any unusual methods or acts connected with the transaction in question, are proper to be considered in determining whether fraud in fact exists in connection with the transaction. Phelps, Dodge & Palmer Co. v. Samson, 84 N. W. 1051, 1052, 113 Iowa, 145.

The usual badges of fraud which will render void an assignment to a creditor are continuation of possession, or a secret trust, or some provision for the ease and comfort or benefit of the assignor, or the insertion of some feigned debt not due by the assignor. Royster v. Stallings, 32 S. E. 384, 386, 124 N. C. 55.

BAGGAGE.

See, also, "Luggage"; "Personal Luggage."

Baggage is property carried by the person, and stands on a different footing from the carriage of other property, so that a statute authorizing street surface railroads to carry persons and property in their cars could not be presumed to limit the term "property" to baggage merely. Degrauw v. Long Island Electric Ry. Co., 60 N. Y. Supp. 163, 166, 43 App. Div. 502.

Baggage may consist of any articles intended for the use of a passenger while traveling, or for his personal equipment. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2891.

"By baggage we are to understand such articles of necessity or personal convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use, and not merchandise or other valuables, although carried in the trunks of passengers, which are not destined for any such use, but for other purposes, such as sale or the like." Bomar v. Maxwell, 28 Tenn. (9 Humph.) 621, 624, 51 Am. Dec. 682; Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morrison, 9 Pac. 225, 228, 34 Kan. 502, 55 Am. Rep. 252; Dibble v. Brown, 12 Ga. 217, 225, 56 Am. Dec. 460 (quoting Story, Bailm. § 499); Hutchings v. Western & A. R. Co., 25 Ga. 61, 64, 71 Am. Dec. 156.

It is impossible to draw any very well-defined line as to what is and what is not necessary or ordinary baggage for a traveler. That which one traveler would consider indispensable would be deemed superfluous and unnecessary by another. But the general habits and wants of mankind must be deemed to be in the mind of the carrier when he receives a passenger for conveyance. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwirtz, 73 Pac. 941, 942, 13 Okl. 411.

Common carriers are only responsible to a passenger for the loss of a reasonable amount of baggage, which includes such articles as are necessary and convenient for the passenger and usual for persons traveling to take with them. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Moore, 40 Miss. 39, 43; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Capps (Tex.) 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. §§ 33, 35; Smith v. Cincinnati, H. & D. Ry. Co., 3 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 192, 196; Nordemeyer v. Loescher (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 499, 502; Walsh v. The H. M. Wright (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 106; Jordon v. Fall River R. Co., 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 69, 72, 51 Am. Dec. 44; Collins v. Boston & M. R. Co., 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 506, 507; Connolly v. Warren, 106 Mass. 146, 148, 8 Am. Rep. 300; Johnson v. Stone, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 419, 420.

"Baggage," as defined by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Macrow v. Railway Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 612, is "whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of the journey." Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. Ry. Co. v. McGahey, 38 S. W. 659, 660, 63 Ark. 344, 36

L. R. A. 781, 58 Am. St. Rep. 111; New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24, 29, 25 L. Ed. 531; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 262, 274, 20 L. Ed. 423; Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. v. State, 46 S. W. 421, 422, 65 Ark. 363, 41 L. R. A. 333, 67 Am. St. Rep. 933. "The articles carried by a passenger for his personal use, exceeding in quantity and value such as are ordinarily or usually carried by passengers of like station and pursuing like journeys, are not baggage. Articles adapted to personal use, as his necessities, comfort, convenience, or even gratification may suggest, whatever may be the quantity or value of such articles, are not necessarily baggage." New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24, 29, 25 L. Ed. 531; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. of Texas v. Meek (Tex.) 75 S. W. 317, 318.

What is baggage, within the rule of a carrier's liability, is often difficult to determine. It depends in a great measure upon the condition in life of the passenger, and the length, nature, and object of his journey. According to this criterion, the following articles have been held to constitute baggage: The wearing apparel of the passenger in all cases; the easel of an artist on a sketching tour; the gun or fishing tackle of the sportsman when on a hunting or fishing excursion; the costly laces of a lady of wealth, high rank, and social standing, traveling on a railway; "a manuscript price book, which a commercial agent took in his valise and used in making sales;" the surgical instruments of a surgeon in the army, traveling with troops; a few books carried for amusement or entertainment; and the manuscript books of the passenger used in the prosecution of his studies. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. Ry. Co. v. McGahey, 38 S. W. 659, 660, 63 Ark. 344, 36 L. R. A. 781, 58 Am. St. Rep. 111.

Whether or not certain articles are within the term "baggage" is to be determined from the character and length of the journey, its purpose and objects, the owner's station in life, and the habits and uses of the class of travelers to which he belongs. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. of Texas v. Meek (Tex.) 75 S. W. 317, 318.

Baggage only includes a limited quantity of articles such as are ordinarily taken by travelers for their personal use and convenience, such quantity depending, of course, upon the station of the party, the object and length of his journey, and many other considerations. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. v. State, 46 S. W. 421, 422, 65 Ark. 363, 41 L. R. A. 333, 67 Am. St. Rep. 933.

Baggage includes such articles of necessity and convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use, comfort, instruction, amusement, or protection; and, in considering what constitutes baggage, regard must be had to the habits and condition in life of the passenger. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Collins, 56 Ill. 212, 217.

Baggage means articles of necessity and personal convenience, usually carried by passengers for their personal use, and what they are depends upon the habits, taste, and resources of the passenger. Johnson v. Stone, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 419, 420.

The word "baggage," as used in Ky. St. § 783, providing that every company shall check every article of "baggage" taken for transportation, refers only to what the passenger takes with him for his own personal use and convenience, and which he has committed to the care of the carrier. Generally the articles allowed as baggage are the personal apparel of the passenger, but may include a number of other articles, which may not unreasonably be designed for his pleasure, business, or convenience on his journey. In a general sense, it may be said to include such articles as it is usual for persons traveling to take with them for their pleasure, convenience, and comfort according to the habits and wants of the class to which they belong. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Matthews, 72 S. W. 302, 303, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1766, 60 L. R. A. 846 (citing Oakes v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 20 Or. 392, 26 Pac. 230, 12 L. R. A. 318, 23 Am. St. Rep. 126).

Baggage means not only the personal wearing apparel of the passenger, but other conveniences for his personal accommodation. Smith v. Boston & M. R. R., 44 N. H. 325, 331.

The carrier's liability only extends to such reasonable articles as may be necessary for the traveler's convenience, no matter what or how valuable other articles may be which are introduced into the conveyance under the guise of "baggage." The articles of property treated as baggage may be clothing, traveling expenses, a few books for the amusement of reading, a watch, a lady's jewelry, etc. Doyle v. Kiser, 6 Ind. 242, 247.

"Baggage" is synonymous with the term "luggage"; the former term being in general use in the United States, while the latter prevails in England. Pfister v. Central Pac. R. Co., 11 Pac. 686, 688, 70 Cal. 169, 59 Am. Rep. 404; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwirtz, 73 Pac. 941, 942, 13 Okl. 411.

Bedding.

A feather bed is not baggage. Connolly v. Warren, 106 Mass. 146, 148, 8 Am. Rep. 300.

Baggage includes bedding, when applied to steerage passengers required to supply their own bedding. Hirschsohn v. Hamburg-American Packet Co., 34 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Jones & S.) 521, 523.

A bed, pillow, bolster, and quilt belonging to a poor man, who is moving with his wife and family, will be held to be baggage. It is very common for such persons to take such articles with them as their "baggage." They are not merchandise, are of small value, may be put in a box or trunk like apparel, are frequently of immediate, necessary, and personal use to the owner, and both in custom and in regard to the property of such travelers, are often and properly treated as "baggage." Oulmit v. Henshaw, 35 Vt. 605, 622, 84 Am. Dec. 646.

Bicycles.

The words "ordinary baggage" and "baggage," whenever used in the act relating to the incorporation of railroad companies, shall be deemed to include bicycles. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 6316.

Books.

Manuscript books, the property of a student, the papers and books of a lawyer, in a trunk, are baggage. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 262, 269, 20 L. Ed. 423.

In Phelps v. London, etc., Ry. Co., 19 J. Scott, N. S. (115 E. C. L.) 321, the question for the court was whether an attorney, traveling as a passenger on a railway, was entitled to carry with him his portmanteau, as ordinary luggage, and the deeds and documents which were required as evidence on a trial which he was going to attend, and it was held that he was not. On the other hand, in Hopkins v. Westcott, 12 Fed. Cas. 495, it was held that manuscript books, the property of a student and necessary to the prosecution of his studies, are to be regarded as baggage. In that case Shipman, J., says: "Now it may safely be said that books constitute to some extent a part of the baggage of every intelligent traveler. Especially is this the case with scholars, students, and members of the learned professions. There is no reason why they should not be under the protection of the law, as against the negligence of carriers, as well as any other portions of their baggage. But it is said that no case can be shown where the carrier has been held liable for manuscripts. No such case has been cited, and, in my researches, I have found none. But I see no reason for adopting a rule by which they should be excluded, under all circumstances, from the list of articles termed 'baggage.' With a lawyer going to a distant place to attend court, with the author proceeding to his publisher's, with the lecturer traveling to the place where his engagement is to be fulfilled, manuscripts often form, though a small, yet an indispensable, part of his baggage. They are carried, as such, in his trunk or portmanteau, among his other necessary effects. They are indispensable to the object of his journey; and, as they are carried with his baggage in accordance with custom, I see no reason why they should not be deemed as necessary a part of his baggage as his novel or his fishing tackle. In the present case the manuscript books lost are admitted to have been necessary articles for the student at the institution to which he was proceeding. They must, under all the circumstances, be deemed to have been a part of his baggage, for which the defendants are liable." It must, on the whole, be held that the book in question was an article of personal baggage, within the definition above given and the decisions upon the subject. It was a thing of personal use and convenience to the plaintiff, according to the wants of the particular class of travelers to which he belonged, and was taken with him as well with reference to the immediate necessities of his journey as to the ultimate purposes of it. It was not an article of merchandise or the like, or anything designed for use ulterior the purposes of his journey, but a book of memoranda, convenient and necessary for him personally in accomplishing the object of his travel. It was personal baggage, within the definition and rule of law upon that subject. Gleason v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 32 Wis. 85, 99, 14 Am. Rep. 716.

Record books, used by a passenger in her vocation as nurse, are properly included in the term "baggage." Werner v. Evans, 94 Ill. App. 323, 330.

Guns, etc.

A passenger making a voyage from a foreign country can with propriety take with him as baggage whatever is suitable for his personal convenience on the journey, or his amusement or use in the country to which he is bound. Guns for sporting and a small quantity of clothing materials are baggage. Van Horn v. Kermit (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 453, 457.

Baggage does not include a Colt's revolver and silver tea spoons, nor surgical instruments, unless the guest is a physician or surgeon, or student of medicine. Giles v. Fauntleroy, 13 Md. 126, 139.

Household furniture.

The term "baggage" is not to be construed as including household furniture. Vasse v. Ball (Pa.) 2 Dall. 270, 276, 1 L. Ed. 377.

"Furniture or household goods would not come within the description of ordinary luggage, unless accepted as such by the carrier." Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morrison, 9 Pac. 225, 228, 34 Kan. 502, 55 Am. Rep. 252.

Jewelry, etc.

Articles taken with a traveler for use while on his journey are "baggage." The term includes articles intended to be used at the end of the journey, or during a temporary stay at a particular place, as well as those actually used in the transit. The term also includes such articles of apparel, ornaments, etc., as are in daily use by travelers for convenience, comfort, or recreation, and may include, not only clothing, but traveling expense money, books for amusement, a watch and ladies' jewelry for dressing, etc., and an almost indefinite number and variety of articles proper for use on the journey, and will include an opera glass though the trip is made by night. Toledo, W. & W. Ry. Co. v. Hammond, 33 Ind. 379, 382, 5 Am. Rep. 221.

Such jewelry and personal ornaments as are appropriate to the wardrobe, rank, and social position of the passenger will be held to be baggage, but no further. Mauritz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 765, 771.

Jewelry of little value and such as is ordinarily worn about the person comes within the definition of baggage. Torpey v. Williams (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 162, 165.

A diamond pin will be held to come within the term baggage. Coward v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 225, 233, 57 Am. Rep. 227; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 262, 269, 20 L. Ed. 423.

It is not very obvious in what manner the court can restrict the quantity or value of articles that may be deemed either proper or useful for the ordinary purposes of travelers. In the nature of things it is susceptible of no precise or definite rule, and includes the jewelry of the passenger's wife and every other article pertaining to her wardrobe that may be necessary or convenient in traveling. McGill v. Rowand, 3 Pa. (3 Barr) 451, 453, 45 Am. Dec. 654.

Baggage includes only such things as may be necessary to the convenience and comfort of the traveler, and perhaps sufficient money to defray the expenses of the journey, and will not include $30,000 worth of jewelry. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Carrow, 73 Ill. 348, 352, 24 Am. Rep. 248.

We understand the rule to be that the jury, in determining what penalty a traveler is entitled to recover from the carrier in case of loss, may consider what he has been in the habit of carrying for his personal convenience or use within a reasonable limit, or what a person so circumstanced is ordinarily in the habit of carrying. It would be difficult to include, within the definition of "baggage" contained in the books, presents intended for others, or a silver match box, unless the jury believed it to be reasonable personal baggage, or Masonic regalia, or presents received from friends. Nevins v. Bay Steamboat Co., 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 225, 235.

Baggage includes whatever is reasonably necessary for the personal use or convenience of a passenger. Gold chains, gold rings, a silver pencil case, and money sufficient to pay necessary expenses, have been held to be embraced under the term "baggage." A railroad company cannot restrict the right of a passenger to carry baggage necessary for his comfort or convenience by calling it "wearing apparel." Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Ware (Tex.) 60 S. W. 343, 344.

The "baggage" of a passenger, which a common carrier by sea is required by law to carry safely as a part of his contract with the passenger, means wearing apparel of the passenger, and does not include gold ornaments for presents and coin. The Ionic (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 88.

It is only apparel and other articles necessary for a person's comfort and convenience while away from home, with the necessary sum of money for his expenses, and does not include merchandise, jewelry, and other valuables, which a person, under the pretense of having his "baggage" transported, places in the hands of the carriers. Cincinnati & C. Air Line R. Co. v. Marcus, 38 Ill. 219, 223.

The baggage of a man cannot with any accuracy be said to include one sack, a muff, and two silver napkin rings. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Boyce, 73 Ill. 510, 512, 24 Am. Rep. 268.

Merchandise.

"The baggage which a passenger is entitled to take with him, and for the safe carriage of which the carrier is liable, means ordinary baggage, or such baggage as a traveler usually carries with him for his personal convenience, and does not include merchandise as such." Grant v. Newton (N. Y.) 1 E. D. Smith, 95, 98; Pardee v. Drew (N. Y.) 25 Wend. 459, 460; Nordemeyer v. Loesch (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 499, 502; Stimson v. Connecticut River R. Co., 98 Mass. 83, 84, 93 Am. Dec. 140; Collins v. Boston & M. R. Co., 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 506, 508; Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morrison, 9 Pac. 225, 228, 34 Kan. 502, 55 Am. Rep. 252.

By "baggage" is understood such articles of personal convenience or necessity as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use, and not merchandise or other valuables, though carried in the trunk of a passenger, but which are not, however, designed for such use, but for other purposes, such as sale and the like. Articles consisting of a sample liquor cooler, one beer faucet, one wrench, and one lemon squeezer, which were samples carried by a passenger in his trunk for the purpose of effecting sales, do not constitute baggage. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Capps, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 33.

The "baggage" of a passenger, which a common carrier is required to carry safely as a part of his contract with the passenger, is the passenger's personal baggage, and does not include goods, wares, and merchandise, commonly called "notions," carried in a valise belonging to the passenger. Haines v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 12 N. W. 447, 448, 29 Minn. 160, 43 Am. Rep. 199.

Mere articles of trade and business, and not for personal use, are not included in the term "baggage." Collins v. Boston & M. R. Co., 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 506, 507.

Merchandise, or other articles intended for business purposes, are not included in the term "baggage." Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Zwirtz, 73 Pac. 941, 942, 18 Okl. 411.

The term "baggage" will not include a package containing articles of merchandise only, even though marked "glass" in such a manner as would have given the carrier notice that it contained other than personal baggage. Cahill v. London & N. W. Ry. Co., 10 C. B. (N. S.) 154, 170.

The term does not embrace samples of merchandise carried by a passenger in his trunk to enable him to make bargains for the sale of goods. Hawkins v. Hoffman (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 586, 590, 41 Am. Dec. 767.

Baggage does not include articles of merchandise for sale or for use as samples, and not designed for the use of the passenger. Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 628, 13 Sup. Ct. 711, 37 L. Ed. 587.

Baggage, or luggage, as applied to a traveler, implies something which he bags up or lugs along with him for his daily comfort and convenience on his journey, but does not include window curtains, blankets, cutlery, books, ornaments, etc., even when packed with what is baggage. McCaffrey v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 24 Am. Law Reg. 175, 178.

In an advertisement by a common carrier, declaring that "all baggage was at the owner's risk," the word "baggage" meant the luggage or belongings of passengers, and hence did not protect the carrier from responsibility for a loss of a parcel of merchandise shipped by merchants. Beckman v. Shouse (Pa.) 5 Rawle, 179, 188, 28 Am. Dec. 653.

Baggage means clothing and other conveniences which a traveler carries with him on a journey, and will not include merchandise. Hence a law exempting a carrier from liability for loss of goods and merchandise will not exempt it from liability for loss of baggage. Chamberlain v. Western Transp. Co., 45 Barb. 218, 223.

Money.

Money carried by a passenger in a railway train for use in purchasing a business is not "baggage," within the legal meaning of that term as used in determining the liability of a railroad company for its loss. Levin v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 66 N. E. 803, 183 Mass. 175.

Money bona fide included in the baggage for traveling expenses and personal use, but not beyond a reasonable amount. Jordan v. Fall River R. Co., 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 69, 72, 51 Am. Dec. 44; Walsh v. The H. M. Wright (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 106; Torpey v. Williams (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 162, 165; Hollister v. Nowlen, 19 Wend. 234, 244, 32 Am. Dec. 455; Hutchings v. Western & A. R. Co., 25 Ga. 61, 64, 71 Am. Dec. 156; Johnson v. Stone, 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 419, 420; Jones v. Voorhees, 10 Ohio, 145, 150. Contra, Nordemeyer v. Loescher (N. Y.) 1 Hilt. 499, 502.

The baggage of a passenger, which is included in the contract of carriers of persons, means "traveling conveniences which such passenger takes with him, and includes whatever may be reasonably necessary to the traveler under ordinary circumstances for the prosecution of the journey, for which nothing is more essential than an adequate supply of money for traveling expenses, and the amount must necessarily be measured not alone by the requirements of the transit over a particular part of the entire route on which the line of one class of carriers extends, but must embrace the whole of the contemplated journey, and includes such an allowance for accident and sickness and for sojourning on the way as a reasonably prudent man would consider it necessary to make." But the money must be limited to that taken for traveling expenses properly so called, and does not include money carried for the purpose of transportation or remittance, or for investment in another locality. Merrill v. Grinnell, 30 N. Y. 594, 609.

Both "baggage" and "luggage" mean articles intended for the use of the passenger while traveling, and neither includes money intended for trade, business, or investment. Pfister v. Central Pac. R. Co., 11 Pac. 686, 688, 70 Cal. 169, 59 Am. Rep. 404.

Baggage is what travelers usually carry with them, or what is essential or necessary to the traveler in the course of his journey; and, where a traveler who had just arrived from Europe had $450 in gold pieces in his portmanteau, such money constituted baggage. Van Wyck v. Howard (N. Y.) 12 How. Prac. 147, 151.

Baggage, for which a carrier is liable, does not include money of one passenger contained in a valise which another passenger, with the knowledge of the first, delivers as his own luggage; and to such a passenger a carrier is not liable at all, because he has not been shown to have made any contract with it to transport the baggage. Dunlap v.

International Steamboat Co., 98 Mass. 371, 376.

"Baggage" is a relative term, and must be defined by the facts and circumstances of each case, including the object and length of the journey and the habits and condition of life of the passenger. So a particular sum of money for traveling expenses, contained in a trunk, is to be construed part of the passenger's personal baggage, and the amount must be determined by the whole journey, and include accidents, sickness, and sojourns by the way. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 262, 269, 20 L. Ed. 423.

Baggage extends to such things as might become necessary, convenient, or ornamental during the course of the journey, with such a reasonable sum of money as would be required to meet the actual and contingent expenses. Articles of merchandise, or samples of them, and large amounts of money, are not, on a mere passenger's ticket, carried at the risk of the carrier. Weeks v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 669, 701.

A check is in the nature of a receipt for baggage, and may be given and received at any time which the convenience and custom of the company may dictate. It is not a contract, but evidence of the ownership, delivery, and identity of the baggage. Hickox v. Naugatuck R. Co., 31 Conn. 281, 282, 83 Am. Dec. 143.

"The term 'baggage,' as used in connection with traveling in public conveyances, is difficult to define with technical precision; but it may be safely asserted that money, except what may be carried for the expense of traveling, is not included, and especially a sum" which was taken for the mere purpose of transportation in a trunk, together with the passenger's other baggage. Orange County Bank v. Brown (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 85, 117, 24 Am. Dec. 129.

Baggage, for which a carrier is liable, does not include money beyond a sum sufficient for the reasonable traveling expenses contained in a valise delivered as "baggage," without notice to the carrier of any peculiar value. Dunlap v. International Steamboat Co., 98 Mass. 371, 376.

A carrier, by selling a ticket and agreeing to carry a passenger and his "baggage," cannot be reasonably supposed to contemplate incurring liability in respect to a large sum of money of which the carrier had no knowledge, and which the passenger was carrying solely for the purpose of transferring it from one point to another. First Nat. Bank of Greenfield v. Marietta & C. R. Co., 20 Ohio St. 259, 260, 5 Am. Rep. 655.

The trunk of a passenger, containing $11,000 in money belonging to a bank, which was lost, did not constitute "baggage." Orange County Bank v. Brown (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 85, 117, 24 Am. Dec. 129.

Theatrical property.

The baggage of a passenger, which a common carrier is required to carry safely, consists of such articles of apparel as through necessity, convenience, comfort, or recreation the passenger may take for his personal use, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or the ultimate purpose of the journey. The right of the passenger is limited to the baggage required for his pleasure, convenience, and necessity during the journey. Stage properties, costumes, paraphernalia, advertising matter, etc., are not articles required for the pleasure or convenience or necessity of the passenger during his journey, but are plainly intended for the larger or ulterior purposes of carrying on the theatrical business, and do not fall under the denomination of "baggage." Oakes v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 26 Pac. 230, 231, 20 Or. 392, 12 L. R. A. 318, 23 Am. St. Rep. 126.

Tools of trade.

The baggage of a passenger, which a common carrier is required to carry safely, means the necessities a traveler is compelled by legitimate considerations to transport with his person, and includes a small and select portion of a carpenter's tools, carried in his trunk with his clothing; they being a reasonable part of his baggage. Porter v. Hildebrand, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 129, 133.

The term "baggage" includes tools used by the passenger in his trade, and which he usually carried with him from place to place in his trunk. Davis v. Cayuga & S. Ry. Co. (N. Y.) 10 How. Prac. 330, 332.

Watch and chain.

There is no uniform or definite rule with respect to what shall be deemed baggage. It includes all personal effects, useful or convenient to a traveler in the prosecution, or for use at the end, of his journey, according to his habits, rank, and condition. Carriers are not liable for articles transported as baggage, but not to supply any wants of the traveler as such on his journey, not made known to the carrier or its agents, nor paid for as freight, but put aboard for the convenience of the passenger, simply as baggage, and so treated by the passenger on his journey. The fee for transporting a reasonable amount of baggage by common usage is deemed to be included in the fare paid for passage; but the courts will not allow this trust to be abused, and under the pretense of "baggage" include articles not within the scope of the term or intent of the parties, and thereby defraud the carrier of its just compensation, besides subjecting him to unknown hazards. Articles treated as baggage may consist of clothing, money for defraying traveling expenses, a few books for amusement or reading, a lady's jewelry for dressing, a watch, fishing tackle, a gun, and a pair of pistols; but, where the passenger wears one watch, he cannot carry four as baggage. Mississippi Cent. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 671, 678, 679.

Baggage includes whatever forms the necessary appendages of a traveler, and where a traveler deposited a gold watch in his trunk it must be regarded as baggage. American Contract Co. v. Cross, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 472, 475, 8 Am. Rep. 471; Coward v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co., 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 225, 233, 57 Am. Rep. 227; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Swift, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 262, 269, 20 L. Ed. 423; Walsh v. The H. M. Wright (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 106; Jones v. Voorhees, 10 Ohio, 145, 150.

The baggage which a common carrier by sea is required to carry safely does not include a gold watch and chain. The Ionic (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 88.

A watch, carried by a passenger on his person, is not to be construed as being baggage. Clark v. Burns, 118 Mass. 275, 277, 19 Am. Rep. 456; Mississippi Cent. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 41 Miss. 671, 678, 679.

A watch of reasonable value will be treated as baggage. Torpey v. Williams (N. Y.) 3 Daly, 162, 165.

Wearing apparel.

The baggage of a passenger, which a common carrier is required to carry safely, includes wearing apparel, which is not limited to such apparel only as the traveler must necessarily use on his journey. "Regard being had to the condition in life of the passenger, he may recover, if entitled to recover at all, for the loss of all such wearing apparel as he had provided for his personal use, and as it would be necessary or reasonable for him to use, after his arrival and settlement in this country. Cloth not yet made into garments, but which may have been procured for manufacture into wearing apparel, and which was intended to be so used, to a reasonable amount, may properly be included as a part of the passenger's wearing apparel." Mauritz v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 765, 771.

Baggage includes, within reasonable limits, whatever may be deemed proper or desirable for the necessity, comfort, convenience, pleasure, or amusement of the passenger on his journey, or his stay away from home; and where a person was away from home, without any article of wearing apparel except such as he had on his person, and purchased a trunk and apparel to take with him on his return home, such apparel constituted "baggage"; and the term is not limited to such articles as the passenger expected to use or needed by the way, but includes articles purchased for the immediate personal use of the passenger, though such articles had never been worn. Dexter v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co., 42 N. Y. 326, 331, 1 Am. Rep. 527.

Baggage, for which a carrier is liable, is such ordinary and reasonable wardrobe as is suitable for one in a traveler's station in life, together with such articles as are generally found in the paraphernalia of a traveler. First Nat. Bank of Greenfield v. Marietta & C. R. Co., 20 Ohio St. 259, 260, 5 Am. Rep. 655.

BAIL

See "Admission to Bail"; "Excessive Bail"; "Released on Bail"; "Special Bail"; "Straw Bail."

"Bail," as a verb, means the delivery of one under arrest to another, who is responsible for his appearance. Stafford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 46, 49.

Bail is a delivery or bailment of a person to his sureties, upon their giving, together with himself, a sufficient security for his appearance; he being supposed to continue in their friendly custody, instead of going to jail. Nicolls v. Ingersoll (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 145, 155; State v. McNab, 20 N. H. 160, 161; Gay v. State, 7 Kan. 394, 402; State v. Aubrey, 8 South. 440, 441, 43 La. Ann. 188. Hence a person out on bail is regarded in legal theory as in the custody of the sureties, and a surrender of him by the sureties to the sheriff does not require the issue of a new process against him. In re Siebert, 58 Pac. 971, 972, 61 Kan. 112.

In legal contemplation, upon the recognizance being entered into, the principal is delivered into the friendly custody of his sureties, instead of being committed to prison. The sureties have control of his person, and they are bound at their peril to keep him within the jurisdiction, and to have his person ready to surrender when demanded. The arrest and imprisonment of the principal in another state for an offense committed in the latter place after the entering into of the recognizance is no excuse for the failure of the bail to surrender him at the time and place stipulated. Devine v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 623, 625.

The term "to bail" signifies "to deliver," and was, at common law, the delivery of the respondent to the persons who became sureties for his appearance, and who were, until that time, his jailers. State v. Dwyer, 39 Atl. 629, 70 Vt. 96.

Bail is the security given by a person accused of an offense that he will appear and answer before the proper court the accusation brought against him. This security is given by means of a recognizance or a bail bond. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 303.

Hold to bail.

"Hold to bail," as used in St. 1783, c. 51, § 1, authorizing justices of the peace to hold to bail all persons guilty or supposed to be guilty of offenses less than capital, not recognizable by the justice of the peace, does not comprehend a power to take a recognizance to the injured party for his treble damages, but means merely bail intended to secure the appearance of the person charged with a crime at a court of which the recognizance was to be returned. Vose v. Deane, 7 Mass. 280, 283.

As jailers.

Bail are substituted for the officer whose duty it is to take charge of the party accused. A man's bail are jailers of his own choosing, who are bound to secure his appearance as effectually, and to put him as much under the power of the court, as if he had been in the custody of the proper officer. Gildersleeve v. People, 9 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 18, 22.

Where one became bail for another on a writ issued as a capias against such other in an action of assumpsit before a justice of the peace, the bail is the same as special bail, or bail above, or to the action at common law, and the right of such bail to apprehend their principal is not at all dependent upon their having a bail piece, which is not process, nor in the nature of process, but is only evidence that the surety has become bail. At common law the bail piece seems not to have been delivered to the person becoming bail, but it was signed by a judge and filed in the court in which the case was pending. Lord Coke says that "in truth 'bailly' is an old Saxon word, and signifieth a safe keeper or protector, and 'baille,' or 'ballium,' is safe-keeping or protection; and thereupon we say, when a man upon surety is delivered out of prison 'traditur in ballium,' he is delivered into bayle—that is, into their safe-keeping or protection from prison." Blackstone derives the word "bail" from the French "bailleur," to deliver. Some derive it from the Greek, Ballein, to deliver into hands. "Hence a defendant who is delivered to special bail is looked upon in the eye of the law as being constantly in their custody. They are regarded as his jailers, and have him always as it were upon a string that they may pull at pleasure and surrender him in their own discharge. They may take him on Sunday, which shows that it is not an original taking, but that he is still in custody. Their authority arises more from contract than from the law, and, as between the parties, neither the jurisdiction of the court nor of the state controls it; and so the bail may take the principal in another jurisdiction or another state, on the ground that a valid contract made in one state is enforceable in another, according to the law there. This shows that the authority need not be exercised by process, but that it inheres in the ball themselves, and they may exercise it personally or depute to another to exercise it for them." Worthen v. Prescott, 11 Atl. 690, 92, 60 Vt. 68.

Bail are said to be the legal jailers of the defendant, and may take and render him at any time; but this is not the case with respect to bail to the sheriff. Their undertaking is that the party shall appear at the return of the writ, which can only be satisfied by their putting in good bail above. Hamilton v. Wilson, 1 East, 383, 390.

It is the constant language of the books that bail are their principal's jailers, and that it is on this opinion that they have authority to take them, and that, as the principal is at liberty only by the permission and indulgence of the bail, they may take him up at any time. Nicolls v. Ingersoll (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 145, 155.

A man's bail are looked upon as his jailers in the eye of the law, and for many purposes he is esteemed to be as much in the prison of the court by which he is bailed as if he were in the actual custody of the proper jailer; and it seems that, if the party bailed be suspected by his bailee as likely to deceive them, he may be detained by them and enforced to appear according to the condition of the recognizance, or may be brought by them before the justice of the peace, by whom he shall be committed, unless he find new sureties. State v. McNab, 20 N. H. 160, 161.

As sureties.

"Bail," as a noun, means either the process of bailing or the persons who are the sureties for the appearance of the one bailed. Stafford v. State, 10 Tex. App. 46, 49.

In the case of Toles v. Ade, 84 N. Y. 222, 238, the court, having under consideration a bond accepted by the sheriff in discharge of the defendant from arrest in a civil action, said: "Bail are sureties, with the rights and remedies of sureties in other cases." Bail to secure a defendant's discharge from arrest on civil process and his obedience to any mandate to enforce final judgment sustain the character of sureties in the same manner as sureties for an appeal. Culliford v. Walser, 52 N. E. 648, 649, 158 N. Y. 65, 70 Am. St. Rep. 437.

Upon those contracts of indemnity which are taken in legal proceedings as security for the performance of an obligation imposed or declared by the tribunals, and known as "undertakings" or "recognizances," the sureties are called "bail." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2780; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4623; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1967.

Taking bail.

The taking of bail consists in the acceptance, by a competent court or magistrate, of the undertaking of sufficient bail for the appearance of the defendant according to the terms of the undertaking, or that the bail will pay to the people of the state a specified sum. Code Cr. Proc. N. Y. 1903, § 551; B. & C. Comp. Or. § 1493.

The taking of bail shall consist in the acceptance, by a competent court, magistrate, or legally authorized officer, of the undertaking, with sufficient sureties, for the appearance of the defendant according to the terms of the undertaking, or that the sureties will pay to the state a specified sum if he does not appear. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 4984.

BAIL BOND.

A bail bond is an undertaking entered into by the defendant and his sureties for the appearance of the principal therein before some court or magistrate to answer a criminal accusation. It is written out and signed by the defendant and his sureties. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 305.

As recognizance.

Wherever the word "bail" is used with reference to the security given by the defendant in a criminal proceeding, it is intended to apply as well to recognizances as to bail bonds. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 307.

Recognizance distinguished.

A recognizance at common law was an obligation entered into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized, with a condition to do some particular act, as to keep the peace or appear and answer to a criminal accusation. It was not signed by the party entering into it. A recognizance differs from a bail bond merely in the nature of the obligation. The former is an acknowledgment of record of an existing debt. The latter, which is attested by the signature and seal of the obligor, creates a new obligation. People v. Barrett, 67 N. E. 23, 27, 202 Ill. 287, 63 L. R. A. 82, 95 Am. St. Rep. 230.

There are two methods of taking bail—by recognizance and by bond. In some respects a recognizance is very similar to a bond. It is defined to be an obligation of record, which a man enters into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized, binding himself under a penalty to do some particular act. A bond, or, as it is commonly called, a "bail bond," is also an obligation, but under seal, signed by the party giving the same, with one or more sureties, under a penalty, conditioned to do some particular act. The chief distinction between the two methods of bailing is that the former is an acknowledgment of record of a debt already due, while the latter is a creation of a new debt not of record. A law providing for a bail bond in criminal cases is different from a law providing for a recognizance in such cases, but is neither repugnant to nor inconsistent with it, being merely cumulative. Swan v. United States, 9 Pac. 931, 935, 936, 3 Wyo. 151.

The principal difference between a bail bond and recognizance lies in the fact that a recognizance is a matter of record in the nature of a conditional judgment, and is proceeded upon by scire facias, while a bond is but an evidence of debt, for the recovery of which an action must be brought. A bail bond is taken out of court in vacation, and a recognizance is taken in open court, in which the cognizors confess judgment, to be levied on their property in case the principal makes default in his appearance. Cole v. Warner, 23 S. W. 110, 111, 93 Tenn. (9 Pickle) 155.

BAIL PIECE.

A bail piece is not a process, nor anything in the nature of it, but is merely a record or memorial of the delivery of the principal to his bail on security given. Nicolls v. Ingersoll (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 145, 154; Worthen v. Prescott, 11 Atl. 690, 692, 60 Vt. 63.

BAILEE.

See "Special Bailee."
Other bailee, see "Other."

A bailee is one to whom a thing has been delivered, to be held according to the purpose or object of delivery, and to be returned to the bailor, or delivered over to some other, when the object has been accomplished, or for the purpose of accomplishing it. Phelps v. People, 72 N. Y. 334, 357.

A bailee is one to whom the property involved in the bailment is delivered. State v. Sienkiewicz (Del.) 55 Atl. 346, 348.

The person who takes personal property for the purpose of bailment is called the "bailee." He is the one who is to hold it for the special purpose involved in the bailment, and the person who assumes the responsibility of taking the property in his possession in trust may do so with or without compensation; but, whether he receives pay for it or not, when a man assumes a trust knowingly, he assumes all of the responsibilities of the trust. McGee v. French, 27 S. E. 487, 488, 49 S. C. 454.

"Bailee," as used in statutes relative to larceny of a thing bailed by the bailee, is used in its limited sense, as including simply those bailees who are authorized to keep, to transfer, or to deliver, and who receive the goods bona fide and then fraudulently convert. When it does not appear that a fiduciary duty is imposed on the defendant to return the specific goods of which the alleged bailment is composed, a bailment under the statute is not constituted. Krause v. Commonwealth, 93 Pa. 418, 421, 39 Am. Rep. 762; People v. Cohen, 8 Cal. 42, 43. The term as so used does not mean bailees merely to keep, to transfer, or to deliver property, but any bailee who converts the property of which he is the bailee to his own use, with intent to steal it, without regard to the nature of the bailment. People v. Poggi, 19 Cal. 600; Dotson v. State, 10 S. W. 18, 19, 51 Ark. 119. One who falsely represented to a jeweler that he with certain persons wished to make a wedding present, and that he wanted to take some jewelry to show such persons, and who was given the jewelry upon delivering an instrument purporting to guaranty the payment of whatever jewelry such person should buy of the jeweler for not over a certain sum, the jewelry not being returned or paid for, was a "bailee," within the meaning of such a statute. Bergman v. People, 52 N. E. 363, 364, 177 Ill. 244.

The word "bailee," as used in Pen. Code, 1860, § 108, relating to larceny by bailee, means any one intrusted with the possession of property for a time, and is not confined to the case of a carrier. Thus, where the personal property of a defendant in an execution was purchased by a friend, who permitted defendant to retain and use it until demanded, and, being so intrusted, defendant appropriated it to his own use, he was a bailee, within the meaning of the section, and hence guilty of larceny. Commonwealth v. Chatham, 50 Pa. (14 Wright) 181, 183, 83 Am. Dec. 539.

As agent.

See "Agent."

Consignee distinguished.

See "Consignee."

Public officer.

A public officer, having property in custody in his official capacity, is a bailee. York County v. Watson, 15 S. C. 1, 8, 40 Am. Rep. 675 (citing United States v. Thomas, 82 U. S. [15 Wall.] 344, 21 L. Ed. 89). An officer who has taken property under an attachment acquires a special property in the goods, and may maintain an action, if his possession is violated. See, also, Fowles v. Treadwell, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 377, 378.

BAILIFF.

A bailiff is a servant who has the administration and charge of lands, goods, and chattels, to make the best benefit for the owner, against whom an action of account lies for the profits which he has raised or made, or might by his industry or care have raised or made; his reasonable charges and expenses deducted. Barnum v. Landon, 25 Conn. 137, 149 (citing Co. Litt. 172); Huff v. McDonald, 22 Ga. 131, 161, 68 Am. Dec. 487; Bredin v. Kingland (Pa.) 4 Watts, 420, 422. Although the case of an attorney intrusted to collect money for his client may not be included in the words of this definition, yet by an equitable construction it may be so enlarged as to embrace his case. Bredin v. Kingland (Pa.) 4 Watts, 420, 422.

A bailiff in husbandry was at the common law one appointed by a private person to collect his rents and manage his estates. West v. Weyer, 18 N. E. 537, 538, 46 Ohio St. 66, 15 Am. St. Rep. 552; Elwell v. Burnside (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 447, 453. He has no permanent estate, and may be removed at pleasure. Elwell v. Burnside (N. Y.) 44 Barb. 447, 453.

As deputy sheriff.

The term "bailiff" signifies a keeper or protector, and, from the duties a bailiff performs in and about our courts, is synonymous with "under sheriff" or "deputy sheriff." The term "bailiff" is applied to him because of the special duty of guarding or protecting juries during their deliberations from improper communications or intrusions. In the performance of such duties they act as deputies of the sheriff, and must get their appointment and authority from him, even though they be deputized for the special duty alone. The circuit judges have no authority to appoint them. Nicholson v. State, 20 South. 818, 819, 38 Fla. 98.

BAILIWICK.

"Bailiwick," as used in the return, "Not found in my bailiwick," by a deputy sheriff, does not necessarily include "county," but strictly means that part which is or may be assigned to the deputy. Greenup's Representatives v. Bacon's Ex'rs, 17 Ky. (1 T. B. Mon.) 108, 109; Evans v. Walt, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 110, 113 (citing Gully v. Sanders, 16 Ky. [Litt. Sel. Cas.] 424).

BAILMENT.

See "Gratuitous Bailment"; "Lucrative Bailment."

See, also, "Commodatum"; "Depositum"; "Mutuum."

The essential feature of bailment is a stipulation for the return of property at the end of the term. Farquhar v. McAlevy, 21 Atl. 811, 812, 142 Pa. 233, 24 Am. St. Rep. 497.

The word "bailment," according to Story, is derived from the French word "bailler," which signifies "to deliver." In re Price (Pa.) 16 Phila. 36, 38.

1 Wds. & P.—43

A bailment is a delivery of goods in trust, on a contract, express or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee. Pool v. Adkisson, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 110, 131 (citing Bl. Comm.); Commonwealth v. Maher (Pa.) 11 Phila. 425; Todd v. Figley (Pa.) 7 Watts, 542, 543; Krause v. Commonwealth, 93 Pa. 418, 420, 39 Am. Rep. 762; Harper v. Hogue, 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 624, 630; Ott v. Sweatman, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 97, 112; Krause v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 9 Wkly. Notes Cas. 61, 62.

A bailment is a delivery of goods in trust, on a contract, express or implied, that the trust shall be truly executed, and the goods restored to the bailor as soon as the purpose of the bailment shall be answered. Commonwealth v. Maher (Pa.) 11 Phila. 425 (citing Kent, Comm.); Watson v. State, 70 Ala. 13, 14, 45 Am. Rep. 70. See, also, State v. Chew Muck Yon, 25 Pac. 355, 356, 20 Or. 215; Ott v. Sweatman, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 97, 112; Harper v. Hogue, 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 624, 630; Commonwealth v. Cart (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 495, 496; Krause v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 9 Wkly. Notes Cas. 61, 62; Siter v. Morris, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 218, 219; Trunick v. Smith, 63 Pa. (13 P. F. Smith) 18, 23.

"Bailment" is the delivery of goods for some purpose, under a contract, express or implied, that after the purpose has been fulfilled they shall be redelivered to the bailor, or otherwise dealt with according to his terms, or kept until he reclaims them. McCaffrey v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 74 Ill. App. 80, 85 (citing Story, Bailm.). A bailment is a delivery of a thing in trust for some special object or purpose, on a contract, express or implied, to conform to the object or purpose of the trust. Commonwealth v. Maher (Pa.) 11 Phila. 425 (citing Story, Bailm.); Todd v. Figley (Pa.) 7 Watts, 542, 543; Krause v. Commonwealth, 93 Pa. 418, 420, 39 Am. Rep. 762; People v. Cohen, 8 Cal. 42, 43; Watson v. State, 70 Ala. 13, 14, 45 Am. Rep. 70; Goodwyn v. State (Tex.) 64 S. W. 251, 252. See, also, Fulcher v. State, 25 S. W. 625, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 621; Harper v. Hogue, 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 624, 630; Ott v. Sweatman, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 97, 112; Taylor v. Campbell (Pa.) 1 Pittsb. R. 459, 462; Siter v. Morris, 13 Pa. (1 Harris) 218, 219; In re Price (Pa.) 16 Phila. 36, 38; Krause v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 9 Wkly. Notes Cas. 61, 62; Commonwealth v. Cart (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 495, 496; Lewis v. Park Bank (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 85, 91.

"Bailment," according to Sir William Jones, consists of, or may be divided into, five sorts: (1) Depositum, or deposit; (2) mandatum, or commission without recompense; (3) commodatum, or loan for use without pay; (4) pignori acceptum, or pawn; (5) locatum, or hiring, which is always with reward. Todd v. Figley (Pa.) 7 Watts, 542, 543.

The old and well-recognized definition of "bailment" is a delivery of goods in possession, and is either to keep or employ (Finch, Law, Bk. 2, c. 18); and such a full delivery of the property must have been made to the bailee as to require a redelivery of it by the bailee to the owner after the trusts of the bailment have been fully discharged. Fletcher v. Ingram, 46 Wis. 191, 202, 50 N. W. 424.

A bailment is a delivery of some personal property, the subject of larceny, by one person to another, to be held according to the purpose or object of the delivery, and to be returned or delivered over when that purpose is accomplished. State v. Davis (Del.) 50 Atl. 99, 3 Pen. 220; State v. Sienkiewicz (Del.) 55 Atl. 346, 348; McGee v. French, 27 S. E. 487, 488, 49 S. C. 454.

A "bailment" is defined to be a delivery of goods for some purpose, on a contract, express or implied, that after the purpose has been fulfilled they shall be delivered to the bailee or otherwise dealt with according to his directions, or kept until he reclaims them. Haskins v. Dern, 56 Pac. 953, 955, 19 Utah, 89; Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 52 N. E. 898, 899, 178 Ill. 107, 69 Am. St. Rep. 290.

A "bailment" is defined as a transfer of the possession of personal property from one person to another without the transfer of the ownership of it. Malz v. State, 37 S. W. 748, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 447.

"The objects of bailment may be as various as the transactions of man. They are made for the purpose of sale, hire, safe-keeping, etc. In some cases, in fact a large majority of the transactions, they are made for the purpose of the disposition or for the conversion of the property." People v. Cohen, 8 Cal. 42, 43.

Delivery, under which the bailee acquires an independent and temporarily exclusive possession, is essential to a contract of bailment. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Baker, 45 S. E. 673, 118 Ga. 809.

Delivery is one of the elements of a bailment. Commonwealth v. Williams, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 1, 9.

All bailments, whether with or without compensation to the bailee, are contracts founded upon a sufficient consideration. McCauley v. Davidson, 10 Minn. 418, 421 (Gil. 335, 338).

A bailment is a delivery of goods or property for the execution of a special object, beneficial either to the bailor or bailee or both, and upon a contract, express or implied, to carry out this object and dispose of the property in conformity with the purpose of the trust. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2894; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Baker, 45 S. E. 673, 118 Ga. 809.

Carriage of goods.

See "Contract of Carriage."

Among the purposes included within such definition of "bailment" is hiring of the carriage of goods from one place to another for a stipulated or implied reward. There is nothing in this definition which excludes carriage of goods by water, and that such carriage of goods comes within the principles of bailment is evident from Story, Bailm. §§ 496, 501, 504, and elsewhere. Knapp, Stout & Co. v. McCaffrey, 52 N. E. 898, 899, 178 Ill. 107, 69 Am. St. Rep. 290.

The "carriage of goods" is by all legal writers classed as a different contract of bailment, having peculiarities and governed by principles characteristic of the relation quite apart from the contract of bailment of chattels for hire. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. New Jersey Electric Ry. Co., 38 Atl. 828, 832, 60 N. J. Law 338.

Conditional sale distinguished.

It is not infrequently a matter of difficulty to accurately distinguish between a conditional sale and a bailment of property. The border line is somewhat obscure at times. The question must be solved by the ascertainment of the real intent of the contracting parties as found in their agreement. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. v. Western Land & Cattle Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 49, 53, 7 C. C. A. 660.

A conditional sale implies the delivery to the purchaser of the subject-matter, the title passing only upon the performance of a condition precedent, or becoming reinvested in the seller upon failure to perform a condition subsequent. It is not infrequently a matter of difficulty to accurately distinguish between a conditional sale and a bailment of property. It is an indelible incident to a bailment that if the identical thing, either in its original or an altered form, is to be returned, it is a bailment. In a contract of sale there is this distinguishing test common to an absolute and a conditional sale: that there must be an agreement, expressed or implied, to pay the purchase price. In a bailment, if a bailment for hire, there must be payment for the use of the thing let or bailed. If service is to be rendered to the subject-matter of the bailment, there must be compensation for the service, unless the bailment be a mandate. An agreement to feed and care for cattle at the expense of a defendant, whose compensation was to be money realized from the sale of the cattle exceeding a certain sum per head, but who was liable for deterioration in flesh or condition, was a bailment, and not a conditional sale. Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. v. Western Land & Cattle Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 49, 53, 7 C. C. A. 660.

The most approved test to be applied to determine whether a contract is a conditional sale rather than a bailment lies in ascertaining whether there was a promise to pay for the goods. If so, as a general rule, the transaction will be declared a conditional sale. Norton v. Fisher, 85 N. W. 801, 802, 113 Iowa, 595.

The term "conditional sale," and not the term "bailment," is correctly applied to the relation arising by a contract by a manufacturer to construct a refrigerating plant in a brewery on foundations to be furnished by the brewer, with a stipulation that the title is not to pass until the entire purchase price has been paid; and therefore, while the sale is valid between the parties, the machinery and plant are subject to be sold on execution against the brewer. Ott v. Sweatman, 31 Atl. 102, 106, 166 Pa. 217.

Where one agrees with another to send him goods for the latter to sell or return, it is often difficult to determine whether the contract constitutes a sale or a bailment. The contract may not constitute a sale, but be a bailment, with an option on the part of the bailee to buy. Or it may be a sale with an option on the part of the vendee to return the goods; such a contract being termed a "contract of sale or return." An option to purchase if he like is essentially different from an option to return a purchase if he should not like. In one case the title will not pass until the option is determined; in the other, the property passes at once, subject to the right to rescind and return. Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198. If the owner of goods deliver them to another with the understanding that there is to be no sale until the happening of a certain condition, this is a bailment, and the title does not pass until the condition happens. If the goods be delivered with the understanding that under certain circumstances the vendee may return them, this is a conditional sale, and title immediately passes, although under the contract the vendee may have the right to rescind and return the goods. In the one case the condition is precedent, in the other subsequent. Under a contract of sale or return, the title passes and remains in the vendee until the option to return is exercised. A bailee with an option to purchase does not become a purchaser until he exercises such option. Furst Bros. v. Commercial Bank, 43 S. E. 728, 729, 117 Ga. 472.

Consignment for sale.

An assignment of goods to the care of another, to be shipped to a foreign country and there sold to the best advantage, any loss resulting from sale below the invoice price to be borne by consignors, and profits in excess thereof to be equally divided, consignee to bear expenses of shipment, and to return free of charge any goods not sold, is not a contract of sale or return, but a bailment. Sturm v. Boker, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 104, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

An agreement was made to sell two horses, and conditioned that they be kept in good condition, that the vendee should turn over $250 to the vendor with one-half received in addition to such sum, not to exceed $25, or that they should become the property of the vendee on payment of $275, and further, if not sold within a certain time, should be delivered to the vendor in good condition and without any charge for keep. It was held that such contract was a bailment for safe-keeping, and not an absolute sale. Middleton v. Stone, 4 Atl. 523, 526, 111 Pa. 589.

Denial of bailor's title.

"The right of a bailee to set up title in a third person as against the claim of his bailor has been much considered. It is said that neither a warehouseman nor a wharfinger can deny the right of the person from or for whom he receives the property; and this rule applies to all cases where the bailee seeks to avail himself of the title of a third person for the purpose of keeping the property himself from the bailor." Western Transp. Co. v. Barber, 56 N. Y. 544, 552.

Deposit.

See "Deposit."

May be implied.

A bailment is not always accompanied by a contract, expressed or implied, and in the absence of it the law imposes duties which the bailee cannot neglect without liability; and such duty consists in the restitution of the bailed goods. State v. Chew Muck You, 25 Pac. 355, 356, 20 Or. 215.

The obligation of a bailee to fulfill the trust need not be actually expressed, but may be implied only; thus where the defendant received $10 from a justice of the peace, the money being collected by the justice as fees, and given to defendant to pay to the county treasurer, of both of which facts he had knowledge, defendant was the bailee of the money; there being an implied obligation on the part of defendant to deliver the money to the county treasurer. Goodwyn v. State (Tex.) 64 S. W. 251, 252.

A bailment arises by implication, as where one finds lost goods and becomes a bailee by the act of finding. Phelps v. People, 72 N. Y. 334, 358.

Manufacture of flour.

A bailment of wheat for the purpose of being converted into flour for the use of the bailor is called in the books "locatio operis faciendi," and undeniably exists in the case of a single bailment, and where the flour of the same wheat is to be received in return. Slaughter v. Greer (Va.) 1 Rand. 3, 9, 10 Am. Dec. 488.

Money paid by mistake.

A "bailment" may be defined as a delivery of personal property to another for some purpose upon a contract, expressed or implied, that such purpose shall be carried out. Money paid by a bank by mistake to defendant for more than his check called for is not a bailment. Fulcher v. State, 25 S. W. 625, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 621.

Sale distinguished.

If property be delivered to another under a contract that another thing shall be returned, there is a sale, while if the identical thing itself is to be returned, it is a bailment. Marsh v. Titus (N. Y.) 6 Thomp. & C. 29, 31.

The distinction between bailment and sale is not difficult of ascertainment, if due regard be had to the elements peculiar to each. In bailment the identical thing delivered is to be restored. In a sale there is an agreement, express or implied, to pay money or its equivalent for the thing delivered, and there is no obligation to return. Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093. The bailee may, however, by contract, enlarge his common-law liability without converting the bailment into a sale. The test would seem to be, has the sender the right to compel the return of the thing sent, or has the receiver the option to pay for the thing in money? In re Galt (U. S.) 120 Fed. 64, 67, 56 C. C. A. 470.

If a thing is delivered by one party to another, and the identical thing delivered is to be returned, it is a "bailment," and there is no transfer of title; but if the one to whom it is delivered may return another thing of the same kind, or an equivalent in the form of money, or otherwise, it will ordinarily constitute a "sale," and effect a change of title. Scott Mining & Smelting Co. v. Shultz & Clary, 73 Pac. 903, 904, 67 Kan. 605.

A recognized distinction between bailment and sale is that when the identical article is to be returned in the same or in some altered form, the contract is one of bailment, and the title to the property is not changed; on the other hand, when there is no obligation to return the specific article, and the receiver is at liberty to return another thing of value, he becomes a debtor to make the return, the title to the property is changed, and the transaction is a sale. Lafin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 116, 24 L. Ed. 973; Sturm v. Boker, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 104, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed.

1093; Backus v. Lawbaugh (Iowa) 86 N. W. 298, 299.

Storage of grain.

The distinction usually drawn between a bailment and a sale is that in the former the subject of the contract, although possibly in an altered form, is to be restored to the owner, while in the latter there is no obligation to return a specific thing; the party receiving it being at liberty to return some other thing of equal value for it. To meet the apparent exigencies of commerce the rule was somewhat extended in Sexton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181, 4 N. W. 1090, so that where grain is stored with the understanding that it may be mixed with other grain of like quality and kind, and the warehouseman may buy and mix his own therewith, and ship and sell therefrom, the owner does not lose his title to his proportionate share of the grain, even though the identity of the entire mass has changed through additions and subtractions. Backus v. Lawbaugh (Iowa) 86 N. W. 298, 299.

It is well settled that where a warehouseman has received grain on deposit for its owner in a common granary, where it is mingled with other grain in such receptacle, to which from day to day other grain of various owners of like kind and quality is added, and from which from time to time sales of grain are made, and the warehouseman keeps constantly on hand grain of the quality received, prepared for delivery on call to all depositors, the contract is a "bailment," and not a sale. Potter v. Mt. Vernon Roller Mill Co., 73 S. W. 1005, 1006, 101 Mo. App. 581.

Voluntary assumption of custody.

A "bailment" implies the delivery of a chattel, and to subject one to liability as a bailee. It is a constituent that he has voluntarily assumed or retained the custody of the chattel alleged to have been bailed. The manager of a theater is not the bailee of the overcoat of the patron who hangs it on a hook in a box occupied by him while witnessing a play. Pattison v. Hammerstein, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1039, 1040, 17 Misc. Rep. 375.

BAILMENT FOR HIRE.

See "Contract of Hiring."

"A bailment for hire is a contract in which the bailor agrees to pay an adequate recompense for the safe-keeping of the thing intrusted to the custody of the bailee, and the bailee agrees to keep it, and restore it on the request of the latter, in the same condition substantially as he received it, unless it should be impossible to do so by reason of its injury, loss, or destruction from causes for which he is not responsible. If the restoration of it to the owner or bailor has become impossible from any cause, it lies with the bailee to show it, for it is to be assumed that the one who has had the control and custody of the property is better able to account for its loss or injury than the other. If a pipe of wine, placed on storage, is returned to the owner half empty, or if goods intrusted to a warehouseman, who is paid for his care and trouble, are delivered materially damaged or injured, it is absurd to say that the owner must bear the loss, unless he can show how it occurred. It is sufficient for him to show that the property intrusted to the safe-keeping of the warehouseman had not been restored to him on demand, or has been returned injured or diminished in quantity." Arent v. Squire (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 347, 358.

BAILOR.

The person who delivers personal property to another to be held in bailment is called the "bailor." He is the one who places the thing in trust. McGee v. French, 27 S. E. 487, 488, 49 S. C. 454.

BAKER.

Pub. St. c. 98, § 2, forbids keeping open one's shop on the Lord's day, or doing any manner of labor, business, or work, except works of necessity or charity, and as amended by St. 1886, c. 82, provides that the section shall not apply to sales by bakers of bread and other articles of food usually dealt in by them between certain hours. Held, that "bakers" includes those whose occupation is to bake bread and other articles of food, and does not mean those who deal only in the products of bakers. "One keeping a shop for the purpose of selling bread and pastry which he did not make, or cause to be made, but bought from time to time from other parties, is not a baker." Commonwealth v. Crowley, 14 N. E. 459, 460, 145 Mass. 430.

BAKERY.

A bakery is generally called a "store" or "shop," as is any other room or building where any kind or article of traffic is sold. The American word "store" applies to the building; the name more strictly belonging to the collection of wares within it. Richards v. Washington Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 27 N. W. 586, 588, 60 Mich. 425.

The term "bakery property," as used in a mechanic's lien certificate in describing the property, includes not only those parts of the building in which the process of baking is carried on, but also those parts which are used for storage, distribution, or other purposes connected with the business. York v. Barstow, 55 N. E. 846, 847, 175 Mass. 167.

Fixtures included.

In a referee's report finding that the defendant purchased from the plaintiffs a bakery and stock of groceries, agreeing to pay therefor the cost price, the term "bakery" should be construed to include and embrace all fixtures belonging thereto and forming a part thereof. Neib v. Hinderer, 4 N. W. 159, 160, 42 Mich. 451.

The term "bakery," in a lease of property to be used as a bakery, imports that the lessee shall acquire such appurtenances as usually belong to and are necessary to the carrying on of the bakery business; including the use of water. Gans v. Hughes, 14 N. Y. Supp. 930, 931.

BALANCE.

See "Net Balance."

The term "balance" has in law no technical signification. It is a word, however, which is in popular use. In its literal import it is perhaps only applicable to weights, but is frequently in a figurative sense applied to other things. In this sense we speak of a balance of an account, and we may no doubt, in the same sense, and with the same propriety, speak of the balance of a tract of land. But the word when thus used does not signify the whole thing of which we speak, and always implies that there is something to be deducted or subtracted, and it is only applied to signify what remains after the deduction or subtraction is made. The term "balance" is never used to signify any precise quantity or definite proportion of a thing. It is equally applicable to a small as to a large quantity or proportion. Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Ky. (3 A. K. Marsh.) 18, 19.

"Balance," as used in Hutchinson's Code, p. 506, § 133, declaring that the guardian shall not be chargeable with interest on any balance of money in his hands, means simply the balance that may remain in his hands of the annual income of the ward over and above disbursements for the education and maintenance of the ward. Brown v. Mullins, 24 Miss. (2 Cushm.) 204, 206.

Of accounts.

As claim, see "Claim."

A balance is the difference between the debits and credits of an account. Loeb v. Keyes, 51 N. E. 285, 286, 156 N. Y. 529.

In any sense in which the term "balance" is used in reference to an amount stated between guardian and ward, it would properly express the amount due by the guardian on his account whether such amount was composed of money received as a part of the estate of the ward, or as the income of his property. Reynolds v. Walker, 29 Miss. (7 Cushm.) 250, 266.

In the account of an officer, specifying a certain sum as the balance from last year, "balance," when taken by itself, refers "to the state of the account, and rather shows the amount necessary to make the account even than the actual possession or residue at that time of the sum named. It shows an indebtedness and nothing more, and is not inconsistent with evidence that the item rose from the transaction of the previous year." Kellum v. Clark, 97 N. Y. 390, 394.

"There is a broad distinction between an account and the mere balance of an account, resembling the distinction in logic between the premises of an argument and the conclusion drawn therefrom. A balance is but the conclusion or result of the debit and credit sides of an account. It implies mutual dealings, and the existence of debt and credit, without which there can be no balance." McWilliams v. Allan, 45 Mo. 573, 574.

St. 6 & 7 Wm. IV, c. 120, § 22, excepting out of the jurisdiction of the court of requests any debt for "any sum being the balance of an account originally exceeding the sum of five pounds," applies to cases where credit is given at one time for an amount exceeding five pounds, either in one or different sums, though afterwards the credit might have been reduced under that sum by part payment before the commencement of the suit; and the act did not intend to deprive the court of jurisdiction whenever the plaintiff should claim on the credit side of his account against the defendant items altogether exceeding five pounds, which were proved to that amount originally in the first instance before the defendant would go into his case of payment. Pope v. Banyard, 3 Mees. & W. 424, 430.

A balance is not an account, but the result of an account. It bears to an account the same relation that a conclusion does to the premises of a syllogism. Thillman v. Shadrick, 16 Atl. 138, 140, 69 Md. 528.

The phrase a "balance due on account" discloses no items. Turgeon v. Cote, 33 Atl. 787, 788, 88 Me. 108.

A "balance due upon an account" implies an account between two parties in which the amount of the items upon one side of the account are deducted from the amount of the items on the other side, and the balance thus ascertained. Millet v. Bradbury, 41 Pac. 865, 866, 109 Cal. 170.

Of estate.

The word "balance," as used in a bequest of the "balance of testator's estate," means after excluding what has been before given. It is a residuary clause. The word operates as a residuary clause. Any word importing residue so operates. The word when taken alone in a will imports that the beneficiary shall get what is left after legacies already given and debts. Where it is manifest that the intent was that the legacies should be paid at all events, the implication is that the residuary devisee or legatee shall only have the remainder after satisfaction of the previous legacies. Lynch v. Spicer, 44 S. E. 255, 53 W. Va. 426 (citing Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 43, 20 S. E. 852).

"Balance," as used in a will devising the balance of testator's estate, is to be construed as meaning the remainder of his estate. "It may be true that the word 'balance' in the sense of 'residue' or 'remainder' is not considered elegant English, but in this country it is very often used in that sense, and there is no difficulty in understanding what the testator meant by the phrase 'balance of my estate.' In one of his definitions Worcester gives the sense in which it is understood, 'remainder of anything, as the balance of an addition.'" Lopez v. Lopez, 23 S. C. 258, 269.

Where, after the making of certain specific bequests, a will provided that the balance should be divided, the phrase "balance to be divided" was equivalent to "residue be divided." Davis v. Hutchings, 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 174, 177, 8 O. C. D. 52, 54.

Where a testator makes a bequest to legatees and then disposes of the balance of the estate in a residuary clause commingling real and personal property, the legacies will be charged upon the real estate so devised, as the word "balance" means the same as "residue." Brooks v. Brooks, 65 Ill. App. 326, 331.

A will, giving to testator's wife the balance of all his property, real, personal, and mixed, after certain specific devises, leaves to her the undisposed portion of his farm, and every article of personal property as specifically as if enumerated and described at length. He does not leave her a balance in the sense that she is to have what remains after payment of debts and legacies. She was to have the balance distinct and specific after cutting off the two fields specifically devised. The devise was not a residue of an estate, it was a specific devise of the land, and a bequest of the personality capable of absolute certainty the day after the testator's death. There was no room for the presumption that by the use of the word "balance" the testator meant to give his wife the residue of his estate after deducting the devises specified, debts not known, and other charges. In re Pittman's Estate, 38 Atl. 133, 134, 182 Pa. 355.

Where testator provided that after the payment of his lawful debts the residue of his estate, real and personal, should go to his wife, together with certain described lots, subject to the payment of a certain debt to C., and that the "balance of my estate" should go to his wife during her natural life, with the power to will one-half of the estate to whom she chose, the words "balance of my estate" should be construed to refer to that land described specifically; and hence the widow's interest, which under the first part of the will alone would have been a fee, was limited by the concluding portion to a life estate in the land, with power to dispose of one-half the value by will. Lomax v. Shinn, 44 N. E. 495, 496, 162 Ill. 124.

Testator in his will gave certain annuities and pecuniary legacies, and made a devise of part of his real property, and also provided for the payment of his debts, after which he made the following provision: "It is my will that none of these legacies be paid until after the death of my brother G. W. and wife E., and after their death the balance of my estate, if any, to be equally divided between R. L., S. W., R. W., T. L. J., and A. B." Held, that the phrase "balance of my estate" means the balance of testator's estate, both real and personal, for the reason that testator had devised away part of the real estate and also part of his personality, and therefore must be presumed to have had his real property in view as well as the personal property when he made the residuary clause. Cook v. Lanning, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 369, 372, 3 Atl. 132.

A will, directing the conversion of all the testator's real estate into money, and afterwards providing specific bequests and for the disposition of the "balance of my estate," is to be construed as meaning testator's entire estate after the payment of the specific bequests, including the proceeds of the sale of his real property. Welsh v. Crater, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 177, 180.

A will, giving to testator's brother all his household goods, books, clothing, furniture, etc., that he might desire, the "balance of the personal effects," to be divided among the others named, includes all of the testator's personal effects except such particular personal effects of a designated class as might have been taken by the brother under the will. In re Reimer's Estate, 28 Atl. 186, 188, 159 Pa. 212.

A will, which, after bequeathing most of the personal property, provided that a sum in excess of the remaining personalty might be paid out of the balance of the estate, meant to charge the payment thereof on the realty, and was not equivalent merely to a residuary clause as to the personalty. Roman Catholic German Church v. Wachter (N. Y.) 42 Barb. 43, 50.

Of means.

In construing a clause of a will in which testatrix directed that "I want the balance of my means to go to the African Kansas Freedmen's Association," the court says that "from the beginning of the second clause of the will, where the testatrix orders a sale of the personal property, down to the end of the provision in question, real estate is not mentioned, and it is apparent from the language used that testatrix had no reference to any property except money or personal property. Had the testatrix in the first part of the second clause of the will used language which might include real estate, and then said, 'and I want the balance of my means to go,' etc., there might be some ground for holding that the words 'balance' and 'means' referred to real estate, but such was not the case." Willimas v. Johnson, 112 Ill. 61, 67, 1 N. E. 274.

BALANCE DUE.

The balance due on a general account by a correspondent is, in mercantile language, the fund found in his hands. Parsons v. Armor, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 413, 430, 7 L. Ed. 724.

Where a compromise of debts, interest, and costs had been made, a devise by the debtor, directing the payment of the "balance due" on the claims compromised, will include the balance of the debt, interest, and costs. Appeal of Sinclair, 9 Atl. 637, 638, 116 Pa. 316.

In a statute limiting the jurisdiction of justices in action for a balance due, the term "balance due" means the sum found due by the creditor and debtor after an actual statement and settlement of their accounts. Barker v. Baxter (Wis.) 1 Pin. 407, 410.

In Rev. St. 1898, § 3572, giving a justice of the peace jurisdiction of actions on contract where the balance due does not exceed $200, it was claimed that "balance due" meant a balance agreed on by the parties, and hence an action cannot be maintained in a justice's court where there was no such agreement, and the case of Barker v. Baxter (Wis.) 1 Pin. 407, is cited in support. But the court said: "It is true that it was held in that case, by the territorial Supreme Court, that the words 'balance due,' in an action somewhat similar to the present one, must receive their technical meaning as a balance found due by debtor and creditor upon settlement of accounts, and not their meaning according to common parlance. This construction was followed in Woodward v. Garner (Wis.) 2 Pin. 28, but we have been unable to find that it has been directly approved or reaffirmed in any subsequent cases in this court. If it were a rule of property, we should feel that we could hardly disturb it now, but it is not. We think it has been the universal practice to treat the words as used in their ordinary and common signification, namely, as meaning the remainder after deducting proper credits." Prairie Grove Cheese Mfg. Co. v. Luder, 90 N. W. 1085, 1086, 115 Wis. 20.

BALANCE OF PROBABILITIES.

"Balance of probabilities," as used in an instruction that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and that the burden would be sustained if on the whole proof there was a preponderance of evidence, that is to say, a balance of probabilities of the case in his favor, has no well-settled or clearly defined meaning. It is not equivalent to the words "preponderance of proof." Haskins v. Haskins, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 390, 393.

BALANCE SHEET.

A "balance sheet," as that term is uniformly used by bookkeepers and business men, is a paper which shows a summation or general balance of all accounts, but not the particular items going to make up the several accounts, and in that way differs essentially from an itemized account, which embraces a full and complete statement of all the disbursements and receipts, showing from what sources they were derived, and for what and to whom the disbursements or payments were made. Eyre v. Harmon, 28 Pac. 779, 780, 92 Cal. 580.

BALANCED.

"Balanced" is an ambiguous word. It is sometimes used to denote an ascertained state of accounts, but more often, in the sense of all being cleared off and adjusted between the parties." Finney v. Tootell, 5 Man. G. & S. 504, 509.

BALDIOS O REALENGOS.

Proprios, in Mexican laws, were the productive lands, the use of which had been set apart to several municipalities for the purpose of defraying the charges of their respective governments. Escriche, Dict., words "Proprios y Arbitrios." The vacant lands—that is to say, the unappropriated royal domain—are designated as "baldios o realengos." Sheldon v. Milmo, 36 S. W. 413, 415, 90 Tex. 1.

BALE.

A "bale of cotton" means a certain number of pounds of cotton, and not a package of so many cubic feet. Bonham v. Railroad Co., 16 S. C. 633, 634.

Cotton is the staple article of our commerce, and the term "bale" conveys to the mind a distinct idea of a parcel or quantity packed together in a particular form; and they may be of different weights, different qualities, and, of course, of different value. Penrice v. Cocks, 2 Miss. (1 How.) 227, 229.

BALLAST.

There is considerable analogy between "dunnage" and "ballast." Ballast is used for trimming the ship to bring it down to a draft of water proper and safe for sailing.

Dunnage is placed under the cargo to keep it from being wet by water coming into the hold, or between the different parcels to keep them from bruising and injuring each other. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Thwing, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 672, 674, 20 L. Ed. 607.

BALLOT.

See "Double Ballot"; "Joint Ballot"; "Quad Ballots"; "Voting by Ballot"; "Written Ballots."

"Ballot," as used in Const. art. 8, § 2, providing that the voting for general officers shall be by "ballot," should not be construed in its primary meaning, which signifies a little ball, but with the broader meaning, which has been substituted for the word by reason of the change in the mode of voting from little balls to that of a paper vote. Opinion of the Justices, 36 Atl. 716, 19 R. I. 729, 36 L. R. A. 547.

The word "ballot" is of French origin, and has been adopted in the English language without any change in its meaning, so far as the authorities give us light. In the standard French dictionaries it is defined to mean the act of voting by balls or tickets by putting the same into a box or urn; secret voting by means of ball or ticket. In Worcester's Dictionary it is defined as a secret method of voting at election. An able essay in the Encyclopedia Americana presents the word "ballot" as expressing the idea of secret voting as against viva voce or public voting. State v. Shaw, 9 S. C. (9 Rich.) 94, 138.

A ballot is a ticket bearing the name of a person to be voted for at an election, which is deposited in a receptacle provided for the purpose in such a way as to secure to the elector the privilege of complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the person voted for. Brisbin v. Cleary, 1 N. W. 825, 26 Minn. 107.

"Ballot" means, in the election of public officers, a paper so prepared by printing or writing thereon as to show the voter's choice, and is so used in Const. art. 3, § 3, providing that all votes shall be by ballot. State v. Anderson, 76 N. W. 482, 485, 100 Wis. 523, 42 L. R. A. 239.

"Ballot," as used in Code, c. 3, § 34, providing that the several ballots to be voted at any election shall be printed side by side on the same sheet of paper—the Democratic ballot on one side thereof, and the Republican ballot on the other, and the other ballots, if any, between them, with one black line between each of them—and all persons or candidates voted for by any voter shall be those whose names are printed or written as aforesaid thereon, means the whole column of candidates to be voted for, and does not mean the separate offices and candidates to be voted for; a ballot being a single piece of wide paper, containing the names of all the persons for whom the voter wishes to vote, and the designation of the office he desires each of them to fill, without any other name on it, or any mark save those sanctioned by the act, the names of the poll clerks on the back of it and the defaced columns on the face of it. Daniel v. Simms, 39 S. E. 690, 692, 49 W. Va. 554.

A ballot is any printed or written ticket used in voting. The ballot is identical with the piece of paper used by the voter, and means the same as "ballot paper," as used in Sess. Acts 1893, § 5, providing for the punishment of any person personating another person by applying for a ballot paper in his name, so that an indictment for attempting to vote by applying for a ballot in the name of another person is not defective. State v. Timothy, 49 S. W. 499, 500, 147 Mo. 532.

"A ballot is a bit of paper having printed or written thereon the designation of an office, the name of a person to fill it, and that the person casting it has a right to do so in secrecy." Taylor v. Bleakley, 55 Kan. 1, 14, 39 Pac. 1045, 1049, 49 Am. St. Rep. 233, 28 L. R. A. 683.

A "ballot," as used in Const. art. 2, § 13, providing that all elections by the people shall be by ballot, is a piece of paper or other suitable material, with the name written or printed upon it of the person to be voted for, and the term "ballot" implies secrecy. The distinguishing feature of voting by ballot is that every voter is thus enabled to secure and preserve the most complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the person for whom he votes. Williams v. Stein, 38 Ind. 89, 92, 10 Am. Rep. 97.

A ballot is a paper ticket containing the names of the persons for whom the elector intends to vote, and designating the office to which each person so named is intended by him to be chosen; that is, it is a single piece of paper, containing the names of the candidates, and the offices for which they are running. People v. Holden, 28 Cal. 123, 136.

A ballot is a ticket or scroll of paper, purporting to express the voter's choice, given by the voter to the officer or person holding an election, to be put into the ballot box. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1265.

As vote.

The expression of choice by or through a ballot, or by outcry, or any other particular means by which the choice of the voter may be lawfully known or communicated. Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 161, 194.

Vote distinguished.

The word "ballot" signifies that by which the right of suffrage is exercised. It is the means by which the will is expressed, and is distinguished from the word "vote," in that the latter means suffrage—expression of the will. Gillespie v. Palmer, 20 Wis. 544, 546.

While the terms "ballot" and "vote" are sometimes confused, and while they sometimes may be used synonymously, the ballot is, in fact, under our form of voting, the instrument by which the voter expresses his choice between two candidates or propositions, and his vote is his choice or election between the two, as expressed by his ballot; and when his ballot makes no choice between two candidates, or on any question, then he casts no vote for either of these candidates or on the question. Davis v. Brown, 34 S. E. 839, 841, 46 W. Va. 716.

The word as used in Const. art. 4, § 13, providing that for each judicial circuit a judge shall be elected by joint ballot of the General Assembly, is not synonymous with "vote," but it is used in its popular meaning of a secret vote. State v. Shaw, 9 S. C. (9 Rich.) 94, 138.

BALLOT BOX.

The ballot box is any receptacle provided by the officer or person holding an election for receiving the ballots, which box is to be kept locked, or otherwise well secured, until the election is finished. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1266.

BALLOT PAPER.

The expression "ballot paper," as used in Sess. Acts 1893, p. 157, § 5, providing for the punishment of any person personating another by applying for a "ballot paper" in his name, means the same as ballot, so that an indictment for attempting to vote at an election by personating another person, and applying for a ballot in his name, is not defective. State v. Timothy, 49 S. W. 499, 500, 147 Mo. 532.

BALLROOM.

An indictment charging an offense to have been committed in a ballroom will be understood to mean a place where a social gathering composed of men and women were engaged in dancing, and it is not necessary that dancing was going on. Owens v. State, 3 Tex. App. 404, 406.

BALM.

The word "balm," as used in the expression "Balm of a Thousand Flowers," is certainly not a fancy phrase. It has a clear and definite meaning. In its literal and proper sense, as distinguished from its metaphorical, it means an aromatic, vegetable juice, whether extracted from trees, shrubs, or flowers. And as used for a trade label in connection with a cosmetic, we have on every label on the bottles sold a positive assertion that the liquid inclosed is the aromatic juice of unnumbered flowers. Fetridge v. Wells (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. 144, 149; Id., 13 How. Prac. 385, 390.

BALUSTRADE.

Gen. St. c. 19, § 13, in authorizing cities to make rules and regulations for the erection and maintenance of balustrades or other projections upon the roofs of buildings, as the safety of the public requires, would seem to refer to those additions or structures upon the roof which might under certain circumstances render a highway unsafe for travelers. Cushing v. City of Boston, 128 Mass. 330, 331, 35 Am. Rep. 383.

BAMBOO.

According to the various dictionaries and encyclopedias, "bamboo" is a species of grass, and bamboo blinds and scrolls are properly dutiable as manufactures of grass, under Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 460. China & Japan Trading Co. v. United States (U. S.) 66 Fed. 733, 734.

Split bamboo, cut in lengths intended for use in making brooms, is entitled to free entry as bamboo, rattan, and reed unmanufactured, under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 700, 30 Stat. 202 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1689]. R. Brauss & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 120 Fed. 1017.

BAND.

"A 'band' means a company of persons—perhaps a company of armed persons—but a petition stating that oxen were captured by a hostile band of Indians does not show the organization of the Indians, if there was any." Guttman v. United States, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 84, 87, 21 L. Ed. 816.

A "band" means a company of persons—perhaps a company of armed persons. An allegation in a petition that an army transportation train "was attacked by a band of hostile Indians," and the claimant's oxen "were captured by the said band of hostile Indians," does not entitle the claimant to relief under Act March 3, 1849, providing that any person who has sustained damage by the capture by an enemy shall be paid therefor, since the words "hostile band" may imply merely marauders and plunderers, and not a tribe at war with the United States. Guttman v. United States (U. S.) 9 Ct. Cl. 60, 67.

In Act March 3, 1891, c. 538, 26 Stat. 851 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 758], giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction over all claims for property taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any band in amity with the United States, "band" means a company of Indians not necessarily, though often, of the same race or tribe, but united under the same leadership in a common design. While a "band" does not imply the separate racial origin characteristic of tribe, of which it is usually an offshoot, it does imply a leadership and a concert of action. Whether a collection of marauders should be treated as a band whose depredations are not covered by the act may depend not so much upon the numbers of those engaged in the raid, as upon the fact whether their depredations are part of a hostile demonstration against the government or settlers in general, or are for the purpose of individual plunder. Montoya v. United States, 21 Sup. Ct. 358, 359, 180 U. S. 261, 45 L. Ed. 521.

BANISHMENT.

"Banishment" was first known in England as abjuration, where the party accused fled to a sanctuary, confessed his crime, and took an oath to leave the kingdom and not return without permission. This was not as a punishment, but as a condition of pardon. The practice of granting conditional pardons is sustained by the principles of the common law, and therefore the condition of such a pardon may be banishment from the United States. People v. Potter (N. Y.) 1 Parker, Cr. R. 47, 54.

BANJO.

A banjo is described as a musical instrument of the guitar class, having a neck with or without frets, and a circular body covered in front with tightly stretched parchment. It has from five to nine strings, of which the melody string—the highest in pitch, but placed outside of the lowest of the others—is played by the thumb of the performer. As in the guitar, the pitch of the strings is fixed by stopping them with the left hand, while the right hand produces the tone by plucking or striking. Dobson v. Cubley, 149 U. S. 117, 118, 13 Sup. Ct. 796, 37 L. Ed. 671.

BANK.

A mound, pile, or ridge of earth, raised above the surrounding level; hence anything shaped like a mound or ridge of earth; as a bank of clouds; a bank of snow. Webster.

BANK (In Commercial Law).

See "Incorporated Bank"; "National Bank"; "Savings Bank."

All banks, see "All."

Any bank, see "Any."

Circulation of, see "Circulation."

Other bank, see "Other."

The sense in which the words "bank or banks" are used occur every day in conversation, and are understood by every one. But the sense in which they are intended to be used is determined by their connection with what is said besides. When we speak of an act to be done by a bank or banks, we mean an act to be done by those who have the authority to do it. If it be an act within the franchise of the bank, or the ordinary power of the banking contract, and it is done by the president and the directors, or by their agent, we say the bank did it. If, however, an act is to be done relative to the institution, by which its charter is to be in any way changed, the stockholders must do it, unless another mode has been provided by the charter. In one sense, and after it has been done, we may say the bank did it, but only so because what the stockholders had done became a part of the institution, which it was not before. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 44 U. S. (3 How.) 133, 147, 148, 11 L. Ed. 529.

The term "bank" implies a place for the deposit of money, as that is the most obvious purpose of such an institution. Originally the business of banking consisted only in receiving deposits, such as bullion, plate, and the like, for safe-keeping until the depositor should see fit to draw it out for use. But the business, in the progress of events, was extended, and bankers assumed to discount bills and notes, and to loan money on mortgage, bond or other security, and at a still later period to issue notes of their own, intended as a circulating currency, and as a medium of exchange instead of gold and silver. Modern bankers frequently exercise any two, or frequently all three, of these functions; but it is still true that an institution prohibited from exercising any more than one of those functions is a bank, in the strictest commercial sense. The fact that a corporation receiving money on deposit loans it in the name of the depositors, instead of its own name, does not prevent the business from constituting a banking business. So, where a corporation received money, invested it for the depositors by loaning it in their names, and collected rents and interest on the loans, which were subject to check by those for whom they were collected, and for which it charged a commission to both borrower and lender, it was held that the corporation was a bank. Western Inv. Banking Co. v. Murray (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 728, 731.

A bank is a place where money is laid up, to be called for occasionally. Parker v. Marchant, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 290, 300.

The term "bank" means any moneyed corporation authorized by law to receive deposits of money or commercial paper, and to make loans thereon. Hobbs v. National Bank of Commerce (U. S.) 101 Fed. 75, 76, 41 C. C. A. 205.

Banks are financial institutions regulated by law, one branch of whose business is to receive money on deposit, subject to check; the money deposited becoming their property, to be used subject to those rules of law or custom which limit the amount used so that a sufficient fund may always be on hand to meet the checks of the depositors. Cannon v. Apperson, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 553, 583.

A bank is an institution for the custody and loan of money, the exchange and transmission of the same by means of bills and drafts, and the issuance of its own promissory notes, payable to bearer, as currency, or for the exercise of one or more of these functions. Kiggins v. Munday, 52 Pac. 855, 856, 19 Wash. 233.

Banks are establishments intended to serve for the safe custody of money, and to facilitate its payment by one individual to another, and sometimes for the accommodation of the public with loans. Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, 87.

A bank is an institution of a quasi public character. It is chartered by the government for the purpose, inter alia, of holding and safely keeping the moneys of individuals and corporations. It receives such moneys on an implied contract to pay the depositors' checks on demand. American Nat. Bank v. Morey, 69 S. W. 759, 760, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 658, 58 L. R. A. 956 (citing Patterson v. Marine Nat. Bank, 130 Pa. 419, 18 Atl. 632, 17 Am. St. Rep. 778).

"Bank" is defined by Burrill as a house or place where business is carried on; and by Bouvier as a place for the deposit of money; and by Wharton as a place where money is deposited for the purpose of being let out at interest, returned by exchange, disposed of to profit, or to be drawn out again as the owner shall call for it; and by Abbott as an establishment for the custody of money, or for the loaning and investing of money, or for the issue, exchange, and circulation of money, or for more than one or all of these purposes. The term is applied to corporations or associations authorized to perform such functions, and to the body of directors or officers authorized to manage its operations, and to the office or place where its business is conducted. Rominger v. Keyes, 73 Ind. 375, 377.

Bouvier, in defining a "bank," says: "A place for the deposit of money; an institution, generally incorporated, authorized to receive deposits of money, to lend money and issue notes, usually known by the name of 'bank notes,' or to perform one or more of these functions. Banks are said to be of three kinds—deposit, discount, and circulation." Speaking in a commercial view, Bouvier is doubtless correct, but one of the chief characteristics of a bank, as that term is ordinarily understood, is that it is a place for the deposit of money. The powers of a bank are well stated in Oulton v. German Savings & Loan Society, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 109, 117, 21 L. Ed. 618. Banks, in a commercial sense, are of three kinds—of deposit, of discount, and of circulation. Strictly speaking, the term "bank" implies a place for the deposit of money, as that is the most obvious purpose of such an institution. Modern bankers frequently exercise any two, or even all three, of these functions; but it is still true that an institution, by exercising any one, or more than one, of these functions is a bank, in the strictest commercial sense. Reed v. People, 125 Ill. 592, 596, 18 N. E. 295, 1 L. R. A. 324.

Morse, in his work on Banks (3d Ed.) § 2, defines a bank as "an institution, usually incorporated, with power to issue its promissory notes, intended to circulate as money, known as 'bank notes,' or to receive the money of others on general deposit; to form a joint fund that shall be used by the institution for its own benefit for one or more of the purposes of making temporary loans and discounts, of dealing in notes, foreign and domestic bills of exchange, coin, bullion, credits, and the remission of money, or with both these powers, and with the privilege, in addition to these basic powers, of receiving special deposits, and making collections for the holders of negotiable paper, if the institution sees fit to engage in such business." As a further definition, he says: "Practically a bank is a place where deposits are received and paid out on check, and money is loaned on security. If the institution has the additional power of issuing its promissory notes to circulate as money, it is called a 'bank of issue.'" Hamilton Nat. Bank v. American Loan & Trust Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 189, 190; Auten v. United States Nat. Bank, 19 Sup. Ct. 628, 635, 174 U. S. 125, 43 L. Ed. 920; State v. Comptoir National D'Escompte de Paris, 26 South. 91, 96, 51 La. Ann. 1272. See, also, State v. Franklin County Savings & Trust Co., 52 Atl. 1069, 1070, 71 N. H. 246.

The Century Dictionary, in defining "banks," classifies them under four distinct heads, viz., "national banks, private or state banks, loan and trust companies, and savings banks." In the case of Savings Bank v. Field, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 495, 18 L. Ed. 207, Justice Clifford, in defining a "bank," says: "Banks, in a commercial sense, are of three kinds: First, of deposit; second, of discount; third, of circulation. All or any two of these functions may be, and frequently are, exercised by the same institution, but there are still banks of deposit without authority to make discounts or issue a circulating medium." In Oulton v. German Savings & Loan Soc., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 109, 21 L. Ed. 618, it is said: "Associations engaged in money transactions, whether incorporated or not, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid out or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or for sale, are regarded as banks." From the definitions and authorities quoted, it is quite apparent that to buy and sell commercial paper, to make and negotiate loans—that is, to discount commercial paper, to receive money to be transferred to and paid at other places, to buy and sell exchange upon other cities in this and foreign countries, to receive money on deposit, and to pay the same out upon checks or orders—are each banking functions. Hamilton Nat. Bank v. American Loan & Trust Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 189, 190, 191.

A bank is "(1) a place for the deposit of money; (2) an association or corporation whose business it is to receive money on deposit, cash checks or drafts, discount commercial paper, make loans, and issue promissory notes payable to bearer, called 'bank notes'; (3) the building, apartment, or office where such business is transacted." Banks are of three kinds—"banks of deposit, which include savings banks, and all others which receive money on deposit; banks of discount, being those which loan money on collateral, or by means of discounts of commercial paper, and banks of circulation, which issue bank notes payable to bearer." But the same bank generally performs all these several operations. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 469, 471.

The word "bank," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malthouse, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water-craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any bank, without regard to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

As used in Rev. St. 1876, p. 636, § 6, providing that notes payable "in a bank" shall be considered on a footing with bills of exchange, and shall be governed by the law merchant, "in" embodies the idea of place; and the purpose of the statute was to have the place of payment specified, so that a demand of payment might be made there, and proper notice of nonpayment given, so as to charge the indorser; and a note payable at the Indiana Banking Company is not payable in or at a bank, within the meaning of the statute. Rominger v. Keyes, 73 Ind. 375, 377.

The term "bank," as used in the internal revenue act of 1864, § 110, taxing deposit banks, meant an association engaged in money transactions, whether incorporated or not, having a place of business open for deposits or for collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted on draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for sale or discount. Oulton v. German Savings & Loan Soc., 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 109, 116, 21 L. Ed. 618. See, also, Hamilton Nat. Bank v. American Loan & Trust Co. (Neb.) 92 N. W. 189, 190, 191.

The word "bank," as used in the negotiable instruments law, includes any person or association of persons carrying on the business of banking, whether incorporated or not. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio, 1904, § 3178; Negotiable Instrument Law, N. D. § 191; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, p. 1060; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 562, c. 73, § 207; Code Va. Supp. 1898, § 2481a.

In the construction of statutes, the term "banks" shall include all incorporated banks. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1.

The words "bank," "banker," "broker," "stock jobber," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include whoever has money employed in the business of dealing in coin, notes, or bills of exchange, or in the business of dealing in or buying or selling any kind of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, bank notes, promissory notes, bonds, or other writing obligatory, or stock of any kind or description whatsoever, or receiving money on deposit. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 3.

Every corporation, company, individual, person, or association of persons, whether authorized by law to issue notes for circulation or not, that shall keep an office, counting house, or other place for the transaction of business within the state, and shall discount, buy or sell, or exchange notes, bonds, stocks, certificates of public debt, or other evidences of debt, claims or demands, with a view of profit, shall be deemed a bank, within the meaning of the revenue act. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 4944.

The word "bank," whenever used in the chapter relating to banks and banking, shall include every banking, savings, or trust institution, concern, and place of business in this state receiving moneys on deposit, except national banks and concerns engaged in other lines of business, and receiving on deposit or in trust the money of their employees only. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 20231.

Within the meaning of the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, the term "bank" includes every company, association, or person not incorporated under any law of this state or of the United States, for banking purposes, who shall keep any office or other place of business, and engage in the business of lending money, receiving money on deposit, buying and selling bullion, bills of exchange, notes, bonds, stocks, or other evidences of indebtedness, with a view to profit. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2758.

As bank of issue.

"Banks," as used in National Banking Act June 3, 1864, § 41, authorizing the taxing by the state of shares of stock in such banks, but providing that the tax so imposed thereon shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares in any of the banks organized under the authority of the state where such national banking association is located, means banks of issue only. Lionberger v. Rowse, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 468, 473, 19 L. Ed. 721.

The words "banks or banking institutions" are confined to corporations which are authorized to issue bills or notes for circulation as currency. Ohio Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Debolt, 57 U. S. (16 How.) 416, 438, 14 L. Ed. 997.

Corporation receiving deposits and making loans.

A corporation formed for the purpose of receiving deposits and loaning money is not a bank, within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 34, although it is called a bank, if it does not issue paper to circulate as money. Bank of Sonoma County v. Fairbanks, 52 Cal. 196, 198.

A corporation engaged in loaning its own money on note or mortgage is not a banking corporation. Oregon & W. Trust Inv. Co. v. Rathburn (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 764.

Express company.

A corporation authorized to engage in the express business, and to draw drafts and bills of exchange or sale, and buy the same, in the course of such business, is not a bank, within Rev. St. §§ 1924, 1889, providing that the Legislative Assembly of Washington shall have no power to incorporate a bank, etc. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. 469, 471.

As incorporated company.

See "Incorporated Company."

Loan and trust company.

"Bank," as used in an indorsement on a note made payable at any bank in a certain city, will be construed not to include a loan and trust company, which is neither a national nor a state bank. Nash v. Brown, 43 N. E. 180, 165 Mass. 384.

Trust companies are not "banks," in the commercial sense of that word, and do not perform the functions of banks, in carrying on the exchange of commerce. State v. Reid, 28 S. W. 172, 175, 125 Mo. 43 (citing Mercantile Nat. Bank v. City of New York, 121 U. S. 138, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 30 L. Ed. 895).

As moneyed corporation.

See "Moneyed Corporation."

Private bank.

As the term "bank" is used in Laws 1857, c. 416, § 2, dispensing with days of grace on all checks or bills of exchange on any bank or individual banker carrying on a banking business, it means a bank organized and doing business by virtue of the act of April 18, 1838, entitled "An act to authorize the business of banking," and does not apply to a private person operating a mere private banking house, without regard to the statute. Kern v. Lewis, 8 N. Y. Supp. 79, 80.

Revenue Act June 8, 1891 (P. L. 229) § 1, imposing a tax on mortgages and moneys owing by solvent debtors, whether by promissory note, or penal or single bill, bond, or judgment, except bank notes or notes discounted by any bank, means a corporation—an incorporated institution—and not a private bank. Commonwealth v. McKean County, 49 Atl. 982, 200 Pa. 383.

"Bank," as used in a note in which the maker promised to pay the amount contracted for at any "bank" in D., means an institution incorporated for banking purposes, and not an office kept by individuals or a co-partnership for the purpose of doing such banking business as such persons have been authorized to do. Way v. Butterworth, 106 Mass. 75, 76.

"Bank," as used in a promissory note by which the maker promised to pay a certain sum at any bank in Boston, cannot be construed to include or mean a private bank. Way v. Butterworth, 108 Mass. 509, 513.

Act March 9, 1891, entitled "An act concerning bank officers, brokers," etc., receiving deposits after insolvency, etc., embraces not only officers of incorporated banks, but all persons officiating in a banking establishment, or place doing a banking business, and hence includes private bankers doing a partnership business. State v. Arnold, 38 N. E. 820, 821, 140 Ind. 628.

The word "bank," in Act May 9, 1889 (P. L. 145), prohibiting the receiving of deposits with the knowledge "that . . . the bank is at the time insolvent," includes in its meaning a private as well as an incorporated bank; but, when applied to the former kind of a bank, it clearly means the persons associated together in the banking business, who, as between themselves, are legally bound to contribute proportionally to the payment of the debts, and, as between themselves and creditors, are jointly and severally liable for the same. Commonwealth v. Hazlett, 14 Pa. Super. Ct. 352, 374.

Savings bank.

Revenue Act June 30, 1864, § 110, providing that a tax shall be levied each month on the average amount of deposits with "any bank" or "company engaged in the business of banking," includes savings banks which receive deposits and lend the same for the benefit of their depositors, though they have no capital stock, and neither make discounts, nor issue money for circulation. Savings Bank v. Field, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 495, 511, 18 L. Ed. 207.

Generally, "when the word 'bank' is used in the statutes without words of qualification, a bank of issue is meant. This is the meaning ordinarily given to the word in the community. No one would suppose that a note payable at any bank in Boston was payable at a savings bank." Commonwealth v. Pratt, 137 Mass. 98, 104.

As shop, store, or warehouse.

See "Shop"; "Store"; "Warehouse."

Trust company distinguished.

The distinction between a bank and a trust company is well defined. The powers of the trust company depend upon the terms of its charter, of course, but they are not banking powers. The trust company, like the savings bank, pays interest upon deposits, but its deposits are strictly loans, not subject to check. It may not issue its own notes for circulation, nor does it buy or sell exchange in the ordinary course of its dealings. In directions that are not akin to banking, its powers are much broader, and extend outside the monetary realm into real estate transactions, trusteeships, and the conduct of property interests of all kinds. The exercise by a trust company of some of the functions of a bank does not make the company a banking institution, nor lay its officers liable to prosecutions for violating the banking laws. Dietrich v. Rothenberger, 75 S. W. 271, 272, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 338.

BANK (In Gaming).

See "Faro Bank."

Other gaming bank, see "Other."

"Bank," as used relative to gaming, signifies the fund which every one has a right to bet against, and into which is placed all that is won, and from which all that is lost is paid out. People v. Carroll, 22 Pac. 129, 131, 80 Cal. 153.

"Bank," as used in the statute making it an offense to exhibit a gaming bank for gaming purposes, means the fund of money offered and ready to be staked on all bets others may make against the banker on a game which he keeps or exhibits. This element is a distinguishing feature between a bank and a gambling table. Webb v. State, 17 Tex. App. 205, 206.

As the term is used in the language of the gambling house, the bank "is a fund of money or property or credit offered to be staked on all bets which others may choose to make against the banker on a game which he shall exhibit to entice bets." Commonwealth v. Burns, 27 Ky. (4 J. J. Marsh.) 177, 180.

Pen. Code, art. 359, prohibiting the keeping of every species of gaming device known by the name of "table" or "bank," of every kind whatever, means a bank made or constructed with a view to certain specific games in which the bank is not only part of the gaming device, but is also necessary to the proper playing of the game. In other words, the bank is an essential to the game, and its peculiar construction and the manner in which it is operated form part of the game. Whitney v. State, 10 Tex. App. 377, 378.

The term "gaming table or bank," in a statute making it criminal to keep or exhibit any roulette or gaming table, etc., or any other gaming table or bank of the like kind, or of any other description, includes a faro bank; it being immaterial whether it is included in the term "gaming table" or the term "gaming bank." State v. Whitworth (Ala.) 8 Port. 434, 440.

BANK (Of Stream or Pond).

See "Fishing Banks."

The word "bank" means, among other things, an elevation of earth. Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 321, 322.

"Bank," as used in stating the principle that the right which the public enjoys in a navigable stream is generally limited by its banks, is to be construed as meaning "a steep acclivity on the side of a lake, river, or sea," but it is hardly supposable that anything that could be properly termed the bank of a stream would afford a foothold for travelers. Hooper v. Hobson, 57 Me. 273, 275, 99 Am. Dec. 769.

The word "bank," in a grant of land, though not strictly appropriate to land adjoining the tidal waters, is to be construed in this connection after the analogy of its use in relation to fresh-water streams—meaning, not the shore, but the land adjacent to the shore—and is a definite monument. The bank extends to the margin of the shore. Proctor v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 52 Atl. 933, 937, 96 Me. 458.

The "bank" of a river or stream extends to the margin of the stream—to that point where the bank comes in contact with the stream. Morrison v. First Nat. Bank of Skowhegan, 33 Atl. 782, 784, 88 Me. 155.

Bed of stream distinguished.

"The banks of a river are those elevations of land which confine the waters when they rise out of the bed, and the bed is that soil so usually covered by water as to be distinguished from the banks by the character of the soil or vegetation, or both, produced by the common presence and action of flowing water. But neither the line of ordinary high-water mark or ordinary low-water mark, nor of the actual stage of water, can be assumed as a line dividing the bed from the banks. This line is to be found by examining the bed and banks, and ascertaining where the absence and action of water are so common and usual and so long-continued in all ordinary years as to mark upon the soil of the bed a character distinct from that of the banks in respect to vegetation, as well as in respect to the nature of the soil itself. The bed of the river is a natural object, and is to be sought for not merely by the application of any abstract rules, but as other natural objects are sought for and found, by the distinctive appearance they present; the banks being fast land, on which the vegetation appropriate to such land in the particular locality grows, where the bank is not too steep to permit such growth, and the bed being soil of a different character, or having no vegetation, or only such as exists when commonly submerged in water." Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 427, 428, 14 L. Ed. 189.

Bed of stream included.

A conveyance of land to the bank of the stream includes the stream itself. Axline v. Shaw, 17 South. 411, 413, 35 Fla. 305, 28 L. R. A. 391.

"Bank," as used in a description in a deed which gave one boundary of the land conveyed as the bank of a creek, means a grant to the margin of the stream, and does not pass title to the bed thereof. Halsey v. McCormick, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 296, 297.

A deed defining the boundary of the land by the bank of a millpond passes no title to the land under the pond, for the bank is a defined boundary, without regard to the contingent subsidence of the water constituting the pond, and thereby leaving the land dry. The riparian owner can acquire no title to the land under the pond by accretion, as in the case of a navigable stream. Holden v. Chandler, 18 Atl. 310, 311, 61 Vt. 291.

When land is bounded by a river itself, it extends to the thread of the stream, except in case of navigable rivers. But when bounded upon the bank, it does not go to the water. Where the southern boundary of a highway was described as the northerly bank of a river, the outer edge of a wharf, although extended by filling up beyond the original bank, was regarded as the bank of the river. Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 609, 616.

"It is said in Hatch v. Dwight, 17 Mass. 289, 9 Am. Dec. 145, that, where land is bounded on the bank of a stream, such description excludes the bed of the stream. That remark, as applied with the facts of that case, is clearly founded on proof. The facts of the case were such as to indicate with great certainty that by the use of the phraseology the parties intended to exclude from the operation of the release the bed of the stream. But I do not think that such is the necessary construction of such descriptive words in a grant. The popular understanding of them would doubtless limit the grant to the land adjoining to the stream, and so would the popular understanding of the description which bounded the premises upon the margin of the stream, or the stream itself, but the legal construction of such words contained in the description of premises in the land has by repeated adjudications been established otherwise." A conveyance describing one boundary as commencing on the bank of a certain river, then along said river and the bank thereof, was construed to pass the land to the thread of the stream, though it was navigable, and subject to the right of the public to navigate the navigable portion of such stream. Varick v. Smith (N. Y.) 9 Paige, 547, 551.

Where the bank of a nonnavigable stream is used to designate the boundary of a tract of land, it operates to prevent the tract from extending to the center of the stream, although there is a presumption that land bounded by such a stream extends to the thread of the stream. As was said by Parker, C. J., in Hatch v. Dwight, 17 Mass. 289, 9 Am. Dec. 145, where land was bounded by the bank of a stream, it necessarily excluded the stream itself; and an owner may sell the land without the privilege of the stream, as he will do if he bounds his grant by the bank. This case was approved by the Court of Errors of the state of New York, and the case of Child v. Starr, 4 Hill, 369, decided in conformity thereto. Rockwell v. Baldwin, 53 Ill. 19, 21.

A call of a boundary in a deed beginning on the "bank of the creek thence up the creek" with its meanders, fixes the boundary of the land at the margin of the creek, and not at the middle thereof. Fleming v. Kerney, 27 Ky. (4 J. J. Marsh.) 155, 157.

In Jones v. Soulard, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 41, 16 L. Ed. 604, a boundary of the city of St. Louis, described as on the bank of the Mississippi, was construed to carry the boundary of the city to the center line of the river. State v. City of Columbia, 3 S. E. 55, 59, 27 S. C. 137.

As edge at high water.

The banks of a stream are "elevations of land which confine the waters of the stream in their natural channel when they rise the highest and do not overflow." Gould on Waters, § 45. In Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 14 L. Ed. 189, Wayne, J., defined "bank" as "the fast land which confines the water of the river in its channel or bed for its whole width." People v. Madison County Sup'rs, 17 N. E. 147, 154, 125 Ill. 9.

Mr. Justice Story, in Thomas v. Hatch (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 946, defines "banks" to be what contains the water in its greatest flow, and such will be held to be its meaning in the cession by Georgia to the United States of land running along the bank of a river. Alabama v. Georgia, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 505, 513, 514, 16 L. Ed. 556.

The bank of a river is that elevation of land which confines the waters of the river in their natural channel when they rise the highest, and do not overflow the banks; and, in that condition of the water, the banks and the soil which is permanently submerged form the bed of the river. The banks are part of the river bed. Paine Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 55 Fed. 854, 864. See, also, State ex rel. Citizens' Electric Lighting & Power Co. v. Longfellow, 69 S. W. 374, 377, 109 Mo. 109.

The bank of a river "is defined to be that which contains the river in its utmost heights. The bank is part of the river. The bank is that space which the water covers when the river is highest in any season of the year. The bank is a part of the river, which consists of three things—the water, the bed, and the bank." Morgan v. Livingston (La.) 6 Mart. (O. S.) 19, 118.

That is considered the bank of a river which contains the river when fullest. Another definition approvingly quoted is that the banks of rivers or other water courses are those boundaries which contain their waters at their highest flow. Ventura Land & Power Co. v. Meiners, 68 Pac. 818, 820, 136 Cal. 284, 89 Am. St. Rep. 128.

The "bank of the river," as used in a deed bounding the land conveyed as beginning at a certain point on the westerly bank of the river, thence to a certain point on the same bank of said river, etc., means only to the high-water mark on the bank of such river, and does not include the flats below. Dunlap v. Stetson (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 75.

The ordinary idea of a river bank is that portion of the earth which confines the water in its channel. It joins the bed of the river, and belongs to the riparian proprietor. The bed, if the stream is navigable, belongs to the public. While the banks are supposed to confine the water to its channel, they are sometimes, in freshets, overflowed, but they are not the less defined because they are sometimes overflowed. In determining the boundary line between the bank and bed of the stream, freshets are not counted. Houghton v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co., 47 Iowa, 370, 372.

The banks of a river are those elevations of land which confine the waters when they arise out of the bed. Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 220, 37 Am. Rep. 241.

The bank of a river is that space of rising ground above low-water mark which is usually covered by high water, and the term, when used to designate a precise line, is vague and indefinite. Howard v. Ingersoll, 17 Ala. 780, 789.

As edge at low water.

"Bank," in a conveyance of land describing the land conveyed as a lot of land fronting a turupike road, and running from said road to the bank of a certain creek, means the land to the water's edge at low water. Halsey v. McCormick, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 296, 297.

Where a deed mentions a stream as the boundary in general terms, or the land is described as bounded or running along a river, the stream will be held to be the monument, and the thread of the stream the boundary; but, if the land is described as bounded on the bank or shore of the stream, then the low-water mark on the bank will be the boundary, the particular reference to the bank excluding the stream. Brophy v. Richeson, 36 N. E. 424, 425, 137 Ind. 114.

As edge at ordinary height.

The "bank of a river," when used to describe the boundary of land, means the edge of the water when the river is at its ordinary height. Daniels v. Cheshire R. Co., 20 N. H. 85, 88.

Where a deed described one of the boundaries of the land conveyed as "bounded by the bank of said brook," it meant that the boundary line was ordinary high-water mark. Stone v. City of Augusta, 46 Me. 127, 138.

As land between high and low water.

As the term is used when speaking of the banks of a river or stream, a bank is the land between ordinary high and ordinary low water mark, which serves to hold the waters within their course. Johnson v. Knott, 10 Pac. 418, 420, 13 Or. 308.

1 Wds. & P.—44

Levees.

The banks of a river or stream are understood to be that which contains it in its ordinary state of high water, for the nature of the banks does not change, although for some cause they may be overflowed for a time. Nevertheless, on the borders of the Mississippi and other navigable streams where there are levees established according to law, the levees shall form the banks. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 457; Pulley v. Municipality No. 2, 18 La. 278, 282.

As line of vegetation.

The bank of a stream is the continuous margin where vegetation ceases. McCullough v. Wainright, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 171, 174.

"Bank," as used by commissioners in describing a boundary as running along the western bank of a certain river, means those elevations of land which confine the water when it rises out of its bed. It is the fast land on which the vegetation appropriate to the locality grows, unless the bank is too steep for vegetation. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 415, 416, 14 L. Ed. 189.

BANK ACCOUNT.

A bank account, properly so called, is defined to be a fund which merchants, traders, and others have deposited in the common cash of some bank, to be drawn out by checks from time to time as the owner or depositor may require. Gale v. Drake, 51 N. H. 78, 84.

A bank account, even when it is a trust fund, and designated as such by being kept in the name of the depositor as a trustee, differs from other funds which are permanently invested in the name of trustees for the sake of being held as such, for a bank account is made to be checked against, and represents a series of current transactions. The contract between the bank and the depositor is that the former will pay according to the checks of the latter; and, when drawn in proper form, the bank is bound to presume that the trustee is in the course of lawfully performing his duty, and to honor them accordingly. Pennsylvania Title & Trust Co. v. Real Estate Loan & Trust Co., 50 Atl. 998, 201 Pa. 299 (citing Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 54, 28 L. Ed. 693).

BANK BILL.

See "Current Bank Bill"; "National Bank Bills."

Bank bills are only private contracts, having no public sanction similar to that which gives operation to the lawful money of a country. Young v. Adams, 6 Mass. 182, 185.

The term "bank bill," as used in Cr. Code, § 76, providing that every person who shall have in his possession any forged promissory note or notes, bank bill, or bills for the payment of money, with intention to utter or pass the same, shall be punished, etc., means a written promise on the part of a bank to pay to the bearer a certain sum of money on demand. It is understood by the community generally to mean a written promise for the payment of money, and hence an indictment charging one with the possession with intent to utter of a forged bank bill sufficiently charges the offense prescribed in the Code, without alleging that it was for the payment of money. Townsend v. People, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 326, 328.

A bank bill is a promise to pay money, signed by officers of a bank, and, where there is no such signature, a paper, though engraved in the similitude of a bank bill, is not a bank bill; so that an indictment for "uttering an uncurrent and worthless bank bill" is not sustained by proof of the passing of an unsigned sheet of paper, duly engraved and adapted for bank bills, but with the spaces for the signature of the cashier and president left blank. Commonwealth v. Clancy, 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 537, 538.

Bank note synonymous.

Under statutes making punishable the counterfeiting or larceny of bank bills or bank notes, the two terms are held synonymous. Low v. People (N. Y.) 2 Parker, Cr. R. 37, 40; Munson v. State (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 483, 484; Eastman v. Commonwealth, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 416, 417; Commonwealth v. Stebbins, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 492, 495; State v. Wilkins, 17 Vt. 151, 155; State v. Hays, 21 Ind. 176, 177; State v. Stimson, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 9, 29; Roth v. State, 10 Tex. App. 27, 30.

Promissory note synonymous.

The terms "bank bill" and "promissory note," as used in Rev. St. c. 96, § 4, relating to the offense of passing counterfeit bank bills or promissory notes, are synonymous. State v. Wilkins, 17 Vt. 151, 155.

"A bank bill is a promissory note, as is manifest from the fact that it is the promise of the banking corporation to pay the borrower of the instrument a certain sum of money on demand." Commonwealth v. Butts, 124 Mass. 449, 452.

The term "bank bills" is used in modern times to designate promissory notes issued by banks, and in the earlier history of banks they were known as "bills of credit," but in modern times they have lost the designation. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 311, 9 L. Ed. 709, 928.

A bank bill or note is a promissory note of the corporation which issues it. Greeson v. State, 6 Miss. (5 How.) 33, 39.

BANK CHECK.

Bank checks, in this country, are regarded as inland bills of exchange, for the purpose of presentment and demand and notice of dishonor. German Nat. Bank v. Beatrice Nat. Bank, 88 N. W. 480, 481, 63 Neb. 246 (citing Wood River Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 36 Neb. 744, 746, 55 N. W. 239).

Bill of exchange distinguished.

A bank check is not a bill of exchange, within the meaning of act of 1875, § 1, providing that no circuit or district court shall have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless the suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant and bills of exchange. A bank check differs from a bill of exchange, in that it is drawn on a bank or banker, and allows no days of grace, and the drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for nonpayment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default, and it is not due until payment is demanded. Levy v. Laclede Bank (U. S.) 18 Fed. 193, 194.

A bill of exchange usually states the time of payment, and days of grace are allowed on it. There are no days of grace on checks. A bill of exchange is generally drawn with more formality, and payment at sight or at a specified number of days is requested, and that the amount be charged to the drawer's account. When intended for transmission to another state or country, they are usually drawn in duplicate or triplicate, and designated as first, second, or third of exchange. A regular bill of exchange, it is true, may be in a form similar to a bank check, so that it may sometimes be difficult, from their form, to distinguish between the two classes of instruments. But when the instrument is drawn on a bank, or a person engaged in banking business, and simply directs the payment to a party named of a specified sum of money, which is at the time on deposit with the drawee, without designating a future day of payment, the instrument is to be treated as a check, rather than as a bill of exchange, and the liability of the parties thereto is to be determined accordingly. If the instrument designates a future day for its payment, it is, according to the weight of authorities, to be deemed a bill of exchange, when, without such a designation, it would be treated as a check. Bull v. First Nat. Bank, 8 Sup. Ct. 62, 63, 123 U. S. 105, 31 L. Ed. 97.

Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper, and many of the rules of the law merchant are alike applicable to both. Each is for a specified sum, payable in money. In both cases there is a drawer, a drawee, and a payee. Without acceptance, no action can be maintained by the holder upon either against the drawer. The chief point of difference is that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker. No days of grace are allowed. The drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default. It is not due until payment is demanded, and the statute of limitations runs only from that time. It is, by its face, the appropriation of so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer. It is not necessary that the drawer of the bill should have funds in the hands of the drawee. A check in that case would be a fraud. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 647, 19 L. Ed. 1008.

"Bank checks are not bills of exchange, and, though the rules applicable to each are in many respects the same, they differ in important particulars. Among these particulars is that the check is drawn against funds on deposit with the banker, and the indorsement that it is good implies that, when the indorsement is made, there were funds there to pay it. A bill of exchange is not drawn on such deposits, necessarily, and its acceptance raises no implication that the drawer has such funds to meet it. In both cases the bank is supposed to know the signature of its correspondent, and cannot, after indorsing it as good or accepted, dispute the signature." Espy v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 604, 620, 21 L. Ed. 947.

BANK CLAIM.

A bank claim, in mining law, is a tract 100 yards square, lying back of an abutting upon a creek claim; i. e., a tract 100 yards square abutting on a creek, or, rather, extending to the middle thread of it. Chapman v. Toy Long (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 497, 498.

BANK DEPOSIT.

A bank deposit is different from an ordinary debt, in this: that, from its very nature, it is constantly subject to the check of the depositor, and is always payable on demand. Houston v. Braden (Tex.) 37 S. W. 467, 468; People's Bank of Wilkes-Barre v. Legrand, 103 Pa. 309, 314, 49 Am. Rep. 126.

BANK DEPOSITOR.

See "Depositor."

BANK DIRECTOR.

See, also, "Trustee."

Bank directors are not mere agents, like clerks, cashiers, tellers, and collectors; they are trustees for the stockholders; and, as to their dealings for the bank, they act not only for it in its name, but, in a qualified sense, are the bank itself. Hall v. Henderson (Ala.) 28 South. 531, 544, 85 Am. St. Rep. 53 (citing Davenport v. Underwood, 72 Ky. [9 Bush] 609).

BANK FOR SAVINGS.

See "Savings Bank."

Banks for savings are banks established for the receipt of small sums deposited by the poorer class of persons for accumulation at interest. Savings Bank v. Field, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 495, 513, 18 L. Ed. 207.

BANK MONEY.

See "Current Bank Money."

"Bank money" means that species of money called "bank notes." Hopson v. Fountain, 24 Tenn. (5 Humph.) 140, 141.

BANK NOTES.

See "Current Bank Notes"; "Good Bank Notes"; "National Bank Notes"; "United States Bank Notes."

As synonymous with bank bill, see "Bank Bill."

An indictment for larceny alleging that defendant stole a bank note of the value of —, of goods and chattels of —, was a sufficient description. Commonwealth v. Richards, 1 Mass. 337, 338.

Pen. Code, § 480, provides that every person who makes or knowingly has in his possession anything employed in counterfeiting bank notes or bills is punishable, etc. Held, that the term "bank notes or bills," as there used, was not limited to bills and notes of domestic banks, but included foreign bank notes and bills, as well, and hence a conviction could be had under such section for having in possession appliances for the counterfeiting of notes of the Bank of England. People v. McDonnell, 22 Pac. 190, 191, 80 Cal. 285, 13 Am. St. Rep. 159.

As bill of credit.

See "Bill of Credit."

As bill redeemable in gold or silver.

"Bank notes," as used in a note payable in current bank notes, imported such bank bills only as are redeemable in gold or silver. Hodges v. Ward, 1 Tex. 244, 246, 247.

"The term 'bank notes,' when used in notes and obligations, imports generally such as are convertible into gold and silver at par." Williams v. Arnis, 30 Tex. 37, 40.

The term "bank notes," as used in a note payable in current bank notes, imports and means such bank bills only as are redeemable in gold or silver, or such as are equivalent thereto. The terms "bank notes," "good bank notes," or "current bank notes," in such connection, are synonymous. Fleming v. Nall, 1 Tex. 246, 247.

As cash.

See, also, "Cash."

"Bank notes" are not to be considered only as security for money, but as cash. Southcot v. Watson, 3 Atk. 226, 232. See, also, Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 452, 457; Green v. Sizer, 40 Miss. 530, 543; Jones v. Overstreet, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 547, 550.

A bank note is evidence of a credit at the bank for a like sum of money, and a contract to pay it to the holder in specie. The law presumes it will be paid on request, and it gives a penalty to the holder for damages for nonpayment, which is deemed sufficient to make the bank note equivalent to cash. Phillips v. Blake, 42 Mass. (1 Metc.) 156, 158, 159.

Check distinguished.

A check differs materially from a bank note. The latter is issued as currency under legal restrictions which give to it the character of money. The check is not currency, though it may pass current from hand to hand. Dike v. Drexel, 11 App. Div. 77, 83, 42 N. Y. Supp. 979.

As goods, etc.

As goods, wares, and merchandise, see "Goods."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

As money.

See, also, "Money."

Bank notes are treated, civiliter, as money. Crane v. Freese, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 305, 307.

Bank notes are not goods or securities nor documents for debts, nor are they so esteemed, but are treated as money—as cash—in the ordinary course and transaction of business, by the general consent of mankind, which gives them the credit and currency of money to all intents and purposes. They are as much money as guineas themselves are, or any other current coin that is used in common payment as money or cash. Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 452, 457. See, also, Green v. Sizer, 40 Miss. 530, 543; Jones v. Overstreet, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 547, 550.

"Bank notes" are not money. They are not always and in all places of the value of money. However, by their common currency, they may resemble money, and however, by the common consent, they may answer the purpose of money, yet they certainly are not so in reality. Scott v. Conover, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 222, 226.

"Bank notes constitute a large and convenient part of the currency of our country, and, by common consent, serve to a great extent all the purposes of coin. In themselves they are not money, for they are not legal tender, and yet they are a good tender unless specifically objected to as being notes merely and not money. They subserve the purposes of money in the ordinary purpose of life by the mutual consent, expressed or implied, of the parties to a contract, and not by the binding force of any common usage, for the party to whom they may be tendered has an undoubted right to refuse to accept them as money. Bank notes, however, as well as the negotiable notes of individuals, which pass by delivery, and not by indorsement, have by judicial determinations acquired, to a certain extent, and under certain circumstances, a character as money, which may with propriety be termed a legal character. This arises not from the intrinsic character or worth of the notes, but from the circumstances under which, and the objects for which, they are transferred and accepted. If they have worked payment or satisfaction, actual or legal, they are in such cases construed as money, and equivalent to so much coin. Thus, if at the time of a contract a bank note be paid without indorsement, guaranty, and agreement, it is received as money, and the risk of the solvency of the bank is on the part of the receiver." Corbit v. Bank of Smyrna (Del.) 2 Harrington, 235, 252.

Bank notes may be, and some of them are, esteemed as valuable things, but are they money? The legal definition of the term "money" is given by Lord Hale. He calls it the measure of commerce. So, also, because it is equal in value. Bank notes are neither equal in value, nor are they the measure of commerce. The ideas of every man in the country will change in a day or an hour with respect to the value of bank notes, according as they are measured by the unerring standard, gold or silver. So far from being the measure of commerce, it is a lamentable fact that they are almost always the subject of it. The notes of different banks are not equal in value. So that where one is indicted for gaming for money, and the proof is that he bet bank notes, it will not sustain the indictment. Johnston v. State, 8 Tenn. Mart. & Y. 129, 131.

Bank notes, in the ordinary transaction of business, are considered as money, and do not come under the denomination of goods, wares, and merchandise. By the universal consent of mankind, when bank notes pass from one to another they pass as money, and in the course of business they are charged and credited as cash—as money—and a contract to pay a certain amount in current bank notes is a contract to pay money if the notes be neither paid nor tendered when the note matures. Morris v. Edwards, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 189, 204.

In United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 333, 6 L. Ed. 334, Story, J., says: "Bank notes constitute a part of the common currency of the country, and ordinarily pass as money. They are a good tender as money, unless specially objected to; and a sheriff, without specific directions to the contrary, would be authorized, in payment of an execution for collection, to receive bank notes constituting the currency of the country at the time and place where they are so received." State v. Moseley, 10 S. O. (10 Rich.) 1, 4.

Bank bills intrusted to a carrier are regarded as money. Chouteau v. The St. Anthony, 11 Mo. 226, 229.

Under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 1, § 18, providing that in indictments it shall be sufficient to describe bank notes as money, the term "money" would include bank notes stolen before they were in circulation, and when they were in the hands of the bankers themselves. Regina v. West, 40 Eng. Law & Eq. 564.

The term "bank notes," as used in a contract authorizing the payment of a certain sum of money in current bank notes of a certain bank, must be paid in the notes of the specific bank mentioned, or in their numerical value in specie, and not in their value as fixed by shavers and brokers, and the ability or inability of the bank to pay cannot be taken into consideration, since bank notes are considered as money. Edwards v. Morris, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 524, 533.

A mortgagor, after foreclosure of the mortgage, and before the time of redemption had expired, paid to the clerk of court, in national bank notes, the sum requisite to redeem the premises from the foreclosure sale. The clerk received such notes as money, and tendered to the holder of the sheriff's certificate the amount in legal-tender money, which was refused on the ground that the notes paid by the mortgagor to the clerk were not money, and that there had therefore been no redemption. The court held that, while the clerk was not under obligation to accept the notes, he having done so, and tendered the holder of the certificate legal tender, the redemption was effected. Boyd v. Olvey, 82 Ind. 294, 298.

Bank notes are not money, but it is held that the acceptance of bank notes as money by a sheriff making a sale of goods is not malfeasance in office. Governor v. Carter, 10 N. C. 328, 338, 14 Am. Dec. 588.

As moneyed capital.

See "Moneyed Capital."

As note for payment of money.

"Bank notes," as used in an indictment charging defendant with stealing a bank note, necessarily implies a note for the payment of money. Commonwealth v. Richards, 1 Mass. 337, 340.

As promissory note.

The term "bank notes" is used in modern times to designate promissory notes issued by a bank. They were known in the early history of banks as "bills of credit," but in modern times they have lost that designation. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 311, 9 L. Ed. 709, 928.

Bank notes are properly described in an indictment for the larceny of them as "promissory notes." Commonwealth v. Collins, 138 Mass. 483.

A bank note is a promissory note. Stone v. State, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 404, 407 (citing Brown v. Commonwealth, 8 Mass. 64).

As public token.

"Bank notes" are public tokens—as much so as weights and measures or the alnager's seal. It is not necessary that they should have a common-law existence, to make the obtaining property by means of mere counterfeits at least the object of trespass or larceny. It is sufficient that they have, no matter when invented or discovered, the qualities of a public token that is calculated to inspire public confidence. In practice they represent the coin of our country, and pass currently as money. State v. Patillo, 11 N. C. 348, 349.

BANK OF ISSUE.

Within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5197 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3493], providing that the rate of interest to be charged by national banks shall be the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for national banks, "banks of issue" mean those having the power to issue circulating notes, and which would therefore compete with the national banks. First Nat. Bank of Clarion v. Gruber, 87 Pa. 468, 471, 30 Am. Rep. 378.

BANK STOCK.

The term "bank stock," in a will devising bank stock by a testator not owning bank stock, was construed to mean his bank deposit. Tomlinson v. Bury, 14 N. E. 137, 140, 145 Mass. 346, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464.

Where testatrix had state and railroad bonds on deposit in a bank, and in her will she bequeathed her "bank stock," such phrase should be construed to mean the bonds on deposit in the bank. Clark v. Atkins, 90 N. C. 629, 640, 47 Am. Rep. 538.

Capital stock distinguished.

Bank stock or stock owned by the individual stockholders of the bank is the undivided interest in the dividends as they are declared, and a right to a pro rata distribution of the effects of the charter on hand at the expiration of the charter. It is a very different thing from the capital stock of the bank, which is the whole undivided fund paid in by the stockholders, the legal right to which is vested in the corporation, to be used and managed in trust for the benefit of the members. An exemption from taxation of the capital stock of a bank does not exempt the stock belonging to individual stockholders. State v. Petway, 55 N. C. 396, 406.

"Bank stock," as used in Const. art. 2, § 28, making bank stock liable to taxation, not mentioning the capital stock of a bank, is to be construed to mean "individual interest in the dividends as they are declared, and a right to a pro rata distribution of the effects of a bank on hand at the expiration of the charter." Union Bank of Tennessee v. State, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 490, 498.

As credit.

Bank stock is merely evidence of title to shares in the capital stock of a bank, and not a credit, within Rev. St. art. 5063, authorizing taxpayers to deduct the amount of their indebtedness from their taxable credits. Primm v. Fort, 57 S. W. 86, 89, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 605.

As moneyed capital.

See "Moneyed Capital."

As personal estate.

"Bank stock is personal estate. According to the rule of law, it follows, with all other personal property, the person of the owner. Such stock, whether owned by a resident or a nonresident, is usually taxed in the state where the bank is located." Duer v. Small (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1164, 1165.

BANK STOCK CERTIFICATE.

"Bank stock certificates, while not possessing all the characteristics of commercial paper, are nevertheless esteemed by the business world as having a value somewhat superior to ordinary securities. For this reason they have come to be regarded as one of the most desirable bases of commercial transactions; and, when transferred to a purchaser for value, and without notice of any defect in title, the certificate is of itself generally an assurance to the transferee that upon its presentation the holder will be entitled to have the stock transferred to him upon the books of the bank." Buffalo German Ins. Co. v. Third Nat. Bank, 29 App. Div. 137-141, 51 N. Y. Supp. 667, 670. The case from which the foregoing language is quoted was reversed by the Court of Appeals (162 N. Y. 163, 56 N. E. 521), but the reversal, so far from criticising such language, apparently recognized it as a correct statement of the rule now existing in this state and country. Lyman v. State Bank of Randolph, 80 N. Y. Supp. 901, 903, 81 App. Div. 367.

BANK TELLER.

As a clerk, see "Clerk."

"A teller is an officer of a bank who receives and pays money on checks. Webster's Dictionary." Union Dime Sav. Inst. v. Nepert, 3 N. Y. Supp. 797, 800.

"The office of the teller of a bank is implied in the word used to designate it—to tell or count the moneys of the bank which are received or paid out. The office is often divided into two branches—that is, of receiving teller and of paying teller—where the business of the bank is large, and the duties cannot conveniently be united in one person. When united, the duty of a teller is to receive all moneys offered at the bank in payment of notes and bills previously discounted or lodged for collection, as they severally fall due, and all moneys offered by customers of the bank to be deposited to their credit and account, whether arising from money brought by them to the bank, or the proceeds of discounts made for them, to pay the checks of depositors, as money is from time to time drawn out, or for notes discounted, and to redeem the bills of the bank with specie when the same is demanded." Mussey v. Eagle Bank, 50 Mass. (9 Metc.) 306, 311.

A teller of a bank is an agent acting under special or express authority, whose appointment is not such that any implication of undefined powers can arise. His duties are defined with an approach to exactness. Such a one—sometimes called a "special agent," though the phrase is open to objection—the principal holds out to the public as an agent with limited powers, and with such a one third persons deal suo periculo. Walker v. St. Louis Nat. Bank, 5 Mo. App. 214, 217.

The teller of a bank is an agent acting under a special or express authority, and not one so appointed by a principal that there can arise any implication of undefined powers. The teller consequently has no implied authority to certify checks, though such authority may be implied from his conduct in certifying checks, and the subsequent payment of them by the bank. Muth v. St. Louis Trust Co., 67 S. W. 978, 981, 94 Mo. App. 94.

BANKABLE.

"Bankable," as used in regard to "bankable" paper, means high credit paper, which, if the time of payment was reasonable, and the bank had loanable funds, would be discountable. Edward P. Allis Co. v. Madison Electric Light, Heat & Power Co., 70 N. W. 650, 651, 9 S. D. 459.

BANKABLE CURRENCY.

A contract for the sale of slaves, by which the purchaser agreed to pay on delivery the sum of $25,000 in bankable Confederate currency, and, in addition, to give his note for the further sum of $20,000, to be paid in 12 months after call—the seller enjoining that he would not call on the purchaser for specie when it was at a premium, but engaged to be satisfied with the bankable currency of the day—means the currency of the Confederate States; the only currency in circulation at the time the contract was made being Confederate currency. Rives v. Duke, 105 U. S. 132, 140, 26 L. Ed. 1031.

BANKABLE FUNDS.

Confederate money, used in New Orleans in 1862 universally in the payment of debts due to banks, recognized in Mississippi as money, and generally received in every kind of trade, occupation, and business as a medium of exchange, was "bankable funds." Foster v. Bank of New Orleans, 21 La. Ann. 338, 340.

BANKER.

See "Individual Banker"; "Private Bankers."

"A banker is one who keeps a place for traffic in money; who there receives it from others, and keeps it with his own, using the whole fund as his own, or remits it at request to other places; who repays it at the will and call of his customer; who furnishes money to others on the discount of their obligations, or on securities brought by them; and who buys and sells bills of exchange. To these is sometimes added the issuing of his notes to pass as money, when allowed by law to do so." People v. Doty, 80 N. Y. 225, 228 (quoting Zane on Banks & Banking, § 2).

A banker is a trader who buys money, or money and debts, by creating other debts, which he does with his credit; exchanging for a debt payable in the future one payable on demand. The very first banking in England was pure borrowing. It consisted in receiving money in exchange, for which promissory notes were given, payable to bearer on demand; and so essentially was this banking, as then understood, that the monopoly given to the Bank of England was secured by prohibiting any partnership of more than six persons, "to borrow, owe, or take up any sum or sums of money, on their bills, or notes payable at demand." And it had effect until 1772 (about 30 years), when the monopoly was evaded by the introduction of the deposit system. The relations created are the same as those created by the issue of notes. In both a debt is created. The evidence only is different. In one case it is a credit on the banker's books; in the other, his written promise to pay. In the one case he discharges it by paying the orders (checks) of his creditor; in the other, by redeeming his promises. Auten v. United States Nat. Bank, 19 Sup. Ct. 628, 635, 174 U. S. 125, 43 L. Ed. 920.

The internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, declaring that "all brokers and bankers doing business as brokers" shall be subject to certain taxes on merchandise, gold, silver, etc., means all brokers and bankers who do brokerage business together with their banking business, and does not apply to those who are engaged merely in the banking business. United States v. Fisk, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 443, 448, 18 L. Ed. 243.

"Banker," as used in Laws 1875, c. 371, § 49, providing that it shall not be lawful for any bank, banking association, or individual banker to advertise or put forth a sign as a savings bank, or in any way to solicit or receive deposits as a savings bank, and providing for a forfeiture in case of a violation of the statute, means one who has availed himself of the banking statutes of the state, and has become empowered to do banking thereunder, and does not mean a private banker, who exercises in his business no more than the rights and privileges common to all. People v. Doty, 80 N. Y. 225, 227.

Two attorneys at law were partners in the ownership of a business, which was held forth to the public, by their notes, checks, etc., as the Perry County Bank. Held, that they were bankers, within Act May 9, 1889, providing for the punishment of any banker receiving a deposit, knowing himself to be insolvent. Commonwealth v. Sponsler, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 116, 119.

The words "bank," "banker," "broker," "stockjobber," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include whoever has money employed in the business of dealing in coin, notes, or bills of exchange, or in the business of dealing in or buying or selling any kind of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, bank notes, promissory notes, bonds, or other writing obligatory, or stock of any kind or description whatsoever, or receiving money on deposit. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 3.

Within the meaning of the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, the term "banker" includes every company, association, or person, not incorporated under any law of this state or of the United States for banking purposes, who shall keep any office or other place of business, and engage in the business of lending money, receiving money on deposit, buying and selling bullion, bills of exchange, notes, bonds, stocks, or other evidences of indebtedness, with a view to profit. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio, 1904, § 2758.

Every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be a banker, within the meaning of the war revenue act of 1898. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2286.

Broker distinguished.

"Banker," as used in Rev. St. §§ 3407, 3408, providing that every person having a place of business where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, etc., or where stocks, bonds, etc., are received for discount or for sale, shall be regarded as a banker, and subject to certain tax, includes one who employs capital in his business, and has a regular place for transacting it, and whose business is buying and selling stocks for his customers; such person not being a broker, who, without employing capital of his own, simply negotiated purchases and sales of stocks for others, receiving only the usual commissions for services of that character. Richmond v. Blake, 10 Sup. Ct. 204, 205, 132 U. S. 592, 33 L. Ed. 481.

As dealer in capital.

A banker is a dealer in capital—an intermediate party between the borrower and the lender, who borrows of one party and lends to another—and the business of banking is, among other things, the establishment of a common fund for lending money. Meadowcroft v. People, 45 N. E. 303, 304, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L. R. A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447.

A banker is a dealer in capital—an intermediate party between the borrower and lender. He borrows of one party and lends to another, and the difference between the terms on which he borrows and lends is the source and measure of his profits. Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9, 167. Banking, regarded as a business, includes the borrowing of money, as one of its features or incidents. Deposit Bank of Carlisle v. Fleming (Ky.) 44 S. W. 961, 963.

The business of a banker implies capital. A man holding himself out as a banker gives public proclamation that he has money and property readily convertible into money, in his possession and subject to his control, and for that reason he may be safely trusted. Baker v. State, 12 N. W. 12, 17, 54 Wis. 368.

As money changer.

The term "banker" includes all the business of a money changer. "Money changer" is defined by Webster to be "a broker who deals in money or exchanges." Thus defined, it is included in the business of a banker, and constitutes the greater part of it. Uncurrent funds and the exchanging of one kind of money for another are equally the practice of the money changer and the banker. Hence a banker may be required to obtain a license under a city charter authorizing it to license, tax, and regulate money changers. Hinckley v. City of Belleville, 43 Ill. 183, 184.

As one who receives and sells for another.

Rev. St. § 3407, enacts that every person, firm, or company, having a place of business where stocks, bonds, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or for sale shall be regarded as a bank or as a banker. It was sought to collect from a corporation, whose only business was the investing of its own capital in mortgage securities on real estate, and selling such mortgage securities with the company's guaranty, an internal revenue tax as a banker. In considering this claim, the court said: "Surely Congress did not intend that corporations or persons who have a place of business where they sell their own stocks, bonds, bills, or notes should be regarded as bankers. If they did, the vast proportion of the corporations and of the merchants and manufacturers of the country would be included. But the language of the statute is, 'Where such property is received for discount or for sale.' The use of the word 'received' is significant. In no proper sense can it be understood that one receives his own stocks and bonds or bills or notes for discount or for sale. He receives the bonds, bills, or notes belonging to him as evidences of debt, though he may sell them afterwards. Nobody would understand that to be banking business. But when a corporation or natural person receives from another person, for discount, bills of exchange or promissory notes belonging to that other, he is acting as a banker; and, when a customer brings bonds or stocks for sale, and they are received for the purpose for which they are brought—that is, to be sold—the case is presented which we think was contemplated by the statute. In common understanding, he who receives goods for sale is one who receives them as an agent for a principal who is the owner. He is not one who buys and sells on his own account." Selden v. Equitable Trust Co., 94 U. S. 419, 422, 423, 24 L. Ed. 249.

As one who receives deposits and loans money.

Having a place of business where deposits are received and paid out on the checks, and where money is loaned on security, is the substance of the business of a banker. Warren v. Shook, 91 U. S. 704. 712 23 L. Ed. 421.

A banker is one having a place of business where deposits are received and paid out on checks, and where money is loaned on security, and it seems that at least these elements must coincide in order to bring a person within any definition of "banker." A person is not rendered a banker by reason of the fact that he exercises one of the functions usually appertaining to bankers, but, to come within the definition, must prosecute at least all the lines of business named. State v. Comptoir National D'Es-compte de Paris (La.) 28 South. 91, 95.

Trustee distinguished.

The trade of a banker is to receive money and use it as if it were his own; he becoming debtor to the person who has lent or deposited the money with him, and accountable to such person as a debtor, but not as a trustee. The relationship existing is that of debtor and creditor, purely, with no admixture of any fiduciary character; the banker being, with relation to his customer, neither a trustee nor a quasi trustee, but simply a debtor for a loan. Collins v. State (Fla.) 15 South. 214, 218.

As unincorporated association.

Bankers are unincorporated associations exercising banking powers, while the banks are incorporated associations. Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, 32.

BANKER (In Gaming).

A banker is the one who conducts the bank in a game where every one bets against a fund into which all winnings are placed, and from which all losses are paid. People v. Carroll, 22 Pac. 129, 131, 80 Cal. 153.

A banker, in the language of the gambling house, is a person who exhibits a fund of money or property to be staked on all bets which others may choose to make against him on the game which he exhibits to entice bets. Commonwealth v. Burns, 27 Ky. (4 J. J. Marsh.) 177, 180.

BANKING.

As franchise, see "Franchise."

Banking, when viewed in detail, may consist of a succession of receiving, depositing, loaning, and borrowing money, and buying and selling exchange, and acts of like character intended to be pursued as a business and occupation. Nevertheless any person may, without being a banker, borrow or loan money, or be a depository of money, or buy and sell exchange, or be the drawer or holder of any kind of commercial paper, provided that it be not done as a business and occupation. But where a corporation which by its charter was prohibited from banking was accustomed, as a business and occupation, to deal in exchange for profit, such transactions were in controversion of the charter. Ohio Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 30 Tenn. (11 Humph.) 1, 23, 53 Am. Dec. 742.

The business of banking, as defined by law and custom, consists of issuing notes, payable on demand, intended to circulate as money, where the banks are banks of issue; in receiving deposits payable on demand; in discounting commercial paper; making loans of money on collateral security; buying and selling bills of exchange; negotiating loans; and dealing in negotiable securities issued by the government, state and national, and municipal and other corporations. First Nat. Bank v. Turner, 57 N. E. 110, 112, 154 Ind. 456; Richards v. Incorporated Town of Rock Rapids (U. S.) 31 Fed. 505, 509; Mercantile Nat. Bank v. City of New York, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 835, 121 U. S. 138. 30 L. Ed. 895; Bressler v. Wayne County, 49 N. W. 787, 788, 32 Neb. 834, 13 L. R. A. 614; First Nat. Bank v. Chehalis County, 32 Pac. 1051, 1054, 6 Wash. 64.

Banking is the business or employment of the banker, or the business of the bank. Baker v. State, 12 N. W. 12, 17, 54 Wis. 368.

Banking is the employment of establishing a common fund for the loan of money and discounting of notes, issuing bills, taking deposits, making collections of money or notes deposited, and negotiating bills of exchange. City of New Orleans v. New Orleans Savings Inst., 32 La. Ann. 527, 531.

At common law the business of banking and all its branches was open and free to all, and it did not constitute one of the prerogatives of the sovereign, or pertain to sovereignty. State v. Scougal, 51 N. W. 856, 860, 3 S. D. 55, 15 L. R. A. 477, 44 Am. St. Rep. 756.

The investment of the premiums, etc., received by a life insurance association, in loans secured by mortgage or otherwise, does not constitute carrying on a banking business. Life Ass'n of America v. Levy, 33 La. Ann. 1203, 1209.

The issue of paper designed to circulate in the form of bank bills is an act of banking. People v. River Raisin & L. E. R. Co., 12 Mich. 389, 395, 86 Am. Dec. 64.

The business of banking has acquired a restricted legal signification, applying only to those banks which exercise the function of issuing paper money. It is in this sense that the term "banking" has been used in the statutes of Ohio, with very few exceptions, since 1816, and such is the meaning given to the word by the constitution, as is apparent from article 13, § 7, providing that no act of the General Assembly authorizing associations with banking powers shall take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and approved by a majority of all electors voting at such election. Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1, 31.

"Banking," as used in Laws 1838, c. 260, under which moneyed corporations organized in accordance with its provisions are authorized to carry on the business of banking by discounting bills, notes, and other evidences of debt, by receiving deposits, by buying and selling gold and silver bullion, foreign coins, and bills of exchange, and by loaning money on both real and personal property, means the establishing of a common fund for lending money, discounting notes, issuing bills, receiving deposits, collecting money on notes deposited, and negotiating bills of exchange. Nassau Bank v. Jones, 95 N. Y. 115, 120, 47 Am. Rep. 14.

"Banking," as used in Const. art. 4, § 35, providing that the Legislature shall prohibit any person, association, or corporation from exercising the privilege of banking or creating paper to circulate as money, means the issuing of paper money or bank bills, and does not include the ordinary functions of banking. Bank of Martinez v. Heme Orchard & Land Co., 38 Pac. 963, 964, 105 Cal. 376.

The act prohibiting the carrying on of banking business by individuals and incorporated companies, unless specially authorized by law, does not preclude individuals or corporations, if otherwise authorized, from lending their funds on promissory notes by way of discount or otherwise. The evil intended to be guarded against is the keeping of an office of deposit for the purpose of carrying on the banking business. People v. Brewster (N. Y.) 4 Wend. 498, 500.

The act of having a deposit in a Chicago bank, and drawing checks thereon in payment of obligations, and buying checks or exchange from other banks or persons to replenish the deposit fund in the Chicago bank, is not transacting the business of a banker, within the interdiction of a bond that the obligor would not engage in the banking business at a place named during the period of five years. Scott v. Burnham, 56 Ill. App. 23, 30.

BANKING ASSOCIATION.

See "Moneyed Corporation."

BANKING CORPORATION.

A building and loan association is not a banking corporation, within the meaning of Rev. St. U. S. § 5243, prohibiting the use of the word "national" in the corporate name of banking corporations, excepting national banking corporations. Lomb v. Pioneer Savings & Loan Co., 106 Ala. 671, 17 South. 670, 671.

"Banking corporations" are but trustees. They are artificial bodies created with the view, in a great measure, to the public interest. Agricultural Bank v. Burr, 24 Me. (11 Shep.) 256, 270.

The term "banking corporation," as used in Laws 1894, c. 1, § 28, providing that taxation of banking corporations is specifically provided for in this act, is to be understood as including not only every corporate body doing a general banking business, whether under state or national authority, but also all property employed by banking, whether owned by corporations or individuals. Board of Com'rs of Rice County v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Faribault, 23 Minn. 280, 281, 283.

The term "banking corporation," as used in Const. Ohio 1857, art. 8, relating to the liability of stockholders in such corporations, means banks of issue only, and not banks of discount and deposit. Allen v. Clayton, 18 N. W. 663, 667, 63 Iowa, 11, 50 Am. Rep. 716.

BANKING GAME.

The essential element of a "banking game" is that it is one against the many, and the banker accepts all the bets. A banking game is where one person keeps or exhibits the game, and bets against all comers, and does not include a game ordinarily a game of craps. Cummings v. State (Tex.) 72 S. W. 393, 396.

A banking game is a game conducted by one or more persons, where there is a fund against which everybody has a right to bet; the bank being responsible for the payment of all the funds, taking all that is won and checking out all that is lost. People v. Carroll, 22 Pac. 129, 131, 80 Cal. 153.

The terms "banking" or "other game for money," as used in a statute prohibiting gambling, do not refer to some intangible mental device, but a tangible device adapted, devised, and used for the purpose of carrying on a gambling game. State v. Gitt Lee, 6 Or. 425, 426, 428.

The supreme test of a gaming table or banking game is whether the exhibitor pays all the winnings of the bettors, and takes all their losses—whether it is a case of the one against the many. Bell v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 187, 22 S. W. 687.

Crapa.

"Banking game," as used in Pen. Code, art. 358, which provides a penalty for the keeping of any gaming table or bank of any name or description whatever, or any table or bank used for gaming which has no name, does not include the game of crapa. Bell v. State (Tex.) 21 S. W. 366.

Dice throwing.

Where a person threw the dice, took all the bets, stood behind the table, and was one against many, he was the dealer of the game, and hence the game was a "banking game." Shaw v. State, 33 S. W. 1078, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 394.

"A banking game, in the meaning of the law, is one in which the owner or exhibitor of the game bets against all persons who come, and includes a game played by means of dice thrown from a box by a player who paid a certain sum for each throw of the dice, and, if he threw the number corresponding with the one on either of the prize checks on the cloth, on which there were several blank checks or numbers, he won the prize of that check; the owner giving the privilege of throwing the dice to all who desire upon their giving the regular sum." State v. Martin, 22 Ark. 420, 422.

Faro.

The game called "faro" is a banking game. Patterson v. State, 12 Tex. App. 222, 224.

Monte.

The game of monte is especially enumerated in Pen. Code, art. 360, as a banking game. Evans v. State (Tex.) 22 S. W. 18.

Rondo.

"Rondo is a banking game, and included in a statute making it criminal to bet at certain specified games, or at any other gaming table or bank, or any other gaming device." Randolph v. State, 9 Tex. 521-523.

Senate poker.

The term "gaming bank," in a statute prohibiting the exhibition for the purpose of gaming of a gaming bank and table, does not include the game of senate poker, which may be played on any table or smooth surface, though conducted by one who takes a percentage from the gamblers, but who does not gamble himself. Hairston v. State, 30 S. W. 811, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 346.

BANKING HOURS.

Banking hours are those hours in the day when the bank is open to do its ordinary business over the counter. It does not include the time after the bank closes to public custom or business, but which is devoted by the employes or officials to settling up the affairs of the day, etc., and to the sending or receiving of packages or messages, etc. Marshall v. American Exp. Co., 7 Wis. 1, 23, 73 Am. Dec. 381.

BANKING HOUSE.

Currency Act of 1864 requires banks created under the statute to transact their usual business at an office or banking house specified in its organization certificate. Held, that the phrase "banking house" did not prevent the purchase of coin by one bank at the banking house of another; it being unavoidable that some of the business of a bank be transacted away from the bank. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 604, 651, 19 L. Ed. 1008.

BANKING HOUSE (In Gaming).

"Banking house," as used in Rev. St. § 911, prohibiting gaming, and punishing the keeping of a banking house or banking game, means any house carrying on a game of chance, which has capital always ready for play, whether the capital is owned or furnished by the house, or made up at the time by the players. The expression is sufficiently definite in its meaning to constitute a sufficient description of the offense, without further definition. State v. Lenares, 12 La. Ann. 226; State v. Markham, 15 La. Ann. 498; State v. Hunter (La.) 30 South. 261, 262; People v. Carroll, 22 Pac. 129, 131, 80 Cal. 153; State v. Thomas, 50 Ind. 292, 293; In re Lee Tong (U. S.) 18 Fed. 253; State v. Gitt Lee, 6 Or. 425, 428; Miller v. State, 48 Ala. 122, 126; Foster v. Territory, 1 Wash. St. 411, 25 Pac. 459, 460; Lowry v. State, 1 Mo. 722; Evans v. State (Tex.) 22 S. W. 18; Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

BANKING INSTITUTION.

Revenue Act Pa. June 8, 1891 (P. L. 229) § 1, imposing a tax on mortgages and moneys owing by solvent debtors, whether by promissory note, or penal or single bill, bond, or judgment, except bank notes or notes discounted by any banking institution, means a corporation—an incorporated institution—and not a private bank. Commonwealth v. McKean County, 49 Atl. 982, 200 Pa. 383.

BANKING POWERS.

"Banking powers consist in the right of issuing notes, making discounts, and receiving deposits." New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely (N. Y.) 2 Cow. 664, 711.

Const. art. 13, § 7, providing that no act of the General Assembly authorizing associations with banking powers shall take effect until it shall be submitted to the people at the next general election, and be approved by a majority of all the voters voting at such election, includes only banks of issue, or those banks which have the authority of issuing notes intended to circulate as money, since at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, and for a long time prior thereto, the phrase "banking powers" had become used in a restricted sense, which related only to the powers employed in the making and issuing of paper money; and it appears from the debates in the constitutional convention that the evil which the convention intended to restrict was the power of banks to issue their own notes to circulate as money. Dearborn v. Northwestern Sav. Bank, 42 Ohio St. 617, 619, 51 Am. Rep. 851.

The phrase "banking powers," as used in Const. art. 13, § 7, which declares that no act authorizing associations with banking powers shall take effect until it shall be submitted to the people and approved by a majority of the electors, does not include a building and loan association authorized to collect money from its members, and to loan it among them for the purpose of enabling its members to buy lots or houses, or to build and repair houses. Forrest City United Land & Bldg. Ass'n v. Gallagher, 25 Ohio St. 208, 214.

BANKING PRINCIPLES AND USAGES.

Banking principles and usages, within the meaning of a bank charter providing that it shall be lawful for the bank to loan money, buy, sell, and negotiate bills of exchange, checks, and promissory notes, and discount, upon bank principles and usages, bills of exchange, post notes, and promissory notes, and other negotiable paper, do not impose upon the bank a prohibition against receiving on its loans and discounts more than 6 per cent. per annum. The plain and obvious meaning of the words is that the bank may take on loans and discounts the interest in advance. McLean v. Lafayette Bank (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 264, 268.

BANKING PRIVILEGES.

The term "banking privileges" in Const. Art. 10, § 1, in reference to banks and corporations embracing banking privileges, does not include the character or the power of corporations to receive money on general or special deposit, to lend money securities, to discount or purchase bills, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness, as the right to carry on such business is neither a privilege nor a franchise. It does not include annuity, safe deposit, and trust companies, though, in addition to their other corporate powers, they have power to receive general deposits of money, or to loan or invest the money so deposited, as well as their own capital, on mortgages, or by purchasing bills, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness. International Trust Co. v. American Loan & Trust Co., 65 N. W. 78, 79, 62 Minn. 501.

BANKRUPT.

"The following are the definitions of the word 'bankrupt' by Ash, who wrote his dictionary several years before our Revolution: Adjective, 'Broken for debt,' 'Incapable of payment,' 'Insolvent'; substantive, 'Incapable of paying his debts'; verb, 'to break a person,' 'to render a person incapable of paying his debts.' He defines 'bankruptcy' the 'state of a bankrupt.' Johnson carries the definitions through the various parts of speech to the same effect. Adjective, 'In debt beyond the power of payment'; substantive, 'a man in debt beyond the power of payment'; verb, 'to disable one from satisfying his creditors.' We are referred to Webster as narrowing the word 'bankrupt' to an 'insolvent trader.' He does so, indeed, following Blackstone, whose definition does not pretend to give the general sense. The latter wrote for students of the English law, and of course took the statute definition as it stood in the time of Elizabeth, or had been expanded by subsequent legislation or judicial construction. Webster himself thus treats the term as one of legal art, entirely destroying the harmony of signification between the substantive and its kindred words in other parts of speech." Kunzler v. Kohaus (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 317, 320.

"Judge Story construed the word 'bankrupt' in the bankruptcy act of the United States [Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418)] in Arnold v. Maynard (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 1181. He says it describes one acting in contemplation by actually stopping his business, because he is insolvent and utterly incapable of carrying it on." Utley v. Smith, 24 Conn. 290, 310, 63 Am. Dec. 163.

A "bankrupt" was originally defined to be one who concealed his property, or fraudulently evaded payment, and hence his bank for trade was broken up and his assets divided. Ashby v. Steere (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 15, 17.

A bankrupt is one who is unable, or who willfully refuses, to pay his debts in full. In re Scott (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 800, 808.

A corporation is "bankrupt," in a legal sense of that term, when it has done, or has suffered to be done, some act which is by law declared to be an act of bankruptcy, or when proceedings in bankruptcy have been instituted by or against it. Mere financial embarrassment causing a discontinuance of business does not make it bankrupt. Barr v. Bartram & Fanton Mfg. Co., 41 Conn. 502, 505.

Debtor distinguished.

"Bankrupt," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include a person against whom an involuntary petition or an application to set a composition aside or to revoke a discharge has been filed, or who has filed a voluntary petition, or who has been adjudged a bankrupt. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418.

In the statute relating to acts of bankruptcy committed by any debtor or bankrupt, the word "bankrupt" is used as descriptive of a person who is a debtor, but who has not at the time of committing the offense become a bankrupt. A "bankrupt," in the sense of the act, is a debtor and something more. He is a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy declared to be such by the bankrupt law. A debtor may or may not be a bankrupt. United States v. Pusey (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 631, 632.

As insolvent trader.

"In England the bankrupt system is confined exclusively to traders and the creditors of traders, and does not apply to persons in any other class of business. In this country the term has had uniformly the same meaning, so that it may well be doubted whether an act of Congress subjecting to such a law every description of persons within the United States would comport with the spirit of the powers vested in relation to the subject." Adams v. Storey (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 141, 142.

BANKRUPT LAW.

A bankrupt law is a law for the benefit and relief of creditors and their debtors, in cases in which the latter are unable or unwilling to pay their debts; and a law on the subject of "bankruptcies," in the sense of the Constitution, is a law making provision for cases of persons failing to pay their debts. 4 Elliot, Deb. 282. The laws upon that subject, in a general sense, concern the relation of debtor and creditor, a relation existing largely between citizens of different states, and, in fact, constituting a branch of those great commercial relations over which the power of Congress is also extended. The expression has also a limited signification; that is, that it concerns the relation of debtor and creditor in cases where the debtor is unable or unwilling to pay his debts. Such laws have for their object the appropriation, either voluntarily or by compulsion, of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts pro tanto, or in full as the case may be, and the relief of honest debtors. To accomplish this object these laws are made to operate upon, affect, and control the relations of the parties, so as to limit and circumscribe the rights of the debtor in and his control over his property, in many particulars, before any proceedings in bankruptcy shall have been commenced. Under these principles section 44 of the bankrupt act of 1867, providing for the punishment of any debtor or bankrupt who fraudulently disposes of his goods within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, is a "necessary and proper" law on the subject of bankruptcy, as provided for by the Constitution. It is as though Congress had made the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings conclusive proof that the debtor contemplated bankruptcy in disposing of the property. United States v. Pusey (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 631, 632.

Insolvent law distinguished.

In the reign of Henry the Eighth the first act was passed making special provision for bankrupt traders. Following this, and prior to the American Revolution, the bankrupt laws grew to be a great system. Distinct from this system were the insolvent laws made for the relief of those imprisoned for debt. They respected a different class of men, and their objects, effects, and administration were different. The insolvent laws were optional, the bankrupt laws were compulsory, and they were never, either in common conversation or in juridical language, confounded. The insolvent laws operated equally upon all men and had for their object only the liberation of the insolvent from the imprisonment of his person; while the bankrupt system respected only merchants and traders, and their negotiations and concerns. It took a retrospective view of their proceedings, it detected their frauds, it set aside their fraudulent contracts and conveyances, it restored to the fair creditor the proceeds of that property to which he was justly entitled, and it dealt with the debtor according to his merits. If misfortune had overtaken him in the paths of integrity and truth, it discharged him from imprisonment, exonerated him from his debts, and left him something wherewith to begin the world anew. Such should be the interpretation of the constitutional provision which delegated to Congress the power of establishing uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and all laws which have in view the objects of the bankrupt system as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and especially those which exonerated the debtor from his debt, are "bankruptcy laws," and can only properly be passed by Congress. Vanuxen v. Hazlehurst, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 192, 218, 222, 7 Am. Dec. 582.

Not every law which discharges the person and property, as well future as in possession, of the debtor, is a bankrupt law. A distinction is recognized both in this country and England between "bankrupt laws" and "insolvent laws." In England the bankrupt system has been confined exclusively to traders and the creditors of traders, whereas the insolvent laws of this country embrace every class of debtors. It is of no importance whether the debt has been contracted by way of trade or not, for a person to come within the purview of an insolvent law. So exclusively have bankrupt laws operated on traders, that it may well be doubted whether an act of Congress subjecting to such a law every description of persons within the United States would comport with the spirit of the powers vested in them in relation to this subject. But it is not only in the persons who are the objects of these laws that a difference exists, but their general and most important provisions are essentially dissimilar. Under a "bankrupt law" the debtor is at once, by operation of law, as soon as he has committed an act of bankruptcy, divested of all his property, which is transferred to assignees in trust for his creditors. All dispositions by the bankrupt himself after this are void. An "insolvent," on the contrary, retains the management of his own estate, however he may misbehave towards his creditors at large, and it is rarely, unless on his own application, vested in others. It is of no importance how many acts he may commit which under a bankrupt system would enable his creditors to take from him the control of his property; they can seldom act upon him compulsively under the provisions of an "insolvent law" if he is obstinate or dishonest until he has given what preferences he thinks proper, and is become so poor as to be scarcely worth pursuing. Under the one system the creditors are actors, and under the other the debtor himself originates the proceedings. Adams v. Storey (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 141, 142.

Laws which merely liberate the person are "insolvent laws," and those which discharge the contract are "bankrupt laws." "Insolvent laws" operate at the instance of an imprisoned debtor, "bankrupt laws" at the instance of a creditor. The bankrupt law is said to grow out of the exigencies of commerce, and to be applicable solely to traders; but it is not easy to say who may be excluded from or included within this description. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. (4 Wheat.) 122, 194, 4 L. Ed. 529.

The only substantial difference between a strictly bankrupt law and an insolvent law lies in the fact that the former affords relief on the application of the creditor, and the latter on the application of the debtor. In the general character of the remedy there is no difference between the two, however much the modes by which the remedy may be administered may vary. Martin v. Berry, 37 Cal. 208, 222.

Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, in respect to what are to be deemed "bankrupt laws," says: "Attempts have been made to distinguish between 'bankrupt laws' and 'insolvent laws.' For example, it has been said that laws which merely liberate the person of the debtor are insolvent laws, and those which discharge the contract are bankrupt laws. But it would be very difficult to sustain this distinction by any uniformity of laws at home or abroad. * * * Again, it has been said that insolvent laws act on imprisoned debtors only at their own instance, and bankrupt laws only at the instance of creditors. But, however true this may have been in past times as the actual course of English legislation, it is not true, and never was true, as a distinction in colonial legislation. It is believed that no laws ever were passed in America by the colonies or state which had the technical denomination of 'bankrupt laws.' But insolvent laws are quite co-extensive with the English bankrupt system in their operation and effect, and have not been unfrequent in colonial and state legislation. No distinction has ever practically, or even theoretically, been attempted to be made between 'bankruptcies' and 'insolvencies.'" In Re Klein (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 716, it is said: "The ideas attached to the word 'bankruptcy' in the Constitution are numerous and complicated, and extend to all cases where the law causes to be distributed the property of the debtor among his creditors. This is its least limit; its greatest is the discharge of a debtor from its contract, and all intermediate legislation affecting the substance and form, but tending to further the great end of the subject—distribution and discharge—are in the competency and discretion of Congress." Hence Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 544 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3418], is not unconstitutional because it provides that others than traders may be adjudged bankrupts, and that this may be done on voluntary petition. Hanover Nat. Bank v. Moyses, 22 Sup. Ct. 857, 859, 186 U. S. 181, 46 L. Ed. 1113.

BANKRUPTCY.

See "Act of Bankruptcy"; "Adjudication of Bankruptcy"; "Involuntary Bankruptcy"; "Matters in Bankruptcy"; "Voluntary Bankruptcy."

"Bankruptcy" is an absolute inability to pay a debt, without respect to time; a want of assets convertible into money sufficient to pay the debt. Phipps v. Harding (U. S.) 70 Fed. 468, 470, 17 C. C. A. 203, 30 L. R. A. 513.

In Everett v. Stone, 8 Fed. Cas. 901, Mr. Justice Story observed: "In short, 'contemplation of bankruptcy' means a contemplation of becoming a broken up and ruined trader, according to the original signification of the term; a person whose table or counter of business is broken up, bancus ruptus." Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9, 110.

"Bankruptcy," as used in the bankruptcy act, with reference to time, shall mean the date when the petition was filed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3419.

As insolvency.

"'Bankruptcy' is an ancient English word, which has come down to us at least from the time of Elizabeth, bearing all the way a meaning coextensive with 'insolvency,' and it was especially equivalent to that word when the Constitution was adopted, and hence was used in that sense in the clause of the federal Constitution giving Congress the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy." Kunzler v. Kohaus (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 317, 320.

The word "bankruptcy" has two meanings, one the popular meaning, in which it is convertible with the word "insolvency," describing the mere inability of a debtor to pay; the other the technical meaning, describing a legal process by which a lease is put to an end. Bernhardt v. Curtis, 33 South. 125, 126, 109 La. 171, 94 Am. St. Rep. 445.

"Chancellor Kent says 'bankruptcy' in the English law has by long and settled usage received an appropriate meaning, and has been considered to be applicable only to unfortunate traders, or persons who get their livelihood by buying and selling for gain, and who do certain acts which afford evidence of an intention to avoid the payment of their debts. 2 Kent, Comm. 389. Crabb, in his English Synonyms, points out the distinction which has been mentioned between 'bankruptcy' and 'insolvency,' but he did not speak as a lawyer, but as a master of language. 'Bankruptcy' is applied to merchants and traders, 'insolvency' to other persons. As the state of insolvency usually precedes and is attendant upon bankruptcy, it is not surprising that the two words should sometimes be confounded, and hence it is that in common parlance the word 'bankruptcy' has occasionally been applied to an insolvent farmer, physician, lawyer, mechanic, or other person. 'Insolvency' is said to be the generic term, comprehending 'bankruptcy' as a species." As used in a clause of the federal Constitution authorizing Congress to make uniform laws on the subjects of bankruptcy it is to be construed in its narrower signification of tradesmen who are incapable of paying their debts, and not as including all insolvent persons. The term is not synonymous with "insolvency." A man may be insolvent without becoming a bankrupt, or having a capacity to become such, and a bankrupt may be proved to be entirely solvent. Mere insolvency never makes one a bankrupt, without the concurrence of some act done to the injury of his creditors. Sackett v. Andross, 3 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 11, 17; Id. (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 327, 343.

BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDING.

A "bankruptcy proceeding" is a proceeding or suit, in itself not equitable, sequestrating a debtor's property. In re Weitzel (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 604, 605.

A proceeding in bankruptcy is in the nature of a bill in equity, in which the bankrupt is complainant and the creditors are defendants. Where a discharge is refused on the merits, the judgment inures to the benefit of all the creditors. Both parties are bound by it, and neither party should be permitted to try the same question again. In re Fiegenbaum (U. S.) 121 Fed. 69, 70, 57 C. C. A. 409.

Proceedings in bankruptcy are in the nature of a suit in equity, the ultimate relief in which is the distribution of the unexempt property of the bankrupt among his creditors, and a discharge of the bankrupt. In re Gasser (U. S.) 104 Fed. 537, 538, 44 C. C. A. 20.

"Bankruptcy proceedings have been likened to an equitable attachment (In re Hinds, 12 Fed. Cas. 202) in respect to their purpose and their effect upon the debtor's property." Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Baker, 46 N. Y. Supp. 266, 273, 20 Misc. Rep. 387; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Minneapolis E. & M. Works, 35 Minn. 543, 546, 29 N. W. 349.

"Matters and proceedings in bankruptcy," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 711 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 577], declaring that the jurisdiction of United States courts shall be exclusive in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, "means the matters and proceedings which pertain to the special and peculiar jurisdiction of federal courts as courts of bankruptcy. The adjudication of the bankruptcy, the appointment of assignees and other agents for the administration of the system, the vesting of the title of the bankrupt's property in the assignee, the marshaling and distribution of the assets, the discharge of the bankrupt from his debts—these and other like powers belong to the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and are matters and proceedings in bankruptcy of which the state courts have no jurisdiction." Kidder v. Horrobin, 72 N. Y. 159, 167.

The District Court sitting in bankruptcy has no jurisdiction over a controversy, between trustees in bankruptcy and an adverse claimant, relating to the title or possession of property in the custody of the latter, in the absence of his consent, but such an issue is a controversy at law or in equity, as distinguished from a "proceeding in bankruptcy," within the meaning of section 23, Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 552, 553 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3431]. In re Rochford (U. S.) 124 Fed. 182, 185, 59 C. C. A. 388.

As proceeding in rem.

A bankruptcy proceeding is a proceeding in rem, and all parties interested in the res are regarded as parties to the bankruptcy proceedings. These include the bankrupt and the trustee, as well as the creditors of the bankrupt, both secured and unsecured. Southern Loan & Trust Co. v. Benbow (U. S.) 96 Fed. 514, 528.

BANQUET.

"A banquet is a grand entertainment of eating and drinking, a sumptuous feast," and indicates the distinction between a hotel, as such, for entertaining travelers, and the bar or drinking place. In re Breslin (N. Y.) 45 Hun, 210, 213, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 80, 82.

BAR.

See "Plea in Bar"; "Presumptive Bar"; "Public Bar."

A "bar" is a bar or counter from which liquors and food are passed to customers, hence the portion of the room behind the counter where liquors for sale are kept; and it may also be defined as a room or counter where liquors or refreshments are dispensed, as in a public house. Town of Leesburg v. Putman, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 103 Ga. 110, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

A "bar" is an inclosed place of a tavern, inn, or coffeehouse where the landlord or his servants deliver out liquors and wait upon customers, and, as used in a mortgage of property in the "room or rooms known as the Buford Hotel Bar," refers to the room where the liquors were sold, and did not include liquor in a cellar on a different floor from and unconnected with the barroom. Latta v. Bell, 30 S. E. 15, 16, 122 N. C. 639, 641.

BAR DOCKET.

A "bar docket" printed in small pamphlet form for distribution among the members of the bar is not known to or recognized by statute. It is not a part of the court records, and can only become such, or made available on appeal, when duly incorporated in or sufficiently identified by a bill of exceptions. Code, § 2747, contemplates or refers to the "appearance docket" which is materially different from what is called a "bar docket." Gifford v. Cole, 10 N. W. 672, 57 Iowa, 272.

BAR IRON.

"Bar iron" means only such iron as is known as "bar iron" in the commercial sense, and iron in flat pieces less than one inch in width and three inches in thickness, known commercially as "nail rods," and never in a commercial sense designated as "bar iron," is not to be regarded as such within Rev. St. § 2504, Schedule E, fixing duty on bar iron. Worthington v. Abbott, 8 Sup. Ct. 562, 563, 124 U. S. 434, 31 L. Ed. 494.

"Bar iron" is a term of trade, including, it may be, what to those out of the trade would not be deemed to be bars of iron, and excluding what they would. At all events, the question of what is included under that term is one of fact, not to be decided by a court, but for a jury. Evans v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 6 R. I. 47, 53.

BARKEEPER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

"Barkeeper," ex vi termini, imports a person hired, who from the nature of his station is forced to perform servile offices within the walls of a public house. He is a domestic living intra moenia, assisting in the economy of the family. They are hirelings making a part of the family, whose sole occupation and employment is about the house, many of whose duties are menial, subject to the command, not only of his employer, but of all his guests in matters connected with such employment. The wages of a barkeeper in a tavern are to be considered as servant's wages, and are entitled to a preference as such under the intestate act of April 19, 1794. Boniface v. Scott (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 351-354.

BARROOM.

A "barroom" is defined to be a room containing a bar or counter at which liquors are sold. Town of Leesburg v. Putnam, 103 Ga. 110, 113, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

"Barroom," as used in the general local option law of 1885, § 8, providing that "nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the manufacture, sale and use of domestic wines or cider, or the sale of wines for sacramental purposes, provided such wines or cider shall not be sold in 'barrooms' by retail," means a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, by retail, for consumption at the place of sale. Belser v. State, 4 S. E. 257, 258, 79 Ga. 326.

"Barroom," as used in a city ordinance taxing and regulating barrooms, signifies and means a place where intoxicating liquors are sold, to be drunk on the premises owned or occupied by the dealer. In re Schneider, 8 Pac. 289, 290, 11 Or. 288.

Act March 3, 1893, 27 Stat. 563, defines a "barroom" to be every place where intoxicating liquors are sold to be drunk on the premises. Army & Navy Club v. District of Columbia (U. S.) 8 App. Cas. 544, 550.

Dispensary.

A room containing a bar or counter at which liquors are sold, or a room with a bar where liquors and refreshments are served, is a "barroom," and a dispensary cannot be correctly so termed. Town of Leesburg v. Putnam, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 103 Ga. 110, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

BARROOM FIXTURES.

The term "fixtures" has a well-ascertained and certain meaning as something affixed to realty, and the word "barroom" has a certain meaning, so that the term "barroom fixtures," as used in an insurance policy, can only be reasonably interpreted to mean fixtures in a barroom. Hegard v. California Ins. Co. (Cal.) 11 Pac. 594, 598.

BARRED.

Within the meaning of a city ordinance making it unlawful to exhibit in a "barred or barricaded" house or room, or in any place protected in a manner to make it difficult of access by the police, any cards, dice, or gaming implements whatsoever, the words "barred and barricaded," when rightly construed, do not mean an ordinary private residence or room, where doors are sometimes locked or bolted in the ordinary method, but relate to such as are barred against intrusion by officers, and hence the ordinance is not unreasonable. In re Ah Cheung, 69 Pac. 492, 493, 136 Cal. 678.

By limitations.

"Barred" is the word in general use to characterize the effect of the statute of limitations. An action or a cause of action is commonly said to be "barred" by such a statute. Knox County v. Morton (U. S.) 68 Fed. 787, 791, 15 C. C. A. 671.

When we say that a debt is "barred by the statute of limitations," we do not mean that it has been satisfied or otherwise extinguished, but we mean that the man who owes it can avoid a personal judgment by pleading the bar of the statute. Cowan v. Mueller, 75 S. W. 606, 607, 176 Mo. 192.

"Barred," as used in the act of limitations of 1715, declaring that any person claiming interest to any slave by virtue of any parol gift shall commence or prosecute his suit for the same within 3 years from the passing of the act, otherwise the same shall be forever barred, means that the suit, and not the title, shall be barred. The word "bar" is technically applied to actions and suits. Skinner v. Skinner, 7 N. C. 535, 537.

The word "barred," in Rev. St. 1889, § 3195, providing that a county warrant having been delivered and not presented for payment within five years from its date, and having been presented and not paid for want of funds, which is not again presented within five years after the funds shall have been set apart for its payment, shall be barred, must be held to have been used in its well-defined technical sense. It necessarily implies an action to be barred, defeated, or destroyed, and the meaning of the phrase "such warrant shall be barred" is just as plain and unmistakable as if the phrase had been written "action on such warrant shall be barred." Wilson v. Knox County, 34 S. W. 45, 46, 132 Mo. 387.

BARBAROUS.

"Cruel and barbarous treatment, and indignities to the person endangering life or health," within the meaning of the divorce law, must consist of willful and malicious acts, or they would not come within the description of the terms. "Cruel" and "barbarous" are words implying a merciless and savage disposition, taking pleasure in suffering, and without pity; while "indignities" involves an insulting and contemptuous purpose. The evil and malicious will must be present to constitute an act cruel or barbarous, and an insulting intent to make it an indignity. Accidental acts, no matter how injurious, would not be sufficient, for the wrongful intent would be absent. Hence cruel and barbarous treatment resulting from the insanity of the party is not ground for divorce. Hansell v. Hansell, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 514, 515.

BARBED WIRE.

A wire consisting of flat iron twisted ribbons about ½ inch wide, with teeth 1½ inches apart, is not a "barbed wire," within the meaning of Laws N. Y. 1891, c. 367, providing that barbed wire shall not be used in constructing fences required of a railroad company against adjoining premises. Stisser v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 52 N. Y. S. 861, 862, 32 App. Div. 98.

BARBER.

As mechanic, see "Mechanic."

BARBERING.

"Barbering," as used in the title to an act making it a misdemeanor to carry on barbering on Sunday, and providing in the body of the act that it shall be a misdemeanor for any one engaged in the business of a barber to shave, shampoo, cut hair, or keep open their bathrooms on Sunday, means the act of one whose occupation is to shave the beard and cut and dress the hair of others, and cannot be construed to include bath-rooms, which are apartments for bathing. "Barbering" and 'bathing,' or 'barber shop' and 'bath-house,' are neither synonymous nor convertible terms." Ragio v. State, 6 S. W. 401, 86 Tenn. (2 Pickle) 272.

Any person who is engaged in the capacity so as to shave the beard or cut and dress the hair for the general public shall be construed as practicing the occupation of "barber." Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 5046.

BARE NAKED LIE.

A "bare, naked lie" within the meaning of the rule that an action for fraud cannot be supported for telling a bare, naked lie, is defined as saying a thing which is false, knowing or not knowing it to be so, and without any design to injure, cheat, or deceive another person. Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Term R. 51, 56.

BARGAIN.

See "Catching Bargain"; "Grant, Bargain, and Sell."

If the word "agreement" embraces a mutual act of both parties, surely the word "bargain" is not less significative of the consent of two. In a popular sense the former is frequently used as declaring the engagement of one only, but the word "bargain" is seldom used unless to express a mutual contract or agreement. Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, 131, 9 Am. Dec. 123.

A bargain, is a contract or agreement between two parties, the one to sell goods or lands, and the other to buy them. Hunt v. Adams, 5 Mass. 358, 360, 4 Am. Dec. 68.

"Bargains, in most instances, are trials of skill. It is not expected that a purchaser will point out the advantages of the objects of sale. The buyer will not tell the seller his horse is younger than he represents him to be." Edelman v. Latshaw (Pa.) 13 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 27, 31 (quoting 2 Brown, Ch. 420).

Where the word "bargain" is employed in a deed, it is not used for the purpose of expressing the quantity of estate conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing the title to an estate, therein described, by other words specially introduced for that purpose. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314-316.

The word "bargain," in section 14, How. & Hutch. 374, 375, enacting that no person shall take, directly or indirectly, "in any contract, bond or note, for the payment of money, founded on any bargain, sale, or loan of wares and merchandise, interest at the rate of more than 8 per cent. per annum," grammatically considered, has exclusive relation to wares and merchandise, etc., and not to money. The meaning of the word, in its common acceptation, is "an agreement between persons concerning the loan, exchange, or sale of property." Grand Gulf Bank v. Archer, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 151, 192.

"Bargain," as used in the seventeenth section of the statute of frauds, means the terms on which the parties contract. Kenworthy v. Schofield, 2 Barn. & C. 945.

Sell distinguished.

To "sell" means to transfer a thing in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money, while a "bargain" is where the consideration, instead of being payable in money, is made in goods or merchandise. Commonwealth v. Davis, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 240, 241.

BARGAIN AND SALE.

A "bargain and sale," is the transfer and delivery of personal or real property, or chose in action, by one person to another, for a consideration agreed on between them as the value of the property sold. Brittin v. Freeman, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 191, 231. It "is a real contract, for a valuable consideration, for passing the title of land from one to another." Clalborne v. Henderson (Va.) 3 Hen. & M. 322, 349. It is a real contract, upon a valuable consideration, for passing lands by deed indented. 2d Inst. 672. Guest v. Farley, 19 Mo. 147, 150. As defined by Blackstone, it is a real contract whereby a person contracts to convey land. Cruise says that it is "where a contract is made by which a person conveys his lands to another for a pecuniary consideration, in consequence of which a use arises to the bargainee." Perry v. Price, 1 Mo. 553, 554. Bargain and sale is a method of conveyance founded on the statute of uses. "The bargainor contracts to sell the land, and receives the purchase money. After this he is, in equity, considered as seised of the land to the use of the bargainee, and the statute unites the possession to the use, so that the very instant the use is raised the possession is joined to it, and the bargainee becomes seised of the land. The words of transfer applicable to this conveyance are 'bargain and sell,' but they are by no means necessary nor material to its operation. There must be a pecuniary consideration; but, if a man for such a consideration covenants to stand seised to the use of another person, a use is thereby raised, which the statute will execute." French v. French, 3 N. H. 234, 261.

The words "bargain and sale," as used with reference to the title to real estate, import a contract to convey, and raise a use in favor of the bargainee. It does not import a payment of the consideration in money. State of Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 219, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 198.

The words "bargain and sell" are not necessary to constitute a deed of bargain and sale, in order to pass a fee simple or less estate in land under the statutes of uses. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314, 315.

The words "bargain, sell, release, quitclaim and convey," as used in a deed, "are words of release and quitclaim merely. They carry the grantor's interest and estate in the land described, whatever it may be." Gibson v. Chouteau, 39 Mo. 536, 566.

The words "bargained and sold," or words to the same effect, in all conveyances of hereditary real estate, unless restricted in express terms on the part of the person conveying the same, himself, and his heirs, to the person to whom the property is conveyed, his heirs and assignees, shall be limited to the following effect: (1) that the grantor, at the time of the execution of said conveyance, is possessed of an irrevocable possession in fee simple to the property so conveyed; (2) that the said real estate, at the time of the execution of said conveyance, is free from all incumbrance made or suffered to be made by the grantor, or by any person claiming the same under him; (3) for the greater security of the person, his heirs and assignees, to whom said real estate is conveyed by the grantor and his heirs, suits may be instituted the same as if the conditions were stipulated in the said conveyance. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 3941.

Conveyance.

The term "conveyance" includes a grant by way of bargain and sale. Wilhelm v. Wilken, 44 N. E. 82, 83, 149 N. Y. 447, 32 L. R. A. 370, 52 Am. St. Rep. 743.

Covenant to stand seised distinguished.

"The only essential difference between a covenant to stand seised to uses and a bargain and sale, setting aside the external formalities required to give validity to the latter—that is, the enrollment thereof—is the nature of the consideration, and hence the deed may operate for the benefit of the different parties both as a bargain and sale and a covenant to stand seised." Burt, Real Prop. 45, pl. 145. Cornish also takes it for granted that there is no difference between a bargain and sale enrolled, and a covenant to stand seised, in conveying a future freehold under the statute of uses; hence he concludes that a grant of lands generally by either of these modes of conveyance, with the habendum limiting the freehold to commence in futuro, will be valid to convey such estate, though it could not be thus limited by any common-law conveyance. Rogers v. Eagle Fire Co. (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 611, 630 (citing Corn. Deeds, 35).

As transferring title.

A bargain and sale, since the enactment of the statute of uses and trusts, is a kind of real contract, whereby the bargainor, for some pecuniary consideration, bargains and sells—that is, contracts to convey the land to the bargainee—and becomes by such a bargain trustee for, or seised to the use of, the bargainee, and then the statute of uses completes the purchase; or, as it hath been well expressed, the bargain first vests the use, and then the statute vests the possession. Where an owner of certain real estate agreed with a broker that if the latter would find a purchaser or make a sale of the real estate the owner would pay the broker for his commission a specified sum, and in pursuance of the agreement the broker effected a bargain and sale of the real estate on the contract, which was mutually obligatory on the owner as vendor and a third person as vendee, the broker was entitled to said commission, though the vendee afterwards refused to execute his part of said contract of sale. Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294, 296, 21 Am. Rep. 192.

A bargain and sale is a real contract, upon valuable consideration, for passing lands, etc., whereby the bargainor does not convey, but contracts to convey, the land to the bargainee, and becomes by such bargain a trustee for or seised to the use of the bargainee. The property or possession of the soil remained in the bargainor; the bargainee had neither jus in re nor ad rem, but only a confidence or trust; or, in other words, he was entitled to the use or profits of the land. "Deeds of bargain and sale do not of themselves transfer the title, but merely raise a use in favor of the bargainee." Thatcher v. Omans, 20 Mass. (3 Pick.) 521, 529.

A bargain and sale is a real contract whereby a person bargains and sells his lands to another for a pecuniary consideration, in consequence of which a use arises to the bargainee, and the statute of uses immediately transfers the legal estate and actual possession to the cestui que use, without any entry or other act on his part. Slifer v. Beates (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 166, 176.

A simple bargain and sale of land in writing, in words of the present and without any more, is a conveyance operating under and by virtue of the statute of uses, always on sufficient consideration. It was devised in England as a common assurance soon after the passage of the statute, and has become the most common mode of conveyance in the United States. It is more than a quitclaim or a release. It actively effects a divestiture of title from the grantor, and transmits it to the grantee, with or without covenants of warranty, and it is no less a conveyance, in the strictest sense, because it may also have clauses of quitclaim or release. Holland v. Rogers, 33 Ark. 251, 255.

"A deed of bargain and sale (which mode of conveyance was not introduced in consequence of the enactment of the English statute of uses, but existed long before, deriving only from that statute greater efficacy than it possessed when uses remained at common law. Saund. 311), although purporting to convey an estate in fee simple, yet actually conveys nothing more than the estate of the bargainor—such an estate only as the bargainor might lawfully transfer, an estate commensurate with the estate of the bargainor at the execution of the deed." Micheau v. Crawford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 90, 108.

At common law the term "bargain and sell" was used to evidence a contract to convey, which made the bargainor to hold for the use of the bargainee, and the statute of uses vested the title in the usee. A release was used only when the releasee was in possession, and the releasor conveyed to him his own title. The signification of these terms has been somewhat modified, and in America to-day the words "bargain and sell" are sufficient to convey the full fee-simple title to any species of property. Thus, if one "grants, bargains, sells, and releases," the grantee by such words takes the fee. Richardson v. Levi, 3 S. W. 444, 448, 67 Tex. 359.

An ordinary deed of bargain and sale is an executed contract between the bargainor and bargainee. Higdon v. Rice, 26 S. E. 256, 119 N. C. 623.

Where the partition words in a deed are "bargain, sell and quitclaim," the deed not only releases, but transfers any interests which the grantor possessed at the expiration of the deed. Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150, 160, 81 Am. Dec. 108.

The word "grant," the phrase "bargain and sell," in a deed, or any other words purporting to transfer the whole estate of the grantor, shall be construed to pass to the grantee the whole interest and estate of the grantor in the lands therein mentioned, unless there be limitations or reservations showing, by implication or otherwise, a different intent. Code Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 254, art. 21, § 12.

BARGAINED.

"Bargained," as used in a written contract whereby one person "bargained" and agreed to sell to another for a specified consideration the pine timber on certain lots, imports a sale in present, not an agreement to sell by some further conveyance. "It implies a conveyance of a present interest, and was a sale of the timber." Warren v. Leland (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 613, 616.

BARGE.

See "Coal Barge."

Rev. St. § 4492 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3058], requiring a barge carrying passengers, while in tow of a steamer, to be equipped with fire buckets, etc., did not include a canal boat, laden with coal for transportation, having on board the wife and children of the captain. Eastern Transp. Line v. Cooper, 99 U. S. 78, 79, 25 L. Ed. 382.

Lighter synonymous.

"Barge," as used in Rev. St. § 4289 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2945], providing that the limited liability act shall not apply to the owners of any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation, means, according to Webster, "a flat-bottomed vessel of burden for the loading and unloading of ships," and is synonymous with "lighter," and used wholly in local navigation. The Mamie (U. S.) 5 Fed. 813, 818.

Scows included.

"Scows" are classed with "barges," and are charged at the same graded rates under the classification of vessels by the New York statute prescribing different rates for wharfage. The Scow No. 15 (U. S.) 88 Fed. 305, 306.

As ship or vessel.

As sail vessel, see "Sail Vessels."

A barge is a boat or vessel, and hence is within the letter of a law relating to "boats and vessels." The Resort v. Brooke, 10 Mo. 531, 534. See, also, The Mac, 7 Prob. Div. 126 (cited in Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 119 U. S. 629, 30 L. Ed. 501); The New York (U. S.) 93 Fed. 495, 497.

A coal barge is a rough, square-cornered box from 156 to 180 feet long, about 26 feet wide, and 8 to 10 feet deep, specially made for the transportation of coal down the Mississippi river and its tributaries. It is usually sold with the coal, and when the coal is unloaded is broken up for old lumber and firewood, but sometimes, when in good condition, and if such boats are in demand, is towed back up the river and used once more. It is not a ship or vessel within the admiralty laws. Wood v. Two Barges (U. S.) 46 Fed. 202, 204; Jones v. Coal Barges (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 950.

That species of water craft known on the western rivers of Pennsylvania as "barges" are neither ships, boats, nor vessels, within an act giving a lien for work furnished in the construction or repair of such vessels. Appeal of Nease (Pa.) 3 Grant, Cas. 110, 113.

Steam yacht.

A steam pleasure yacht running in and out of the port of Detroit is to be treated as a barge, within Rev. St. § 4289 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2945], excepting canal boats, barges, and lighters from the preceding sections limiting the liability of owners of vessels. The Mamie (U. S.) 8 Fed. 367.

BARLEY.

An indictment for setting fire to a "stack of barley" was sufficient under a statute describing the punishment for setting fire to a "stack of corn or grain." Rex v. Swatkins, 4 Car. & P. 548.

BARN.

See "In Barn."

A barn is a covered building for securing productions of the earth. State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 354, 355. It is defined by Webster to be "a covered building for securing grain, hay, flax, and other products of the earth." State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 354, 355.

A conveyance of a "barn," without other words being added to extend its meaning, will not be construed as including the same appurtenances as a conveyance of a "house," and the conveyance will pass no more land than is necessary for its complete enjoyment. The word "barn" is of more limited significance than that of "house," and the appurtenances necessary for the enjoyment of the same are more limited. Bennet v. Bittle (Pa.) 4 Rawle, 339, 342.

Under Rev. St. § 4226, punishing a malicious burning of any barn, a building may be a "barn," whether used to receive the crop, for the stabling of animals, or other purposes. Webster defines a "barn" as "a covered building for receiving grain, hay, or other productions of the farm," and says that in the Northern states farmers generally use these buildings for stabling their horses or cattle, so that among them a barn is both a cornhouse and a stable. State v. Smith, 28 Iowa, 565, 568.

Under the Kentucky statute making it a felony to willfully burn a stable, barn, or other place where wheat, corn, or other grain is usually kept, or any other house whatever, an indictment for burning a barn is sufficient without an allegation that wheat, corn, or other articles named in the statute were usually kept in it, the word "barn" being an ordinary term, the meaning of which is well understood. Evans v. Commonwealth, 12 S. W. 769, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 573.

"Barn," as used in Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, providing that any one who should burn a barn having grain in it should be punished with death, includes a building of hewn logs 26 feet by 15, divided by a partition, on one side of which horses were kept, and the other side of which was used for storing corn, oats, and wheat, and other products of the farm, and farming utensils. State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 493, 496.

2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, defines burglary to be the unlawful entry of any "barn . . . or any building in which goods, merchandise or valuable things are kept for sale or deposit." Held, that the word "barn" means any barn, irrespective of whether it contains any valuable thing, since the latter clause of the statute refers only to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

Buggy house.

In the ordinary acceptance of the term, a "barn" does not include a house built as a shelter for buggies, though it was also used to store rough food for cattle, such as peas, pea vines, etc., and, as used by a testator in bequeathing to his wife "all the contents of barns, storehouse, and smokehouse," means a building whose primary use or adaptation was to the storing away of corn, wheat, and other grain and rough food, and this meaning is not destroyed by the fact that sheds were attached to the building, where wagons, etc., were kept out of the weather. Johnson v. Johnson, 26 S. E. 722, 725, 48 S. C. 408.

As dwelling house.

See "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

Dwelling house used for storage.

As used in an indictment, a "barn" includes a building which the owner had erected on his farm for a dwelling house, but which he had never occupied or used as such, and which had been used for several years for storing wheat and corn and other products of the farm. Barnett v. State, 38 Ohio St. 7.

A building intended for and constructed as a dwelling house, but which had not been completed or inhabited, and in which the owner had deposited straw and agricultural implements, is not a "house, outhouse, or barn," within St. 9 Geo. 1, c. 22, § 7, entitling the owner of a "house, outhouse, or barn" to maintain an action against the hundred for an injury sustained in consequence of malicious setting fire to the same. Elsmore v. Inhabitants of St. Briavells, 8 Barn & C. 461.

Fodder house.

"Barn," as used in Cr. St. § 140, defining arson to be the willful and malicious setting fire to or burning any "barn, stable, coach house, gin house, store-house or warehouse," does not include a fodder house and corn-crib, and an indictment charging the felonious burning of a "fodder house" is insufficient. State v. Jeter, 24 S. E. 889, 891, 47 S. C. 2.

Granary.

A house 18 feet long, 15 feet wide, built of logs, the cracks covered with rough boards, with a good plank floor and the door 4 feet high, containing corn and oats, though the only building on the farm used for storing crops, is not a "barn" within the statute as to arson. State v. Jim, 53 N. C. 459, 460.

A "barn" is said to be, in Webster's Dictionary, a covered building for securing grain, hay, flax, and other productions of the earth. Bouvier's Law Dictionary describes it as a building on a farm used to receive the crop, the stabling of animals, and other purposes. A house 17 feet long and 12 feet wide, sitting on blocks in a stable yard, having two rooms in it, one for storing nubbins and refuse corn and the other for storing peas, oats, and other products, is not a "barn" within the statute making burning of a barn a felony. State v. Laughlin, 53 N. C. 455, 458.

Incomplete building.

A building in process of erection and not completed is not a "barn" within the statute punishing the burning of a barn. State v. Wolfenberger, 20 Ind. 242, 243.

Sheep shed.

A deed of a homestead, reserving to the grantor the undivided half part of the "barn" thereon, includes the sheep shed connected with it, and the land on which it stood, and the barn yard used with the barn, being within the exception, under the general term "barn," as applicable to the purposes for which the building and land were used. Cunningham v. Webb, 69 Me. 92, 95.

Stable synonymous.

In an indictment for barn burning, which alleges the offense to have been committed by burning a barn and stable, "barn" is used interchangeably with the word "stable." Primarily, a barn is a building for the storage of grain and fodder, and a stable is a building for lodging and feeding horses and other domestic animals. It is stated in Webster's International Dictionary that in the United States a part of a barn is often used for stable. Saylor v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 57 S. W. 614, 615.

Tobacco storehouse.

"Barn," as used in an indictment for burglary, includes a building erected on a farm, and designed and used mainly for the purpose of storing and drying tobacco, and occasionally for the purpose of storing hay and flax. Ratekin v. State, 26 Ohio St. 420.

BARON AND FEME.

"Baron and feme" means "lord and woman," and was used in the feudal legal nomenclature and in the earlier text-books as properly expressing the feudal theory that the wife was subject to the husband. Cummings v. Everett, 19 Atl. 456, 82 Me. 260.

BARQUE.

A fire insurance policy describing the subject-matter as a "barque" on the stocks near a shipyard, being built for a certain person, does not cover timbers not united to the keel or structure thereon of the contemplated barque, though they are intended and completely prepared to be used in its framework, and are lying in the yard in the proper place to be conveniently applied to that use, and are valueless for any other vessel. The term "barque," standing by itself, has for its primary signification a completed vessel. As used in the policy, it includes timbers when they have entered into the structure which, when completed, will be a barque. In a technical sense, neither the keel with the incomplete structure thereon, nor any of the materials intended for the vessel, is a barque, but in the ordinary use of language the former would be so spoken of, and the others, though the work on them was all done, would not. Hood v. Manhattan Fire Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. 532, 539.

BARRACK.

A "barrack" is an erection of upright posts supporting a sliding roof, usually of thatch, and is so used in the statute making it an indictable offense to willfully set fire to any "barrack" or stack of hay, grain, or bark. A "barrack" is not generally, if at all, used by the tanner to cover his bark, but if containing that material its contents would be within the words of the statute, and the protection intended to be given by it. Chapman v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 5 Whart. 427, 429, 34 Am. Dec. 565.

BARRATRY.

See "Common Barrator."

Barratry is the institution of several suits, where one would have served every justifiable purpose, with a malicious design to harass and oppress the debtor. Commonwealth v. McCulloch, 15 Mass. 227, 229.

"Barratry" is defined to be the practice of exciting groundless judicial proceedings. Information on an outstanding title to land in the adverse possession of another constitutes a good consideration for a promissory note, and the sale of such information is not barratrous. Lucas v. Pico, 55 Cal. 126, 128.

BARRATRY (In Maritime Law).

As the sole definition of "barratry," Kersey, in his edition in 1707 of Phillips' New World of Words, gives, "a word that is used in policies of insurance for ships, signifying dissensions and quarrels among the officers and seamen." And Martin in his English Dictionary of 1748 says: "Barratry, in insurance, signifies dissensions and quarrels among officers and seamen." But Kersey, who published a dictionary of his own between these periods incorporates it simply as a law term, as follows: "Barratry is when the master of a ship cheats the owners or insurers, either by running away with the ship or embezzling their goods." Kersey's Dict. (3d Ed.) 1721. In the succeeding and fuller work of Bailey, it is given as a term in commerce, thus: "Barratry (in commerce) is the master of a ship cheating the owners or insurers, either by running away with the ship, sinking her, or embezzling the cargo." Bailey's Dict., folio, of 1736, and this exposition of its meaning has been substantially followed by the lexicographers to the present time. Webster limits it to a fraudulent breach of duty, a willful act of illegality or breach of trust, with dishonest views, by the master or mariners, to the injury of the owners of the cargo or ship, without the consent of the party insured. Webster's Quarto Dict. 1864. How the word came to express things so distinguishable from each other as strife or quarreling, and deceit or fraud, is explainable by its origin and history. The root, or apparent word, is to be found in Sanskrit. It is "bharat," meaning war. Houghton's Sanskrit Dict. (Lond. 1833). From this was formed in Sanskrit another word, "bharata," meaning an act which is a trespass against morals or justice, or an unjust or immoral action, probably used in its first formation to designate an unjust war, and which afterwards acquired in the Sanskrit a more general signification; both of which words have survived, and are now in use in modern Hindustani, the latter slightly modified in form. "bhaari, barhi, bural," and with other words formed from it, as "bharam, bharamani," but retaining in their various forms the same general signification, which may be illustrated by a word now in very general use in India—"baraket," evil. (Forbes' English & Hindustani Dict.) These two primitive words, "bharat" and "bharata," with significations more or less equivalent, are to be found in some form or other in tongues of all nations of the Indo-European group that derive their language from this parent source. Thus, "barathrum," both in the Greek and in Latin, was the name of the pit into which the condemned criminals were thrown, and, as a word for pit, dungeon, or the infernal regions, became "barathro" in the Spanish and the Portuguese, and "baratro" in the Italian. (Morin, Dict. Etymy; Paris, 1809.) In all these languages "barat," or some word formed from it by a change in the termination, meant strife, contention, quarreling, confusion, or disorder, intentional wrong, deceit, cheating, maliciousness, and also bartering and selling. In fact, the curious result of this inquiry is that this word, with its origin so remote, has during the many ages tenaciously adhered to the general signification of the parent words out of which it sprung. It was first used as a marine term in the Basque; at least, the first form of it in that sense which I have been able to discover is in that tongue, now one of the oldest in Europe. In the Basque, "barabaratu" signified delaying a vessel, abandoning her, seizing and giving her over, together with all that followed therefrom; and "baratu-galdu," stranding, sinking, or scuttling her. (Don Pio De Zuaga Dict., by De Larramendi, San Sebastian, 1853.) In Lockyer v. Offley, 1 Term R. 269, "barratry" is defined as "every species of fraud or knavery in the masters of ships, by which the freighters or owners have been injured." Atkinson v. Great Western Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 4 Daly 1, 16.

"The term 'barratry' is known to the common law, and Cowell's Interpreter refers its origin to a Latin word, which would attach to it the idea of meanness, selfishness, and knavery. Some of our English books, following a French writer (Pasquier sur Emerigon), derive it from 'barat,' an old French or Italian word, which they explain by 'tromperie, fourbe, mensonge.' I should myself derive the word from the Spanish 'baratria, baratero,' which are rendered 'fraus' and 'fraudulentus.' But it is worthy of particular notice that writers on maritime law, of the first respectability (I think Emerigon gives six in number), in explaining the marine sense of the word 'barratry,' use the French word 'prévariquez,' which can only be translated into 'acting without due fidelity to their owners.' The best French dictionary we have renders it by 'agir contre les devoirs de son charge,' acting contrary to the duties of his undertaking, and 'trahir la cause ou l'intérêt des personnes qu'on est obligé de défendre,' to betray the cause or interest of those whom we are bound to protect." Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Coulter, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.) 222, 231, 7 L. Ed. 659.

"Barratry" is synonymous with the terms "villainy," "knavery," "cheat," "malversation," "trick," and "deceit," and means the fraud of the master or mariners of a vessel to cheat the owner or freighters. It is any criminal act committed by the master or mariners of a vessel whereby the owner is injured. Hood's Ex'rs v. Nesbit, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 137, 138, 1 L. Ed. 321, 1 Am. Dec. 265. See, also, Cook v. Commercial Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 40, 45, 6 Am. Dec. 353; Waters v. Merchants' Louisville Ins. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 415; Dederer v. Delaware Ins. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 341, 343; Lawton v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 500, 501.

"Barratry," as used in a policy of marine insurance insuring against barratry of the master of the vessel, means a violation on the part of the master of some of the duties and obligations which he owes to the owner of the vessel, by fraud or misconduct, from which a loss ensues, either of vessel or goods. Wilson v. General Mut. Ins. Co., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 360, 362, 59 Am. Dec. 188.

Evidence that a cargo was sold, some of it beyond its original price, before it was discharged, before the damage to the vessel was ascertained; that the cost of repairing the vessel was trivial, and occupied only a few days; that the master and part owner failed to notify him either of the damage to or of the sale of the cargo; and that soon after the repair of the vessel he abandoned the voyage and sailed to another distant port—is sufficient to sustain a verdict that the sale was "barratrous," within the provisions of a marine policy insuring against barratry. Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 38 Pac. 82, 84, 104 Cal. 381.

Criminal or fraudulent intent implied.

It is an essential ingredient in barratry that there should be a criminal act or intent or gross negligence on the part of the master or mariners, tending to their own benefit, and to the injury of the owners or freighters of the ship, and without their privity or consent. Hood v. Nesbitt, 1 Yeates, 114, 118, 1 Am. Dec. 265.

Barratry is any willful act on the part of the master or mariners of a vessel whereby the owner is damnified, by whatever motive the act be induced, but accident or negligence does not amount to barratry. Atkinson v. Great Western Ins. Co., 65 N. Y. 531, 538.

Barratry is a fraudulent breach of duty on the part of the master or crew whereby injury results to the owners of a ship, but an act to be barratrous must be done with the fraudulent intent or ex maleficio. A loss occasioned by the mere negligence of the master or mariners does not amount to barratry. Grim v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 451, 457.

Barratry, according to Valin, Pothier, Emerigon, and LeGuilon, includes every fault of the master by which a loss is occasioned, whether arising from fraud, negligence, unskillfulness, or mere imprudence; but in English law it has a more limited signification, and no fault of the master amounts to barratry unless it proceeds from a fraudulent purpose, and there must be fraud or crime to constitute barratry. Walden v. New York Firemen Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 129, 137.

Barratry is any fraudulent or criminal conduct against the owners of a ship or goods by the master or mariners, in breach of the trust reposed in them, and to the injury of the owners, although it may not be done with an intent to injure them, or benefit the master and mariners at their expense. Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 126, 135.

A mere deviation, without fraudulent intent, does not amount to barratry. Hood v. Nesbit's Ex'rs, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 137, 138, 1 L. Ed. 321, 1 Am. Dec. 265.

A jettison of cattle by the master from mere unfounded apprehension during rough weather is not barratry, there being neither intentional fraud, breach of trust, nor willful violation of law, one of which is necessary to constitute barratry. Compania De Navigacion La Flecha v. Brauer, 18 Sup. Ct. 12, 17, 168 U. S. 104, 42 L. Ed. 398.

By co-owner.

Barratry cannot be committed by a master who is owner for the voyage, since he cannot commit a fraud against himself. Waters v. Merchants' Louisville Ins. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 415; Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 39, 49, 3 L. Ed. 481.

"As a person cannot commit fraud upon himself, barratry cannot be committed by a master of a vessel who is part owner thereof." Wilson v. General Mut. Ins. Co., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 360, 362.

Though a master of a ship, who is also the sole owner, cannot commit a fraud on himself so as to be guilty of barratry, one who is part owner may be guilty of barratry towards his co-owners. Hutchins v. Ford, 19 Atl. 832, 833, 82 Me. 363.

Barratry is a fraud committed by the master or mariners against the owners of a vessel. Though committed by the master and one of the several owners, it is no less a fraud on the part of the master; or if the master, being himself a part owner, commits the barratry, it is equally a fraud on the other part owners. Every fraudulent act on the part of the master is barratry, but such fraudulent act cannot be committed by a master who is sole owner. Jones v. Nicholson, 10 Exch. 28, 36.

Where the captain of a vessel intended by his acts to put the vessel with her cargo out of the way, and subject the insurance companies to the payment of their risks, it constituted what is known in marine insurance as the offense of "barratry," and was a crime against the owners of the cargo as well as the underwriters; and that he was himself the owner of an interest in the vessel did not render the crime any the less barratry, though such crime cannot be committed by the master when he is the sole owner of the vessel. Voisin v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 62 Hun, 4, 9, 16 N. Y. Supp. 410.

By sole owner.

"When the master of a ship is the sole owner, he cannot commit an act of barratry against himself, for one cannot commit a fraud or other like unlawful act upon or against himself. Upon no sound principle, therefore, can it be made to embrace the case of a mere part owner." Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Moog, 78 Ala. 284, 303, 56 Am. Rep. 31.

Must be against owner's interest.

The act of barratry must be to the prejudice of the owners of the vessel, which prejudice may be either direct, intermediate, or consequential. Cook v. Commercial Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Johns. 40, 45, 6 Am. Dec. 353.

"Barratry always carries the idea of fraud or crime with it, and to constitute barratry it is essential that the act or acts claimed to be barratrous should not be done with the view to promote the interests of the owners, but to promote that which is diametrically opposite to it; to injure or dispute such interest." Brown v. Union Ins. Co. (Conn.) 5 Day, 1, 8, 5 Am. Dec. 123.

"Barratry is an act committed by the master of a vessel, of a criminal nature, without the license or consent of the owner. There must be fraud in the transaction, and a selfish design for the master's own interest, for if the act is done solely to benefit the owner it does not constitute barratry." Crousillat v. Ball, 4 U. S. (4 Dall.) 294, 296, 1 L. Ed. 840, 2 Am. Dec. 375.

Need not be to master's interest.

"It is not essential to constitute the act of barratry that it should be to the interest of the master, but if it be so, that fact is evidence of fraud, as also is gross negligence. If the question turn merely on fraud, it will always be necessary to look at the motives and intention which influenced the act. If the motive were to benefit the owner, it is an honest one, though it may be a mistaken one, and therefore the act cannot be called 'barratrous.' The act of a willful deviation for the benefit of the owners is an example which attests the truth of the principle; but if made for the benefit of the master it would be an act of barratry." Dederer v. Delaware Ins. Co. (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 341, 343.

Barratry is a breach of duty on the part of the master or mariners of a vessel, whereby the owner is injured. It is not essential that the act be committed for the benefit of the actor, but it is sufficient if the act was done with a fraudulent intent. Kendrick v. Delafield (N. Y.) 2 Calnes, 67, 71.

Desertion of crew.

The desertion of the crew of a captured ship was not barratry. Messonier v. Union Ins. Co. (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 155, 163.

Going into enemy's settlement.

"Where a master had general instructions to make the best purchases with dispatch, this would not warrant him in going into an enemy's settlement to trade (which was permitted by the enemy), though his cargo could be more speedily and cheaply completed there, but such act, in consequence of which the ship was seized and confiscated, is barratrous." Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 126, 135.

Leaving porthole open.

The term "barratry," in a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from liability for loss or damage occasioned by barratry of the master or crew, does not extend to a mere incident of an attempted act of barratry which is not accomplished, and therefore the owner is not exempt from an injury to the goods resulting from a port being left open in an unsuccessful attempt at theft by some of the crew. Putman v. The Manitoba (U. S.) 104 Fed. 145-151.

Resisting search by belligerent.

Resistance by the master and mariners of a neutral vessel to the search of a belligerent is barratry. Brown v. Union Ins. Co. (Conn.) 5 Day, 1, 12, 5 Am. Dec. 123.

Sale of appurtenances of vessel.

The sale and disposal of boats, oars, and other portions of the vessel's appurtenances by the master to obtain money for his own use amounted to barratry. Lawton v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 500, 511.

Smuggling.

Misconduct of the master of a ship in taking on board commodities which subjected the ship to seizure for smuggling, such act being done against the consent of the owner, falls within the general definition of "barratry." Havelock v. Hancill, 3 Term R. 277, 278.

BARREN.

See, also, "Impotency"; "Naturally Impotent."

A warranty in the sale of a stallion provided that the same was an average foal-getter, and "should the above-named horse prove to be barren, a horse of equal size and value to be given in his place." Held, that the term "barren" was used in its ordinary acceptation, and meant "incapable of getting offspring." Davis v. Iverson (S. D.) 58 N. W. 796, 797.

BARREL.

See "Oil in Barrels."

The term "barrel" does not import or refer to quantity only, but a barrel of turpentine or a barrel of flour, in agricultural and mercantile parlance, means, prima facie, not a certain quantity merely, but a certain state of the article, namely, that it is in a cask. The statute exacts, for example, that every barrel of turpentine shall contain 32 gallons, and be in good and sufficient casks, made of staves of certain dimensions. It is in a degree a term of art in trade and in law, and, when a man says he has so many barrels of turpentine, he is universally understood to mean that number of casks of the statute size, containing turpentine, and consequently that the casks, as well as the turpentine, are his. A barrel of turpentine or flour is thus one thing, constituted by both the cask and its contents, and it is known so to be by that description. Hence, under an indictment for stealing two barrels of turpentine, it must appear that the turpentine was in barrels when it was stolen, and not that it was dipped from the boxes in small quantities from time to time, and then deposited in barrels. State v. Moore, 33 N. C. 70, 72.

As denoting quantity.

The term "barrel" is not a definite and precise description of a particular article or thing. It is often used to designate a certain quantity, and not the vessel or cask in which an article is contained. Gardner v. Lane, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 492, 501, 85 Am. Dec. 779.

"Barrels of flour" may be a proper description of flour in bags, according to the common usage of the place where the term is used, since the term "barrel of flour" is a certain known quantity of flour of a particular measure, which may be readily computed from flour in sacks. Fordice v. Rinehart, 8 Pac. 285, 286 11 Or. 208.

Half barrel.

Wherever the term "barrel" or "cask of flour" is used in the chapter relating to inspections, it shall be construed to include a half barrel, unless the same be repugnant to the enactment. Code N. C. 1883, § 3020.

Of salt.

An agreement to deliver Salina salt in barrels means the barrels prescribed by Rev. Laws, 249, § 3, providing that all the salt manufactured at salt springs, and which shall be put in casks, shall be packed in good casks, watertight, and that each cask shall contain five bushels. Clark v. Pinney (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 681, 684.

BARREL STAVES.

"A first-class oil-barrel stave is one that is 35 inches long, not less than $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch in thickness, and made of good white oak timber." Riggs v. Armstrong, 23 W. Va. 760, 772.

"A second-class oil-barrel stave must have the same dimensions of a first-class stave, except that it may be of less width and not so easily worked, and may be rougher, so that it would take more staves and more work to make a barrel from staves of the second class than from the first, and consequently they bring a less price in the market." Riggs v. Armstrong, 23 W. Va. 760, 772.

BARRICADE.

The term "barricade" imports an obstruction; not merely a warning, but an actual impediment to travel. American Waterworks Co. v. Dougherty, 37 Neb. 373, 376, 55 N. W. 1051.

BARRICADED.

Within the meaning of a city ordinance making it unlawful to exhibit in a "barred or barricaded" house or room, or in any place protected in a manner to make it difficult of access by the police, any cards, dice, or gaming implements whatsoever, the words "barred" and "barricaded," when rightly construed, do not mean an ordinary private residence or room, where doors are sometimes locked or bolted in the ordinary method, but relate to such as are barred against intrusion by officers, and hence the ordinance is not unreasonable. In Re Ah Cheung, 69 Pac. 492, 493, 136 Cal. 678.

BARRILLA.

"Barrilla" is a term given in commerce to impure soda imported from Spain. Commonwealth v. James, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 375, 381.

BARRISTER.

Barristers in England are the highest class of lawyers, who have exclusive audience in all the superior courts. Every barrister must be a member of one of the four ancient societies called "Inns of Court," viz., Lincoln's Inn, the Inner and Middle Temples, and Gray's Inn. Associations of lawyers acquired houses of their own, in which students were educated in the common law. These schools of law are now represented by the Inns of Court, which still enjoy the exclusive privilege of calling to the bar, and, through their superior order of benchers, control the discipline of the profession. Subject to an appeal to the common-law judges as visitors, they may reject the petition of a student to be called to the bar, or expel from their society and from the profession any barrister or bencher from the Inn. The peculiar business of barristers is the advocacy of causes in open court, but a great deal of other business falls into their hands. They are the chief conveyancers, and the pleadings are, in all but the simplest cases, drafted by them. The highest rank among barristers is that of king's or queen's counsel. They lead the case in court, and give opinions on cases submitted to them, but they do not accept conveyancing or pleading, nor do they admit pupils to their chambers. In re Rickler, 29 Atl. 559, 563, 66 N. H. 207, 24 L. R. A. 740.

BARROW.

A barrow is a castrated male hog. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

"A barrow is an animal of the hog family," so that an indictment charging defendant with unlawfully and needlessly killing a barrow sufficiently informed defendant of the offense he was to answer. State v. Greenlees, 41 Ark. 353, 355.

A barrow is a hog, especially a male hog castrated, so that, where an information for stealing a barrow charged the theft of a male hog, it was not error to refuse to charge that a male hog is one which has not been changed from a boar to a barrow by alteration. Williams v. State, 17 Tex. App. 521, 524.

BARTER.

A barter is the exchange of goods of one character for goods of another; any sale of one character of merchandise where any transfer of merchandise is taken in exchange instead of money. Guerreiro v. Peile, 3 Barn. & Ald. 616, 617. See, also, Cooper v. State, 37 Ark. 412, 418. It is the exchange of one commodity or article of property for another; exchange of goods; a commutation; transmutation or transfer of goods for other goods. Coker v. State (Ala.) 8 South. 874, 875.

"Barter," as used in Act Feb. 3, 1875, § 1, providing that any person who shall sell, barter or exchange, or otherwise dispose of any property upon which a lien exists by virtue of a mortgage, deed of trust, contract of parties, or operation of law, without the consent of the person in whose favor such lien exists, shall be punished, etc., means the exchange of one commodity or article of property for another, and has about the same meaning as "exchange." Cooper v. State, 37 Ark. 412, 415.

The term "barter" is not applied to contracts concerning land, but only such as relate to goods and chattels. Speigle v. Meredith (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 919, 920.

Purchase distinguished.

See "Purchase."

Sale distinguished.

See "Sale."

Exchange synonymous.

"Barter" and "exchange" are of about the same meaning. "Barter," the exchange of one commodity or article or property for another; "exchange" of goods, a commutation, transmutation, or transfer of goods for other goods, as distinguished from "sale," which is a transfer of goods for money. Meyer v. Rousseau, 2 S. W. 112, 113, 47 Ark. 460.

The terms "exchange" and "sale," used in an order by county commissioners for the election to determine whether or not the sale or exchange or barter of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited, are not synonymous, and therefore such a use is not warranted by a statute authorizing the commissioners to order an election to determine whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited. Ex parte Beatty, 1 S. W. 451, 452, 21 Tex. App. 428.

BARTER AND SALE.

The phrase "barter and sell," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did unlawfully "barter and sell" intoxicating liquor, imports a sale, and not a barter, and the word "barter" may be regarded as surplusage. Massey v. State, 74 Ind. 368, 369.

BASE.

Adulterated synonymous.

"In common parlance 'base' and 'adulterated' signify the same thing, and there is no repugnancy in charging that a defendant passed 'one piece of base and adulterated coin.'" Gabe v. State, 6 Ark. (1 Eng.) 540, 544.

In chemistry.

A "base," in chemistry, is defined to be a compound substance which unites with an acid to form a salt. In re Schaeffer, 2 App. Cas. (D. C.) 1, 4.

BASEBALL.

"Baseball" is a game of ball, so called from the bases or bounds, usually four in number, which designate the circuit which each player must make after striking the ball; and this is a game within the definition of "sporting," as used in Neb. Cr. Code, § 241, providing that any person engaged on Sunday in sporting, etc., shall be fined. State v. O'Rourke, 53 N. W. 591, 592, 35 Neb. 614, 17 L. R. A. 830.

Baseball does not belong to the same class, kind, species, or genus as horse racing, cockfighting, or card playing, so as to be within the term "games" in Rev. St. 1899, § 2242, providing that every person who shall be convicted of horse racing, cockfighting, or playing at cards or games of any kind on Sunday, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Baseball is to America what cricket is to England. It is a sport or athletic exercise, and is commonly called a "game," but it is not a gambling game or productive of immorality. In a qualified sense it is affected by chance, but it is primarily and properly a game of science, of physical skill or trained endurance, and of natural adaptability to athletic skill. It is a game of chance only to the same extent that chance or luck may enter into anything that men may do, but when chance or luck is pitted against skill and science, it is as fair an illustration of what will result as any test that can be applied. Ex parte Neet, 57 S. W. 1025, 1027, 157 Mo. 527, 80 Am. St. Rep. 638.

BASE BULLION.

"Crude" or "base" silver bullion, as the term is understood in Montana, is silver in bars, mixed to a greater or less extent with base materials. Hope Min. Co. v. Kennon, 3 Mont. 35, 44.

BASE FEE.

A "base" or "qualified" fee is such a one as hath a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Ohio & M. R. Co., 94 Ill. 83, 93; Jordan v. Goldman, 34 Pac. 371, 376, 1 Okl. 406; Knight v. Pottgieser, 52 N. E. 934, 936, 176 Ill. 368.

A qualified, base, or determinable fee is an interest which may continue forever, but the estate is liable to be determined, without the aid of a conveyance, by some act or event circumscribing its continuance or extent, though the object on which it rests for perpetuity may be transitory or perishable; yet such estates are deemed to be fees because of their possibility of enduring forever. Connecticut Spiritualist Camp Meeting Ass'n v. East Lyme, 5 Atl. 849, 850, 54 Conn. 152 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. [5th Ed.] 9); Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 159, 168; Bartlett v. Baker (Me.) 5 Atl. 847; United States Pipe-Line Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 41 Atl. 759, 763, 62 N. J. Law, 254, 42 L. R. A. 572 (citing 1 Cruise, Dig. 63; 1 Inst. 27a); Jordan v. Goldman, 34 Pac. 371, 376, 1 Okl. 406; Grout v. Townsend (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 336, 339 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 9).

Testator's will provided that at the death of testator's wife the estate should go to and be divided amongst testator's children and their descendants. The interest which vested at the death of testator was not a base or determinable fee, subject to be divested as to any devisee by the death of such devisee, during the continuance of the life estate, without leaving descendants to take after the death of the widow of the testator. Knight v. Pottgieser, 52 N. E. 934, 936, 176 Ill. 368.

The term "base fee" includes the interest acquired by a county in real estate conveyed by a deed providing that the conveyance is for the use of the people of the county as long as the premises shall be used for a county site for the courthouse, jail, and clerk's office, but shall revert to the grantor if the county ceases to use it for such purpose. Gillespie v. Broas (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 370, 381.

A base fee was confined to a person as tenant of a particular place. Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 259, 277.

Conditional and simple fee distinguished.

A "base fee" is a fee confined to a person as tenant of a particular place. It belongs to the class of limited fees, which includes "qualified" or "base" fees, and "fees conditional at common law," both of which are distinguished from a "fee simple," which is an absolute inheritance, clear of any limitation or condition whatever. It is distinguished from a "conditional fee," which is a fee restrained to particular heirs, as the heirs of a man's body. Paterson v. Ellis' Ex'rs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 258, 277.

Where a tenant in tail, by indenture enrolled, bargains and sells land to another and his heirs, and afterwards levies a fine to the bargainee, the bargainee has a fee in the land, but it is only to endure as long as the tenant in tail has heirs of his body, and is therefore called a "base," as compared with the "pure" fee, which is in the original donor, and which has an absolute perpetuity belonging to it. Richardson v. Noyes, 2 Mass. 56, 63, 3 Am. Dec. 24.

Qualified or determinable fee synonymous.

Kent speaks of "qualified," "base," or "determinable" fees, and uses the terms as interchangeable. A qualified fee confers only a limited power of alienation, entitling the owner to give an interest of the same extent and continuance only in another person that it would be in itself. So that the estate will, notwithstanding the transfer, be determinable, and, into whosoever hands it will come, will cease on a failure of those heirs to whom, on creation of the qualified fee, the limitation is made. An estate devised to heirs, or to one and to the heirs, on the part of such person is a qualified fee. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson, 13 Atl. 369, 68 Md. 606.

BASED.

The word "based," as used in an instruction that the jury may assess damages

"based" on the pecuniary loss, if any, resulting from the death of plaintiff's intestate, could not be construed as authorizing the jury to add interest and speculative damages to the pecuniary loss, nor would they be likely to infer such right, and hence the instruction is not objectionable for such reason. Webster Mfg. Co. v. Mulvanny, 48 N. E. 168, 169, 168 Ill. 311.

BASIN.

A basin is a part of the sea inclosed in rocks. United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310, 1313.

The terms "rivers," "haven," "creek," "basin," "bay," or "arm of the sea," in Rev. St. U. S. § 5346, providing that an assault committed with a dangerous weapon, or with intent to perpetrate a felony, on board of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States, while in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay, within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, are limited to the high seas and other waters connected immediately with them, and do not include the rivers connecting the Great Lakes. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 406.

BASIS OF COST.

Plaintiff and defendant, stockholders of a corporation, were liable as joint indorsers on corporation notes, the proceeds of which were used in betterments. Plaintiff also held defendant's notes given by the latter to secure the firm for payment of the latter's stock. Defendant afterwards sold to plaintiff all his stock on the basis of cost. Held, that the term "basis of cost" did not include defendant's liability as a joint indorser of the corporation notes. Peyton v. Stuart, 16 S. E. 160, 88 Va. 50.

BASS.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to fish and fisheries, the term "bass" means the striped bass of the tidal waters. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 375, c. 40, § 32.

BASTARD.

"The fundamental definition of the word 'bastard' is a child born out of lawful wedlock." Timmins v. Lacy, 30 Tex. 115, 135.

A bastard is a child born out of wedlock, and whose parents do not subsequently intermarry, or a child the issue of adulterous intercourse of the wife during wedlock. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2507.

Lord Coke, in his first Institute, in defining "bastard," says: "But we term them all by the name of 'bastard' who are born out of lawful marriage. By the common law, if the issue be born within a month or a day after marriage between parties of lawful age, the child is legitimate. Swinney v. Klippert (Ky.) 50 S. W. 841, 842.

A bastard is one that is not only begotten, but born, out of lawful matrimony. Ex parte Hayes (Fla.) 6 South. 64, 65 (citing 1 Blackst. Comm. 454).

A bastard is one that is not only begotten, but born out of lawful matrimony. Where a woman is pregnant at the time of the marriage, and the pregnancy is known at the time to the husband, the husband is conclusively presumed to be the father, and the natural father cannot be held for the child's support. Miller v. Anderson, 43 Ohio St. 473, 475, 476.

At common law, a "bastard" is one who is born neither in lawful wedlock nor within a competent time after its termination, or under circumstances which render it impossible that the husband of his mother can be his father. Parker v. Nothomb (Neb.) 93 N. W. 851, 852 (citing 5 Cyc. 625).

At common law all illegitimate children were bastards, and a bastard was regarded as the first of his family, nullus filius, and was incapable of either receiving or transmitting an inheritance, except to his own legitimate children. But the civil law, though originally holding to the same rule, became relaxed, and out of this relaxation grew up a distinction between illegitimate children, which gave rise to much uncertainty about what at different periods was the law. "The Roman law distinguished between the offspring of that concubinage which it tolerated as an inferior species of matrimony, and the spurious brood of adultery, prostitution, and incest." 5 Wheat. 262, note to Stevenson's Heirs v. Sullivan. A distinction was made between offspring the issue of frailty and prostitution. The offspring of concubines, who resided in the same house with the father, were called naturales, and could be legitimated in one of the various modes provided by law. Care should be taken not to confound the meaning of the different words used. At common law the word "bastard" applied to all illegitimate children. Under the civil law, while it was sometimes loosely so applied, there is quite a distinction. In France a bastard could not inherit at all, unless legitimated by the marriage of his father and mother. Stevenson's Heirs v. Sullivan, 18 U. S. (5 Wheat.) 267, 5 L. Ed. 70; 2 Dom. Civ. Law, § 2510. The mode of legitimation by letters patent from the prince was abrogated by the Code Napoleon. As adopted in Spain, the civil law was modified, and provided methods by which natural children could be legitimated so as to inherit from their fathers. In the Spanish civil law the word "bastardo" meant and was applied to the sons of fathers who could not contract matrimony when the son was begotten. Salva, Dicc. in verbo "Bastardo." "Bastards," as thus defined, could not inherit as from the father, nor could they become legitimated. But such as were not "danado," or the offspring of an adulterous, sacrilegious, or incestuous intercourse, were permitted to inherit from the mother. Pettus v. Dawson, 17 S. W. 714, 715, 82 Tex. 18 (citing Escriche, Dicc. in verbo "Bastardo").

That a bastard is nullius filius applies only in the case of inheritance. A bastard is within the Marriage Act, 26 Geo. II, c. 33, requiring the consent of parent or guardian to the marriage of persons under age who are not married by banns. King v. Inhabitants of Hodnett, 1 Term R. 96, 100.

"Bastardy is an unlawful state of birth, which disables the bastard from succeeding to an inheritance." Davenport v. Caldwell, 10 S. C. (10 Rich.) 317, 337.

A bastard is, in law, quasi nullius filius; and therefore he is called filius populi, a child of the people. Appeal of Gibson, 154 Mass. 378, 381, 28 N. E. 296, 297 (citing Co. Litt. pt. 1, p. 123a).

"Bastard," in Virginia, is not defined as at common law. He is one born out of wedlock, lawful or unlawful, or not within a competent time after the coverture is determined; or, if born out of wedlock, whose parents do not afterwards intermarry, and the father acknowledges the child; or who is born in wedlock when procreation by the husband is for any cause impossible. Smith v. Perry, 80 Va. 563, 570.

Child of slaves.

Bastards are children born of an illicit connection, begotten and born out of lawful wedlock. The cohabitation between slaves who intended to marry, and did all that they were able to do to carry that intention into effect, was a legal slave marriage. Such a marriage was a marriage good at common law, being a legal natural marriage, jure divino. It was not a mere adultery or fornication, and a cohabitation for any illegal or improper purpose. Children born of such a marriage are not bastards, in the absence of a statute making them so, for they are not at common law. Stikes v. Sawnson, 44 Ala. 633, 636.

BASTARDY.

Adultery distinguished, see "Adultery." As crime, see "Crime."

Illicit carnal connection which causes the birth of an illegitimate child is fornication and bastardy. Dinkey v. Commonwealth, 17 Pa. (5 Harris) 126, 129, 55 Am. Dec. 542.

BASTARDY PROCEEDING.

As civil proceeding.

Bastardy proceedings are to be regarded as essentially a civil action, accompanied by the extraordinary remedy of arrest and imprisonment for the purpose of enforcing judgment rendered in the case. In re Walker, 86 N. W. 510, 511, 61 Neb. 803; Rawlings v. People; 102 Ill. 475, 478; Maloney v. People, 38 Ill. 62, 63. See, also, State v. Carlisle, 52 N. E. 711, 713, 21 Ind. App. 438.

A bastardy proceeding is of a rather nondescript character. It partakes in its inception, under our statute, very much of the nature of a criminal case, but in its latter stages, when it reaches the circuit court, becomes a civil case. Bond v. State (Fla.) 15 South. 591, 592. A bastardy prosecution is a case, and it is not a criminal proceeding. Such a proceeding has been held, though partaking of the nature of a criminal proceeding, to be a civil suit. Robinson v. Swett, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 378, 382 (citing Wilbur v. Crane, 30 Mass. [13 Pick.] 284).

A bastardy proceeding is special in character, and is in the nature of a civil proceeding, and hence there is no authority to impose imprisonment as a part of the original judgment in order to compel the judgment debtor to secure the payment of a judgment by executing a bond. In re Comstock, 61 Pac. 921, 10 Okl. 299.

A bastardy process, under our statutes, is a civil action, and may be prosecuted before any justice of the peace, without regard to the question whether he is clothed with criminal jurisdiction. Gen. St. c. 72, § 13. It may be observed, though perhaps not necessary to the decision of this case, that, being a civil action, it is not governed by the peculiarly strict rule of criminal proceedings. Maloney v. Piper, 105 Mass. 233, 234 (citing Bailey v. Chesley, 64 Mass. [10 Cush.] 284).

Proceedings in a case of bastardy may not be considered as penal, but only as means to enforce the discharge of legal obligations. Steinert v. Sobey, 44 N. Y. Supp. 146, 148, 14 App. Div. 505.

Where the reputed father of a bastard has given recognizance before the justice of the peace to answer to the charge in the circuit court, and fails to appear in that court, the proceeding is not so far a criminal proceeding as to preclude the court from proceeding to a trial of the case in the absence of the defendant. Baker v. State, 26 N. W. 167, 168, 65 Wis. 50.

As criminal proceeding.

A prosecution under the statute for the support of bastard children is not a civil proceeding, but a criminal proceeding, and cannot be tried at a term of the court which is restricted to the transaction of civil business only. Hyde v. Chapin, 56 Mass. (2 Cush.) 77, 79; Sweet v. Sherman, 21 Vt. 23.

BATHROOMS.

"Bathrooms," as used in an act making it a misdemeanor to carry on barbering on Sunday, and providing in the body thereof that it should be a misdemeanor for any one engaged in the business of a barber to shave, shampoo, cut the hair, or keep open their bathrooms on Sunday, means apartments for bathing, and cannot be construed as included in the term "barbering," which means the act of one whose occupation is to shave the beard and cut and dress the hair of others. "Barbering" and "bathing," and "barber shop" and "bathrooms," are neither synonymous nor convertible terms. Raglo v. State, 6 S. W. 401, 86 Tenn. (2 Pickle) 272.

BATTERY.

A battery is the unlawful beating of another. Goodrum v. State, 60 Ga. 509, 511. It is the unlawful striking or beating of another. Lamb v. State (Md.) 10 Atl. 208, 209. It is the actual infliction of an injury, however slight it may be. State v. Lewis (Del.) 55 Atl. 3, 4. It is the accomplishment of an unlawful attempt to do violence to the person of another. State v. Harrigan (Del.) 55 Atl. 5, 6. It is any willful and unlawful use of force or violence upon the person of another. Rev. Codes, § 7142. State v. Climie (N. D.) 94 N. W. 574, 575.

A "battery" is defined to be the willful touching of the person of another by the aggressor, or by some substance put in motion by him. Razor v. Kinsey, 55 Ill. 605, 614; Westcott v. Arbuckle, 12 Ill. App. (12 Bradw.) 577, 580.

Anger.

At the common law, the least touching of the person of another in anger was a battery. Hunt v. People, 53 Ill. App. 111, 112.

The least touching of another's person willfully and in anger constitutes in law a battery. Johnson v. State, 17 Tex. 515, 517.

The term "battery" includes the act of touching another in anger, but not the mere act of willfully touching another; and therefore an instruction that the least touching of another person willfully or in anger is a battery is vitiated by the disjunctive "or." Alston v. State (Ala.) 20 South. 81, 82.

A battery is any unlawful touching of another, and more especially if done under influence of anger. Kirland v. State, 43 Ind. 146, 149, 13 Am. Rep. 386.

Battery consists in the doing in an angry, rude, and revengeful manner of an injury to another person. Hendle v. Geller (Del.) 50 Atl. 632.

Assault distinguished.

See "Assault."

Assault included.

A battery is the unlawful use of force or violence on the person of another, and includes an assault, but assault does not include a battery. People v. Helbling, 61 Cal. 620, 622.

Battery is an unlawful beating, or other physical violence or constraint, inflicted upon a human being without his consent. An assault is included in every battery. State v. Cody, 62 N. W. 702, 703, 94 Iowa, 169.

A battery includes an assault, and is the actual striking, or in any manner touching, another in an insolent, angry, rude, rough, or violent manner. State v. Mills (Del.) 52 Atl. 266, 267, 3 Pennewill, 508.

Every battery includes an assault. The offense of an assault, or an assault and battery, is declared criminal by the Code of Iowa; but for the description of the offense, or in order to ascertain what will amount to an assault, or assault and battery, resort to the common-law definition must be had. State v. Twogood, 7 Iowa (7 Clarke) 252, 254.

Every battery includes an assault, but an assault does not include a battery; therefore an assault and battery is an offense of a higher grade and of a more serious character than a simple assault. Furnish v. Commonwealth, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 180, 181.

A battery is only an aggravation of the assault, and, when the assault is charged to have been made with a dangerous weapon, it is still a further aggravation; and, where it is charged to have been made with an intention to commit great bodily injury, it is only an offense in a different degree. The assault is still the original offense, and the means, the intent, and the extent to which it is carried, qualify only the aggravation of this original offense, to which additional punishment is often affixed by the statute, which admits that the defendant may be convicted of the offense in a degree lower than that charged in the indictment. Cokely v. State, 4 Iowa (4 Clarke) 477, 479.

If facts are stated, in a complaint for assault and battery, showing an actual infliction of violence on the person, this is sufficient for such facts to constitute a battery, which includes an assault. Greenman v. Smith, 20 Minn. 418 (Gil. 370, 373).

As consummated assault.

Battery is not an offense of a higher nature or degree than an assault, nor is it otherwise punished, but is merely a name which the law has given to an assault after

It has reached the person at which it is aimed. Hardy v. Commonwealth (Va.) 17 Grat. 592, 601.

A battery is where an attempt to do a corporal hurt to another is carried into effect. State v. Shields (Ohio) 1 West. Law J. 118, 119.

A battery is committed whenever the violence menaced in an assault is actually done, though in ever so small a degree, upon the person. Sweeden v. State, 19 Ark. 205, 213 (citing 3 Green, Ev. § 60).

A battery is an attempt carried into execution, to the injury of the person, in an angry, revengeful mood, or insolent manner. People v. Lee (N. Y.) 1 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 364, 365. See note 2.

A battery is where an attempt or offer to do violence to the person of another results in the actual infliction of the injury. Commonwealth v. Ruggles, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 588, 591.

An assault is an attempt or offer, with force or violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, and when the assault is consummated it becomes a battery. List v. Miner, 49 Atl. 856-858, 74 Conn. 50.

An assault is an attempt to strike; the battery is the consummated act, or the unlawful touch of another person, when a rude, insulting, or angry one, and with the evident intention of injuring or wronging the person struck. Commonwealth v. Brungess, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 13-15.

"A battery is committed whenever the menaced violence of an assault is done in the least degree to the person." Cluff v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 95 Mass. (3 Allen) 308, 317.

Attempt.

As used in the definition of an "assault" as "any attempt to commit a battery," the words "any attempt to commit a battery" mean any attempt to inflict unlawful violence upon the person of another, with intent to injure him. Hardin v. State, 46 S. W. 803, 804, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 426.

Force.

A battery is any unlawful and willful use of force or violence on the person of another. People v. Chalmers, 14 Pac. 131, 132, 5 Utah 201; People v. Munn, 3 Pac. 650, 651, 65 Cal. 211.

"A battery is the use of any unlawful violence on the person of another, with intent to injure him, whatever be the means or degree of violence used." McKay v. State, 44 Tex. 43, 48.

A battery is merely the laying on of hands, or the infliction of the injury. State v. Burton (Del.) 47 Atl. 619, 2 Pennewill, 472.

A battery is committed whenever any wrongful violence is inflicted upon another without his consent. So, pouring of turpentine and pepper on one's person is a battery. Murdock v. State, 65 Ala. 520, 522.

A battery is the unlawful application of violence to the person of another. It is not necessarily a forcible striking with the hand, or stick, or the like, but includes every touching or laying hold, however trifling, of another's person or his clothes, in an angry, wrongful, rude, insolent, or hostile manner. Englehardt v. State (Ala.) 7 South. 154.

A battery is not necessarily the forcible striking with the hand, or stick, or the like, but includes every touching or laying hold, however trifling, of another person, or his clothes, in an angry, revengeful, rude, insolent, or hostile manner. A man, for instance, throwing a bottle or stone at another, is guilty of battery. The act of one in shooting another with a revolver, with intent to kill and murder him, necessarily constitutes an assault. State v. Robertson (La.) 20 South. 296, 298.

A battery is the actual infliction of violence on the person of another. The degree of violence is not regarded in the law, and therefore any touching of the person in an angry, revengeful, rude, or insolent manner, spitting upon the person, jostling him out of the way, pushing another against him, throwing a squib or any missile or water on him, striking the horse he is riding, whereby he is thrown, or taking hold of his clothes in an angry or insolent manner, to detain him, is a battery. A battery is more than an attempt to do a corporal hurt to another, but any injury whatsoever, be it ever so small, being actually done to the person of a man in an angry or revengeful or rude or insolent manner, is a battery in the eye of the law. Perkins v. Stein, 22 S. W. 649, 650, 94 Ky. 433, 20 L. R. A. 861.

Intent.

A battery is an injury actually inflicted with violence, from malice or wantonness. Commonwealth v. Ruggles, 88 Mass. (6 Allen) 588, 590 (citing 1 East P. C. 406).

"A criminal battery is committed whenever one person intentionally and wrongfully inflicts personal injury on another, against his will, by violence." Scott v. State (Ala.) 24 South. 414, 415.

"Battery" is the infliction of violence on the person, and its intention is not material. Greathouse v. Croan (Ind. T.) 76 S. W. 273, 276.

A "battery" is generally defined to be any injury done to the person of another in a rude, insolent, or unlawful way. Where one, at the request of another, inflicted a whipping on the latter, with the idea of thereby saving him from a prosecution for felony, it was not battery. Where there is no intention to injure, and no negligence, the offense cannot be imputed. State v. Beck (S. C.) 1 Hill, 362, 364, 28 Am. Dec. 190.

A "battery," as distinguished from an "assault," is where the person of a man or woman is actually struck in a violent, angry, insolent, or rude manner. But every laying on of hands is not battery. The party's intention must be considered. To constitute a battery, an intent to injure must concur with the use of unlawful violence upon the person of the assaulted party; but the slightest degree of force suffices to constitute violence, and the intended injury may be to the feelings or mind of the latter, as well as to the corporeal person. Clayton v. Keeler, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1051, 1053, 18 Misc. Rep. 488.

The "battery" mentioned in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 8, subd. 1, requiring actions for battery to be brought within two years, is an intentionally administered injury to the person; such an injury as could be made the basis of a criminal prosecution. Personal injury actions, the result of negligence, are not within the statute. Ott v. Great Northern R. Co., 72 N. W. 833, 70 Minn. 50.

BATTERY TRANSMITTER.

A "battery transmitter" is one in which a battery or strong current is utilized for the transmission of speech through a telephone, as distinguished from a "magneto transmitter," in which only a feeble current is generated by induction. It requires a battery current to transmit speech a long distance. American Bell Tel. Co. v. National Tel. Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 119 Fed. 893.

BATTURE.

"Batture" is, according to Richelet and the French Academy, a marine word, and is used to denote a bottom of sound stone or rock, mixed together and rising toward the surface of the water. This etymology is from the verb "battre," to beat, because a batture is beaten by the water. In its grammatical sense as a technical word, and we believe in common parlance, it is then an elevation of the bed of a river under the surface of the water, since it is rising toward it. It is, however, sometimes used to denote the same elevation of the bank when it has arisen above the surface of the water, or is as high as the land on the outside of the bank. Morgan v. Livingston (La.) 6 Mart. (O. S.) 19, 111; Hollingsworth v. Chaffee, 33 La. Ann. 547, 551.

In its grammatical sense as a technical word, and in common parlance, a "batture" is an elevation of the bed of the river under the surface of the water. It is, however, sometimes used to denote an elevation of the bank when it has arisen along the surface of the water, or is as high as the land on the outside of the bank. In this latter sense it is synonymous with "alluvion," which is defined to be "an insensible increment brought by the water." It means, in common law, any land formed by accretion. New Orleans v. Morris (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 114, 115.

Batture "is an elevation of the bed of a river under the surface of the water, but is sometimes used to signify the same elevation when it has risen above the surface. The term is applied principally to certain portions of the bed of the Mississippi river which are left dry when the river is low, and are covered again, either in whole or in part, by the natural swells." Heirs of Leonard v. City of Baton Rouge (La.) 4 South. 241, 243.

Battures are the gradual and imperceptible augmentations of the soil situate on the shore of a river or other stream. Zeller v. Southern Yacht Club, 34 La. Ann. 837, 838.

A batture is the accretion formed in front of lands situated on the Mississippi river. Ferriere v. City of New Orleans, 35 La. Ann. 209.

BAUXITE.

The word "bauxite" alone, when used in trade, indicates the crude ore, which when taken from the mine resembles lumps of coarse earth or clay, and contains iron, silica, titanite acid, besides other substances. It does not include such a product as hydrate of alumina. As used in Act Oct. 1, 1890, c. 1244, § 2, Free List, par. 501, 26 Stat. 604, placing bauxite on the free list, it does not include the white powder known to the trade as "refined bauxite," which is manufactured from bauxite by removing from the crude ore the impurities of iron, silica, and titanite acid. In re Irwin (U. S.) 62 Fed. 150, 152; Irwin v. United States (U. S.) 67 Fed. 232, 233, 14 C. C. A. 381.

BAWD.

"A bawd is one who procures opportunities for persons of opposite sexes to cohabit in an illicit manner, and may be, while exercising the trade of a bawd, perfectly innocent of committing in his or her own proper person the crime either of adultery or of fornication." Dyer v. Morris, 4 Mo. 214, 216.

BAWDY HOUSE.

See "Common Bawdy House."

"A bawdy house is a house kept for the purposes of prostitution, and visited by the public for such purposes." Davis v. State, 2 Tex. App. 425, 427 (quoting Gen. Ord. City of Waco, art. 44).

The definition of a "bawdy house" embraces the fact that lewd persons of both sexes resort thereto and commit acts of prostitution therein, and these acts are embraced in the charge of keeping the house. Nelson v. Territory, 49 Pac. 920, 5 Okl. 512.

A single act of illicit intercourse in a house is not sufficient to constitute it a "bawdy house," but it must be resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, and it must be shown that the inmates are prostitutes, or that the house is the resort of prostitutes. People v. Gastro, 42 N. W. 937, 939, 75 Mich. 127.

As disorderly house.

"At common law, a bawdy house, in the common sense of the term, is a species of disorderly house, and is indictable as a nuisance." Hensen v. State, 62 Md. 231, 232.

As house of ill fame.

The term "bawdy house" was said in State v. Boardman, 64 Me. 523, to be synonymous with "house of ill fame." Henson v. State, 62 Md. 231, 232, 234, 50 Am. Rep. 204.

A bawdy house is a house of ill fame, kept for the resort and convenience of lewd people of both sexes, whether it be kept for pecuniary profit and gain, or for other motives equally bad and more debasing. State v. Porter, 38 Ark. 637, 638.

A "bawdy house" and "house of ill fame" are synonymous terms. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 163. In State v. Smith, 12 N. W. 524, 29 Minn. 193, it was said: "The term 'house of ill fame' is no doubt a mere synonym for 'bawdy house,' having no reference to the fame of the place, but denoting the fact." State v. Lee, 45 N. W. 545, 547, 80 Iowa, 75, 20 Am. St. Rep. 401.

A bawdy house is a house of ill fame, kept for the resort and convenience of lewd people of both sexes. It is not necessary that more women than one must live or resort together to constitute a bawdy house, and although a person be only a lodger and have a single room, yet if she makes use of it to accommodate people in the way of a bawdy house it will be a keeping of a bawdy house as much as if she occupied the whole house. People v. Buchanan, 1 Idaho, 681, 689.

BAY.

A bay is an opening into the land where the water is shut in on all sides except at the entrance. United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310, 1313.

Laws 1846, p. 279, authorizes the Hudson River Railroad to build certain bridges over navigable streams and inlets, and requires the bridges to be so constructed as to provide free passage for vessels and boats that may pass into the bay that may be crossed by such railroads. It is held that the word "bay" was used to describe an indentation or curve which was not the outlet of a navigable stream. Tillotson v. Hudson R. R. Co., 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 575, 580. The word "bay" as so used refers to such bays only as have a general navigation deserving the name of navigation, and the fact that some sort of water craft can at times pass near to the shore of a curve in the stream does not make a bay within the meaning of the statute. Getty v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 21 Barb. 617, 629.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5346 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3630], provides for the punishment of any person who shall on the highways or in any arm of the sea, or in any bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, commit an assault on another. Held, that the word "bay" means a bay connected with the high seas, and does not include the Great Lakes and their connecting waters. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 405.

In description as high-water mark.

The term "bay," when used in a deed as a boundary of land conveyed, is to be construed to mean bay at the ordinary high-water mark. Seaman v. Smith, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 521, 524.

When the sea or a bay is named as a boundary, the line of ordinary high-water mark is always intended where the common law prevails. United States v. Pacheco, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 587, 590, 17 L. Ed. 865.

Any boundary at tide water, by whatever name, whether sea, harbor, or bay, includes the land below the high-water mark as far as the grantor owns; but a boundary of that land, whether described as shore, beach, or flats, excludes it. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (18 Allen) 146, 155.

In description as low-water mark.

"Bay," as used in a grant of land described as bounded by a bay, will be construed to mean low-water mark of the bay. Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160, 169.

River.

A bay is an inlet of the sea, and is not included within the term "river," as used in Code, § 4212, providing for the punishment of a captain or commanding officer of a steamboat who knowingly suffers a game of cards to be played on such boat while navigating any of the rivers of the state, though the river flows into it, for a river is an inland stream. "Where the one begins and the other ends may often be a question of difficulty, yet the two are legally, and in fact essentially, distinct." Johnson v. State, 74 Ala. 537, 538.

"A bay is a bending or curving of the shore of a sea or of a lake, and is derived from an Anglo-Saxon word signifying to 'bow' or 'bend.' For a similar reason the word 'bay' is in Latin termed 'sinus,' which expresses a curvature or recess in the coast; and calling a river a bay will not make it so." State v. Town of Gilmanton, 14 N. H. 467, 477.

"Bay" is an arm of the sea distinct from a river, so that a grant bounded by the east side of Delaware Bay does not of itself include the Delaware river. Attorney General v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 12 (C. E. Green) 631, 635.

BAY CRAFT.

A statute authorizing "bay or river crafts or other boats" to make fast to private wharves without paying harbor master's fees will be construed to include all vessels propelled by either sail or steam which are constructed and used in the bays and rivers, and not on the open seas, and not to embrace steamboats of 500 tons. The Wenonah, 21 Grat. 685, 697.

BAY HORSE.

The term "bay" is defined, as applied to horses, to be "red or reddish; inclining to chestnut." Sparks v. Brown, 46 Mo. App. 529, 536.

BAY RUM.

As intoxicating liquor, see "Intoxicating Liquor."

BAY WINDOW.

A bay window, both in the ordinary and technical acceptance of the word, indicates the formation of a bay in the room to which it is attached, and which to that extent enlarges the capacity of the room. Commonwealth v. Harris (Pa.) 10 Wkly. Notes Cas. 10, 13.

BAYOU.

Under Act Cong. March 3, 1811, § 5, as renewed and continued in force by Act June 15, 1832, provided that every person who owns a tract of land bordering on any river, creek, bayou, or water course in the territory of Orleans and not exceeding a certain depth shall be entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser of any tract of land adjacent to and back of his own tract not exceeding a certain depth. It was held that "bayou" means a channel through which commerce could be carried on by water; and hence a shallow pond or lagoon 2 or 3 miles long, which drains swamps, and at its greatest width is from 70 to 80 feet from bank to bank, and the channel in parts is some 15 feet deep from the top of its banks, but at no time of the year is a navigable stream, being nearly dry for a greater portion of the year, having no running water, or water in it except stagnant pools, but is merely an ordinary pond of the Mississippi swamp and of shallow ponds, is not a bayou within the meaning of the act. Surgett v. Laplace, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 48, 67, 12 L. Ed. 982.

BE—BEING.

See "In Being"; "May be"; "Then Being."

A deed by which the grantor conveyed all his right, title, and interest, the same being a one-half undivided interest, conveys all of grantor's right, title, or interest without regard to whether they exceed a one-half interest or not; the words "being a one-half undivided interest" not limiting the extent of the previous terms of conveyance, or excepting any interest conveyed by the previous terms. McLennan v. McDonnell, 20 Pac. 566, 567, 78 Cal. 273.

A bill of sale of a slave which recited that the seller had sold to the buyer a negro woman named "Sarah," age about 30, "being of sound wind and limb, and free from all disease," should be construed as warranting her soundness, and not as merely descriptive. Cramer v. Bradshaw (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 484.

"Be offered," as used in an order passed by a city council that a reward be offered to any person giving information so that a person may be convicted of setting fire to a building for the purpose of burning the same, means be notified and presented to the public, to any and all persons, by some suitable and authentic announcement to be published. It does not mean "is hereby offered," so as to constitute an offer without the advertisement. Freeman v. City of Boston, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 56, 59.

"Being threatened," as used in the exception contained in the statute against carrying concealed weapons, which allows any person to carry a weapon on being threatened or having good reason to apprehend an attack, means only impending threats. Baker v. State, 49 Ala. 350, 352.

The words "be and is hereby granted," in a government grant of land to a railroad, import a grant in present, and when the lands are ascertained by fixing the line of the road in the manner prescribed in the act, the title of the grantee relates back to the date of the act, but does not attach to land in which the United States did not have full title at that date, or which were otherwise excepted from the operation of the grant, even though they should afterwards be freed from the claim or possession which excluded them under the terms of the grant. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Wood, 124 Cal. 475, 481, 57 Pac. 388, 390 (citing Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769). See, also, Denny v. Dodson (U. S.) 32 Fed. 899, 903.

Where a valid insurance policy was stated as being on "a new bark now being built," it was held that the policy applied to the bark itself as it then lay on the stocks at the time of the insurance, and operated on such materials as should from time to time be put upon and attached to the vessel, so that they might be considered a part thereof. But in the absence of proof of usage, the policy did not attach upon articles made for the vessel, delivered in the shipyards where she was constructing, in a condition and intended to be fitted and attached to her if she had been, or as soon as she might be, ready to receive them. Mason v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. (Md.) 12 Gill & J. 468, 473.

In a proclamation directing a vote of the people for or against issuing bonds to a railroad company, under the stipulation that they should be issued only in the event of such railroad being constructed and running centrally through the county, the words "being constructed" did not mean "fully completed." It was only a proposition whether the county would aid to construct the road. The money was to be paid only in the event of the road being constructed centrally through the county. To aid in constructing the road after it is constructed would be tautology in language; to say they would aid in building the road, and contend that they were only liable after the road was built, is a contradiction in terms. State v. Bissell (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 328, 332.

The term "walking or being on the roadbed of any railroad," in a life policy limiting the amount to be recovered if death results to insured from walking or being on the roadbed of any railroad, includes an attempt to cross the track at a place where it is commonly crossed by the public. Keene v. New England Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 41 N. E. 203, 164 Mass. 170.

The phrase "walking or being on a railroad bridge or roadbed," under an exception in an accident policy of liability for injuries or death caused thereby, is not to be construed with absolute literalness. The condition is a warranty by the assured that he will not intrude upon that part of the roadbed which is also a part of the highway or public thoroughfare, and that he will not loiter upon the track; but it does not obligate him not to cross the railroad at the place provided for the public to cross it. And if one crosses a track at a station where the public is accustomed to cross, he is not walking on a railroad bed in any sense as will entitle the insurer to avoid the policy, irrespective of proof of such person's negligence in so crossing. Payne v. Fraternal Acc. Ass'n, 93 N. W. 361, 363, 119 Iowa, 342.

As used in an instruction in a prosecution for murder, that "the killing being proved" the burden of proving the circumstances of mitigation or justification or excuse is on defendant, means that, if the jury find the fact of the killing and that the prisoner did it, then the burden of proving the circumstances which mitigate the offense or justify the killing altogether would devolve on the accused, unless the very evidence itself which proves the killing, and that it was done by the prisoner, also shows that it was manslaughter or justifiable homicide. Territory v. Manton, 19 Pac. 387, 392, 8 Mont. 95.

The words "if she be dead," as used by a testatrix in devising property to a sister, "and, if she be dead, to her children," did not refer to the date of the will, it appearing that testatrix thought that her sister was then living, but to the date of the testatrix's death. Grant v. Mosely (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 508.

As creating a condition precedent.

A proposition submitted to the people to subscribe money to be paid only in the event of the road being constructed through a certain county sufficiently presents the proposition as to whether the people would aid to construct a road through such county. State v. Bissell (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 328, 331.

A covenant to convey one-half of the lands to be bought, the grantees "being" at one-half of the expense, renders payment of the expenses a condition precedent. Hutcherson v. McNutt's Heirs, 1 Ohio (1 Ham.) 14, 15, 17.

As having.

In the Constitution of Rhode Island, declaring that no person can be a legal voter unless he is possessed in his own right of real estate of the value of $134 or which shall rent for $7 per annum, being an estate in fee simple fee tail for the life of any person, or an estate in reversion or remainder which qualifies no other person to vote, the phrase "being an estate in fee simple" evidently means having an estate of this class, so that if a person has an estate in remainder of the value mentioned in his own right, that is, which he holds beneficially for himself, and not simply as trustee or custodian, the provision of the Constitution is satisfied. In re Horgan, 18 Atl. 279, 281, 16 R. I. 542.

As living.

"Being," as used in the certification by a magistrate as to the cause of taking a deposition saying that the deponent being more than 30 miles from the place of trial, etc., "being" was not equivalent to the word "living." Barron v. Pettes, 18 Vt. 385, 387.

As indicating past or future.

As used in the acceptance of a draft of a contractor, accepted on condition that the contracts be complied with, will be construed to mean the subsequent performance of the contractors, and not to acts which they were required to do in the past. United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 40 U. S. (15 Pet.) 377, 399, 10 L. Ed. 774.

A guaranty stating that, "In consideration of your being in advance to John Lees & Son in the sum of 10,000 pounds, I hereby give you my guaranty for that amount," the words "being in advance" did not necessarily mean to assert that the party was in advance at the time of giving the guaranty; the terms might have been intended as prospective. Haigh v. Brooks, 10 Adol. & E. 309, 310.

The phrase "without being married," in a will providing for the disposition of property if a certain person dies without being married, is capable of two meanings, either "without having been married," or "unmarried at the time of death"; but the natural prima facie meaning of the words, taken per se, is "without having been married." In re Norman's Trust, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 127, 129; Bell v. Phyn, 7 Ves. 453, 458.

As sufficient statement of character or status.

A statement in an indictment that certain parties, "being surveyors," performed certain acts, sufficiently alleged the parties "to be surveyors." Rex v. Boyall, 2 Burrows, 832, 834.

An averment in a pleading as to N. "being a merchant" is a sufficient averment that he is a merchant, under Bankr. Act 1867, § 39, cl. 9, providing that any person who, "being a banker, merchant, or trader," has fraudulently stopped or suspended, and has not secured payment of his commercial paper within a period of 14 days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy. In re Nickodemus (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 222, 223.

While in some cases the expression "being" director, etc., has been assumed to be sufficient to show that the person charged occupied the relation to the bank necessary under a statute punishing bank officials for certain acts, in an indictment for aiding a cashier in making false entries, a description of defendant as "being" then and there a director does not charge him with aiding and abetting in his official capacity. United States v. French (U. S.) 57 Fed. 382, 386.

To say that a person, "being" insane, does an act, cannot be construed as an allegation as to the condition of that person, or regarded as presenting an issuable fact or ground for relief, and is not equivalent to an allegation that she was at the time of the act referred to a person of unsound mind. Valentine v. Lunt, 22 N. E. 209, 210, 115 N. Y. 496.

"Who being minors," though an awkward way of alleging that defendant sold liquor to minors, sufficiently sets forth the claim that such persons were minors. State v. Boncher, 59 Wis. 477, 481, 18 N. W. 335.

BEACH.

The word "beach" must be deemed to designate land washed by the sea and its waves, and to be synonymous with "shore." Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 180, 183; Elliott v. Stewart, 14 Pac. 410, 417, 15 Or. 259; Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 439, 4 Am. Dec. 155; Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 531.

By a "beach" is to be understood the shore or strand. Cutts v. Hussey, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 237, 241; Doane v. Willcutt, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 328, 335, 66 Am. Dec. 369; Town of East Hampton v. Kirk (N. Y.) 6 Hun, 257, 259.

The beach of the sea cannot be construed as including any ground always covered by the sea, for then it would have no definite limit on the seaboard; neither can it include any part of the land for the same reason. It denotes lands washed by the sea. Town of East Hampton v. Kirk, 68 N. Y. 459, 463.

As land between high and low water.

When used in a conveyance of land bounded on one side by the sea or beach, "beach" has a fixed and definite meaning and comprises the territory lying between the lines of high and low water over which the tide ebbs and flows. Doane v. Willcutt, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 328, 335, 66 Am. Dec. 369; Niles v. Patch, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 254, 257; Town of East Hampton v. Kirk (N. Y.) 6 Hun, 257, 259; Cutts v. Hussey, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 237, 239.

In a deed of a lot of land, reserving to a certain person the right to cross to a beach and to take and haul water, stones, gravel, sand, and seaweed, "beach" means the land lying between the lines of high water and low water over which the tide ebbs and flows, when used in reference to places anywhere in the vicinity of the sea or the arms of the sea. Hodge v. Boothby, 48 Me. 68, 70.

The word "beach" has no such inflexible meaning that it must denote land between high and low water mark. Where the term is used in the conveyance, it is competent to show by other parts of the deed, and by the situation and use of the property, and also by parol evidence, that the word was not intended to indicate land between high and low water mark. Merwin v. Wheeler, 41 Conn. 14, 26.

The words "beach" or "ocean front," in an act authorizing cities on the ocean to lay out walks thereon, include the entire beach flowed by the ocean tides. State v. Wright, 23 Atl. 116, 418, 54 N. J. Law (25 Vroom) 130.

As high-water mark.

"Beach," as used in a deed in which land was bounded westerly by the beach, did not include the beach, but merely extended to it. Niles v. Patch, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 254, 257; Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 531.

"The word 'beach' denotes land washed by the sea, and in the absence of qualifying words a boundary by the sea beach extends to high-water mark." McRoberts v. Bergman, 80 N. E. 261, 263, 132 N. Y. 73.

In the expression "back of the beach," "beach" means the high-water land. Nixon v. Walter, 8 Atl. 385, 387, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 103.

Any boundary at tide water by whatever name, whether sea, harbor, or bay, includes the land below the high-water mark as far as the grantor owns; but a boundary of that land, whether described as shore, beach, or flats, excludes it. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

As shore above high water.

The word "beach," when used in a deed, has no such inflexible meaning that it must necessarily denote land between high and low water mark, but may be construed, in the light of circumstances surrounding the execution of such deed, to mean the sandy shore above high-water mark. Wakeman v. Glover, 52 Atl. 622, 75 Conn. 23.

BEACH FOR DRIFTWOOD.

A will devising to testator's daughter a certain farm, also one mile in length of his "beach for driftwood and timber," means "that portion of the soil of the beach upon which driftwood will ordinarily come by force of the action of the elements in ordinary seasons." Such a line is usually marked on the shore or upper part of the beach by the row of sea drift there formed. The devise must be limited by that line of shore inward from the sea to which seaweed and driftwood are usually carried by the sea in ordinary seasons by the highest winter floods, but it will not include lands occasionally covered by sea water by extraordinary inundations. Brown v. Lakeman, 34 Mass. (17 Pick.) 444, 445, 28 Am. Dec. 314.

BEADS.

Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 408, 30 Stat. 189 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1673], fixing a duty on articles composed wholly or in part of beads, does not include metal beads; but they should be assessed under paragraph 193, Schedule C, § 1, c. 11, 30 Stat. 167 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1645], as articles composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, or other metal. Steinhardt v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 996.

BEADSMAN.

A beadsman is a man employed in praying, generally in praying for another. Bailey defines "beadsman" as "a person devoted to prayer, who in a chantry or religious house in popish times said a certain set of prayers for patrons, having an allowance for performing said office. The office in modern times has become a sinecure." Faulkner v. Boddington, 3 C. B. 412, 416.

BEAM FILLING.

The term "beam filling" is used in maritime language to designate materials used in loading a vessel to fill the spaces between the beams that separate the lower between-decks from the lower hold. The John A. Briggs (U. S.) 113 Fed. 948, 950.

BEAR.

Bear arms.

Section 26 of the Declaration of Rights, declaring that the free white men of this state have a right to "bear arms" for their common defense, is to be construed as having "reference to their military use, and . . . not employed to mean wearing them about the person as a part of the dress." Aymette v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 154, 158.

Const. U. S. Amend. 2, providing that the right of the people to "keep and bear arms" shall not be infringed, means "to keep and bear arms of every description, and not such merely as are used by the militia." The right pertains to "the whole people, old and young, men and women and boys, and not militia only." A law prohibiting the carriage of concealed weapons is not a violation of the provision, though a prohibition of carrying visible weapons would be a violation thereof. Nunn v. State, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 243, 251.

Const. U. S. Amend. 2, which declares that the right of people to "keep and bear arms" shall not be infringed, is not to be so construed as to prevent states from passing laws prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons. State v. Jumel, 13 La. Ann. 399.

The right to "bear arms," in defense of himself and the state, given by the Constitution, does not divest the Legislature of the power over the subject, and authority to adopt such regulations of police as may be dictated by the safety of the people and the advancement of public morals. State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 615, 35 Am. Dec. 44.

The words "bear arms" include the right to load and shoot them, and use them as such things are ordinarily used, so that the people will be fitted for defending the state when it needs aid; and, when the Constitution grants to the General Assembly the right to prescribe the manner in which arms may be borne, it grants the power to regulate the whole subject of using arms, providing the regulation does not infringe on that use of them which is necessary to fit the owners of them for a ready and skillful use of them as militiamen. Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, 480.

The words are not used in the Constitution alone in the military sense of carrying arms, but in the earlier sense of wearing them in war or in peace. The word "arms" means instruments or weapons of defense, and is not restricted by any means to public warfare. Andrews v. State, 50 Tenn. (3 Helsk.) 165, 194, 8 Am. Rep. 8.

The Constitution provides "that the right of the citizens to bear arms in defense of themselves and the state shall not be questioned." To be in conflict with the Constitution, it is not essential that an act should contain a prohibition against bearing arms in every possible form, for whatever restrains the full and complete exercise of that right, though not an entire restriction of it, is forbidden by the Constitution. In accordance with these views an act prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons is unconstitutional. Bliss v. Commonwealth, 12 Ky. (2 Litt.) 90, 13 Am. Dec. 251.

Bearing date.

A declaration on a bond, alleging that the action was brought on a bond "bearing date" the 18th day of October, 1823, was no averment that the bond was executed and issued on that day. Latham's Adm'rs v. Lawrence, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 322, 325.

Bear the expenses.

Where a special contract under which horses were shipped over a railroad provided that the owner should "bear the expenses" of feeding or watering the stock during transportation, such provision varied the common-law duty of the railroad company to the extent of its terms, reasonably construed, but no more. "The extent of the variation in terms is simply that the owner shall bear the expenses of feeding and watering. Certainly there is no reasonable construction of those words, considered alone, which would relieve the railroad company from the duty of placing the cars where the horses could be unloaded by the person in charge, where the evidence showed that the horses could not be fed or watered while on the cars." Burns v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 80 N. W. 927, 929, 104 Wis. 646.

Bear interest.

An agreement that a sum loaned should "bear interest" at a certain per cent. means that such loan should produce or yield such rate of interest; that is, that such rate of interest should be paid by the person to whom the loan was made to the person making the loan. Slaughter v. Slaughter, 52 N. E. 994, 996, 21 Ind. App. 641.

BEARER.

Of challenge.

St. 1796, providing that, if any person shall by word, message, letter, or any other way challenge another to fight a duel with rapier, small sword, pistol, or other dangerous weapon, or shall knowingly be the bearer of such challenge, means a third person who carries a challenge for his friend, and not the challenger himself. State v. Gibbons, 4 N. J. Law (1 South.) 40, 49.

Of negotiable instrument.

The terms "order" or "bearer" are convenient and expressive to be used, in negotiable instruments, to communicate the quality of negotiability. Whitney Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 27 South. 948, 950, 52 La. Ann. 1484.

The words "or order," "or bearer," and "bearer," in notes or bills, are words of negotiability, without which, or other equivalent words, the instrument will not possess that quality; and therefore the use of these expressions by the drawer of a bill indicates his intention that the paper shall be negotiable. Mechanics' Bank v. Straiton, 36 How. Prac. 190; Id., (N. Y.) 3 Abb. Dec. 269, 270; Id., *42 N. Y. (3 Keyes) 365, 5 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 11.

A receipt was as follows: "On or before the first day of March next, I promise to deliver to L——, or bearer, $100 worth of hemlock lumber at wholesale price." Held, that the receipt would have been transferable if the phrase "or bearer" had been omitted. People v. Bradley (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 245, 247.

The term "holder," when used with reference to negotiable paper, is properly applied to the person having possession of the paper and making the demand, whether in his own right or as an agent for another. "Holder" is a word of the same import as "bearer," and is applied to any one in actual or constructive possession of the bill, and entitled at law to recover or receive its contents from the parties to it. Crocker-Wool- worth Nat. Bank v. Nevada Bank (Cal.) 73 Pac. 456, 462, 63 L. R. A. 245.

A note payable to bearer is payable to any person who successively owns the note bona fide, and is so payable, not by virtue of any assignment of the promise, but by virtue of the original and direct promise moving from the maker to the bearer. Town of Thompson v. Perrine, 1 Sup. Ct. 564, 567, 106 U. S. 589, 27 L. Ed. 298.

A note payable to a named payee, or bearer, passes by delivery, and may be sued for by any person who received it in the course of business, and such suit may be brought in the bearer's own name without notifying the payee, since the promise to pay was as much to the bearer as to the person named. Bradford v. Jenks (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 1132, 1133.

The word "bearer," as used in a negotiable instrument reciting that it is payable to "bearer," denotes an intention to make the instrument transferable by delivery. Porter v. City of Janesville (U. S.) 3 Fed. 617, 619.

A contract to deliver certain stock on notice to bearer does not mean simply a person having a paper in his individual custody. It means a person apparently exercising individual dominion of the paper as owner. If it appeared that he who had the paper procured it wrongfully from the owner he would not be the "bearer." Van Orden v. Keene, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 460, 461.

The word "bearer," in a bond of a corporation payable to an individual or bearer, includes the holder, whoever he may be. Hubbard v. New York & H. R. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 275, 278.

"Bearer," as used in the negotiable instruments law, means the person in possession of a bill or note which is payable to bearer. Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 653, c. 73, § 207; Negotiable Instruments Law N. D. § 191; Rev. Codes 1899, § 1060; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178; B. & C. Comp. Or. § 4592.

An instrument, otherwise negotiable in form, payable to a person named, but with the words added "or to his order" or "to bearer," or words equivalent thereto, is in the former case payable to the written order of such person, and in the latter case payable to the bearer. Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2867.

BEARING.

A "bearing," in mechanics, is defined by Webster to be: (a) The part in contact with which a journal moves, as the journal boxes, trusses, etc.; (b) that part of the shaft or axle which is in contact with the supports. To the same effect is Knight's American Mechanical Dictionary, only reversing the order: (a) The portion of an axle or shaft in contact with its collar or boxing; (b) the portion of the support on which the gudgeon rests and rotates. Cramer v. Fry (U. S.) 68 Fed. 201, 209.

BEAST.

See "Cattle Beast"; "Wild Beast."

Cow.

As used in Act 1883, c. 9, § 2, providing that any person who shall willfully or maliciously kill or destroy or wound the beast of another shall be fined and imprisoned, the word "beast" is a generic term, and includes a cow. Taylor v. State, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 285, 286.

"Beast," as used in a statute prohibiting the malicious and unlawful killing of a beast, includes a cow; and hence, in an indictment for the unlawful killing of a cow, it was not necessary to allege or charge that a beast was killed, as stated in the statute. Taylor v. State, 25 Tenn. (6 Humph.) 285, 286.

Dog.

Rev. St. c. 101, § 39, providing that every person who shall willfully and maliciously kill, maim, or disfigure any horse, cattle, or other beasts of another person shall be punished, etc., is to be construed as including all animals not specified which "have an intrinsic value in the same sense as there is value in horses, oxen, and cows." It does not include animals having in law no value, and hence it does not include a dog. United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292, 296 (Gil. 226, 229).

A "beast," as used in Shannon's Code, § 6509, in reference to the killing of beasts, does not include a dog. In deciding the case the court admitted that the term was broad enough to include dogs, but based the decision on a legislative intent not to include dogs within the statute. State v. Phillips, 1 Tenn. Cas. 34.

Hog.

"Beast," as used in Code, § 2678, providing that "if any person maliciously kill, maim, or disfigure any horse, cattle, or other domestic beast of another," etc., includes hogs. State v. Enslow, 10 Iowa, 115, 116.

Horse.

In the statutes exempting work beasts and work horses from execution, the word "beast" means "an animal of the horse kind which may be rendered fit for service, as well as one of mature age and in actual use." It has the same meaning as the words "work horse," as therein used. Winfrey v. Zimmerman, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 587, 588.

A horse is a "beast of the plow," within Laws 1871, c. 30, exempting from execution beasts of the plow; but a wagon or harness is not included. Somers v. Emerson, 58 N. H. 48, 49.

BEAST GATE.

"Beast gate" is land and common for one beast. Bennington v. Goodtitle, 2 Strange, 1084.

BEAST OF BURDEN.

The phrase "beast of burden" does not include a dog. People v. Court of Special Sessions (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 441, 445.

BEAT.

St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 29, declaring that, if any person shall unlawfully beat or wound any person intrusted with the care of deer, he shall be punished, etc., is not satisfied by a mere battery; but the statute contemplates beating in the popular sense of the word. Pulling a man to the ground and holding him there is not a "beating." Regina v. Hale, 2 Car. & K. 326, 327.

The word "beat," in an indictment alleging that defendant cruelly beat a certain horse, describes with sufficient certainty the alleged act, and cannot be claimed to refer to a race or some other act of contest. There is no doubt that the beating of a horse by a man refers to the infliction of blows. Commonwealth v. McClellan, 101 Mass. 34, 35.

There is no distinction between the meaning to be given the words "unlawful beating" within a statute and that given the word "battery" at common law. The latter word is defined by Blackstone to mean "the unlawful beating of another." Hunt v. People, 53 Ill. App. 111, 112.

"Assault or beating," as used in admiralty rule 16, declaring that in all suits for an "assault or beating" on the high seas, the suit shall be in personam only, means any case in which the gravamen of the action is an assault or beating, although the injuries alleged arise, not only from assaults and beatings, but also injuries from every ill treatment and all cases of actionable personal abuse. Smith v. The Challenger, 7 Pac. 851, 853, 2 Wash. 447.

A single blow may constitute "beating," within the meaning of the statute relative to wife beating. State v. Harrigan (Del.) 55 Atl. 5.

As subdivision of county.

In 1851 a "beat" in the state was a well-known legal subdivision of a county, corresponding to townships or towns in some other states. Williams v. Pearson, 38 Ala. 299, 308.

BECAME.

The words "became, were, and still are," in an indictment charging that a dam and pond "became, were, and still are" a nuisance to the public, imports a prior and continuing offense, and therefore evidence of the existence of the nuisance at any time within two years prior to the date laid in the indictment is admissible. State v. Holman, 10 S. E. 758, 104 N. C. 861.

BECOME.

An indictment alleging a sale to a person in the habit of becoming intoxicated is the same as charging a sale to a person in the habit of being intoxicated. State v. Dolan, 122 Ind. 141, 23 N. E. 761.

As relating to future.

Where a fire policy on a building contains a condition invalidating it on the building becoming vacant and unoccupied, the phrase "becoming vacant and unoccupied" has reference to the future. It relates to a change in the condition of the property in this respect after the insurance is effected, and not to a condition existing at the date of the policy. Bear v. Atlanta Home Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 581, 583, 34 Misc. Rep. 613.

In 3 How. Ann. St. § 9286, declaring it to be felony to solicit or induce a female to enter a house of ill fame for the purpose of becoming a prostitute, some force must be given to the word "become"; and it is evident that the Legislature did not intend to make the offense complete by the mere soliciting of a female, who was already a prostitute in a house of ill fame, to go from that place into another house of like character. People v. Cook, 55 N. W. 980, 981, 96 Mich. 368.

The word "become," as used in the transfer tax law, providing that such tax shall be imposed on any such person or corporation specified as "becomes" beneficially entitled to any property by such transfer, whether made before or after the passage of this act, clearly refers to future, and not past, events. In re Birdsall's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, 463, 22 Misc. Rep. 180.

The word "become," as used in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, directing the assignee to pay the sums "which are or may become due to them," means nothing more than "be," and the term simply means, by the use of the words "are or may become due," past due debts and existing liabilities to become due. Read v. Worthington, 22 N. Y. Super. Ct. (9 Bosw.) 617, 627.

BECOME AWARE

The bond of a bank teller required that the bank should at once notify the guaranty company on its becoming aware that the teller was engaged in speculation or gambling. It was held that the obvious meaning of "becoming aware," as used in this bond, was to be informed of, or to be apprised of, or to be put on one's guard in respect to, and that no other meaning is equally admissible under the terms of the instrument; that to be aware is not the same as to have knowledge, and hence it cannot be construed as equivalent to becoming satisfied, though perhaps it may be to having reason to believe. Thus, where the bank officers had information in regard to speculation by its teller, and failed to investigate it or notify the surety company, they could not recover on the bond, though they did not know or were not satisfied that the teller was engaged in speculation. Guarantee Co. of North America v. Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Co., 22 Sup. Ct. 124, 131, 183 U. S. 402, 46 L. Ed. 253.

BECOME DUE.

An appeal bond, given in an action concerning real property, and conditioned to pay all rent due and to "become due," could only be construed as meaning the intervening rent. Martin v. Campbell, 120 Mass. 126, 130.

Rev. St. U. S. § 4747 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3279], exempting from execution money "due or to become due to any pensioner," means money due or to become due from the pension department, and has no wider application. Rozelle v. Rhodes, 9 Atl. 160, 161, 116 Pa. 129, 2 Am. St. Rep. 591.

Code, § 2975, requiring a garnishee to not pay any debt due or "thereafter to become due," should be construed as meaning a subsisting debt, and does not include any debt which may thereafter originate. A debt which has yet to originate cannot properly be said to be a debt which is to become due. Thomas v. Gibbons, 15 N. W. 593, 61 Iowa, 50.

The words "to become due," in Rev. St. § 3719, providing that a garnishee shall be liable to the plaintiff for the amount of his indebtedness to the defendant then due or "to become due," only applies to an absolute debt payable in the future, and not to a debt which may possibly become due upon the performance of a contract by the defendant in attachment. Foster v. Singer, 34 N. W. 395, 396, 69 Wis. 392, 2 Am. St. Rep. 745.

A provision of a will was: "I give the several legacies following, which I will shall be paid to the several persons hereinafter named, and that, if any of these persons should die before the same has become due and payable, I will that they or any of them shall not be deemed lapsed legacies." Held, that the words "become due and payable" had the same effect as "was payable," and one of the legacies being to A., the wife of W., and A. having died during the life of the testatrix, the legacy did not lapse, but was decreed to W. Sibley v. Cook, 3 Atk. 572, 573.

BECOME INCAPABLE OF SERVING.

The words "become incapable of serving," in a statute providing that, if a township officer shall become incapable of serving, his office shall be deemed vacant, refers to a personal incapacity, mental or physical, on the part of the incumbent, and not a supposed incapacity by a change of the township boundary, leaving the incumbent a non-resident of the township. State v. Riverside Tp., 53 Atl. 396, 68 N. J. Law, 571.

BECOME VOID.

In an act (1 Litt. Comp. Laws, p. 501) requiring that, within 15 days after a caveat is entered, the plaintiff in the caveat shall deliver a certified copy thereof to the clerk of the court in which he intends to prosecute it, and declaring that otherwise the caveat should become void, the phrase "become void" is not convertible with "determine." "Become void," however, differs from "determine" only as a species differs from its genus, and must therefore be included in it; for to say that a thing has become void necessarily implies that it has, in effect, been terminated or brought to an end, but the expression applies only to its end or termination in one specific mode, whereas to say that a thing has been determined, though it clearly imports simply that the thing has been terminated or brought to an end, yet the expression is generic in its nature and comprehends every mode of terminating or bringing a thing to an end. Sharp v. Curds, 7 Ky. (4 Bibb) 547, 548.

See "River Bed."

Bank distinguished, see "Bank (of Stream or Pond)."

Webster and the Century Dictionary define a "bed" as a layer, a stratum, an extended mass of anything, whether upon the earth or within it, as a bed of sulphur, a bed of sand, or clay; and so the verb "bed," to lay in a stratum, to stratify, to lay in order or flat as bedded clay. This view is well illustrated by the stratum of marl to be seen in the banks of many of our eastern rivers and in the marl pits in the eastern part of the state. State v. Willis, 104 N. C. 764, 769, 10 S. E. 764.

In a contract for restoring a pavement, by which one party was to furnish materials and the other should prepare all necessary beds of gravel, sand, or other material that might be required for the paving and to do the paving, the term "beds of gravel" has a definite and well-known meaning among persons engaged in the work of paving, and does not embrace the putting in or tamping of the coarse material at the bottom, but relates to the thin bed of light material placed at the top to receive the blocks or brick of which the pavement was made. McDonough v. Jolly, 30 Atl. 1048, 165 Pa. 542.

BEDROOM.

Under Liquor Tax Law, § 31, subd. 2, defining a hotel and requiring that it shall have at least ten furnished "bedrooms," it was held that rooms 7 feet 3 inches long, varying in width from 5 feet 8 inches to 7 feet 2 inches, with board partitions one inch thick between, and which do not reach the ceiling, are not "bedrooms," within the meaning of the act. In re Place, 50 N. Y. Supp. 640, 645, 27 App. Div. 561.

Prima facie, a bedroom is a private place, and an assembly of 8 or 10 persons in such room by invitation, to which place the public have no right to go for the purpose of participating in the amusements going on or partaking in the social enjoyment, will not constitute such bedroom a public place, within an act forbidding gambling in such place. Coleman v. State, 20 Ala. 51, 52.

BEEF.

"Beef," as used in an indictment charging the theft of a beef, "means an animal of the cow species, denominated in the statute 'cattle,' and not beef prepared for market or for use as meat. 'A beef' or 'one beef' is an expression frequently used to designate an animal fit for use as beef, instead of designating it as a 'steer,' a 'heifer,' or a 'cow.'" Moore v. State, 2 Tex. App. 350, 351; Davis v. State, 40 Tex. 134, 135.

As article manufactured.

"Beef," though it comes, like everything else, primitively from the soil, is as much a manufactured article as leather, cloth, or charcoal. The ox is a product of the farm; beef is a product of the slaughterhouse and the shambles; it is manufactured by the professional skill of an artisan, whose business is as distinct from that of a farmer as is that of a flax dresser or a wool comber. When the farmer slaughters his own ox, the beef is not less the product of the slaughterhouse, and is not produce of the farm. City of Philadelphia v. Davis (Pa.) 6 Watts & S. 269, 279.

Bull or cow.

A "beef" may be either a bull, a cow, or an ox; and hence where a master directed his servant to go to a certain place and kill a "beef," and the servant on arriving there found only a bull, which proved to belong to plaintiff, and which he killed, the master was liable, as the servant was acting within his instructions. Maier v. Randolph, 6 Pac. 625, 626, 33 Kan. 340.

The word "beef," according to Webster, includes "the bull, cow, and ox in their full grown state," which is the common acceptance of the term; hence the description of an animal as a "beef"—an animal of the cattle kind—is a sufficient description of an animal stolen, which the testimony proved to have been a cow. Smith v. State, 6 S. W. 40, 41, 24 Tex. App. 290.

Neat stock.

The word "beeves" may include neat stock, but all neat stock are not beeves in common parlance. Castello v. State, 36 Tex. 324.

BEEF CATTLE.

The term "beef cattle," used in a contract of sale thereof, means and includes all steer cattle, over the age of three years, used and intended to be used for beef. Elliott v. Long, 14 S. W. 145, 146, 77 Tex. 467.

The term "beef cattle," as used in the chapter relating to weighing live stock, shall not be construed to include veals or lambs. Code Va. 1887, § 1937.

BEEF STEER.

An indictment charging the theft of a "beef steer" will be understood to indicate a species of cattle. Robertson v. State, 1 Tex. App. 311, 313.

BEER.

See "Dutch Beer"; "Fermented Beer"; "Home-Made Beer"; "Hop Beer"; "Hop Tea"; "Hop-Tea Tonic"; "Lager Beer"; "Strong Beer."

Beer is a spirituous liquor made from any farinaceous grain, but generally from barley, which is first malted and ground, and its fermentable substance extracted by hot water. This extract or infusion is evaporated by boiling in caldrons, and hops or some other plant of an agreeable bitterness added. Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44; Myers v. State, 93 Ind. 251, 252; Douglas v. State, 52 N. E. 238, 21 Ind. App. 302; Welsh v. State, 25 N. E. 883, 126 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664; Briffitt v. State, 16 N. W. 39, 40, 16 N. W. 39, 46 Am. Rep. 621; United States v. Ellis (U. S.) 51 Fed. 808, 812; Hollender v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 912, 913 (citing McCulloch's Dictionary).

"Beer," as it is ordinarily understood, and as it is defined in the dictionary, is "a fermented liquor." It is made from malted grain, with hops, or from the extract of roots and other parts of various plants, as spruce, ginger, sassafras, etc. It is known under various names, and designated as "ale," "porter," "stout," "strong beer," "small beer," "liquor," "spruce beer," etc. The courts take notice that many of the beverages sold under the name of "beer" are not intoxicating, while the stronger kinds, as ale, porter, and strong beer, are of an intoxicating character. Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 437, 450. Under the civil damage act it was error to charge that plaintiff's husband, the night before he committed suicide by hanging, drank "intoxicating liquors," upon proof that at that time he drank beer at defendant's saloon, as the court assumed the fact not proven; the term "beer" including lager beer, which is not to be deemed intoxicating without proof of the fact. Blatz v. Rohrbach, 110 N. Y. 450, 451, 22 N. E. 1049, 6 L. R. A. 669.

"Beer" is defined to be "fermented liquor made from grain," and in this country chiefly from barley. Every intelligent person knows that the process of manufacturing lager beer is the same, in all essential particulars, as that of making other kinds of ale and beer from grain, and that the only real difference is, so far as intoxicating properties are concerned, a lesser per cent. of alcohol. Killip v. McKay, 13 N. Y. St. Rep. 5, 6.

In Act March 8, 1870 (Laws 1870, p. 437), providing that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to sell beer except at a regular licensed inn and tavern, "beer" means a certain liquor made from malt, containing a certain percentage of alcohol. Murphy v. Inhabitants of Montclair Tp., 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 673, 675.

Beer is both a fermented and a malt liquor, and generally contains 3.40 to 4.94 per cent. of alcohol. State v. Schaefer, 24 Pac. 92, 44 Kan. 90.

Beer is a fermented liquor made from malted grain, with hops or other flavoring matters, and also is a fermented extract of the roots of various parts of other plants, as spruce, ginger, and sassafras. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 426, 53 Am. Rep. 79.

"Beer" is a general term, and includes both alcoholic liquors, and a class of nonintoxicants made from the roots or other parts of various plants, such as spruce beer, ginger beer, and the like. Lager beer is a malt liquor. Johnson v. State (Tex.) 66 S. W. 552, 553.

As fermented drink.

See "Fermented."

As an intoxicating liquor.

Beer is embraced in Act Feb. 12, 1853, prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages, as such term did not mean merely spirituous liquors, or those which are distilled, but included all drinks of an intoxicating nature. People v. Hawley, 3 Mich. 330, 340.

"Beer," in its ordinary sense, denotes a beverage which is intoxicating, and is within the fair meaning of the words "strong and spirituous liquors," as used in statutes regulating the sale of such liquors. Maier v. State, 21 S. W. 974, 976, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 296; Tompkins County Com'rs v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173, 175; Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44; In re McDonough (U. S.) 49 Fed. 360, 361; Mullen v. State, 96 Ind. 304, 306; Welsh v. State, 25 N. E. 883, 126 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664; Douglas v. State, 52 N. E. 238, 21 Ind. App. 302; Myers v. State, 93 Ind. 251, 252; Stout v. State, 96 Ind. 407, 410; Kurz v. State, 79 Ind. 488, 490; Plunkett v. State, 69 Ind. 68, 69; Klare v. State, 43 Ind. 483, 485; State v. Jenkins, 4 Pac. 809, 32 Kan. 477; State v. Spiers, 73 N. W. 343, 344, 103 Iowa, 711; State v. Cloughly, 35 N. W. 652, 653, 73 Iowa, 626.

Beer is defined by Craig in his Dictionary as: "A fermented liquor made from malt and barley, and flavored with hops. It may be called the 'wine of barley.' A variety of kinds are made; those in use at present being distinguished by the names of 'ale,' 'porter' or 'strong beer,' 'pale beer' or 'small beer,' which differ little except in strength and the mode of preparation in their manufacture." Beer, then, is a malt liquor, as much as whisky is spirituous, or port wine is a vinous liquor, and are classed together as intoxicating drinks, within statutes prescribing and regulating the sale thereof. Kerkow v. Bauer, 18 N. W. 27, 29, 15 Neb. 150.

As the word is generally used and understood "beer" is a malt liquor, and is intoxicating, though there are, however, some light nonintoxicant preparations sometimes vended under that name, and hence an instruction by the court that "beer" was malt liquor and was intoxicating was not erroneous. State v. Currie, 80 N. W. 475, 476, 8 N. D. 545.

Where it was proved that defendant sold "beer" to a minor, such proof was not sufficient to establish an action under a civil damage act for the sale of intoxicating liquors, since beer is not necessarily an intoxicating liquor. From the definitions of the word "beer" it cannot be said that "beer," as the word is thus defined, is necessarily an intoxicating liquor, since the fact is beyond dispute that there are different kinds of beer, some of which are intoxicating and others not, and hence whether beer which may be sold in a given case is a malt or intoxicating beer, or a ginger or root beer, or some other of the various kinds of beer which are known not to be intoxicating, is a question of fact to be proved. Hansberg v. People, 8 N. E. 857, 858, 120 Ill. 21, 60 Am. Rep. 549.

Beer is an intoxicating liquor, within the meaning of Gen. St. 1878, c. 16, § 11, relating to intoxicating liquors, and providing that the word shall be understood to mean "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquor." State v. Dick, 50 N. W. 362, 366, 47 Minn. 375.

"Beer" is, in effect, defined as an "intoxicating liquor," by Rev. St. §§ 4593, 4598. State v. Heinze, 45 Mo. App. 403, 412.

The word "beer" is a generic term, which is applied indiscriminately to malt beer, as well as to beer which is made from various extracts, and from the roots and other parts of certain plants and the bark of trees; thus it cannot be said, without specific designation of the kind of beer referred to, that it is an intoxicating liquor, the beers manufactured from roots, etc., not being intoxicating. State v. Sioux Falls Brewing Co., 58 N. W. 1, 2, 5 S. D. 39.

In its ordinary sense, "beer" denotes a beverage which is intoxicating, and is within the meaning of the words "strong and spirituous liquors," as used in Rev. St., prohibiting the sale of "strong and spirituous liquors" without a license. The term "beer," when used alone, must be understood as signifying an alcoholic beverage, though some qualifying word, as "molasses," may be used with it to show that an alcoholic beverage is not intended. Evidence that the defendant, indicted for selling strong beer, sold "Dutch beer," is not a material variance, since there is nothing in the ordinary sense of the word "Dutch" to qualify the meaning of the word "beer," so as to show that it was not in fact intoxicating. The term "strong beer" and "Dutch beer," without explanation, must both be understood to mean intoxicating liquors of a similar character, produced from similar materials, and in a like manner. People v. Wheelock, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 9, 14.

Beer may be denominated "raw material from which alcohol is made," and science has proved by actual analysis that it is in its very nature inebriating in its consequences when drunk to excess. Markle v. Town Council of Akron, 14 Ohio, 588, 592.

"Beer" is a general name, which includes various liquors, some of which are, and some may not be, intoxicating. Commonwealth v. Gourdlar, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 390, 391; Blatz v. Rohrbach, 22 N. E. 1049, 1050, 116 N. Y. 450, 6 L. R. A. 669.

Act March 8, 1870 (P. L. 1870, p. 436), providing that it shall be unlawful for any persons or person to sell any "ale, porter, beer," or other malt or spirituous liquors as a beverage within said township, etc., each means a certain well-defined liquor made from malt, containing a certain percentage of alcohol, sufficient to render the same intoxicating. Murphy v. Inhabitants of Montclair Tp., 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 673, 676.

The word "beer," as used in an indictment charging one with selling beer, means a fermented and intoxicating liquor. State v. Besheer, 69 Mo. App. 72, 75.

Judicial notice of intoxicating character.

Beer may be, but is not necessarily, a malt liquor, and may not be intoxicating. It devolves on the state, therefore, to prove that beer sold was either a malt liquor, or that it was in fact intoxicating. Neither of these facts will be assumed or judicially recognized. Weis v. State, 33 Ind. 204, 205; Kurz v. State, 79 Ind. 488, 490; Klare v. State, 43 Ind. 483, 485; State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211, 220, 43 Am. Rep. 26; State v. Church, 60 N. W. 143, 144, 6 S. D. 89.

The word "beer" may mean malt or fermented liquor, or it may mean the unfermented and undistilled extracts of various roots or plants. There is no presumption that the word "beer" means fermented or malt liquor, or that it is intoxicating, and therefore the burden of showing that it is intoxicating, and consequently that a sale thereof is in violation of the liquor tax law, is on the petitioner, in an action to enjoin the sale thereof. In re Hunter, 69 N. Y. Supp. 908, 909, 34 Misc. Rep. 389.

As some kinds of beer are not intoxicating, the question whether beer sold was an intoxicating liquor, within the meaning of a statute regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, is a question for the jury, if there is evidence tending to show that it was intoxicating. Schlosser v. State, 55 Ind. 82, 87.

Whether beer is intoxicating is a question of fact for the jury, and the fact that alcohol was discovered in it on a chemical analysis, although competent evidence, does not necessarily prove that the liquor was spirituous within the meaning of the statute. Commonwealth v. Bloss, 116 Mass. 56, 58.

When beer is called for at a bar in a saloon or hotel, the bartender would know at once from the common use of the word that strong beer was wanted. When the word "beer" is used in court by a witness, the court will take judicial notice that it means a malt and an intoxicating liquor. In the meaning of the word itself, there is a prima facie proof that it is malt or intoxicating liquor that is meant. Briffitt v. State, 16 N. W. 39, 41, 58 Wis. 39, 46 Am. Rep. 621.

Webster defines beer to be "a fermented liquor made from any malted grain, with hops and other bitter flavoring matters." In other words, it is a malt liquor, which the same author declares to be "a liquor prepared for drink by an infusion of malt, as beer, ale, porter, etc." It may therefore be said that beer is a liquor infused with malt, and prepared by fermentation for use as a beverage. As a consequence, when beer is called for at a place at which intoxicating drinks are sold, the bartender, having in view the primary meaning, as well as the common use of the word, is justified in inferring, and must reasonably infer, that malted and fermented beer is wanted. When, therefore, a witness testifies to the sale or giving away of beer under circumstances which make the sale or giving away of any intoxicating liquor unlawful, the prima facie inference is that the beer was of that malted and fermented quality declared by the statute to be an intoxicating liquor, and the court trying the cause ought to take judicial notice of the inference which thus arises from the use of the word "beer" in its primary and general sense. Myers v. State, 93 Ind. 251, 252; State v. Jenkins, 4 Pac. 809, 811, 32 Kan. 477; Dant v. State, 5 N. E. 870, 871, 106 Ind. 79; State v. Tisdale, 55 N. W. 903, 904, 54 Minn. 105.

Testimony that beer was sold in a drinking saloon by one who manufactured it will be taken to mean a sale of the fermented malt liquor commonly sold in such saloons, and not ginger beer, root beer, or the like. State v. Dick, 50 N. W. 362, 363, 47 Minn. 375.

In its ordinary sense, "beer" denotes a beverage which is intoxicating, and is within the fair meaning of the words "strong or spirituous liquors," as used in statutes regulating the sale of such liquors. "Its primary signification is that of a malt liquor; and if it is to be understood in a restricted or qualified sense, such as to denote root beer, molasses beer, or persimmon beer, etc., it would be incumbent on the defendant to show that such is the case. There have been a great many decisions on the subject, but the most of them sustained the view that the court will take judicial notice that the word 'beer,' when used in a court by a witness, means a malt and an intoxicating liquor." Maler v. State, 21 S. W. 974, 976, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 296; United States v. Ducournau (U. S.) 54 Fed. 138, 139 (citing Tinker v. State, 90 Ala. 647, 8 South. 855; Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 158; Allred v. State, 89 Ala. 112, 8 South. 16); State v. Effinger, 44 Mo. App. 81, 83; State v. Teissedre, 2 Pac. 650, 653, 30 Kan. 476.

The term "beer," when used by witnesses in a liquor prosecution to describe a sale of beer, is not sufficient in itself to show a sale of intoxicants. Lathrope v. State, 50 Ind. 555, 556.

Evidence that liquor sold was beer is not sufficient to sustain a conviction for selling intoxicating liquors, for "there are many kinds of beer made and used, such as potato beer, persimmon beer, and other beers which are known to be not intoxicating. There is also lager beer, which may or may not be judicially known to be intoxicating, the courts differing as to this matter"; and hence, the beer not being shown to be lager beer, it cannot be assumed to be intoxicating. Du Vall v. City Council of Augusta, 42 S. E. 265, 115 Ga. 813.

As a spirituous liquor.

Lager beer is not embraced within the term "spirituous liquors" in Code, § 4869, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday, as spirituous liquors only includes distilled, and not fermented, liquors. Fritz v. State, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 15, 16. See, also, In re McDonough (U. S.) 49 Fed. 360, 361; Sarlls v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 722, 152 U. S. 570, 38 L. Ed. 556; *Gnadinger v. Beer is a fermented liquor made from malted grain, and has different names, such as "ale," "porter," "brown stout," "lager," and "small beer," according to its strength and other qualities. It is not a spirituous liquor. State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55.

BEE TREE.

An accusation that plaintiff stole "my bee tree" was held not to be actionable per se, the words referring to the tree, and not to the bees or honey, and the word "tree," without explanation, meaning a standing tree, and a part of the realty. Idol v. Jones, 13 N. C. 162, 164.

The term "bee tree," when used in a charge that another stole a bee tree, relates to the wild, and not to the reclaimed, insect—the insect feræ naturæ, and not yet reduced to property; and therefore the charge is not slanderous as importing larceny of bees. A charge that another "stole a bee tree" does not import a larceny, as neither standing lumber nor wild bees are property which are the subjects of larceny. Cock v. Weatherby, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 333, 337.

BEFORE.

See "At or Before"; "Next Before"; "On or Before."

Gen. St. § 23, art. 11, providing that, before the auditor shall issue any certificate of authority to a foreign insurance company to do business in this state, the corporation or its agent shall pay $50 into the state treasury, means that the money must be paid into the treasury before the corporation shall have the right to a certificate, and hence a certificate issued without such payment is a nullity. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. State, 9 Kan. 210, 226.

Act March 3, 1875, c. 137, § 3, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 510], relating to the removal of causes from state to federal courts, and requiring the petition for removal to be filed in the state court "before or at the term at which the cause could be first tried," means at the time when, by the usual orderly course of practice under the rules of the court, the case could be set down for trial if an action at law, or for a final hearing if a suit in equity. Wilkerson v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. 353, 355.

As excluding time mentioned.

The authorities are uniform that where an act is required to be done a certain number of days or weeks "before" a certain other day, upon which another act is to be done, the whole number of the days or weeks must intervene before the day fixed for doing the second act. Ward v. Walters, 63 Wis. 39, 44, 22 N. W. 844.

Where a notice is required to be served "before" a certain day, such day cannot be counted. Greve v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co., 25 Minn. 327; Small v. Edrick (N. "Before," as used in a statute providing that the sheriff shall give his bond before the first Monday in January in each year, is employed literally, and a bond given on that day is too late. Alston v. Falconer, 42 Ark. 114, 116.

In a decree providing for payment "before" a fixed date, the word confers no right to pay on such date, the meaning being "earlier than," "previous thereto." Hooper v. Young, 58 Ala. 585, 589.

"Before the first day of July" conveys nearly, if not precisely, the same meaning as

"until the first of July," as used in a statute authorizing the Governor of the state to receive sealed bids for certain property from all persons "until the first of July" in a certain year, and is exclusive in its meaning, thereby excluding the first day of July. Webster v. French, 12 Ill. (2 Peck) 302, 304.

The word "before," as used in a stipulation for a stay of sale, and authorizing the debtor to pay the debt "before the 15th day of November," means "earlier than" or "previous to," and it confers no right to pay on the 15th of November. Hooper v. Young, 58 Ala. 585, 589.

In Wag. St. p. 850, § 20, providing that all appeals taken ten days before the first day of the term of the appellate court shall be determined at such term, "before" is to be construed in its plain, ordinary, and usual sense, as authorizing a computation of the time by including the day on which the appeal was taken, and excluding the first day of the term. Bailey v. Lubke, 8 Mo. App. 57, 58.

"Before," as used in the ordinance of the convention defining the qualifications of voters, and requiring that the oath shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county court "at least five days before the day of election," will not exclude the first day on which the oath was filed, where to do so would cause a forfeiture. State ex rel. Reitemeyer v. Gasconade County Court, 33 Mo. 102.

Before capital.

An agreement to place another party's interest in a mining claim "before capital" means to call the attention of capital to the claim and induce its investment therein. Baum v. Rainbow Smelting Co., 71 Pac. 538, 541, 42 Or. 453.

Before conviction.

Gen. St. § 183, providing that, if any person lawfully imprisoned on any criminal charge shall break from such imprisonment "before conviction," he shall on conviction be punished by confinement for a term not exceeding two years, includes an escape which was made while the defendant was committed on a criminal offense, though he was thereafter rearrested and tried and acquitted, since the offense cannot be made to depend on some future contingencies; and, if the words are to be construed as not including an escape in case the defendant is subsequently acquitted of the charge for which he is committed, then it would be improper in any case to try a defendant for escape until after his trial and conviction on the original charge. State v. Lewis, 19 Kan. 260, 265, 27 Am. Rep. 113.

Before departure of train.

Laws 1874, c. 68, § 2 (Miller's Code, p. 347), providing that a charge of 10 cents may be added to the fare of any passenger, where the same is paid on the cars, if a ticket might have been procured within a reasonable time "before the departure of the train," does not require that the ticket office at the station shall remain open up to the instant the train moves off; the question is, might the passenger have procured a ticket within a reasonable time before the departure, and not up to the very moment when the wheels began to move? Everett v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 28 N. W. 410, 411, 69 Iowa, 15, 58 Am. Rep. 207.

Before delivery.

The condition of an auction sale that on the purchase something was to be paid "before the delivery" was not the same as "on delivery," but would seem to point out rather that the payment is to be made before the commencement of the act by which the goods are to be handed over to the purchaser. Pettitt v. Mitchell, 4 Man. & G. 819, 838.

Before full payment.

As used in a will leaving certain sums in trust for children, to be paid at the expiration of a certain time, and providing that, if either of the children died before the full payment of his share, such share should be paid to such child's issue, the words "before full payment" meant before the share became payable, and did not include a contingency of delay in making the payment after it became due. Finley v. Bent, 95 N. Y. 364, 368.

Before the King.

A bond requiring the appearance of defendant "before the King," means before the King in his court, and not before him in person. Jones v. Stordy, 9 East, 55, 56.

Before other testimony for defense is heard.

Acts 1887, c. 79, §§ 1, 2, providing that a defendant in a criminal case may testify only on condition that he shall do so "before any other testimony for the defense is heard," means that a defendant must be the first witness for the defense, and not merely that his testimony on any particular subject must be the first induced relative to that subject. Clemons v. State, 21 S. W. 525, 92 Tenn. (8 Pickle) 282.

Before next term.

"Before the next term," as used in a statute requiring the record of the proceedings upon an appeal from the circuit court to be filed before the next term, means before the meeting of the court on the first day of the next term. Vanlear v. Vanlear (Pa.) 1 Bin. 76.

Where a bond was conditioned that the defendant should be and appear "before the next term of the district court, to be begun and holden," etc., stating the time and place of holding the court, "and attend from day to day and term to term, then and there to answer the state of Texas," etc., and it was objected that the statute required the bond to be conditioned that the defendant should appear "at the district court of the proper county, at the next term thereof," etc., and that the word "before" in the bond related to time, and that the bond required the defendant to appear before the term, and not at the court itself, it was held that the word "before," in its connection in the bond, referred to place, and that the objection to the bond was not well taken. Williford v. State, 17 Tex. 653, 656.

Before said court.

The words "before said court," in a certificate by the clerk of court to a complaint that it was sworn to "before said court," operates to raise a presumption that the complaint was in fact sworn to before the court. Tacey v. Noyes, 9 N. E. 830, 831, 143 Mass. 449.

Before sitting of court.

St. 1785, c. 69, § 8, provides that no action for divorce or alimony shall be brought before the court unless the libelant shall file the libel in the clerk's office, and shall cause the adverse party, if in the state, to be served with an attested copy of the same, and with a summons to appear in court 14 days at least "before the sitting of the court." It is held that the words "before the sitting of the court" are equivalent to the words "before the first day of the term," and do not extend the time to the opening of the court on any subsequent day in the term to which it might stand adjourned. Anonymous, 5 Mass. 197, 198.

Before sheriff and suitors.

A declaration on a judgment, stating that it was recovered in a court held "before the sheriff and suitors," implied that it was held before the sheriff as judge. Jones v. Jones, 5 Mees. & W. 523, 526.

Before term at which cause could be first tried.

The expression "before the term at which said cause could be first tried," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 137, 18 Stat. 470 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 50], providing for the removal of suits from state to federal courts, means the term at which by law the cause could first be tried, and not necessarily the term at which the parties are ready for trial. Kaeiser v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. (U. S.) 6 Fed. 1, 6. It means, in regard to suits pending at the time of the adoption of the act, the first trial after the right of removal attaches subsequent to the passage of the act. Hendecker v. Rosenbaum, Id. 97, 98.

Before trial or final hearing.

The words "before the trial," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 262, subd. 1, applied to the dismissal of an action, mean "before the commencement of the trial." Bettis v. Schreiber, 31 Minn. 329, 331, 17 N. W. 863, 864.

The federal statute requiring that a petition for removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court, on the ground or legal cause of prejudice, must be filed before the trial or final hearing, means before the trial or hearing of the cause has been in good faith begun in the state court. Jilkins v. Sweetser, 102 U. S. 177, 179, 26 L. Ed. 129. It is not made before the trial when it is made after defendant's motion for a continuance has been overruled, and the court has ordered the jury stricken and the trial to proceed, though a half hour's indulgence is given the defendant to enable him to procure counsel. Fleming v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 76 Ga. 678, 681. If the case has been called for trial in its order, and the jury called to try the case, the trial has been begun, even though the jury has not been sworn. The calling of the jury is a part of the trial. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. King Wrought Iron Bridge Co., 23 Minn. 186, 188, 23 Am. Rep. 682. Where there has been one trial in the state court, a petition cannot be filed. Whittier v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 55 N. H. 141, 144, 20 Am. Rep. 185; Chandler v. Coe, 56 N. H. 184, 186, 22 Am. Rep. 437. A petition cannot be filed after a trial on the merits, though such trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury. Galpin v. Critchlow, 112 Mass. 339, 341, 17 Am. Rep. 176.

"Before trial," as used in Rev. St. c. 82, § 88, providing that if a party knows any objection to a juror in season to propose it before trial, etc., means before the termination of the trial. Brown v. Reed, 16 Atl. 504, 505, 81 Me. 158.

As used in Gross' St. p. 216, requiring all exceptions which go to the form of an indictment merely to be made "before trial," means before plea pleaded, and a motion to dismiss the prosecution for the reason that the name of the prosecutor was not indorsed upon the indictment, and did not purport to have been found upon the information and knowledge of two or more of the grand jury, or the information of some public officer in the discharge of his duty, should have been made at the earliest practicable moment before a plea to the merits. Winship v. People, 51 Ill. 296, 298.

Gen. Laws 1839, c. 511, provides that where, in any county, there are two or more municipal courts, the defendant in a civil action may have a change of venue from one to another under the same circumstances and on the same conditions as provided for a change of venue in justices' courts; and Gen. St. 1878, c. 65, § 20, provides that the application for a change of venue must be made "before the trial commences." Held, that the term "before the trial commences" should be construed as meaning before any trial has been commenced, and that such an application, therefore, comes too late after a trial, though it may have resulted in a disagreement of the trial, or in a verdict which was afterwards set aside. Lueck v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 58 N. W. 821, 57 Minn. 30.

2 Rev. St. pp. 124, 125, § 389, providing that the defendant may at any term "before the trial" serve upon the plaintiff an offer in writing to allow judgment to be taken against him for the sum or property, or to the effect therein specified, with costs, which if accepted by plaintiff within a certain time, judgment shall be entered accordingly, is applicable only to suits which have been commenced and are pending at the time the offer to confess therein provided for may be made, and cannot be construed to include time before as well as after the commencement of the suit. Without a suit pending, there would be nothing to try. Horner v. Pilkington, 11 Ind. 440, 441.

An offer of judgment, pursuant to Gen. St. c. 66, § 241, to be of any effect on the recovery of costs occasioned by the trial, must be made and served 10 days before the commencement of the trial. The plaintiff is entitled to the full period of 10 days in which to accept or reject the offer, and in ascertaining this period the day of service of the offer must be excluded (Gen. St. c. 66, § 68), and the trial must be regarded as a single point of time identical with its commencement. Mansfield v. Fleck, 23 Minn. 61.

BEG.

To "beg" does not necessarily import spoken words. One who, to obtain alms, exhibits his need or infirmities, or attracts attention by signs or conduct to his desire to receive charity, is chargeable with a violation of a statute against begging, as fully as if he had spoken. In re Haller (Pa.) 12 Hun, 181, 132.

BEGET.

To "beget," as defined by Webster, is to procreate as a father or sire; to generate; chiefly used of the father alone, but sometimes of both parents, so that the use of the word "beget," in a clause in a will that if a son should die leaving no heirs of his body by him begotten, indicates that the word "heirs" is to be limited to his own children, and not to include grandchildren. This is evidenced from another clause providing that should the daughter die without leaving any heir of her body by her begotten and delivered, the words "begotten and delivered" both indicate that the word "heir" should be limited to the children and not to the grandchildren. It is said that to "beget" is as strong a term as "child" itself. In a measure the same relation exists between the word "beget" and the word "child" that does between the word "create" and the word "creation," between cause and effect, and grandchildren and other and more distant descendants are begotten by their own respective fathers, and not by more remote ancestors. Granger v. Granger, 44 N. E. 189, 190, 147 Ind. 95, 36 L. R. A. 186, 190.

To beget is to procreate, as a father or sire, so that when used in connection with the word "children" in a deed "to L., wife of E., to her and her children begotten of said E.," indicates that the word "children" is limited to the immediate descendants—those of the first generation. Downing v. Birney, 70 N. W. 1006, 1008, 112 Mich. 474.

"Begotten," as used in a will where testator bequeathed certain property to a daughter, and on her death to her children by her lawfully begotten, is to be construed as born. Barnes v. Provoost (N. Y.) 4 Johns. 61, 64, 4 Am. Dec. 249; Minnig v. Batdorff, 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 503, 506.

The words "begotten" and "to be begotten," "procreant," and "procreant," have always been held to have the same meaning, unless a contrary intent plainly appears. Wager v. Wager (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 374, 378.

A devise to G. and "his heirs lawfully begotten, forever," creates in G. an estate tail. Good v. Good, 7 El. & Bl. 295, 301.

Testatrix devised to her daughter-in-law and son a life estate, and provided that after their death the land should descend to such heirs as they shall have living at the time of their death, begotten by them, share and share alike. Held, that the words "heirs living at the time of their death begotten by them" was equivalent to lineal descendants, and that on the death of the life tenants all of the lineal descendants of the son and daughter-in-law, both grand and great grandchildren whose parents are living, as well as grandchildren whose parents are dead, took under the testatrix's will, per capita, equal portions of the estate. Dukes v. Faulk, 16 S. E. 122, 124, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745.

BEGIN.

See, also, "Commencement of Action."

To "begin" is to do the first act, to enter upon. To "begin" an enterprise is to take the first step, the initiatory step, the very commencement of an expedition, under Acts Cong. April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 449), providing that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide the means or procure the same for any military expedition to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor. United States v. O'Sullivan (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 380, 381.

In Rev. St. § 5286 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3601], making it a misdemeanor for any one within the United States to begin any military enterprise against any foreign prince, state, or people with whom the United States is at peace, "begin a military enterprise" is a phrase of a wide latitude, and means not only the actual starting of an expedition, but the instigation of such enterprise. It brands as such an offense against the government the first effort or proposal by individuals to get up a military enterprise in this country against a foreign one. "The statute does not wait for the project to be consummated by any formal array or organization of forces, but it strikes at the inception of the purpose, in the first incipient step taken with a view to the enterprise." United States v. Ybanez (U. S.) 53 Fed. 536, 538 (citing 2 Whart. Cr. Law [5th Ed.] pp. 519-525).

Where an insolvent executed a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, under which judgment was entered up within less than four months of the filing of a petition on which he was adjudged a bankrupt, the proceeding which included such judgment was "begun" within such four months. Such proceeding is deemed begun when the judgment is confessed of record, i. e., when the warrant for its entry is actually delivered to the prothonotary, and not when the warrant was executed. A legal proceeding is not begun when a party empowers an attorney to appear and act for him, but when the attorney, in pursuance of that authority, does appear and act for him. Ferguson v. Greth, 45 Atl. 735, 737, 195 Pa. 272, 78 Am. St. Rep. 812.

BEGINNING.

Beginning to demolish.

A mob going along and breaking a person's windows is not a "beginning to demolish," under 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 30, § 7, even though the frames of the windows should be broken, because the object of the mob in such case is evidently very different. Rex v. Batt, 6 C. & P. 329.

To constitute a "beginning to demolish," within the meaning of St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 30, § 8, it must appear that the ultimate object of the rioters was to demolish the house, and that if they had carried their intention into full effect they would in point of fact have demolished it. Rex v. Thomas, 4 Car. & P. 237.

Destroying movable shop shutters is not a "beginning to demolish," within 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 30, § 8, prescribing punishment for mobs or rioters who begin to demolish a house. Regina v. Howell, 9 Car. & P. 437.

Beginning to keep house.

"Beginning to keep house with the intent to delay creditors," as used in a statute providing that a beginning to keep house with the intent to delay creditors should be regarded as an act of insolvency, means "a withdrawing from a part of the house where the debtor had before usually sat, and where there was free access, to a more retired part of the house to avoid personal applications for money, by means whereof his creditors are prevented from importuning him. But if a trader is merely denied when at home to his creditor who demands payment of a debt, but does not ask to see him personally, this is not evidence of a 'beginning to keep house,' so as to constitute an act of bankruptcy." Dudley v. Vaughan, 1 Camp. 271.

Closing the doors and shutters of a bank is a "beginning to keep house," although the banker be not domiciled at the house. Cumming v. Baily, 6 Bing. 363.

Beginning of suit.

"Beginning of suit," within the meaning of the limitation statutes, cannot be construed to mean the time of the filing of an amended complaint, filed for the purpose of restating the cause of action in a more perfect manner. Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Hackendahl, 58 N. E. 930, 932, 188 Ill. 300.

BEGOTTEN.

See "Beget."

BEHALF.

See "In Behalf of"; "On Behalf of."

BEHAVIOR.

See "Bad Behavior."

"Behavior," as used in Const. art. 3, § 9, providing that the clerk of court may be removed for breach of good behavior at any time by the judges of the respective courts, is synonymous with the word "conduct." State v. Roll, 7 West. Law J. 121, 128, 1 Ohio Dec. 284.

BEHIND.

In a will by which testator devised certain estate to a son, his heirs and assigns, forever, but in case he shall happen to die leaving no issue behind him, then the property to go to another son, the term "leaving no issue behind him" necessarily imports that the testator meant at the time of his death. Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term R. 143, 146; Van Mid-dlesworth v. Schenck, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 29, 41.

BEHOOF.

"Behoof," as used in a deed to a married woman, conveying the land to her and her heirs and assigns, to her proper use, benefit, and behoof in fee simple, means simply use, service, profit, or advantage, but does not, without other words, denote a separate or exclusive use or advantage, and was to the behoof of the husband as well as to the wife, and the property conveyed constituted their common property, and not the separate property of the wife. Stiles v. Japhet, 19 S. W. 450, 452, 84 Tex. 91.

BEING.

See "Be—Being."

BELIEF.

See "Best of His Information and Belief"; "Best of His Knowledge and Belief"; "Firmly Believes"; "Fixed Belief"; "Fully Believe"; "Honest Belief"; "Reasonable Belief."

Unqualified belief, see "Unqualified."

The meaning of the words "belief" and "knowledge," as defined by lexicographers, will show that there is a distinct and well-defined difference between them. "Believe: To exercise trust or confidence." Webster. "To exercise belief in; to be persuaded upon evidence, arguments, and deductions, or by other circumstances other than personal knowledge." Cent. Dict. "Knowledge: The act or state of knowing; clear perception of fact; that which is or may be known." Webster. "Acquainted with things ascertained or ascertainable; specific information." Cent. Dict. Ohio Valley Coffin Co. v. Goble, 62 N. E. 1025, 1027, 28 Ind. App. 362.

"The term 'belief' implies an assent of the mind to the alleged fact, and is not supported by knowledge. One may believe a proposition without making it known, or without possessing any knowledge upon the subject. It is or may be a passive condition of the mind, prompting in neither action nor declaration. One may believe that he has a right to land, without asserting or demanding it." Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa, 148, 151.

Belief is a persuasion of the truth or an assent of the mind to the truth of a declaration, proposition, or alleged fact. Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 506, 514, 31 S. E. 92, 95.

Belief admits of all degrees, from the slightest suspicion to the fullest assurance. State v. Harris, 97 Iowa, 407, 409, 66 N. W. 728.

The belief of a witness is a conclusion from facts. The witness should state the facts, and the conclusion to be drawn from them rests with the jury. Ventress v. Smith, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 161, 171, 9 L. Ed. 382.

A statute provided that, if a complaint be verified, the answer must contain a specific denial to each allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or a denial thereof according to his information and belief. Held, that the word "belief" should be taken in its ordinary sense, and means the actual conclusion of the defendant drawn from information. Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59, 62, 70 Am. Dec. 621.

As conviction beyond reasonable doubt.

"Belief, in a criminal case, when applied to the guilt of a defendant, is a conviction of the mind to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt." People v. Sheldon, 9 Pac. 457, 460, 68 Cal. 434.

Knowledge distinguished.

"Belief" is the degree of certainty produced by things which do not make a very deep impression on the memory, and differs from "knowledge" in that the latter is nothing more than a firm belief. The difference is ordinarily merely in the degree. Hatch v. Carpenter, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 271, 274.

"Belief," as used in a statute requiring the answer in an action, in case the complaint be verified, to contain a specific denial of each allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, or a denial thereof according to his information and belief, means "an actual conclusion of the defendant drawn from information. Such is its ordinary sense, and there is a clear distinction between positive knowledge and mere belief, and they cannot both exist together. Thus belief may be founded on a statement of others, not competent witnesses, and not under oath, and not therefore legal testimony. In making out his answer he cannot undertake to decide whether the information upon which his belief is founded was legal testimony or otherwise. He must state facts known, and the fact of his belief is the only fact known to him." Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59, 62, 70 Am. Dec. 621.

"Belief" and "knowledge" are not synonymous, and, where a statute related to patenting mines where a lode was "known" to exist, the court could not use the term "belief" synonymously in its charge with "knowledge." Knowledge may be obtained in various ways which do not involve belief. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Reynolds, 8 Sup. Ct. 598, 603, 124 U. S. 374, 31 L. Ed. 466.

There is no solid distinction between "knowledge" and "belief." Practically and metaphysically, the difference is only in degree of conviction on the evidence of the fact. Belief is the conclusion of the mind as to the existence of a fact. It may be a weak or strong belief. If strong, decided conviction, we may call it "knowledge," and yet it is only belief. State v. Berkeley, 23 S. E. 608, 610, 41 W. Va. 455.

An affidavit of defense stating certain facts to be to the "knowledge and belief" of affiant is insufficient, as it does not mean affiant's actual personal knowledge. First Nat. Bank v. Gregg, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 384, 387.

The words "knowledge, information, and belief," in the verification of a bill in chancery praying a discovery and the appointment of a receiver by the complainant as being true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, are insufficient, as the words "knowledge, information, and belief," upon the construction most favorable to the complainant, mean that the affiant has knowledge that some of the averments of the bill are true; that, while he does not know, he has been informed and believes that others of the averments are true; and that as to yet other averments he has neither knowledge nor information, but, without knowing the facts or ever having been informed of their truth, he believes them to be true. Burgess v. Martin, 20 South. 506, 507, 111 Ala. 656.

Opinion synonymous.

Where the statute requires an affiant to state that in his belief there is reasonable cause for granting a writ, his affidavit that in his opinion there is such ground is sufficient. The nice philological distinctions between the words "opinion" and "belief" are too subtle and refined to form a basis on which to ground sufficient justice. Day v. Southwell, 3 Wis. 657, 661.

Presumption distinguished.

Legal presumptions by which conflicting claims and titles are set at rest are not always founded on the belief that the thing presumed has actually taken place. Instead of belief, which is the foundation of the judgment on a recent transaction, the legal presumption in matters of antiquity holds the place of particular and individual belief. Worley's Adm'r v. High's Adm'r, 40 Ala. 171, 177.

As suspicion.

Mere suspicion is not belief. Gosser v. Gosser, 38 Atl. 1014, 1015, 183 Pa. 499.

In a bankrupt act providing that, in order to invalidate as a fraudulent preference a security taken for a debt, the person secured must have had such a knowledge of facts as to induce a reasonable belief of his debtor's insolvency, "belief" does not mean that the creditor must have had knowledge of facts which would induce a suspicion of his debtor's insolvency. "It is not enough that a creditor had some cause to suspect the insolvency of his debtor, but he must have such a knowledge of facts as to induce a reasonable belief of his debtor's insolvency in order to invalidate a security taken for his debt. A man may have many grounds of suspicion that his debtor is in failing circumstances, and yet have no cause for well-grounded belief of the fact. He may be unwilling to trust him for it, he may feel anxious about his claim and have a strong desire to secure it, and yet such belief as the act requires may be wanting." Grant v. First Nat. Bank, 97 U. S. 80, 81, 24 L. Ed. 971.

As an element of probable cause, belief must rest upon reasonable grounds, and be induced by such a state of facts as would lead a man of ordinary prudence and caution to entertain a strong suspicion that the accused is guilty of the offense charged. Spalding v. Lowe, 23 N. W. 46, 56 Mich. 366.

One of the ordinary definitions of "belief" is partial assurance, without positive knowledge or absolute certainty. Webster. By another authority it is defined as a persuasion of the truth of a fact, formed in the way of inference from some other fact. Burrill's Law Dict. tit. "Belief." This would certainly be tantamount to, or even a stronger form of expression than, reasonable suspicion on probable grounds, for either may exist and yet no belief be generated in the mind. State v. Grant, 76 Mo. 236, 246.

In wills as word of intention or direction.

The word "belief" as used in a will, according to Perry on Trusts (volume 1, c. 4, § 112), in a clause that the testator believes a legatee will make a certain disposition of the fund bequeathed, is a word of intention, which the court will carry into effect as if the testator had used an absolute word of devise in trust, and the court will direct the donee or first taker to hold as a trustee for those whom the donor intended to benefit. Cockrill v. Armstrong, 31 Ark. 580, 589.

Where a testator gave to his wife all the rest and residue of his property, adding thereto the words, "believing that she will manage it judiciously and perfectly satisfied that she will make a fair distribution of it among our children at her death," such clause does not limit the estate devised to her, but merely explains his motives for giving the estate absolutely to his wife without making provision for their children. Cheston v. Cheston, 43 Atl. 768, 769, 89 Md. 465.

BELIEVE.

See "Verily Believes."

A statutory requirement that a verification of a mining claim shall be to the effect that the affiant "believes" the same to be just is satisfied by a verification that the affiant has read the foregoing notice, knows the contents thereof, and that said claim is just and correct. Johnston v. Harrington, 81 Pac. 316, 318, 5 Wash. 73.

A statement concerning another that "I believe he did steal" is equivalent to a charge of larceny, as the word "believe" does not operate to soften the charge, and therefore the language is actionable. Dottarer v. Bush-ey, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 205, 209.

The words "I believe you took it," when spoken of and to another, are not actionable per se as imputing larceny, but they may be slanderous as having such meaning when considered in connection with extrinsic circumstances. Alcorn v. Bass, 46 N. E. 1024, 1025, 17 Ind. App. 500.

As convinced or firmly believe.

"Believes" is not equivalent to "firmly believes," as used in Act March 20, 1810, § 11, relating to appeals, and providing that the appellant shall swear or affirm that it is not for the purpose of delay such appeal is entered, but because he firmly believes injustice has been done, for all belief is not equal, and "believes" is a weaker term or expressive of a less degree of belief than "firmly believes." For instance, one may have a "firm belief" that the moon revolves around the earth, and may "believe," too, that there are mountains and valleys in the moon, but this belief is not so strong, because the evidence is weaker; hence an affidavit that appellant "believer" injustice has been done is insufficient, as not being a compliance with the statute. Thompson v. White (Pa.) 4 Serg. & R. 135, 136.

In a pleading alleging that plaintiff "believes" she will be incapacitated from performing manual labor for life, "believes" is used in the sense of "averred" or "alleged," or that she is convinced of the fact. McFarland v. City of Muscatine, 67 N. W. 233, 234, 98 Iowa, 199.

The words "unless you are satisfied from the evidence" are parallel, and may be used interchangeably, with the words "if you believe from the evidence." They imply no more than that, if the jury shall be convinced by the preponderance of evidence of the truth of the basic facts constituting plaintiff's alleged cause of action, they shall find for him. Braddy v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 47 Mo. App. 519, 523.

As fear.

An affidavit for change of venue that the affiant "has reason to fear and does fear" is not equivalent to an affidavit that he "has reason to believe and does believe." They are substantially unlike expressions. Smith v. Clarke, 35 N. W. 318, 319, 70 Wis. 137.

"Believe," as used in an instruction that "if you believe from the evidence before you," etc., is to be construed as synonymous with the word "find." State v. O'Hagan, 38 Iowa, 504, 505; Spotten v. Keeler (N. Y.) 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 385, 389, 22 Abb. N. C. 105, 110.

As equivalent to knowledge.

"Believed" is a sufficient equivalent for "knowledge" in an affidavit in support of a petition where the statute requires an affidavit upon the "knowledge" of the affiant, since information received and believed to be true is knowledge. Dinkelspiel v. New Albany Woolen Mills, 15 South. 282, 283, 46 La. Ann. 576.

In a complaint, in an action against a master for injuries to his servant by a defective passageway leading to a building which had been repaired by the master, alleging that when such passageway was repaired the complainant "believed" it was safe, "believed" is not equivalent to an averment of want of knowledge of the defect, either actual or constructive. The meaning of the words "believe" and "knowledge" as defined by lexicographers will show that there is a distinct and well-defined difference between them. Webster says "believe" means to exercise trust or confidence, while the Century Dictionary says it means to exercise belief, not to be persuaded upon evidence, arguments, and deductions, or by other circumstances other than personal knowledge. "Knowledge" is defined by Webster to be the act or state of knowing; clear perception of fact; that which is, or may be, known; and the Century Dictionary defines it as acquaintance with things ascertained or ascertainable; specific information. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Reynolds, 124 U. S. 374, 8 Sup. Ct. 598, 31 L. Ed. 466, said, "Between mere belief and knowledge there is a wide difference." This expression of Mr. Justice Field was used in criticising and holding erroneous an instruction of the United States Circuit Court for the District of Colorado, in which the words "believe" and "knowledge" were used interchangeably as conveying the same meaning, and it was said the court could not make them synonymous in its charge. Ohio Valley Coffin Co. v. Goble, 62 N. E. 1025, 1027, 28 Ind. App. 362.

As positive statement of fact.

A statement that the speaker "believed" a certain person was conspiring with others to cheat him was sufficient to amount to a positive charge of dishonesty, under the rule that the utterance of slanderous words on belief or on information or report is the legal equivalent of their positive statement as facts. Beehler v. Steever (Pa.) 2 Whart. 313, 328 (cited and approved in Booker v. State, 14 South. 561, 562, 100 Ala. 30).

For a person to say that he "believes" another is guilty of a crime is equivalent to saying that he has such evidence as convinces him that the person has committed a crime, and is equivalent to a positive charge, since belief is the result of evidence. Waters v. Jones (Ala.) 3 Port. 442, 448, 29 Am. Dec. 261.

When used in reference to an existing fact, and not as relating to a matter of belief in religion, morals or science, "belief" is the condition of the mind founded on evidence that a fact exists, that an act is done, or that a statement is true; and when one says he believes that a fact exists, or that an act was done by another, he must be understood to assert that there was present to his mind evidence sufficient to convince him that the fact in reality existed, or that the act was in fact done. To say "I imagine" is not so clear and direct an imputation as to say "I believe." In this case the statement "I believe G. burnt the camp ground" was held to be a direct charge, and hence slanderous. Giddens v. Mirk, 4 Ga. 364, 369.

A statement that a person's watch has been stolen, and he has reason to "believe" that a certain person named stole it, is equivalent to a positive averment, for a man only alleges a thing to be so because he has reasons for believing it so. Miller v. Miller (N. Y.) 8 Johns. 74, 75.

As presume.

To "believe" is to put credit or confidence in the veracity or testimony, and differs from "presume," which means to assume a thing to be true without proof. Hammock v. McBride, 6 Ga. 178, 183.

As reasonable suspicion.

An allegation, in an answer in a prosecution for false arrest, that the defendant "believed" that the plaintiff had committed an offense, is "tantamount to or even a stricter form of expression than 'reasonable suspicion' or 'probable grounds,' for either may exist and yet no belief be generated in the mind." State v. Grant, 78 Mo. 236, 246.

As suppose.

"Believed" is substantially the same thing as "supposed," as used in an instruction that if plaintiff in good faith "supposed" he had a cause of action against the defendant on account of personal injuries, and threatened to sue him on account thereof, and defendant executed the note sued on in consideration that the plaintiff would not sue him for such injuries, and which plaintiff accepted in settlement, such compromise and settlement was a good and lawful consideration for the note. The definition of "suppose" is given by Webster in his Unabridged Dictionary as "Imagine, to believe, to receive as true," and the same authority gives a definition of "believe" as "to think, to suppose." Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 272, 277, 40 Am. Rep. 588.

As suspect.

In the rule that a peace officer has a right to make an arrest if he has reasonable ground to believe that the accused has been guilty of felony, etc., "believe" is equivalent in meaning to the word "suspect," the latter word being generally used in stating the rule. Jackson v. Knowlton, 53 N. E. 134, 135, 173 Mass. 94.

Rev. St. c. 142, § 41, provides that when complaint shall be made on oath to any magistrate authorized to issue warrants in criminal cases that personal property has been stolen or embezzled, or gotten by false tokens or pretenses, and that the complainant "believes" that it is concealed in any particular house or place, if he be satisfied that there is reasonable cause for such belief, shall issue a warrant to search for such property. Held, that "believes" cannot be construed to have the same meaning as "suspects," for they have not by the approved use of the language the same meaning. "Suspecting is not believing. That may be a ground for suspicion which will not induce belief." Hence a complaint on oath that the complainant had reasonable cause to suspect and did suspect that certain property was sold, etc., is not a compliance with the requirement of the statute. Commonwealth v. Lottery Tickets, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 369, 371.

As think.

It is said that the expression "I think," as used by a juror in answer to a question as to whether he could render a verdict without reference to a former opinion, is not equivalent to "I believe"; that the former implies conjecture or mere guess, while the latter denotes belief in the ability to properly discharge the duty of a juror, and is a stronger and more definite term. The contention, however, is untenable. The two expressions are substantially equivalent in common language. People v. Martell, 33 N. E. 838, 840, 138 N. Y. 599.

BELLIGERENCY.

Belligerency is a fact, and not a principle. It is a certain degree of force and constancy acquired by any mass of population engaged in war, which entitles that population to be treated as a belligerent through the action of the political department of government by other nations. It is a status or power of community which is at war with another, and which covers the sea with its cruisers or the land with its army. A vessel, under such circumstances, must either be acknowledged as a belligerent or treated as a pirate. United States v. The Ambrose Light (U. S.) 25 Fed. 408, 412.

BELLIGERENT.

A belligerent is a subject of the hostile power, and his character in that regard depends upon that of the community to which he belongs. Johnson v. Jones, 44 Ill. 142, 151, 92 Am. Dec. 159.

BELONG—BELONGING.

See "Thereunto Belonging."

The words "belong to him," in the grant of the right to make a turnpike road to commence on lands that may belong to the grantee, must be construed to be limited to land which belonged to the grantee at the time of the grant, and not such as he obtained thereafter. Mills v. St. Clair County, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 569, 580, 12 L. Ed. 1201.

As appertaining to.

"Belonging," as used in Pen. Code, § 137, defining and punishing the burning of or setting fire to any kitchen, shop, barn, stable, or other outhouse that is parcel of such dwelling or belonging thereto, is comprehensive, and includes all barns so near a dwelling house on the same premises as to endanger the safety of such house in case of fire. "As farm buildings are constructed, it is seldom the barn adjoins the house. It may not even be a parcel of it, but still it may belong to it within the meaning of the statute." Hill v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 192, 195.

The word "belonging" may and very often does mean "ownership," but it may also mean that which is connected with a principal or greater thing; an appendage; an appurtenance; and this is its use in the charter of a seminary exempting from taxation property belonging or appertaining to it. People v. Directors of Chicago Theological Seminary, 51 N. E. 198, 199, 174 Ill. 177.

"Belonging thereto," as used in a statute authorizing a wife to hold and enjoy the mansion of her deceased husband and the plantation belonging thereto till the assignment of dower, "clearly indicates uniformity of title, as well as contiguity of location and community of use." The widow is not entitled to hold a farm, on which there are no buildings, which adjoins a farm on which the mansion is located, and which was used by the husband in connection with the latter farm. McKalg v. McKalg, 25 Atl. 181, 182, 50 N. J. Eq. (5 Dick.) 325.

S. contracted to sell to C. his house, farm, and premises, all the tools belonging to the sawmill, all the apparatus belonging to the gristmill, "together with all the fixtures belonging to the fulling mill and carding machine, together with every article attached to the freehold." Held that the phrase, "fixtures belonging to the fulling mill and carding machine" meant all the machinery on the farm which had been used in such buildings as fixtures. Martin v. Cope, 28 N. Y. 180, 182.

"Belonging with," as used in a fire policy insuring a stable and carriage house belonging with the insured's dwelling house, meant "pertaining" to the dwelling house; and in an action on the policy, there being a question as to whether a certain carriage house was embraced, an instruction to the jury that a building, 189 feet from the dwelling, used in part for other purposes, could not be regarded as a carriage house "belonging with" the dwelling, was error, the question being one for the jury. Robinson v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co., 32 Atl. 996, 997, 87 Me. 399.

The words "belonging to the same," in the sale by a lessee owning buildings on the leased premises of the buildings and the fixtures of every description attached to said buildings, in said buildings and belonging to the same, expressly excludes from the operation of the conveyance all fixtures not procured for or used in connection with the building as a business house. Stettauer v. Hamlin, 97 Ill. 312, 319.

As claim.

In the disclosure of a garnishee declaring that the property in his hands belongs to certain persons, "belongs to" was not synonymous with the word "claims," as used in Rev. St. § 2767, providing that, when the answer of a garnishee discloses that any other person than defendant claims the indebtedness or property in his hands, the court may order such claimant interpleaded, the term "claims" in the statute being used in the sense of "asks for" or "demands as his due," and not being equivalent to the phrase "has a right to" or "owns." John R. Davis Lumber Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Milwaukee, 58 N. W. 743, 744, 87 Wis. 435.

As making a direct gift.

"Belong," as used in a will providing that the property shall "belong to my children," operates as a direct gift. Paget v. Melcher, 49 N. Y. Supp. 922, 926, 26 App. Div. 12.

Testator, by a clause of his will, after giving a life estate to his wife, provided that "my said effects thus come into the hands of my said daughters, not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children." It was held that the use of the distributive word "belong," which is a word of ownership, applies to the children as well as to their mothers, the primary definition of the word "belong" being to be the property of, and hence the children must take as purchasers in common with their mothers. Sumpter v. Carter, 42 S. E. 324, 329, 115 Ga. 893, 60 L. R. A. 274.

As membership.

"Belongs," as applied to membership in a religious society, is difficult of definition, and is incapable of any exact inflexible definition which will fit the cases that may arise, so as to enable it to be said that this man does and this man does not "belong," within the meaning of a statute regulating the qualifications of voters in religious societies. Whether a contested voter "belongs" to the church or congregation, within the meaning of the law, is and must remain principally a question of fact. People v. Keese (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 483, 492.

As expression of ownership.

It is undoubtedly true that the word "belonging" may mean ownership, and very often does. But that is not its only meaning. Webster's International Dictionary defines it: "(2) That which is connected with a principal or greater thing; an appendage; an appurtenance." And, as used in a charter providing that the property "belonging or pertaining to said" corporation shall be exempt from taxation, the manifest purpose was to exempt property used in immediate connection with the corporation, and not all the property owned by it and used for its purposes. Chicago Theological Seminary v. People of Illinois, 23 Sup. Ct. 386, 388, 188 U. S. 662, 47 L. Ed. 641 (citing People v. Chicago Theological Seminary, 174 Ill. 177, 51 N. E. 198).

The primary meaning of the words "to belong" is "to be the property of." The word "belonging" is aptly used to express ownership, and, as used in an indictment for larceny, is a sufficient expression of ownership. State v. Fox, 45 N. W. 874, 875, 80 Iowa, 312, 20 Am. St. Rep. 425.

The primary meaning of the words "to belong to" is to be the property of, and hence an allegation in an indictment for burglary that the offense was committed in a dwelling house belonging to prosecutor sufficiently charges ownership. State v. Fox, 80 Iowa, 312, 313, 45 N. W. 874, 875, 20 Am. St. Rep. 425.

In S. & C. Rev. St. 761, providing that all buildings "belonging" to institutions of purely public charity, together with the land actually occupied by such institutions, not leased or otherwise used with a view to profit, and all moneys and credits appropriated solely to sustaining, and belonging exclusively to, such institutions, "belonging" means ownership. It is not necessary that the legal title be vested in the institution; if it were held in trust for the sole use and benefit of the institution, the property in such case would be regarded as belonging to the institution. The institution must not only own the property, but it must be so used as to fulfill the requirements of the statute. Hum- phreys v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 29 Ohio St. 201, 208.

The primary meaning, and also the common and ordinary meaning, of the word "belong," is to be the property of. Such is its meaning in a will providing that one part of certain property shall "belong" to a school. Gammon v. Gammon Theological Seminary, 88 N. E. 890, 891, 153 Ill. 41.

One of the approved definitions of the word "belong" is to be the property of, and "belonging" is being the property of. Commonwealth v. Hamilton, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 480, 482.

The word "belong" implies ownership. An averment in a declaration that there was appraised, and allowed to plaintiff a certain sum as damages "for the taking and appropriating of land belonging to and in the possession of plaintiff," is therefore a sufficient averment of the title to real estate to support a judgment by default. Bragg v. City of Chicago, 73 Ill. 152, 154.

The words "belonging to the same owner," in a statute authorizing sale for taxes of lots so owned, do not mean simply the technical owner of the title, but they mean the person in whose name, as owner or occupant, the lots are assessed. People v. Cady, 11 N. E. 810, 811, 105 N. Y. 290.

Where a person was not the owner of a wagon nor entitled to the possession of it, it cannot in any just sense be said that the wagon "belonged" to him, though he held a chattel mortgage upon it. Blauvelt v. Fechtman, 8 Atl. 728, 729, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 430.

Where the question as to which one of two persons had title to a piece of land, and the arbitrators found that such piece of land "belonged" to one of them, the word meant that he had the whole interest or estate in the land. Shelton v. Alcox, 11 Conn. 240, 248, 249.

Authority to lease mineral lands "belonging to the state" does not apply to lands which have merely been selected by the state, and title to which still remains in the general government. Baker v. Jamison, 55 N. W. 749, 751, 54 Minn. 17.

Belong to town.

A person "belongs" to the town, within the poor laws, where he has a settlement in the town, or derives a settlement from those who do have a settlement therein and are then absent therefrom. Town of Waterbury v. Town of Bethany, 18 Conn. 424, 430.

The word "belong" is not often used, in legislation on the subject of proper settlements, to signify a mere established residence. "Where he resides," or "where he dwells and has his home," is usually implied. The provision in the eleventh section of the general act that it shall be the duty of overseers in their respective towns to provide for the immediate comfort and relief of persons found therein, not "belonging" thereto, means "not having a settlement" therein. In the same sense the word is used in Acts 1821, c. 127, § 1, providing against the spread of contagious diseases, and making it the duty of selectmen to remove people coming from abroad or belonging to the town. Inhabitants of Kennebunk v. Inhabitants of Alfred, 19 Me. (1 App.) 221, 223.

"Belonged," in a resolution of the General Assembly in 1842, wherein it was resolved that the town of Westport shall be liable to maintain all the poor of the town of Fairfield that might be absent therefrom, provided such poor belonged to the parish of Green's Farms, meant the place of a person's legal settlement, and not merely his place of residence. The Town of Reading v. Town of Westport, 19 Conn. 561, 564.

No one "belongs" to a town who is not one of its settled inhabitants. Columbia v. Williams, 3 Conn. 467, 471. The word is descriptive of a status, and, as in the case of infancy, coverture, or citizenship, it is a question of fact what is the status in any such respect of a particular individual. An averment that support furnished to a pauper under certain circumstances is legally chargeable to a certain town does not purport to describe his status. Connecticut Hospital for Insane v. Town of Brookfield, 36 Atl. 1017, 1018, 69 Conn. 1.

"Belongs," as used in the statute (title 150, c. 1, § 11) providing that if a slave set at liberty comes to want he shall be relieved by the selectmen of the town to which he belongs, is to be construed as indicating the relation which the individual bears to a town, which is the popular signification of the word. Columbia v. Williams, 3 Conn. 467, 471.

In Rev. St. c. 14, § 1, providing that nurses and necessities shall be furnished to an infected person at his charge, if able, otherwise that of the town to which he belongs, "belongs" means at the charge of the town where he has his pauper settlement, and not the town where he might happen to reside at the time. Inhabitants of Hampden v. Inhabitants of New Burgh, 67 Me. 370, 371.

"Belongs," as used in a statute relating to the support of paupers, and providing that such support should be furnished to the poor by the overseers of the poor of the town to which such pauper belongs, means resides, and is not equivalent to and synonymous with the expression "legally settled." Cushing v. Hale, 8 Vt. 38, 45.

Belonging to any deceased person.

Rev. St. 1889, c. 3, § 80, provides that if any executor or administrator shall state on oath that he believes that any person has in his possession, or has concealed or embezzled, any goods, chattels, moneys, or effects, book of account, papers, or any evidences of debt whatever, or titles to land, belonging to any deceased person, the court shall require such person to appear before it, and may examine him on oath. Held, that the phrase "belonging to any deceased person" can only mean belonging to the estate of any deceased person, and refers not merely to goods, chattels, moneys, etc., placed in the hands of the party charged by the deceased in his lifetime, but includes goods, chattels, moneys, etc., which belong to the estate of the deceased, and have come into the hands of the party charged since the death of the deceased. Blair v. Sennott, 24 N. E. 969, 970, 134 Ill. 78.

Under a like statute it was held that the goods and money are not limited to such as had remained unchanged and was in specie, but includes property which came to the hands of the person to be charged before the death of the deceased person, and which was converted before or after such death. Dinsmoor v. Bressler, 45 N. E. 1086, 1088, 164 Ill. 211.

Belonging to highway.

"Belonging to a highway," as used in Rev. St. tit. 38, § 3, providing that no person shall acquire title by adverse possession to land belonging to a highway, does not apply to a public landing on a stream, not part of a highway. The words of the statute apply exclusively to such land as is used by the public as a public thoroughfare or highway. Burrows v. Gallup, 32 Conn. 493, 87 Am. Dec. 186.

Belonging to railroad.

A mortgage by a railroad of engines, tenders, and cars, etc., and "all other personal property" in any way belonging or appertaining to the railroad, did not include canal boats used by the railroad company in connection with its transportation line. Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 494, 513.

The term "belonging," in a statute exempting the property belonging to the Illinois Central Railroad Company from taxation, does not apply to grain warehouses erected by private persons on parts of the right of way or other real estate owned by the railroad for the benefit of the lessees, with the right to remove the building after the expiration of their lease. Gilkerson v. Brown, 61 Ill. 486, 488.

St. 1861, c. 100, providing that if the owner of land adjoining a railroad inclose any part of the land belonging to said railroad as located or established, or occupy "any land belonging to or included within the location of any such railroad," no continuance of occupancy shall create in the occupant any right to the land belonging to the railroad so occupied, should be construed to mean land which the road took or might have taken by right of eminent domain, and not adjacent lands purchased. Maney v. Providence & W. R. Co., 37 N. E. 164, 165, 161 Mass. 283.

Belonging to a slave.

"Belonging," as used in Rev. St. c. 89, § 24, authorizing wardens of the poor to seize any horses, cattle, etc., belonging to any slave, applied to animals such as the master permitted the slave to raise for his own, and to exercise acts of dominion over them as if they were his own. McNamara v. Kerns, 24 N. C. 66, 69.

Belonging to the state.

One appointed attorney for the state for a county gave a bond as required by the statute, conditioned that he should account for all moneys "belonging to the state," which he might receive as such attorney. Held, that the phrase "belonging to the state" should be construed to embrace all moneys coming into the hands of the officer by virtue of his office; and hence, where all moneys payable by him to the State Treasurer had been properly accounted for, but sums received by him which were payable to the county treasurer had not been, there was a liability on the bond. Gilbert v. Isham, 16 Conn. 525, 528.

BELOW.

"Below low-water mark," as used in Rev. St. c. 3, § 63, declaring that no fish weir shall be erected in tide waters below low-water mark in front of another's shore or flats, does not necessarily mean that the soil in which such weir shall be erected, to be contrary to the act, shall be under water at all stages of the tide, but it may become the subject of the penalty if erected on public flats situated beyond or near the middle of the channel and the low-water line of the flats. In the elementary books, and reports of decisions relating to tide waters, the word "below," in the phrase in question, is almost invariably found to be used synonymously with "beyond." Donnell v. Joy, 26 Atl. 1017, 1018, 85 Me. 118.

"Below," as used in Rev. St. § 2336, which provides that, when two or more veins of ore unite, the oldest or prior locator shall take the vein below the point of union, has its ordinary and common meaning, and does not mean "beyond." Lee v. Stahl, 22 Pac. 436, 438, 13 Colo. 174.

The natural meaning of a statute forbidding the erection of a bridge, or the keeping of a ferry, within a certain distance "above or below" another bridge, would seem to be above or below in the course of the river.

The ordinary meaning of these words in such connection is not that of location, but that of course or direction, and would mean that such distance should be measured on such course. McLeod v. Burroughs, 9 Ga. 213, 220.

BELT PISTOL

A "belt pistol," within the meaning of Acts 1871, c. 90, prohibiting the act of publicly or privately carrying a belt or private pistol or revolver, other than an army pistol, etc., means such a pistol as a man usually carries, or that may be conveniently carried or actually carried, on the person in a belt, other than an army pistol. Porter v. State, 66 Tenn. (7 Baxt.) 106, 108.

BELT RAILROAD.

A "belt railroad" is a railroad encircling a city, or other restricted territory intersected by other railroads, not having a common right of way into the territory, for the purpose of transferring and switching cars from one railroad to another with which it is not otherwise connected, or of transferring cars between such railroads and industrial plants located in the neighborhood of, but not on, such railroads. Such a road does not come within the provision of a deed of a right of way to a railroad that any other railroad running into or through the city shall have the right to run a parallel track along and on the same right of way. South & N. A. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co., 23 South. 973, 978, 117 Ala. 395.

BELTER.

A "belter," in reference to machinery, is one whose duty it is, when a belt comes off, to put it on. Freeberg v. St. Paul Plow Works, 48 Minn. 99, 107, 50 N. W. 1026, 1027.

BENCH WARRANT.

A bench warrant is one issued by a judge for the arrest of one accused of a crime by a grand jury. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 932.

BENEATH.

"Beneath," as a preposition, means "lower in place, with something directly over or under." Webster's Dict. And such is its meaning in a claim for a patent reciting that the footboard is sustained "beneath" the axle by straps, instead of "lower than," "nearer to the ground." Truman v. Deere Implement Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 109, 116.

BENEDICTINE.

Benedictine is a cordial or liqueur resembling Chartreuse, distilled at Fecamp in Normandy. It was originally prepared by the Benedictine Monks, but since the French Revolution has been made by a secular company. Cent. Dict. An historical account of the origin of this cordial is given by Judge Taft in the case of Société Anonyme de la Distillerie de la Benedictine v. Micalovitch, Fletcher & Co., 36 Alb. Law J. 364. A. Bauer & Co. v. La Société Anonyme de la Distillerie de la Liqueur Benedictine de l'Abbaye de Fécamp (U. S.) 120 Fed. 74, 75, 56 C. C. A. 480.

BENEFICENCE.

A will giving money for the establishment of a perpetual fund, the income of which was to be devoted perpetually to human "beneficence and charity," means for charitable uses; for "beneficence," which indicates a specific design, being followed by and connected with "charity," is limited by the succeeding word, and imports an intention to provide for acts in their nature charitable. The conjunction between "beneficence" and "charity" may be properly taken as uniting synonyms. "Beneficence" must be understood to refer to the charitable purposes which the testator intended to designate in the clause as a whole. In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 457, 468.

BENEFICENT.

"Beneficent" may be distinguished from "benevolent." Dr. Webster says: "Etymologically considered, 'benevolent' implied merely wishing well to others; 'beneficent,' doing well; but by degrees the word 'benevolent' has been widened to include not only feelings but actions. Thus we speak of 'benevolent operations,' 'benevolent labors for the public good,' 'benevolent society.' In like manner 'beneficent' is now applied to feelings. Thus we speak of 'beneficent intentions' of a donor. The phrase 'benevolent labors' turns the attention to the sources of these labors—that is, benevolent feeling—while 'beneficent' would simply mark them as productive of good. So 'beneficent intentions' point to the feelings of the donor as bent upon some specific good act, while 'benevolent intentions' would only denote a general wish and design to do good." In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 457, 508.

BENEFICIAL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2429, authorizes a dissolution of corporations on the ground that it would be "beneficial to the interests of stockholders." Held, that the words "beneficial to the interests of stockholders" were vague, and seemed not to confer an absolute right on the stockholders to have the corporation dissolved, but to confide a discretionary power in the court to order a dissolution, if in its opinion the best interests of the stockholders will be subserved thereby. In the exercise of such discretion the court is bound to consider the interests of a minority as well as of a majority, and to guard what will be beneficial to its interests, as well as what would be to the best interests of the majority. In re Importers' & Grocers' Exchange of New York, 2 N. Y. Supp. 257.

In reference to the occupation of land, making the occupant thereof liable to the poor rate if the same be beneficial, the term "beneficial" is not synonymous with the word "profitable." Regina v. Inhabitants of Vange, 3 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 241, 254.

BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS.

See "Fraternal Association."
As charity, see "Charity."

What is known as a "beneficial association" has a wholly different object and purpose in view from an insurance company. The great underlying purpose of the organization is not to indemnify or to secure against loss; its design is to accumulate a fund from the contribution of its members for beneficial or protective purposes, to be used in their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death. The benefits, though secured by contract, and for that reason to a limited extent assimilated to the proceeds of insurance, are not to be so considered. Such societies are rather of a philanthropic or benevolent character, though their beneficial features may be of a narrow or restricted character. Commonwealth v. Equitable Ben. Ass'n, 18 Atl. 1112, 1113, 137 Pa. 412.

"The great underlying purpose of a beneficial association is not to indemnify or secure against loss, but its design is to have a fund derived from the contributions of its members for beneficial or protective purposes, to be used in their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death. The benefits, though secured by contract, and for that reason to a limited extent assimilated to the proceeds of insurance, are not so considered. Such societies are rather of a philanthropic kind. The motives of the members may be to some extent selfish, but the principles on which they rest are founded on the considerations mentioned. These benefits, by the rule of their organization, are payable to their own unfortunates out of funds which the members thus contributed for the purpose, not as an indemnity or security against loss, but as a protective relief in case of sickness or injury, or to provide the means of a decent burial in the event of death. Such societies have no capital stock, they yield no profit, and their contracts, though beneficial and protective, altogether exclude the idea of insurance or of indemnity or of security against loss." Common- wealth v. Equitable Ben. Ass'n, 18 Atl. 1112, 1113, 137 Pa. 412.

"Beneficial associations," as used in Act May 1, 1876 (P. L. 53, § 54), providing that the act and the act to which it was a supplement should not apply to beneficial associations that provided for the family or heirs of a deceased member, whether issuing policies containing a guaranteed sum of insurance or not, means an association having no fixed capital, which is not bound to pay any fixed sum on the death of a member, but so much only as may voluntarily be paid by the surviving members, which cannot be enforced by law, each person being required to pay a certain fee on his admission as a member, but permitting no assessments to be made for carrying on the business of the association. Commonwealth v. National Mut. Aid Ass'n, 94 Pa. 481, 489.

BENEFICIAL DEVISE.

A devise to a husband is not a beneficial devise to his wife, who is a subscribing witness to the will, so as to render it void. Sullivan v. Sullivan, 106 Mass. 474, 475, 8 Am. Rep. 356.

BENEFICIAL ESTATE.

An estate in expectancy is one where the right to the possession is postponed to a future period, and is beneficial where the devisee takes solely for his own use or benefit, and not as the mere holder of the title for the use of another. In re Seaman's Estate, 41 N. E. 401, 403, 147 N. Y. 69.

BENEFICIAL POWER.

A power is beneficial when no person other than its holder has, by the terms of its creation, any interest in its execution. Rev. St. 1903, Okl. § 4105; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3409; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 326; Leonard v. American Baptist Home Missionary Soc. (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 290, 293; Syracuse Sav. Bank v. Porter (N. Y.) 36 Hun, 168, 170; Sweeney v. Warren, 40 N. Y. St. Rep. 304, 307; Tilden v. Green, 40 N. Y. St. Rep. 512, 523.

A "power," as defined by statute, is an authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform. It is not estate or interest in the land, but an authority to create an estate or interest. A power may be given to a person who has an estate in the land, or to a mere stranger. Where no person other than the grantee has by the terms of its creation any interest in the execution of the power, it is termed a "beneficial interest." Root v. Stuyvesant (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 257, 283.

"Beneficial," as used in 1 Rev. St. 732, § 79, providing that a power is "beneficial" when no person other than the grantee has by the terms of its creation any interest in its execution, means that if, by the terms of the creation of the power, no other person than the donee has an interest in its execution, then it is beneficial, or, if the instrument creating the power does not by its terms give an interest in its execution to any one else, the donee is the sole beneficiary. Cutting v. Cutting (N. Y.) 20 Hun, 360, 364; Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 230, 235.

A general or special power is beneficial when no person other than the grantee has, by the terms of its creation, any interest in its execution. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 2107.

BENEFICIAL USE.

"The beneficial use of his property—which is the thing of value for which a man pays a consideration when he buys a parcel of land—extends within the lines of the highway, and embraces the light and air of heaven, and that other something which has been called 'access.'" Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 238, 240.

BENEFICIALLY INTERESTED.

A requirement that an application for a writ of review or mandamus must be by the "party beneficially interested" means that the party's interest must be of a nature which is distinguishable from that of the mass of the community. Ashe v. Supervisors, 16 Pac. 783, 71 Cal. 236; Eby v. School Trustees of Red Bank, 25 Pac. 240, 243, 87 Cal. 166; Territory v. McPherson, 50 N. W. 351, 352, 6 Dak. 27.

When the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to enforce the performance of a public duty, persons who are residents, voters, and taxpayers are persons "beneficially interested" and entitled to sue for the writ. State v. Grace, 25 Pac. 382, 383, 20 Or. 154.

A taxpayer within an assessor's district is a "party beneficially interested" in having all the taxable property in the district assessed, and is therefore a proper party to make the affidavit for the issuance of a writ of mandamus to the assessor to compel him to assess property subject to assessment. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353, 360.

In a cause of action.

Code Civ. Proc. § 3247, providing that where an action is brought in the name of another by a transferee of the cause of action, "beneficially interested" therein, the transferee or other person shall be liable for costs, means one who takes an absolute title to the res as transferee, and not a person who merely holds it as collateral security for the payment of a debt. Thorn v. Beard, 24 N. Y. Supp. 621, 622, 71 Hun, 112. The provision cannot be construed to apply to one, having no pecuniary interest in the result of a suit, who suggested to a transferee that he bring an action on an assignment obtained without any action, agreeing to let the transferee have the money to pay his attorneys, believing that the transferee had a good cause of action. In re Harwood, 21 N. Y. Supp. 572, 68 Hun, 634.

"Any person beneficially interested," as used in 2 Rev. St. 619, § 44, providing that where an action shall be brought in the name of another by an assignee, or by any person beneficially interested in the recovery in such action, such an assignee or person should be liable for the costs, includes a person who brings and prosecutes a suit in the name of another, under an agreement with the nominal party to carry on the suit at his own expense for a portion of the expected recovery. Giles v. Halbert, 12 N. Y. 82, 84.

In a contract.

The party "beneficially interested" in a contract is prima facie the party who pays the consideration of such contract, and he may maintain an action thereon, though the contract be taken in the name of another party. Tracy v. Gunn, 29 Kan. 508, 513.

Under a will.

The requirement that a will shall be witnessed by three creditable attesting witnesses not "beneficially interested" means those who received a benefit under the will, and not those who are pecuniarily losers by its provisions. The witness "beneficially interested" under the will is one gaining by and under its provisions, but an attesting witness who is called to establish a will by which he is divested of his inheritance can hardly be regarded as "beneficially interested" by it, and so interested to maintain it. Smalley v. Smalley, 70 Me. 545, 548, 35 Am. Rep. 353.

The term "beneficially interested" applies to witnesses having or deriving a fixed certain benefit, and not those having a contingent benefit thereunder, and does not disqualify a member of a corporation owning two shares of stock from witnessing a will wherein a legacy is left to the corporation, the bequest to the corporation being for a specific purpose. In re Marston, 8 Atl. 87, 97, 79 Me. 25.

A taxpayer of a town was not "beneficially interested" under a will by reason of a bequest to the town, so as to render him an incompetent witness to the instrument. In re Marston, 8 Atl. 87, 96, 79 Me. 25.

Where a will gave a legacy to A., and provided that if A. should die prior to testatrix the legacy should go to others, it was held that A. was "beneficially interested."

In re Trinitarian Congregational Church & Society of Castine, 40 Atl. 325-327, 91 Me. 416.

BENEFICIARY.

See "Cestui Que Trust."

As representative, see "Representative."

Where realty is conveyed in trust to pay the income to a person for life, the remainderman is a "beneficiary" of the trust, within the real property law providing that, on the death of a trustee of an expressed trust, the trust estate, if unexecuted, shall vest in the Supreme Court, and shall be executed by some person appointed by the court, but no person shall be appointed until the beneficiary of the trust shall have been brought into court. In re Welch, 46 N. Y. Supp. 639, 690, 20 App. Div. 412.

The person for whose benefit the trust is created is called the "beneficiary." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2218; Civ. Code, Mont. 1895, § 2953.

The person whose confidence creates a trust is called the "trustor," the person in whom the confidence is imposed is called the "trustee," and the person for whose benefit the trust is created is called the "beneficiary." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4257.

The "beneficiary" is the person to whom a policy of insurance effected is payable. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3096a.

BENEFICIARY HEIR.

"Beneficiary heir," as used in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1042, providing that the beneficiary heir of age and present shall be preferred to every other person for the office of executor of the estate, means one who may accept the succession, as well as one who may have accepted it. Succession of Gusman, 36 La. Ann. 299.

"Beneficiary heirs" are those who have accepted the succession under the benefit of an inventory regularly made. Civ. Code, La. 1900, art. 883.

BENEFICIARY UNDER WILL.

Pursuant to the antenuptial release of dower, testator bequeathed to his widow the sum agreed on in lieu of dower, "of any * * * in my personal estate as widow." The residuum was given to the several "beneficiaries under this will, share and share alike," except certain legatees, not including the widow, who was specifically excluded. Held, that the widow was entitled to share in the residue as a "beneficiary under this will." Wood v. Packard, 55 N. E. 315, 174 Mass. 540.

BENEFIT.

See "Common Benefits"; "Double Benefits"; "General Benefits"; "Immediate Benefit"; "Peculiar Benefits"; "Public Benefit"; "Sole Benefit"; "Special Benefits"; "With Benefit of Survivorship."

Any benefit, see "Any."

The word "benefits," when used unqualifiedly, is a comprehensive term, including direct or special benefits, and indirect or general; but when the connection in which it is used, and the subject-matter to which it is applied, are such as to indicate that it is used in a limited or qualified sense, it is the duty of the court to give it that interpretation. Ferguson v. Borough of Stamford, 60 Conn. 432, 446, 22 Atl. 782, 787.

"Benefit," as used in Code 1849, § 396, authorizing the examination of a person for whose immediate benefit the action is prosecuted or defended, means advantage, profit. Fitch v. Bates (N. Y.) 11 Barb. 471, 473.

"Whatever contributes to promote prosperity; to add value to property; advantage; profit"—is a benefit. Webster. Synod of Dakota v. State, 50 N. W. 632, 635, 2 S. D. 366, 14 L. R. A. 418.

In the by-laws of an incorporated joint-stock association organized to benefit its members by regulating the price of labor and all other matters appertaining to the trade of stone-cutting, and assuming to say who of its members should work and when they should work, and the price per day received, and the number of hours they should work, a member on strike to receive from the association a certain sum per week, article 24, § 3, providing that any member three months in arrears should not be considered in benefit until one month after he was clear on the books, "benefit" means the advantage of constant employment, or indemnity for the loss of time in case of a strike, and the facility of employment which the membership in the association affords. Weiss v. Tenant, 21 N. Y. Supp. 252, 254, 2 Misc. Rep. 1213.

As increased value.

The "benefit" for which the owner of a lot is taxed for municipal improvements is not the benefit to the public at large, or to any other person whomsoever but the owner of the lot. The phrases "benefits" and "increased value" are convertible terms; and, where the tax is apportioned according to the increased value of the lot, it is the same thing as the value of the benefit which the owner receives from the improvement. Garrett v. City of St. Louis, 25 Mo. 505, 511, 69 Am. Dec. 475.

As entire beneficial interest or ownership.

In a will giving to certain persons the benefit of a certain sum of money, "benefit" means more than the income of that sum for a limited time or for life. The word "benefit," unrestricted, means the whole benefit, the entire beneficial interest. Where property is given, granted, or bequeathed to certain individuals, to be used, appropriated, and applied for their benefit, and in such a manner that no other person or persons have or can have any interest in it, they thereby become in effect the absolute owners of it, and may exercise all the rights belonging to them in that relation. Paine v. Farsaith, 30 Atl. 11, 12; 86 Me. 357 (citing Smith v. Harrington, 86 Mass. [4 Allen] 566).

A conveyance of one-half of certain capital stock, to be in trust for the sole benefit of the wife of C. and her children, and also directing that one-half of the profits arising from the stock be applied by B. for the "benefit" of C.'s wife and children, is sufficient to show an intention to exclude C.'s marital rights to the profits. Clark v. Maguire, 16 Mo. 302, 314.

A will bequeathing the use of the testator's realty to his widow during her widowhood, and providing that when she ceased to be his widow the "benefits and profits" of the land should equally be divided between the testator's children, and that when the testator's son S. should arrive at the age of 21 years the real estate should be sold, providing the wife's widowhood shall have ceased before that time, does not show an intention to devise a fee, but was intended to dispose of the use of annual rents and profits of the land for the period that might intervene between the termination of the widow's estate and its sale, whether her estate ceased before or after S. became of age. Collier v. Grimesey, 36 Ohio St. 17, 22.

"Benefit," in a conveyance for the benefit of a university, is equivalent to advantage, not to occupation; advantage by occupying, renting, selling, or otherwise. "Benefit" includes "occupation," but is not confined to it. It is a broad word. A devise of the "benefits" of real estate for a term under a will devising the fee elsewhere vests an estate in the land for the term. Lawe v. Hyde, 39 Wis. 345, 359.

An undertaking of a benefit society, "intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of deceased members," must be an undertaking to pay, after the death of the member, directly to such person, or in such way that they should be the immediate recipients of the money, for the word "benefit" will be assumed to have been used in its legal sense—that of the direct and absolute enjoyment of the money to be paid, or of its use. Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc., 21 N. E. 794, 795, 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420.

A bequest of personal property to trustees for a married woman, the profits to be applied to her benefit, does not impart to her an interest beyond the control and dominion of her husband. Nimmo v. Davis, 7 Tex. 26, 31.

Where a testator by his will leaves his estate to his wife "for her own use and benefit during her natural life," remainder to his heirs, and his executors, under power of sale given by the will, convert the realty into money, the wife is not entitled to the control of the principal for life, but only to the income arising therefrom. It may be that the word conveyed to the testator's mind the notion of an absolute power of disposition on her part. This notion is suggested by the limitation of all that remains after her death by way of remainder, but this is conjecture. On the other hand, the words of limitation, taken by themselves, create a life estate and nothing else. They are perfectly clear and free from doubt. Lewis v. Shattuck, 53 N. E. 912, 173 Mass. 486.

As broader than support.

"Benefit," as used in a will directing payment of income to one for his own use and benefit of property, is a much broader word than "support," and has no such limited meaning as the word "support." It is thus defined in Worcester: "Advantage; gain; profit;" and its manifest signification is anything that works to the advantage or gain of the recipient. Winthrop County v. Clinton, 46 Atl. 435, 437, 196 Pa. 472, 79 Am. St. Rep. 729.

A will devising property to a wife for her "benefit" and support meant, using the synonyms for the word, that it was for her advantage, her profit, her gain, her account, her interest. The word "benefit" and its synonyms mean more than simple support. They mean any purpose to which the absolute owner of property can devote it. Stowell v. Stowell, 8 Atl. 738, 739, 59 Vt. 494, 59 Am. Rep. 748.

In a will by which testator gave to his wife, during her natural life, all of his property for her proper "use, benefit," support, and maintenance, the expressions "use" and "benefit" are not synonymous with the phrase "for her support and maintenance," but have a more enlarged signification, implying that the devisee was not only to have simply "her support and maintenance" out of the estate, but also a right to employ it for her advantage, gain and profit. "Her right of 'use' and 'benefit' was superadded to 'support and maintenance'; consequently the devisee had such power over and control of the estate devised as was reasonably necessary, not only to secure her support and maintenance, but also to facilitate her proper use and benefit thereof." Warren v. Webb, 68 Me. 133, 134.

Use synonymous.

In an instruction in a prosecution for larceny regarding the defendant's having received money for the "use and benefit" of a certain person, the addition of the words "and benefit" did not change the evident meaning of the instruction, and did not give a different meaning than that conveyed by the statute, which used only the word "use." If the defendant received money belonging to another for such other's use, it followed that it was for his benefit. State v. Brooks, 52 N. W. 240, 242, 85 Iowa, 366.

"Benefit" may be held as synonymous with the word "use," one of the definitions of which is, "in law, the benefit or profits of land and tenements." Heaston v. Randolph County, 20 Ind. 398, 403.

From construction of railroad.

Benefits accruing from the construction of a railroad to an owner of lands through which it passes may properly and conveniently be divided into two classes, to wit: (1) General benefits, or such as accrue to the community, or the vicinage at large, such as increased facilities for transportation and travel, and the building up of towns, and consequent enhancement of the value of lands and town lots; (2) special benefits, or such as accrue directly and solely to the owner of the lands, from which the right of way is taken, as when the excavation of the railroad track has the effect to drain a morass, and thus to transform what was a worthless swamp into valuable arable land, or to open up and improve a water course. As to the first of these classes, we know from the debates of the convention which formed the Constitution, and from the discussions which preceded and followed the calling of that convention, as well as from the language of the Constitution itself, that it was the express design of the framers of the Constitution to exclude that class of benefits from the consideration of jurors in their assessment of compensation for rights of way appropriated by corporations. In adopting the language that "no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until compensation therefor be first made in money or first secured by a deposit of money to the owner irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation," whether the second class, or special benefits, are included within such provision, has not been decided, and does not arise in this case. Little Miami R. Co. v. Collett, 6 Ohio St. 182, 184, 185.

Of deposits of public funds.

In an act prohibiting the conversion, loaning, or deposit for the benefit of officers, agents, and servants of public funds, and giving a right of action to municipalities against any such officer, agent, or servant who has contracted for or received any benefits or advantages because of the deposit of the public funds, the term "benefits or advantages" was clearly intended to include the interest on such deposits. State v. McFetridge, 54 N. W. 1, 12, 84 Wis. 473, 20 L. R. A. 223.

Of the estate.

An insurance policy providing that it was "for the benefit of the estate of the insured" does not entitle the insured's heirs to the amount due on the policy, to the exclusion of his creditors, but means that such amount shall be used for the payment of the claims against the estate, and that the remainder shall go to the insured's heirs. Pace v. Pace, 19 Fla. 438, 442.

Of grantor.

"Benefit of the grantor," in 9 Geo. IV, c. 85, § 1, curing omission to enroll deeds in cases where deed of conveyance is made without any power of revocation or agreement whatsoever "for the benefit of the grantor," means something given collusively, and making the deed inconsistent with that which it professes to be. A clause of redemption in a mortgage is not such a condition for the benefit of the grantor. Graham v. Hawkins, 2 Q. B. 212, 217.

Of real estate.

"Benefits," as used in a will giving testator's wife the benefits of all his real estate till his children became of age to enjoy their possessions, should be construed to include grain growing in the ground at the time of testator's death. Appeal of McCullough, 4 Yeates, 23.

BENEFIT OF CLERGY.

The plea of "privilegium clericale," or benefit of the clergy, never had any practical operation in the United States, and had it, in the absence of any statutory provision, been claimed as a common-law right in any state, it would have been denied. Blackstone says that it had its origin in the pious regard paid by Christian princes to the church in its infant state, and the ill use which the popish ecclesiastics soon made of that pious regard. 4 Com. 364. At first it was confined in its operation to those persons who were actually in the service of the church and had taken orders, but it was gradually extended until it comprehended all persons who could read, that being in those days of ignorance and superstition a mark of great learning, and the person enjoying this accomplishment was called a "clerk." The probable reason of this exemption being accorded to learned persons was their supposed beneficial influence upon the progress of the realm in civilization and religion, as much as to any sanctity with which the persons of the clergy were invested. It is curious to know how this plea was made and allowed. After a verdict was rendered of guilty, the prisoner was asked by the court if he had anything to say why judgment should not pass against him. The prisoner then prayed his clergy. This was generally performed on his bended knees. He was then tested by an ordinary, who handed him a psalm to read, and he read the first verse. The judge then put the question to the ordinary, "Legit vel non?" who answered, "Legit." The prisoner was then taken without the bar of the court and branded in the hand. 1 Salk. 61. The psalm usually given to the prisoner to read was the fifty-first, on account of the peculiar appropriateness of the first verse. State v. Bilansky, 3 Minn. 246, 253, 254 (Gil. 169, 172, 173).

BENEFIT OF HERSELF.

"Benefit of herself," as used in Gen. St. p. 417, § 9, enacting that actions may be sustained against a married woman on any causes of action which accrued before her marriage and upon any contract made by her since marriage upon her personal credit for the benefit of herself, her family, or her separate estate, means that a married woman may be compelled to pay for money or other property actually obtained by her personal credit, and does not apply to any contract into which a married woman may enter, entirely removing her common-law disabilities, and hence her contract to convey her land is not within the statute. Gore v. Carl, 47 Conn. 291, 292.

BENEFIT OF INVENTORY.

The "benefit of inventory" is the privilege which the heir obtains of being liable for the charges and debts of the succession, only to the value of the effects of the succession, by causing an inventory of these effects to be made within the time and in the manner prescribed. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1032.

BENEFIT SOCIETY.

BENEVOLENCE.

The word "benevolence," as used in a will, shall be taken in its broad sense, unless it is apparent from other directions in the will that the term was used in a stricter and narrower sense, when it is to be construed as synonymous with "charity." Kelly v. Nichols, 25 Atl. 840, 841, 18 R. I. 62, 19 L. R. A. 413.

A will giving a fund to trustees, the whole of the principal or the income to be applied in "aid of objects and purposes of benevolence or charity, public or private," should be construed to mean the general relief of the poor, making the bequest good as one to a charitable use; the word "benevolence" being synonymous with the word "charity" as there used. Saltonstall v. Sanders, 93 Mass. (11 Allen) 446, 454.

Charity distinguished.

"Benevolence" is a word of larger meaning than the word "charity," as it is understood in the law of charitable uses, and therefore, while it includes charitable purposes, it may also include other purposes of mere personal goodness which are not charitable, and, if the word "benevolence" is used in a will in its larger meaning, a bequest for purposes of benevolence cannot be sustained. It does not follow necessarily that the bequest is invalid because such word is used, for the question is a question not of language, but of meaning, and it may appear by the context of the will, or by the will taken as a whole, that, though the word "benevolence" was used, the only thing intended to be denoted by it was "charity." Pell v. Mercer, 14 R. I. 412, 443.

There is a difference between "benevolence" and "charity." The word "benevolence," as said by Durfee, C. J., in Pell v. Mercer, 14 R. I. 443, is a word of larger meaning than the word "charity," as it is understood in the law of charitable uses, and therefore, while it includes charitable purposes, may also include other purposes of merely personal good will which are not charitable. Mason v. Perry, 48 Atl. 671, 674, 22 R. I. 475.

A bequest in trust for such objects of "benevolence and liberality" as the trustee, in his own discretion, should most approve, cannot be supported as a charitable legacy, for, though the trustee might have diverted the whole to purposes charitable within the meaning of the law, he might equally have diverted the whole to purposes benevolent and liberal, and yet not within the meaning of charitable purposes, without being charged with maladministration. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 10 Ves. 522 (affirming 9 Ves. 399).

Gift in return for kindness.

A bequest of property to go to the people who have cared for the testator as a certain person should think best is a "benevolence," and not a charity. It is a kindness to persons who have cared for the donor, not a compensation; it is purely good will, a "benevolence" as much as if that word had been used. It does not relieve suffering or poverty or distress, or go in aid of education or religion, or of any object known to the law as a "charity." Murdock v. Bridges, 39 Atl. 475, 477, 91 Me. 124.

BENEVOLENT.

"Benevolent," as used in Act 1857, § 145, providing for the punishment of any person making a disturbance of an assembly for the promotion of any moral or benevolent object, cannot be construed to include a meeting for culture and improvement in sacred church music. The object of such a meeting is musical education, and not moral training; acquisition of skill, not the dispensation of charities. State v. Gager, 28 Conn. 232, 236.

"Benevolent," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, as amended by St. 1889, c. 465, exempting corporations organized for literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific purposes from taxation, may include purposes which may be deemed charitable by a court of equity, and it may also include acts dictated by kindness, good will, or a disposition to do good, the objects of which have no relation to the promotion of education, learning, or religion, the relief of the needy, the sick, or the afflicted, the support of public works, or the relief of public burdens, which cannot be deemed charitable in the technical or legal sense. A corporation having for its paramount object the dissemination of theosophical ideas, and the procuring of converts thereto, is not a "benevolent" institution, within the meaning of the statute, because one of its purposes was "forming the nucleus of a universal brotherhood of humanity." New England Theosophical Corp. v. City of Boston, 51 N. E. 456, 457, 172 Mass. 60, 42 L. R. A. 281.

Benevolent distinguished.

Dr. Webster says: "Etymologically considered, 'benevolent' implies merely wishing well to others; 'beneficent,' doing well. But by degrees the word 'benevolent' has been widened to include not only feelings, but actions; thus, we speak of 'benevolent operation,' 'benevolent labors for the public good,' 'benevolent societies.' In like manner 'beneficent' is now applied to feelings; thus, we speak of the 'beneficent intentions' of a donor. Thus, the phrase 'benevolent labors' turns the attention to the sources of these labors—that is, 'benevolent' feelings—while 'beneficent' would simply mark them as productive of good. So 'beneficent intentions' point to the feelings of the donor as bent upon some specific good act, while 'benevolent intentions' would only denote a general wish and design to do good." In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 457, 507.

Charitable distinguished.

Trusts having for their object a charity are usually defined by the words "benevolent" or "charitable." "Benevolent" is a word of much broader signification than "charitable," and may include what are not charities; and the courts invariably inquire into the meaning of the testator or donor, and, if the meaning implies a charity, the trust stands, otherwise not. Murdock v. Bridges, 39 Atl. 475, 477, 91 Me. 124.

A will creating a trust for "benevolent" purposes is not restricted to "charitable" purposes. James v. Allen, 3 Mer. 17, 18.

"The word 'benevolent' of itself, without anything in the context to qualify or restrict its ordinary meaning, clearly includes not only purposes which are deemed charitable by a court of equity, but also any acts of kindness or good will, or a disposition to do good, the objects of which have no relation to the promotion of education, learning, or religion, the relief of the needy, the sick, or the afflicted, the support of public works, or the relief of public burdens, and cannot be deemed 'charitable' in the technical and legal sense." Chamberlain v. Stearns, 111 Mass. 267, 268.

"Benevolent purpose" is not interchangeable with the expression "charitable purpose." While it is true that there is no charitable which is not also a benevolent purpose, yet a converse is not equally true, for there may be a "benevolent" purpose which is not "charitable" in the legal sense of the term. Adye v. Smith, 44 Conn. 60, 71, 26 Am. Rep. 424.

"Benevolent" is more definite and of a far wider range than "charitable" or "religious," and includes all gifts prompted by good will or kind feeling towards the recipient, whether an object of charity or not, and it has no legal meaning separate from its usual meaning. Norris v. Thomson's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Eq. (4 C. E. Green) 307, 313.

A will providing that a certain portion of the accumulated income of the estate might be given by the testator's widow to such benevolent, religious, or charitable institutions as she might think proper, is void, since the term "benevolent" is not synonymous with "charitable," and, though many charitable institutions may properly be called "benevolent," it is impossible to say that every object of a man's benevolence is also an object of his charity. Thomson's Ex'rs v. Norris, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 489, 523.

Charitable synonymous.

Benevolent is a word of much the same general import and meaning as charitable, benevolence having for its object the general good of mankind, and not comprehending in its common acceptation a gift bestowed for purely private and personal reasons. Parks' Adm'r v. American Home Missionary Soc., 20 Atl. 107, 109, 62 Vt. 19.

In a devise providing that the residue of testator's property should be distributed among his relatives for benevolent objects in such sums as his executors should deem best, "benevolent" is synonymous with "charitable," though it has been held in other jurisdictions that the word "benevolent" itself, without anything in the context to qualify or restrict its ordinary meaning, cannot be deemed "charitable" in the technical and legal sense. Goodale v. Mooney, 60 N. H. 528, 535, 49 Am. Rep. 334.

"Benevolent," when used in connection with the word "charitable," is synonymous with it, so that a bequest to "benevolent or charitable" objects is not invalid as being indefinite. People v. Powers, 29 N. Y. Supp. 950, 954, 83 Hun, 449, 8 Misc. Rep. 628 (citing Saltonstall v. Sanders, 93 Mass. [11 Allen] 446; Suter v. Hilliard, 132 Mass. 412, 42 Am. Rep. 444).

In a bequest of the residue of an estate to be divided among such benevolent, charitable, and religious institutions and associations as should be selected by testator's executors, "benevolent" should be construed as synonymous with "charitable." In re Murphy's Estate, 39 Atl. 70, 71, 184 Pa. 310, 63 Am. St. Rep. 802.

"Benevolent," as used in the residuary clause of a will giving the property to be used by trustees for benevolent and charitable purposes, was inserted to intensify the word "charitable" rather than otherwise, and the two words may be regarded as equivalent or analogous expressions. The word "benevolence" is used with different meanings according to circumstances. It sometimes signifies "liberality and generosity," and sometimes "charity," in the technical sense of the word. Charity may be benevolence, but all benevolence is not necessarily charity. Fox v. Gibbs, 29 Atl. 940, 942, 86 Me. 87.

"Though often used as synonymous with 'charitable,' 'benevolent' may, as applied to objects or purposes, have a broader meaning, and include some not 'charitable' in the legal sense of that word. Acts of kindness, friendship, forethought, or good will may properly be described as 'benevolent.' Where, however, it is used in connection with the term 'charitable,' or other words indicating an intent to limit it to purposes strictly charitable, it will be held to be synonymous with 'charitable.'" Suter v. Hilliard, 132 Mass. 412, 413, 42 Am. Rep. 444; In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 457, 507.

"Benevolent," as used in a devise to a religious society to aid the missionary, educational, and benevolent enterprises to which the society habitually contributed, cannot be construed as having a wider signification than the word "charitable," though intrinsically it includes more than legal charities; but its meaning may be narrowed down by the context, and the will itself provides a standard by which the word is to be measured, and the fund was not to be used to aid any benevolent enterprise, but only those to which the church was in the habit of contributing. De Camp v. Dobbins, 31 N. J. Eq. (4 Stew.) 671, 696; Id., 29 N. J. Eq. (2 Stew.) 36.

The word "benevolent," as used in connection with "charitable," in a statute exempting benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions from taxation (Rev. St. c. 6, pt. 2), is to be regarded as synonymous with it, and as defining and limiting the nature of the charity intended. City of Bangor v. Rising Virtue Lodge, No. 10, 73 Me. 428, 433, 40 Am. Rep. 369.

The word "benevolent," when used in connection with "charitable," has often been construed as synonymous with "charitable." Payment of sickness and funeral benefits for members only out of an income chiefly derived from regular compulsory dues paid by such members is not a use for a benevolent or charitable purpose, within Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, and St. 1889, c. 465, exempting from taxation real estate of societies devoting their entire incomes to benevolent or charitable purposes. Young Men's Protestant Temperance & Benevolent Soc. v. City of Fall River, 160 Mass. 409, 411, 412, 36 N. E. 57, 58.

BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

"Benevolent" means, literally, well-wishing, and has a larger meaning than "charitable"; hence, though many charitable institutions are properly called "benevolent," as used in Rev. St. § 1038, subd. 3, exempting from taxation the personal property of benevolent associations, it is not necessary that the association or institution should be free to all, in order to make it a benevolent association. St. Joseph's Hospital Ass'n v. Ashland County, 72 N. W. 43, 96 Wis. 636.

The design of what are known as "benevolent societies," which are purely of a philanthropic or benevolent character, is not to indemnify or secure the members from loss, but from the contribution of members to accumulate a fund to be used in their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death. State v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co., 67 N. E. 93, 98, 68 Ohio St. 9, 96 Am. St. Rep. 635 (citing Commonwealth v. Equitable Beneficial Ass'n, 137 Pa. 412, 18 Atl. 1112).

The name of an association will not necessarily fix or establish its real legal character. Even if it has adopted the name of a "benevolent association," it would make no difference. The law looks through and behind the names of things, and passes its judgment upon their substance. If the prevalent purpose and nature of an association, of whatever name, be that of insurance, the benevolent or charitable results to its beneficiaries would not change its legal character. Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299, 303.

Educational institution.

The act of 1848, providing for the incorporation of benevolent societies, and authorizing five or more persons possessing the qualifications prescribed by the act to associate themselves for benevolent purposes, cannot be construed to include a society for the purpose of carrying on medical or other colleges, or any institution whatever which is primarily and exclusively educational, and especially one in which a compensation is demanded for the instruction furnished. An institution of the latter kind could hardly be regarded as a "benevolent" institution within the ordinary meaning of those terms. People v. Cothran, 27 Hun, 344, 345.

Insurance company distinguished.

The great underlying principle of benevolent associations is not to indemnify or secure against loss; its design is to accumulate a fund from the contributions of its members for beneficial and protective purposes, to be used for their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, and death. The benefits, although secured by contracts, and for that reason to a limited extent assimilated to the proceeds of insurance, are not so considered. Such societies are rather of a philanthropic or benevolent character. Such societies have no capital stock, they yield no profit, and their contracts, although beneficial and protective, altogether exclude the idea of insurance, or indemnity or security against loss. Such an organization is not an insurance company. Dickinson v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. of Pennsylvania, 28 Atl. 293, 294, 159 Pa. 258. See, also, Northwestern Masonic Aid Ass'n v. Jones, 26 Atl. 253, 254, 154 Pa. 99, 35 Am. St. Rep. 810; National Mut. Aid Soc. v. Lupold, 101 Pa. 111, 119; Pennsylvania Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 413, 420, 19 C. A. 286, 38 L. R. A. 33, 70.

Mutual aid association.

Mutual aid associations, which are primarily for social and charitable purposes, and for securing efficient mutual aid among their members, are not usually described as "insurance companies," but belong to the distinctly recognized class of organizations known as "benevolent associations." Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 413, 420, 19 C. C. A. 286, 38 L. R. A. 33, 70.

Mutual associations for the purpose of securing, inter alia, sick benefit and burial expenses, are "benevolent institutions" in the strictest sense of the term. State v. Taylor, 27 Atl. 797, 798, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 49.

Payment of sickness and funeral benefits for members only, out of an income chiefly derived from regular compulsory dues paid by such members, is not a use for a "benevolent" or "charitable" purpose, within Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, exempting from taxation real estate of societies devoting their entire incomes to benevolent, charitable, and other purposes. Young Men's Protestant Temperance & Benevolent Soc. v. City of Fall River, 36 N. E. 57, 160 Mass. 409.

A corporation organized for a purpose where pecuniary profit is not an object, but having a fund made up by fees, fines, and assessments of its members, under the control of the association, to be used for benevolent purposes, and in aiding and sustaining those of its members who become sick or distressed, is a benevolent association. Peyre v. Mutual Relief Soc. of French Zouaves, 27 Pac. 191, 192, 90 Cal. 240.

Mutual fire insurance company.

The benefits of a mutual fire insurance order are restricted to those who become members, and who agree to do just what they require to be done for themselves upon loss by fire. They all contract for a benefit to themselves in certain contingencies, and pay their money for it. The order is not a "benevolent" or "charitable" institution, but an insurance company; and its secretary, whose duty it is to interest himself in behalf of the order by seeking members, and otherwise, to examine buildings on which protection is sought, and see that all questions are answered by the applicant, and present the application to the chairman of the board, collect the membership fee and examination fees, is an insurance agent, and, as such, liable to the payment of the privilege tax exacted of insurance agents. Co-operative Fire Ins. Order v. Lewis, 80 Tenn. (12 Lea) 136, 140, 141.

Mutual life insurance association.

A company organized to insure lives on the plan of assessments upon surviving members, without other restrictions than that policy holders shall have an interest in the lives of members, is not a "beneficial association," and entitled to the privileges of such organizations, which privileges are extended on account of the limited nature of the life insurance they are authorized to assume, it being confined to insurance for the benefit of the families and heirs of the members. State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7, 10.

Organization to endow marrying members.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 34, § 166, authorizing the incorporation of benevolent societies, does not include an association of single men, the object of which is to endow the wife of a member marrying with as many dollars as there are members of the society, to be raised by assessment on them. State v. Critchett, 32 N. W. 787, 37 Minn. 18.

Savings and loan association.

A society organized for the purpose of lending money probably to its own members, however excellent the motives of the associates may be, is not an association within the statute authorizing organizations for benevolent purposes. McMorris v. Simpson (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 610.

A benevolent or charitable association must be one whose leading purpose is benevolence or charity, and not the pecuniary advantage of its members. The fact that a savings association formed for the pecuniary profit of its stockholders will, if well managed, promote economy and providence, is a mere incident to its characteristic purposes, and does not render it a benevolent association, since it is carried on for a pecuniary profit, and not for benevolence. Sheren v. Mendenhall, 23 Minn. 92, 93.

BENZINE.

Naphtha, "benzine" or benzol, and kerosene are all refined coal or earth oils, not differing in their nature, but only in the degree of inflammability, kerosene being much less inflammable than either of the others. Morse v. Buffalo Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 536, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

In an action involving the construction of a clause of a fire policy authorizing the keeping of benzine on the insured premises, the court says that it was proven at the trial that benzine is a product from the distillation of coal oil or petroleum, the most volatile of which is called "gasoline"; that benzine is inflammable and explosive when in contact with the atmosphere, and vaporizes from agitation. Maryland Fire Ins. Co. v. Whiteford, 81 Md. 219, 224, 100 Am. Rep. 45.

Benzine is a liquid, consisting mainly of the lighter and more volatile hydrocarbons of petroleum or kerosene oil, used as a solvent and for cleansing soiled fabrics. Benzine is included under the general head of "Drugs and Chemicals," as used in a fire policy insuring a stock of goods of that nature. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Flemming, 44 S. W. 464, 465, 65 Ark. 54, 39 L. R. A. 789, 67 Am. St. Rep. 900. See, also, Carrigan v. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co., 53 Vt. 418, 426, 38 Am. Rep. 687.

BEQUEATH.

See, also, "Give and Bequeath."

"Bequeath" signifies a disposition by will. Jordan v. Jordan's Adm'r, 65 Ala. 301, 307.

The word "bequeath" implies an intention to grant an interest in the person named, and not to make him a mere trustee for another. McMullin v. Leslie, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 314, 315.

The words "bequeath to," as used in a will devising one-half of testator's realty to his daughter during her natural life, then after her decease "to bequeath to" her son, his heirs and assigns, forever, mean "to go to," and are intended to express the testator's direct devise to, the son. Nelson v. Combs, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 27, 30.

Devise synonymous.

The popular sense of the word "bequeath" includes "devise." Indeed, the terms are used as synonymous or equivalent by the lexicographers. Ogle v. Tayloe, 49 Md. 158, 175.

In the construction of statutes the words "bequeath" and "devise" shall be held to mean the same thing. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

Whether the word "bequeath" means the same as "devise," when used in a will, is to be determined by the connection in which it is found. Dow v. Dow, 36 Me. 211, 216.

The term "bequeath" is the proper term to be used in a will to denote a gift of personal property, but when the context shows that it is used by the testator in a different sense, it will be construed to include real estate, and to be synonymous with the term "devise." Borgner v. Brown, 33 N. E. 92, 94, 133 Ind. 391; In re Hoover's Estate, 7 N. Y. Supp. 283, 54 Hun. 106; Lasher v. Lasher (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 106, 109; Shumate v. Bailey, 20 S. W. 178, 179, 110 Mo. 411; Cramer v. Cramer, 71 N. Y. Supp. 60, 61, 35 Misc. Rep. 17.

Gen. St. § 2269, authorizes a married woman to make a will, but provides that "she shall not bequeath away from her husband more than one-half of her property, both personal and real, without his consent in writing." Held, that the word "bequeath," as used in such section by the legislators, was not used in its legal and technical sense, which is limited to gifts of personality only, but was used in its popular sense, and as so used was referable to both personality and realty. Logan v. Logan, 17 Pac. 99, 101, 11 Colo. 44.

As used in Gen. St. 394, § 35, providing that no man while married shall bequeath away from his wife more than one-half his property, nor shall any woman while married bequeath away from her husband more than one-half of her property, "bequeath" means "devise and bequeath." Barry v. Barry, 15 Kan. 587, 590.

It is not essential to the validity of a bequest that a testator should use the word "give" or "bequeath," or other expression of similar signification. In re Thompson, 5 Dem. Sur. 393, 396.

As limited to personalty.

"Bequeath" is properly applied to gifts by will of personal property, and not realty. Logan v. Logan, 17 Pac. 99, 100, 11 Colo. 44; Delafeld v. Barlow, 14 N. E. 438, 500, 107 N. Y. 535; Haug v. Schumacher, 60 N. E. 245, 246, 166 N. Y. 506; Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522; Borgner v. Brown, 33 N. E. 92, 94, 133 Ind. 391; Lasher v. Lasher (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 106, 109; In re Hoover's Estate, 7 N. Y. Supp. 283, 54 Hun, 106.

"Where a testator uses the word 'bequeathed' instead of the words 'bequeath and devise,' in the disposition of property stated in the will to have been 'bequeathed' to her, it shows an intention to confine the operation of the will to personal property only." Laing v. Barbour, 119 Mass. 523, 525.

The word "bequeath" is commonly used with reference to the disposition of personal property, so that, as used in a statute which provides that no nuncupative will shall be good when the estate bequeathed shall exceed in value $150—that is, not proved as therein prescribed—the estate which may be bequeathed by a nuncupative will is thereby limited to personal estate. And such a will bequeathing real estate is of no effect. In re Davis' Will, 79 N. W. 761, 762, 103 Wis. 455.

The word "bequeath" is more properly used in a will to designate a mere gift of personal property, while the word "devise" should be added to the other words if real estate is also included in the gift.—Scholle v. Scholle, 21 N. E. 84, 85, 113 N. Y. 261.

Gen. St. 1886, c. 69, §§ 2, 3, relating to bequests to married women, has reference to both real and personal property. Leighton v. Sheldon, 16 Minn. 243, 247 (Gil. 214, 219).

BEQUEATH ABSOLUTELY.

It was said in Yocum v. Siler, 160 Mo. 281, 289, 61 S. W. 203, 212: "By the words 'bequeath absolutely,' testator unquestionably intended to devise to his son his whole estate in said lands. These words are ample for that purpose in a will, and it is unnecessary to cite precedents to establish that it has been often so held." Roth v. Rauschenbusch, 73 S. W. 664, 665, 173 Mo. 582, 61 L. R. A. 455.

BEQUEATHMENT.

"Bequeathments," as used in a will providing that a testator's plantation should be equally divided between his two sons, and that, if the testator's wife should remain his widow and should live until his sons came to their plantation, then the sons should have the testator's stock and farming utensils, and that, if any of the testator's children or his present wife should die without lawful issue, the "bequeathments" to them should descend to the survivors, must be limited to the personal bequest made to the testator's children by his last wife, and hence J. and N. take the estates in fee simple. Blackwell v. Blackwell, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 386, 392.

BEQUEST.

See "Conditional Bequest"; "Contingent Bequest"; "Executory Bequest."

As contract, see "Contract."

Charitable bequest, see "Charity."

The word "bequest" is a word appropriated to a testamentary disposition of personalty. In re Fetrow's Estate, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 424, 427; Still v. Spear, 45 Pa. (9 Wright) 168, 171.

"Bequest" technically means a testamentary disposition of personalty, and is not accurately applied to a testamentary disposition of land. Fetrow's Estate, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 424, 427.

It is not essential to the validity of a bequest that a testator should use the word "give" or "bequeath," or other expression of similar signification. In re Thompson, 5 Dem. Sur. 393, 396.

A bequest is a gift by will of personal property, but, in order to favor the manifest intention of the testator as shown by the context of his will, the courts often construe the word "bequest" to mean devise, and the word "devise" to mean bequest. Rountree v. Pursell, 39 N. E. 747, 749, 11 Ind. App. 522; Ladd v. Harvey, 21 N. H. (1 Post.) 514, 528; In re Stumpenhousen's Estate, 79 N. W. 376, 377, 108 Iowa, 555.

Where a codicil revoking the devise of a house and lot uses the word "bequest" instead of "devise," "bequest" is to be construed as synonymous with "devise." Thompson v. Gaut, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 310, 313.

The word "bequest" may mean any gift by will, whether it consists of personal or real property. As used in Dower Act 1845, authorizing the widow to elect whether to renounce the benefit of a devise or bequest and take dower and her distributive share of the husband's personal estate, it is a controvertible term with "devise," and includes a gift by will of land, and interest therein.

as well as personal property. Evans v. Price, 8 N. E. 854, 857, 118 Ill. 593.

The word "bequest," if so intended in a will, will pass real estate. Wyman v. Woodbury, 33 N. Y. Supp. 217, 220, 86 Hun, 277.

Legacy synonymous.

In the construction of statutes, the words "bequest" and "legacy" shall be held to mean the same thing, and to embrace and include either real or personal estate or both. Ky. St. 1903, § 467.

BEREFT OF REASON.

One is "bereft of reason," so as to be excusable for failure to give notice of a personal injury, where he was mentally disqualified so to do. Whitney v. Town of Londonderry, 54 Vt. 41.

A statute exempting such persons as are injured on the highway from giving notice of such injuries, if thereby they are bereft of reason, does not mean that one who by slight injuries is temporarily deprived of his reason, or who by reason of the faintness or concussion from a sudden fall is left insensible for a short time, but when reaction takes place the mind resumes its natural and normal state, is bereft of reason, within the meaning of the statute. But if, after the primary effects of the injury have subsided, and time and opportunity are given for the mind and reason to resume their functions, and they cannot perform them, not from mere pain or weakness, but because their functions are deranged, disordered, or abated, and the party is then left in such a state that he is incapable of exercising his reasoning powers so as to understand simple matters of business, like giving a notice in such case, and that continued for 20 days or more, then his state and condition was that of one bereft of his reason. But if the injured person, after the primary effects of the injury have passed, and the physical system has the time and opportunity to resume its normal condition, is still left in a state of insanity, insensibility, or otherwise deprived of his reason, and that condition is, in character, fixed, then, if never, or in a longer or shorter time, his reason may return to him, the fact is established that by the injury he was bereft of his reason. Gonyeau v. Town of Milton, 48 Vt. 172, 174.

BERME BANK.

The berme bank of a canal is the bank opposite the towpath; is a hitching place for boats when not in motion; forms a place for boatmen and canal repairers to walk along the canal; is a place to load and unload cargoes; is a place to pass to and from, to keep the canal in repair when necessary. Morris Canal & Banking Co. v. Fagin, 22 N. J. Eq. (7 C. E. Green) 430, 437.

BERRIES.

Tariff Act 1842, exempting from duty berries or vegetables used principally in dyeing or composing dyes, applies to the berries in their native state, and not after they are transmuted by manufacture into a substance which takes a different denomination in commerce. Schneider v. Lawrence (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 715, 716.

The expression "berries edible in their natural condition," in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule G, par. 262, 30 Stat. 171 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1651], means berries which are in their natural condition as imported, and are edible either in that state or cooked; and foxberries, imported in casks filled with water—the function of the water not being to chemically change the berries or to act as a preservative, but to furnish a cushion against the injuries incident to transportation, similar to that furnished by sawdust in the transportation of grapes—are in their natural condition, and are dutiable under said provision, and not under paragraph 559 of said act, § 2, Free list, 30 Stat. 198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1679], relating to "berries green, ripe or dried, not provided for." Boak v. United States (U. S.) 125 Fed. 599, 600, 60 C. C. A. 335.

BESIDES.

Testator's will recited, "I leave and bequeath to my niece all the money I die possessed of besides all I bequeathed to her in my former will." Held, that the word "besides" meant in addition to, over and above, outside of, and the language was sufficiently certain to transfer to the niece whatever money the testator had at his death. In re Beckett's Will, 103 N. Y. 167, 177, 8 N. E. 506, 508.

BESOT.

To "besot" is to stupify; to make dull or senseless; to make to dote; and "to dote" is to be delirious, silly, or insane. Such is the meaning of the word in an offer in a libel case to prove that defendant's mind at the time of speaking the words complained of was so besotted by a long course of dissipation that no one would believe him. It is error not to admit such evidence in mitigation of damages and to disprove malice. Gates v. Meredith, 7 Ind. 440, 441.

BEST.

See "Deemed Best"; "Think Best."

The use of the word "best" in a provision in a will authorizing the trustee to pay to testator's granddaughter such portion of the income from a trust fund amounting to $60,000 a year as he might consider best, during her natural life, does not show that the bequest was for her maintenance, as it did not oblige the trustee to pay her any amount, and he might at any time withhold the entire income. Bartlett v. Slater, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 53 Conn. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 73.

A contract to erect a building of "the best lumber" construed to mean the best lumber of which buildings were ordinarily constructed at that place. McIntire v. Barnes, 4 Colo. 285.

A letter from an agent for one piano, in which he had spoken of selling a certain piano for the "best," is not to be construed as meaning that such piano is superior to all others. "Things may be best, in the sense of ranking in the very first class, without being superior to each other; and one piano may be best for one purpose, and another for another." Whittemore v. Weiss, 33 Mich. 348, 354.

The use of the word "Best," in a certain arrangement, held to constitute a colorable imitation of complainant's mark on packages of flour. Pillsbury v. Pillsbury-Washburn Flourmills Co. (U. S.) 64 Fed. 841, 847, 12 C. C. A. 432.

BEST BIDDER.

Bates' Ann. St. Ohio, § 2435-7, giving a board of public officers authority to make a contract with the "lowest and best bidder," confers upon the board a discretion with respect to awarding the contract, which cannot be controlled by mandamus. State v. Hermann, 59 N. E. 104, 63 Ohio St. 440.

BEST EVIDENCE.

The "best evidence" means the best evidence which can be adduced in the nature of the case. Scott v. State, 3 Tex. App. 103, 104.

The term "best evidence," as used in the statement of the rule that, where the "best evidence" the nature of the case will admit of cannot be had, the "best evidence" that can be had shall be allowed, means that, if the best legal evidence cannot be produced, the best legal evidence that can be had should be admitted. Gray v. Pentland (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 23, 34.

Within the rule in the production of evidence which requires the best evidence of which the case is susceptible, the term "best evidence" does not demand the greatest amount of evidence which can possibly be given of any fact, but its design is to prevent the introduction of any which, from the nature of the case, supposes that better evidence is in the possession of the parties. Thus a title by deed must be proved by the production of the deed itself, if it is within the power of the party, for this is the best evidence of which the case is susceptible. Manhattan Matting Co. v. Sweteland, 36 Pac. 84, 14 Mont. 269.

The rule requiring the production of the best evidence of which the case is susceptible does not demand the greatest amount of evidence which can be given on the litigated fact. Its design is to prevent the introduction of any where the law presumes or the proof shows that better evidence is in the possession or under the control of the party. The rule only excludes that evidence which indicates the existence of more original sources of information, and the term is confined to cases where there exists, or is presumed to exist, primary as well as secondary evidence. United States Sugar Refinery v. E. P. Allis Co., 9 U. S. App. 550, 554, 6 C. C. A. 121, 56 Fed. 786.

Nothing more is intended by the rule that the "best evidence" is required than that evidence which is merely substitutionary in its nature shall not be received so long as the original evidence can be supplied. "It does not allow secondary evidence to be substituted for that such is primary. It will not permit the contents of a deed or other written instrument to be proved by parol when the instrument itself can be produced. It has nothing to do with the choice of witnesses. It never excludes a witness upon the ground that another is more credible or reliable." Hence the testimony of one who was present and heard a witness testify in a former trial as to what such witness testified to is not objectionable on the ground that it is not the best evidence, and that the legally appointed stenographer who took notes of the testimony could give better evidence. State v. McDonald, 65 Me. 466, 467.

"The term 'best evidence' is confined to cases where the law has divided testimony into primary and secondary. And there are no degrees of evidence, except where some document or other instrument exists, the contents of which should be proved by an original, rather than by other testimony, which is open to danger of inaccuracy. But where living witnesses are placed on the stand, one is, in law, on the same footing with another. If he can testify at all, he can testify in the presence as well as in the absence of those who may be supposed wiser or more reliable." Elliott v. Van Buren, 83 Mich. 49, 53, 20 Am. Rep. 668.

BEST HE CAN.

Where defendant employed cotton brokers to buy for him certain cotton, not to exceed a certain price, the instructions to the broker being "the best you can," the phrase "the best you can" meant that they were to have the largest possible discretion to buy as opportunity should offer at prices not exceeding the prescribed limit. Marland v. Stanwood, 101 Mass. 470, 477.

An agent authorized to sell certain personalty, doing the "best he can" with it, and treating it as it were his own, has authority to ship the property to another market than that in which he resides, where such shipments are common, and seem to the agent to be for the best interests of all the parties. McMorris v. Simpson (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 610.

A statute requiring the tax lister to ascertain, "as best he can," the property owned by a person failing to make an inventory of his taxable property, is to be construed as giving the lister the right to use all lawful means in ascertaining the amount of property belonging to such person. Taylor v. Moore, 21 Atl. 919, 921, 63 Vt. 60.

BEST HORSE IN THE WORLD.

A statement in negotiations leading to the sale of a horse that it is the best horse in the world does not constitute a false representation, even though known to be false by the maker, but is a mere puffing of the value of the horse. State v. Hefner, 84 N. C. 751, 753.

BEST INFORMATION.

An assessor required to act upon the best information he can obtain, on failure of taxpayer to furnish any report as to the property, may act upon the information obtained by inquiring of those likely to know, and from his own judgment upon the general facts of the case, and it is sufficient if he ascertains enough to found upon it an honest belief that the taxpayer has taxable property which he keeps back from taxation. Town of Hartford v. Champion, 54 Conn. 436, 7 Atl. 721.

BEST KNOWN APPLIANCES.

"The phrase 'best known appliances' is susceptible of different interpretations. It may be taken to mean the best appliances known, or the best approved or acknowledged appliances, or those appliances which are best known." As used in an instruction that a railroad company was required to use such appliances, it was held to mean such appliances as the progress of science and improvement had shown, by experience, to be the best, and which had become generally known. It was error to use the phrase without defining its meaning. Hagan v. Chicago, D. & C. G. T. J. R. Co., 49 N. W. 509, 511, 86 Mich. 615.

BEST OF ABILITY.

The words "to the best of my ability," in the oath of an officer to so perform the duties of his office, are not a compliance with the statute requiring an oath to fully and impartially discharge such duties. Hayter v. Benner, 52 Atl. 351, 352, 67 N. J. Law, 359.

The official bond of a treasurer of a school district was conditioned that he would well and truly fulfill the duties of his office, "to the best of his ability and according to law." Held, that the words "to the best of his ability" were insufficient to constitute a condition, and therefore did not limit the treasurer's obligation; the court saying, "The words 'best of his ability' cannot be construed as a condition exempting the officer from performance of his duty on account of accident, on the ground that he was not possessed of the requisite ability." The moneys in said treasurer's care being accidentally consumed by fire, "without want of care and diligence on his part," he was to be held liable, as though the words "best of his ability" did not occur in the bonds; these words expressing no condition restricting the defendant's liability. Union Dist. Tp. v. Smith, 39 Iowa, 9, 12, 18 Am. Rep. 39.

BEST OF HIS INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

An affidavit that an information is true, according to the best of the affiant's information and belief, will be construed to be a verification upon information and belief, as required by Comp. Laws, § 1879. State v. Whisner, 10 Pac. 852, 857, 35 Kan. 271.

BEST OF HIS KNOWLEDGE AND BELIEF.

The phrase "to the best of deponent's knowledge and belief" is of judicial origin, and its import is the same as the phrase "so far as the deponent knows, and as he verily believes." Both imply that the deponent has information or evidence of the facts asserted, which, though it may not amount to certain knowledge, is, in his judgment, sufficient to justify a conclusion of the facts to which he swears. Diehl v. Perle (Pa.) 2 Miles, 47, 49.

An affidavit of defense, stating certain facts to be to the best of the "knowledge and belief" of affiant is insufficient, as it does not mean affiant's actual personal knowledge. First Nat. Bank of Clarion v. Gregg, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 384, 387.

BEST OF THEIR JUDGMENT.

The words "impartially and according to the best of their judgment" in Act June 13, 1836, which requires the taking of an oath by persons selected to assess damages, to perform their duties impartially and according to the best of their judgment, has not the same meaning as the words "faithfully to discharge their duties," and therefore an oath in the latter words is insufficient. In re Nicetown Lane (Pa.) 32 Leg. Int. 28.

BEST ROUTE.

The laying out of the most feasible road between two fixed bounds is not necessarily equivalent to the laying out of the best route for the accommodation of public travel between the same bounds. In the one case the test is arbitrary and unyielding. In the other it is governed by a reasonable public necessity. Spaulding v. Town of Groton, 44 Atl. 88, 89, 68 N. H. 77.

BESTIALITY.

As buggery, see "Buggery."

Bestiality is sexual connection between a human being and a brute of the opposite sex. Ausman v. Veal, 10 Ind. 355, 356, 71 Am. Dec. 331.

BESTOW.

"Bestowed" means used or placed, and never means performed, so that, as used in Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 1183, providing that certain persons shall have a lien upon property upon which they have bestowed labor, it does not require the person to labor personally, but gives a lien to one who has caused his employes to perform labor. Macomber v. Bigelow, 58 Pac. 312, 314, 126 Cal. 9.

To "bestow" is to give, confer, impart, so that a direction in a will giving the residue of the estate, to be bestowed as he may wisely direct, indicates a gift to some one other than the trustee. In re Foley's Will, 10 N. Y. Supp. 12, 13, 2 Con. Sur. 298.

BET.

A bet is ordinarily an agreement between two or more persons that a sum of money or some valuable thing, in contributing which all agree to take part, shall become the property of one or more of them on the happening in the future of an event, at the present uncertain, or upon the ascertainment of a fact in dispute. Rich v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 198, 200, 42 S. W. 291, 38 L. R. A. 719.

It is difficult to give a legal definition of a "bet." In ordinary acceptance, a bet is a placing of something valuable belonging in part to each of two individuals in such a position that it is to become the sole property of one on the result of some unsettled question. Each of the parties risks something which he may lose, and each may gain something beyond what he risks, and it does not apply to a case where a physician performs a service for which he is entitled to compensation, but which he agrees to relinquish, on it being shown that the person for whom he renders the service was not a pauper having a settlement in the town in which the service was rendered. Edson v. Town of Pawlet, 22 Vt. 291, 293.

"A bet is a promise upon the part of each of the betting parties to pay to the other party the amount of his debt if he loses." McGrath v. Kennedy, 2 Atl. 438, 439, 15 R. I. 209.

A bet is where each party contributes money or some valuable thing, termed the "stake," getting a chance to gain a portion or all of that constituting the stake, and taking a chance to lose his own contribution. Harris v. White, 81 N. Y. 532, 539.

The words "wagering," "playing," "gaming," and "betting," though each have a meaning more or less different from the other, are often used one for the other. Thrower v. State, 45 S. E. 126, 127, 117 Ga. 753.

The mere statement that a defendant bet at a pool table, without more, is insufficient proof of the fact that he bet anything of value other than what is charged for the use of the table. Bone v. State, 63 Ala. 185, 186.

Gaming distinguished.

In common usage the term "betting" may sometimes be employed interchangeably with gaming, but not always. If two persons play at cards for money they are said to be gambling or gaming; but they are gaming because they lay a wager, or make a bet on the result of the game; and therefore to say they are betting is equally appropriate. If two persons lay a wager on the result of a pending election it will be said that they are betting, but not that they are gaming. There is no gaming in which the element of the wager is wanting, but there is betting which the term "gaming" is not commonly used to express. People v. Weitthoff, 16 N. W. 442, 445, 51 Mich. 203, 47 Am. Rep. 557. See, also, Thrower v. State, 45 S. E. 126, 127, 117 Ga. 753.

As hazard on uncertain event.

A "wager" or "bet" is a contract by which two or more persons agree that a certain sum of money, or other thing, shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening, or not happening, of an uncertain event. Jacobus v. Hazlett, 78 Ill. App. 239, 241.

Code, § 1129, forbidding an adult to "bet" money or anything of value with a minor, means to hazard a sum ascertained or something of value upon the future happening of some event then uncertain. Martin v. State (Miss.) 14 South. 530.

"Betting" commonly means the putting of a certain sum of money or valuable thing at stake on the happening or not happening of some uncertain event. Shaw v. Clark, 13 N. W. 786, 787, 49 Mich. 384, 43 Am. Rep. 474.

A bet is a mutual agreement, a tender of a gift of something valuable, which is to belong to the one or the other of the contending parties according to the result of a trial of chance or skill, or both combined. Long v. State, 2 S. W. 541, 22 Tex. App. 194, 58 Am. Rep. 633.

A bet or wager is ordinarily an agreement between two or more that a sum of money, in contributing which all agreeing take part, shall become the property of one of them on the happening in the future of an event at present uncertain. People v. Fallon, 39 N. Y. Supp. 865, 869, 4 App. Div. 82.

A bet is usually executory on both sides, isolated and determined by events independent of any action of the parties; and thus a game in which a price is paid for a chance of a prize, and it is determined by a mechanical device worked by the manager of the game, according to the scheme held out to the public, whether he who pays the money is to have the prize or nothing, is not a wager, but a lottery. Commonwealth v. Wright, 137 Mass. 250, 251, 50 Am. Dec. 306.

Any contract or agreement for the purchase, sale, loan, payment, or use of any property, real or personal, the terms of which are made to depend upon or are to be varied and affected by any uncertain event in which the parties have no interest, except that created by such contract or agreement, shall be deemed a bet or a wager. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 818, c. 270, § 18.

Premium, purse, or award distinguished.

"A bet or wager is ordinarily an agreement between two or more that a sum of money or some valuable thing, in contributing which all agreeing take part, shall become the property of one or some of them on the happening in the future of an event at present uncertain. There must be two or more contracting parties having mutual rights in respect to the money or other thing wagered or staked, and each of the parties necessarily risks something, and has a chance of making something, on the happening or not happening of an uncertain event. A purse or prize offered by a party, and to be awarded to the successful competitor in a contest in which such party does not engage nor has any chance of gaining, but only perhaps of losing, is without the elements of a chance of gain or a risk of loss, and hence is not a bet or wager." Misner v. Knapp, 9 Pac. 65, 66, 13 Or. 135, 57 Am. Rep. 6.

"The distinction between a bet or wager and a premium or purse is thus given in Harris v. White, 81 N. Y. 532: A bet or wager is ordinarily an agreement between two or more that a sum of money, or some valuable thing, in contributing which all agreeing take part, shall become the property of one or some one of them on the happening in the future of an event at the present uncertain, and the stake is the money or thing thus put on the chance. There is in that this element that does not enter into a modern purse, prize, or premium, viz., that each party to the former gets a chance of gain from the others, and takes a risk of loss of his own to them. The purse, prize, or premium is ordinarily some valuable thing offered by a person for the doing of something by others, into the strife for which he does not enter. He has not a chance of gaining the thing offered, and if he abide by his offer that he must lose it and give it over to some of those contending for it is reasonably certain." Competing for premiums offered by an association of horse races is not competing for bets or wagers, and therefore an agreement between two owners of horses to pool all premiums and stake moneys awarded on their horses and to divide the same equally is valid. Hankins v. Ottinger, 47 Pac. 254, 255, 115 Cal. 454, 40 L. R. A. 76; Porter v. Day, 37 N. W. 259, 261, 71 Wis. 296; Morrison v. Bennett, 52 Pac. 553, 557, 20 Mont. 560, 40 L. R. A. 158; Porter v. Day, 37 N. W. 259, 261, 71 Wis. 296.

In a wager or a bet there must be two parties, and it is known, before the chance or uncertain event on which it is laid is accomplished, who are the parties who must either lose or win. In a premium or reward there is but one party until the act or thing or purpose for which it is offered has been accomplished. A premium is a reward or recompense for some act done; a wager is a stake on an uncertain event. In a premium it is known who is to give before the event; in a wager it is not known until after the event. Alvord v. Smith, 63 Ind. 58, 62; People v. Fallon, 39 N. Y. Supp. 865, 869; Hankins v. Ottinger (Cal.) 47 Pac. 254, 255, 40 L. R. A. 76; Treacy v. Chinn, 79 Mo. App. 648, 651; Alvord v. Smith, 63 Ind. 58, 59; Delier v. Plymouth Agricultural Soc., 10 N. W. 872, 874, 57 Iowa, 481.

Purchase of options.

The essential elements of an ordinary wagering contract are (1) an agreement by one party to pay another a sum of money, or give something of value, if a certain event happens; (2) a reciprocal agreement by the second party to pay the first a sum of money, or give something of value, if a certain contrary event happens; and (3) that the events contemplated in the agreement shall be something other than the passing of a consideration between the parties. In a wagering contract upon the price of stock both parties assume the risk of either gaining or losing. In a legitimate transaction through an agent or broker, the agent or broker assumes no risk, except that the principal may not be able to carry out his agreement. In Wagner v. Hildebrand, 41 Atl. 34, 36, 187 Pa. 136, the court says: "A purchase of stock on margin for speculation is not necessarily a gambling transaction. If it is the intention of the parties that a real purchase shall be made by the broker, although the delivery may be postponed or made to depend upon future conditions the transaction is legal." Windward v. Lincoln, 51 Atl. 106, 112, 23 R. I. 476.

"Betting," in common speech, means the putting of a certain sum of money or other valuable thing at stake on the happening or not happening of some uncertain event. A purchase of options is not betting, in this sense, though it resembles it in the fact that risks are taken on uncertain events, and that the tendency to those engaged in it is demoralizing. Shaw v. Clark, 13 N. W. 786, 787, 49 Mich. 384, 43 Am. Rep. 474.

As a wager.

"Bet" is synonymous with "wager." It implies risk, but does not necessarily imply risk in both parties. "There must be between them a chance of gain and a chance of loss, but it does not follow that each of the parties to the bet must have both these chances. If from the terms of the engagement one of the parties may gain but cannot lose, and the other may lose but cannot gain, and there must be either a gain by the one and a loss by the other according to the benefit of the contingency, it is as much a bet or wager as if the parties had shared equally the chances of gain and loss." Shumate v. Commonwealth (Va.) 15 Grat. 653, 660.

A bet as a wager. Cassard v. Hinman, 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Bosw.) 207, 213.

"A bet is a wager or stake laid upon the result of a game or upon a certain result arising from other things than games. 'Bet' and 'wager' are synonymous terms, and are applied both to the contract of betting and wagering and to the thing or sum bet or wagered. For example, one bets or wagers, or lays a bet or wager, of so much upon a certain result, but these terms cannot properly be applied to the act to be done or event to happen upon which the bet or wager is laid. Bets or wagers may be laid upon acts to be done, events to happen, or facts existing or to exist. Bets or wagers may be illegal, and the acts, events, or facts upon which they the laid may not be." Woodcock v. McQueen, 11 Ind. 14, 16.

A bet is a wager, and the betting is complete when the offer to bet is accepted. State v. Welch (Ala.) 7 Port. 463, 465.

A wager is something hazarded on the issue of an uncertain event. A bet is a wager, though a wager is not necessarily a bet. Cassard v. Hinman, 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Bosw.) 207, 212.

Bet at a gaming bank.

A statute providing a punishment for the offense of "betting at a gaming bank," exhibited for the purpose of gaming, means the betting by some one other than the exhibitor or dealer of the game. Where the exhibitor and dealer of the game known as monte made a bet with one of the persons betting at such game that such person had made a bad bet, "it was a bet by the gaming bank against a player, the same as any other bet between the bank and those playing against it. A gaming bank does not bet against itself, but against those who bet at it. Defendant could not exhibit the game and at the same time bet at it." Askey v. State, 20 Tex. App. 443, 444.

The phrase "keeping a gaming table or bank" correctly describes one who stands behind a table and throws dice, taking the bids of all others thereon, and therefore such a person cannot be convicted of betting on such a game. Shaw v. State (Tex.) 33 S. W. 1078.

To furnish another with money to set up a faro bank and receive a part of the winnings is not a betting. O'Blennis v. State, 12 Mo. 311, 312.

The term "betting," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting betting at any gaming table, includes playing pool with a tacit understanding that the loser is to pay the table rent. Hall v. State (Tex.) 34 S. W. 122.

Bet on an election.

A statute making it criminal to "bet on an election" is to be construed as including a bet that one candidate will beat another. Commonwealth v. Pash, 39 Ky. (9 Dana) 31.

To "bet on" an election is in effect to bet on the result of an election, and is an apt phrase to designate a bet upon the success or defeat of a candidate. Commonwealth v. Avery, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 625, 633, 29 Am. Rep. 429.

In the statute making it an offense to bet on an election the words "bet on election" mean bet on the result. State v. Griggs, 11 S. E. 740, 741, 34 W. Va. 78.

Betting on the result of an election after it has been held is not betting on an election. State v. McLelland, 36 Tenn. (4 Sneed) 437, 438.

The term "election," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting betting on an election, applies as well to an election which has been held, but before the result is known, as to an election to be held in the future. Terrall v. Adams, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 570, 571.

The term "bet on an election," within the meaning of a statute making such an act criminal, includes a bet upon the vote of a county in a general election, or of a precinct in a district or county election. Commonwealth v. Kennedy, 54 Ky. (15 B. Mon.) 531, 533.

St. Law, 478, declares that if any person shall wager or bet any sum of money, or other thing, on the election of any officers (among whom are members of the general assembly), within six months before election, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of $100, to be recovered by indictment. Held, that "on the election" did not necessarily mean only a bet or wager on the succession of either party, but embraces a bet or wager on or about the "election" to be held in any form by which undue exertions might be stimulated to operate upon, influence, or control the free and unbiased exercise of the right of voting. Commonwealth v. Kirk, 43 Ky. (4 B. Mon.) 1, 2.

The terms "bet," "hazard," and "wager," applied to the result of an election, include the act of selling property for more than its value, payable or not upon the contingency of the result of the election. Somers v. State, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 438, 439.

Where defendant proposed to bet $25 on an election, and the other party put up $5, and defendant put up the $25 with the agreement that the $5 was to be forfeited unless the other $20 was put up within a specified time, and the $5 was forfeited to defendant, it did not constitute a betting on an election. Rich v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 198, 200, 42 S. W. 291, 38 L. R. A. 719.

Bet on a game.

"Betting on a game" is the mutual agreement and tender of a gift or something valuable, which is to belong to the one or to the other of the contending parties, according to the result of such trial. The ordinary rules of the game constitute the terms of the agreement, and define the contingency on which one or the other is to receive the gift. The staking of the money or other property is an ostensible adoption or sanction of such agreement, and also a conditional tender. When the trial is accomplished, the result tells who is the winner. Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

It is betting where parties enter into a game of cards with the understanding that the loser shall pay the bill of the company, or for liquor used by the party. Bachelor v. State, 10 Tex. 258, 262.

The term "betting on a game," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting betting on games, includes wagering drinks, cigars, or anything of value on a game. Humphreys v. State, 30 S. W. 1066, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 434.

Bet on a horse race.

The term does not include betting on horse races. Morrison v. Bennett, 52 Pac. 553, 557, 20 Mont. 560, 40 L. R. A. 158.

BETTER.

The fourth section of the act of 1823, declaring what should be evidence in certain cases, provided that the certificate of any register of any United States land office of the entry of any tract of land within his district should be deemed evidence of title in the party who made such entry, etc., "unless a better legal and paramount title be exhibited for the same." Held, that the words "better legal and paramount title" did not mean any title which might remain in the United States, but referred to cases where the United States had not the title at the time of the sale and issuing of the certificate, as, for example, land covered by British and French grants, some of which the government recognized. McConnell v. Wilcox, 2 Ill. (1 Scam.) 344, 376.

BETTERMENT.

"Betterments" is a term used to designate improvements, etc., on real estate by which the property is increased in value. French v. City of New York, 16 How. Prac. 220; Chase v. City of Sioux City, 53 N. W. 333, 334, 86 Iowa, 603.

All buildings are better for being repaired, but "betterment" means something more than mere repairs, and may be said to mean improvements upon the building itself, or so near to it as to enhance its value. Any addition or alteration made to the building, or expense incurred for draining or paving for warehouse, whether temporary or permanent, for the special accommodation of tenants, such as engines, boilers, furnaces for heating, elevators, gas engines, asphalt pavement, opening and widening streets adjacent to the property, are to be classed as betterments. Abell v. Brady, 28 Atl. 817, 820, 79 Md. 94.

BETTERMENT STATUTES.

Statutes which provide that a bona fide occupant making lasting improvements in good faith shall have a lien upon the estate recovered by the real owner to the extent that his improvements have increased the value of the land are called "betterment" or "occupant" statutes. Jones v. Great Southern Fireproof Hotel Co. (U. S.) 86 Fed. 370, 386, 30 C. C. A. 108.

BETWEEN.

The word "between," in a plea stating that on a certain day an account in writing was made up and stated "between" two certain parties, is insufficient to show that both parties to the settlement were present when the account was made out and stated, or that both of them saw and examined it. Meeker v. Marsh, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt. Ch.) 198, 203.

Where a way extends across a piece of land, and between two dwellings, and in a grant of the way it is spoken of as "between the dwellings," and also in another portion of the grant as extending the entire length of the lot, the phrase "between the dwellings" is to be construed not as limiting the extent of the way to that portion of it between the dwellings, but as a description of the thing granted. Dunn v. English, 23 N. J. Law (3 Zab.) 126, 129.

The term "between and at," in a mortgage of a railroad, between certain termini, operates to prevent the mortgage from being construed to include part of the railroad lying outside such termini. Chapman v. Pittsburgh & S. R. Co., 26 W. Va. 299, 308.

As exclusive of day.

The word "between," when used in speaking of the period of time "between" two certain days, generally excludes the days designated as the commencement and termination of such period. People v. Hornbeck, 61 N. Y. Supp. 978, 30 Misc. Rep. 212; Kendall v. Kingsley, 120 Mass. 94, 95; Weir v. Thomas, 62 N. W. 871, 872, 44 Neb. 507, 48 Am. St. Rep. 741.

When the word "between" is used with reference to a period of time, bounded by two other specified periods of time, such as between two days named, the days or other periods of time named as boundaries are excluded. A summons issued by a justice of the peace, and made returnable at 8 o'clock a. m. on the day set for the trial, is a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring such process to be returnable between the hours of 8 o'clock a. m. and 4 o'clock p. m., since 8 o'clock is not a period of time, like a day, capable of measurement, and forming a definite period as a boundary, but it is a mere instant of time so minute as to be incapable of being measured and excluded from the time prescribed within which the jurisdiction of the justice can attach. Wihans v. Thorp, 87 Ill. App. 297, 298.

Under a contract whereby merchandise is to be delivered between the date of the contract and a subsequent specified date, each of such days is to be excluded. Fowler v. Rigney (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 182, 184; Cook v. Gray, 6 Ind. 335, 337.

A contract requiring the payment of a certain sum "between now and the first day of September" should be construed to require such payment before the 1st day of September, and not to include such day. Richardson v. Ford, 14 Ill. 332, 333.

Where a statute requires that a certain thing shall be done between one day and another, each of such days is to be excluded. Bunce v. Reed (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 347, 352; Robinson v. Foster, 12 Iowa, 186, 188.

Between, as used in a policy of insurance on goods to be shipped "between" February 1st and July 15th, means an intermediate space of time, and excludes both the 1st day of February and the 15th of July. "The most common use of the word is to denote an intermediate space of time or place, although it is not always so used. We speak of a battle between two armies, a combat, a controversy, or a suit at law between two or more parties; but the word thus used refers to the action of the parties, and does not denote locality or time. If all the land between two buildings or between two other lots of land be granted, then only the intermediate land between the two lots of land or the two buildings would pass by the grant, and the word 'between' has the same meaning when it refers to a period of time from one day, month, or year to another." Atkins v. Boylston Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 439, 440, 39 Am. Dec. 692.

As exclusive of place.

The use of "between" in Act March 22, 1865, authorizing the extension of a street railway between Montgomery and Germantown road, in Philadelphia, with the right to connect the same on any street between such two points, indicated intermediate space which excluded that to which it referred, and hence the corporation had no authority to occupy any part of Germantown road. City of Philadelphia v. Citizens' Pass. Ry. Co., 24 Atl. 1099, 1102, 151 Pa. 128.

The use of "between" in a charter of a railroad company, wherein the road was authorized to locate new lines, when additional tracks should be required at any point or points "between" two cities which were the termini of the road, did not mean that such cities were excluded. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Central R. Co., 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 205, 206, 213.

Where a deed conveyed a water right through any gates "between the slitting mill and the forged dam," the words of the description were necessarily exclusive of the termini, and hence any gates existing at either terminus could not be used by the grantee. Revere v. Leonard, 1 Mass. 91, 93.

"Between" indicates an intermediate space, which excludes and cannot include that to which it refers; and that which lies between one given place and another is something distinct from the place given on either side. Hence if land is granted between one town and another both are excluded from the grant, or if land is conveyed lying between lot No. 1 and lot No. 3 it cannot be pretended that either of these lots passed by the deed. State v. Godfrey (3 Fairf.) 12 Me. 361, 366.

"Between," as used in Act 1854, relating to a railroad company, and declared to be for the purpose of fully protecting business of a company from competition between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, meant from city to city, and did not mean "in the intermediate space," without regard to distance. Delaware & R. Canal Co. v. Raritan & D. B. R. Co., 16 N. J. Eq. (1 O. E. Green) 321, 368.

As inclusive of day.

In Rev. St. § 3331, providing that if labor or services were done or performed between the 1st day of November and the 1st day of May following the claim for a lien shall be filed, etc., the word "between" is used inclusively. McGinley v. Laycock, 68 N. W. 871, 872, 94 Wis. 205.

In devises, as by classes.

In Senger v. Senger's Ex'r, 81 Va. 687, the court, in discussing the various significations of the prepositions "between" and "among," said: "When they follow the verb 'divide' their general signification is very similar, and in popular use they are considered as synonymous, though 'among' denotes a collection, and is never followed by two of a sort, while 'between' may be followed by any plural number, and seems to denote rather the individuals of the class than the class itself generically." As applied to persons and things, the word "between" primarily refers to two, though Webster gives "among" as a synonym, and in a large number of cases the word is used in wills where a per capita devise or legacy was to more than two. In re Morrison's Estate, 71 Pac. 453, 138 Cal. 401.

"Between," as used in a will providing that the residue of the estate should be divided between testatrix's husband's grandchildren and the children of a certain other person, refers properly to two, and not more. It is true that it is not unfrequently used, especially by the uneducated and colloquially in the sense of among, as referring to more than two objects, but that admittedly is not its correct use. In re Ihrie's Estate, 29 Atl. 750, 751, 162 Pa. 369.

In a will reading, "The balance of my property and money I want equally divided between the heirs of William Field and James Field, deceased," the meaning of the clause is that the property is to be equally divided between the heirs of James Field and the heirs of William Field. The word unquestionably conveyed the thought of parts—a distribution with reference to two parts, one part to the heirs of James and the other part to the heirs of William. Not only is this the natural and ordinary meaning of the words, "equally divided between the heirs of William and the heirs of James," but this is also the true etymological signification of the word "between." Webster's Dict. The Century Dict. says: "'Between' is literally applicable only to two objects, but it may be and commonly is used of more than two where they are spoken of distributively, or so that they can be thought of as divided into two parts or categories, or in reference to the action or being of each individually as compared with that of any other or of all the others. Where more than two objects are spoken of collectively or individually, 'among' is the proper word." Records v. Fields, 55 S. W. 1021, 1022, 155 Mo. 314.

The use of "between" in a will providing that certain property was to be equally divided "between" children of two families indicated a division between the two, and not "among" the individuals. The word "between" is commonly used in reference to two only. Stoutenburgh v. Moore, 87 N. J. Eq. (10 Stew.) 63, 69.

The use of "between" in a will providing that property should be equally divided "between" the children of a certain person, naming such children, rhetorically construed is more applicable to two classes than to a greater number of individuals. While this is not necessarily controlling, yet it is not without weight in a case where other considerations are equally poised, and will have the greater weight if the circumstances aside from that are such as to induce the belief that the word is used in its accurate sense. Appeal of Lockwood, 10 Atl. 517, 518, 55 Conn. 157.

Same—Creating tenancy in common.

A devise to two or more persons "between" them makes them tenants in common. Lashbrook v. Cock, 2 Mer. 70; Stetson v. Eastman, 4 Atl. 868, 870.

Same—As per capita.

Strictly speaking, "between" implies a division between two parties or classes, but the reference may often be between more than two parties; so that when the words "between" and "among" follow the word "divide" their general signification is very similar, and in popular use they are synonyms, though "among" denotes a collection, and is never followed by two of any sort, while "between" may be followed by any plural number, and seems to refer to individuals of a class rather than to the class itself. Senger v. Senger's Ex'r, 81 Va. 698; Ward v. Tompkins, 30 N. J. Eq. (3 Stew.) 3, 4; Lord v. Moore, 20 Conn. 122; Myres v. Myres, 23 How. Prac. 410. And hence "between," used in a will dividing property between my sisters and my wife's sisters and brothers, divides the property per capita, and not per stirpes. Kling v. Schellbecker, 78 N. W. 673, 107 Iowa, 636.

Testatrix's will declared that she left all the residuum of her estate to G. and the children of G., to be divided between said G. and the children. Held, that the word "between" meant "among"; that the children and mother took per capita, and not by moieties, between the mother on the one hand and the children as a class on the other. Graves v. Graves, 8 N. Y. Supp. 284, 5 Hun, 58.

The use of "between" in a devise to the children of D., of which there were two, to be equally divided between them as they should, respectively, come to the age of 21 years, is not sufficient to exclude a child born to D. after the testator's death, as "between" does not necessarily mean between two, but may be treated as "among," and such child was entitled to an equal share with the two children which were born to D. prior to the testator's death. Ward v. Tompkins, 30 N. J. Eq. (3 Stew.) 3, 4.

The use of "between" in a will providing that the trustees should divide a certain estate equally between wife and children did not mean that the wife should have a share equal to that of all the children, but only an equal share with one of the children. Lord v. Moore, 20 Conn. 122, 126.

In a will in which the testator directed that a certain fund should be divided between certain heirs, "between" imports a division of the fund into parts to be given to the devisees per capita. The word "between" is often used as synonymous with "among," especially when employed to convey the idea of division or separate ownership of property held in common. It is quite as appropriate to say that property is to be divided "between" A., B., and C. as "among" A., B., and C. Webster says: "We observe that the word 'between' is not restricted to two, thus: 'Twenty proprietors owned a tract of land between them.'" And in Lord v. Moore, 20 Conn. 122, the testator, leaving a wife and four children, gave the income of the residue of his estate to be equally divided between his wife and children, and it was held that the wife took a share of the income equal only to that of one of the children. Therefore the word "between," used in that sense, imports a division of the fund into as many equal parts as there are beneficiaries, each beneficiary being entitled to one part per capita. Myres v. Myres (N. Y.) 23 How. Prac. 410, 415.

The prepositions "among" and "between" are often capable of different meaning, according to their collocation and connection, as the same are differently used and placed to express different ideas. But when the prepositions "between" and "among" follow the verb "divide" their general signification is very similar, and in popular use are considered synonymous, though "among" denotes a collection and is never followed by two of any sort, whilst "between" may be followed by any plural number, and seems to denote rather the individuals of the class than the class itself generically; but, whatever importance may be attached to such philological refinements, it is certain that the general rule is that where a bequest is made to several persons in general terms, indicating that they are to take equally as tenants in common, each individual will take the same share, or, in other words, the legatees will take per capita. Senger v. Senger's Ex'r, 81 Va. 687, 698.

Same—As requiring distribution to all.

A will directing a testator's widow to divide his real estate between his children to the best advantage, as she sees fit and proper, does not give the widow a right to exclude any of them in the division of the estate. Faloon v. Flannery, 76 N. W. 954, 955, 74 Minn. 38.

Between high and low water marks.

The term "between high and low water marks," as used in connection with a river which is not a tidal stream, has reference to the difference between the river at floods and at its ordinary stage. Mobile Transp. Co. v. Mobile, 23 Sup. Ct. 170, 173, 187 U. S. 479, 47 L. Ed. 266.

Between two particular ports.

The words, "between New Orleans and any port in the West Indies or the United States," in a marine policy insuring a vessel journeying between New Orleans and any port in the West Indies or the United States, imports that New Orleans is to be one of the termini of the vessels insured, and therefore the policy does not cover a vessel while on a voyage from a port of the West Indies to a port of the United States. Lippincott v. Louisiana Ins. Co., 2 La. 399, 400.

Between two rivers.

The territory lying "between" two rivers is the whole country from their sources to their mouths, and, if no fork of either has acquired the name in exclusion to the other, the main branch to its source must be considered as the true river. Any other rule would be arbitrary, depending on caprice, and not on principle. Doddridge v. Thompson, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 469, 470, 473, 6 L. Ed. 137.

Between two streets.

The word "between" has different meanings, according to the use to which it is applied. In measuring streets it excludes the objects which bound it. Webster describes it as "the immediate space intervening, without regard to distance," and gives as an instance the phrase, "New York is between Boston and Philadelphia." Also, "Pennsylvania is between New Jersey and Ohio," and "the Delaware River is between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, but neither is a part of the other." A street railway company, authorized by its charter to lay its
